In his attitude toward Christianity itself the Burman has changed even more; especially great and rapid has been the change in the last decade or decade and a half. Instead of the long-continued, contemptuous indifference and bitter hostility of earlier days, there is now active investigation and frank appreciation. Hitherto missionary successes in Burma have been largely among the tribes of hill peoples who make up a few hundreds of thousands of the most backward and least important elements of the population, while the millions of intelligent and dominant Burmans have held aloof or been in active opposition. From now on all is to be different. The influence of western ideas, the results of the new education in which the missionary has been the most potent factor, the daily teaching of the Christian scriptures to all youth in mission schools, the dissemination of Christian truth through millions of pages of tracts, the constant, unwearied preaching of the gospel in every part of the land, and the mighty influence of the daily lives of faithful native converts, both Burman and others, among their Buddhist relatives and neighbors, have slowly, steadily and with ever increasing momentum changed the whole situation. The work for Burmans is now most promising and inviting; the doors are all wide open; the Burmans themselves are interested and inquiring; increasing numbers of Burmans are being baptized; and a widespread ingathering in large numbers in the near future is abundantly assured. Judson waited six weary years after his landing at Rangoon before he had his first baptism, knowing to the full that deferring of hope that maketh the heart sick; his successors of today are rejoicing in large present successes and are looking out upon wide fields already white to the harvest.

Then and now! Then—squalid, ugly discomfort; hardship and sacrifice; idle curiosity, contemptuous indifference, bitter hostility; discouragement and disappointment almost to despair. Now—comfort, peace, hope,

Julian Hawthorne Writes "Pen Points"

Julian Hawthorne, son of Nathaniel Hawthorne, confined in the Federal Prison at Atlanta on a charge of misuse of the mails, cannot conceal the genius within him.

As soon as Mr. Hawthorne entered the ranks of the prisoners, he was made editor of the prison publication, "Good Words." He started a column of editorial paragraphs entitled "Pen Points"—with a grim pun on the word "pen," the widely known abbreviation of "penitentiary." These are examples of his wit in this column:

"We are entitled to our rights—and most of our acquaintances say we are getting them."

"Many a 'high flyer' loses the use of his wings after a sojourn here."

"Thorough research into the origin of the bookworm will prove that it originated in some prison."

"One great pleasure is being here; we hear nothing about the self made man."

"Be sure you are right—if not, ask the guard—then go ahead."

"We get a good discount here, for we get paid in advance."

One of Hawthorne's most poignant contributions to "Good Words" was his poem, written on the occasion of Caruso's visit to the prison. The tenor sang in the auditorium at the request of his countrymen, "Lupo the Wolf" and a dozen other Black Hand operators in confinement. The verses were dedicated to Caruso:

Song of Faith and Hope.

"We sit in our rows of sodden gray
  Up there in the great blank hall;
Through the window bars the great blue day
  And the golden sunshine call.
Call us, as Christ called Lazarus, dead
  To rise and come forth from his grave.
But Christ cares not to free us, we said,
  To give the life God gave.
Better the dead than the living dead
Whom the world shuts out and the bars shut in.
Man-made scape-goats of all men's sin!

"Then, in the hush of the great blank hall,
  God wrought a wondrous miracle.
For a voice, like a glorious trumpet call,
  Arose as a soul from the deeps of hell.
And our souls rose with it on wondrous wings,
Rose from their prison of iron and clay,
Forgot the grime and the shame of things!
  We were men once again in a sunlit day.
Sin and grief and punishment all
Were lost in that human trumpet call.

"Not bars nor banishment can abate
  The strong swift wings of the deathless soul,
Soaring aloft over grief and fate
  As the tones of the master of music roll
Through the gloom and doom of the prison pen,
  Distilling the fragrance of flowering song
Into hearts that remember youth again
  And innocent loves that knew no wrong.
How then, if such be music's spell,
Shall we doubt that Christ still conquers hell?"

A somber poem, "Footfalls," appeared in "Good Words," the April issue, signed with Hawthorne's prison number, and some of the verses follow:

'In the cell over mine, at night,
  A step goes to and fro
From barred door to iron wall,
  From wall to door I hear it go,
  Four paces, heavy and slow,
In the heart of the sleeping jail,
  And the goad that drives, I know!

"Unknown brother of the remorseless bars,
Pent in your cage from earth and sky and stars,
The hunger for lost life that goads you so
I also know.

"Hour by hour, in the cell overhead,
  Four footfalls, to and fro,
'Twixt iron wall and barred door,
  Back and forth I hear them go,
  Four footfalls come and go.
I wake and listen in the night;
  Brother, I know!"

An entire cessation of navy building for one year would work no change in the comparative rating of the powers, and would give them time to appreciate the folly of the present system of naval upbuilding, says Leslie's. The suggestion of such a naval holiday for one year came from Winston Spencer Churchill, First Lord of the Admiralty, in submitting the British naval estimates to the House of Commons.

The three reproductions of Columbus' caravels, the Santa Maria, the Pinta and the Nina, constructed for the World's Columbian Exposition in 1893, have left Jackson Park, Chicago, on the first lap of their journey to the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco in 1915. It is expected the fleet will reach Boston before the beginning of winter. In the spring they will be manned by crews of students from Harvard University and begin their long cruise. They will pass through the Panama Canal and up the Pacific to San Francisco.

ROOSEVELT ON "HITTING SOFTLY."

Nor will clean conduct by itself enable a man to render good service. I have always been fond of Josh Billings' remark that "it is much easier to be a harmless dove than a wise serpent." There are plenty of decent legislators, and plenty of able legislators; but the blamelessness and the fighting edge are not always combined. Both qualities are necessary for the man who is to wage active battle against the powers that prey. He must be clean of life, so that he can laugh when his public or his private record is searched; and yet being clean of life will not avail him if he is either foolish or timid. He must walk warily and fearlessly, and, while he should never brawl if he can avoid it, he must be ready to hit hard if the need arises. Let him remember, by the way, that the unforgivable crime is soft hitting. Do not hit at all if it can be avoided; but never hit softly.—Theodore Roosevelt.

HOW HE "SOLED" FRED GRANT'S SHOES.

Gen. Frederick D. Grant said to his servant one morning: "James, I have left my mess boots out. I want them soled."

"Yes, sir," the servant answered.

The general, dressing for dinner that night, said again: "I suppose, James, that you did as I told you about those boots?"

James laid 35 cents on the bureau.

"Yes, sir," said he, "and this is all I could get for them, though the corporal who bought them said he'd have given half a dollar if pay day hadn't been so far off."—Chicago News.

SPURGEON AN "ANTI-ORGANIST."

Spurgeon's famous tabernacle in London is to be closed for redecoration, but it is still to remain unique among London churches inasmuch as its people refuse to have an organ, preferring that the singing should be led by a "precentor," after the old-fashioned Scottish style. This prejudice is a legacy from Mr. Spurgeon himself, who, though able to "smoke a cigar to the glory of God," did not think that an organist could play his instrument to similar purpose. When speaking on one occasion at a meeting to celebrate the installation of an organ in a brother minister's church the great preacher listened to an exhibition of the instrument's power, then remarked, "Yes, it praises its maker very well."

IT PLEASED HER.

Admiral Peary, fresh from his European triumph, was talking on the Kaiser Wilhelm II. about the conquest of Mount McKinley.

"Doc Cook will be pleased about it," said a Brooklynite.

"Yes," said the admiral, "Cook will be about as pleased as the lady who said on the seashore hotel piazza:

"'I shall never marry.'

"To this a group of pretty summer girls answered in a chorus

"'Oh, don't say that! Women even older than you have had proposals.'"—Daily Magazine.

WILSON'S CHEWING TOBACCO REMARK.

"Where I got into trouble was that I ventured on a comparison. I said that public opinion was not typified on the streets of a busy city, but was typified around the stove in a country store, where men sat and probably chewed tobacco and spat into a sawdust box, and made up before they got through what was the neighborhood opinion both about persons and events; and then, inadvertently, I added this philosophical reflection, that whatever might be said against the chewing of tobacco, this at least could be said for it: That it gave a man time to think between sentences. Ever since then I have been represented, particularly in the advertisements of tobacco firms, as in favor of the use of chewing tobacco."

WHEN FAMOUS SINGER MET LONGFELLOW.

It was a wonderful privilege to meet Longfellow. He was never gay, never effusive, leaving these attributes to his talkative brother-in-law, Tom Appleton, who was a wit and a humorist. Indeed, Longfellow was rather noted for his cold exterior, and it took a little time and trouble to break the ice. Yet, though so unexpressive outwardly, his nature was most winning when one was once in touch with it. His first wife was burned to death and the tragedy affected him permanently, but he made a second and a very happy marriage with Tom Appleton's sister. The brothers-in-law were often together and formed the oddest possible contrast to each other.

Longfellow and I became good friends, I saw him many times and often went to his house to sing to him. He greatly enjoyed my singing of his own, "Beware." It was always one of my successful encore songs, although it certainly is not Longfellow at his best. But he liked me to sit at the piano and wander from one song to another. The older the melodies, the sweeter he found them. Longfellow's verses have much in common with simple, old-fashioned songs. They always touched the common people, particularly the common people of England. They were so simple and so true that those folks who lived and labored close to the earth found much that moved them in the American writer's unaffected and elemental poetry. Yet it seems a bit strange that his poems are more loved and appreciated in England than in America, much as Tennyson's are more familiar to us than to his own people.—Clare Louise Kellogg in Saturday Evening Post.

FAMOUS MUSICIAN AS A SCRIBE.

Writing a very illegible hand customarily, Richard Wagner once sent an unusually hopeless scrawl to a friend. The latter gave it up in despair and sat down and wrote in reply, "I shall be most happy to dine with you tomorrow at 6. Kind regards to your wife. Yours, etc." In less than half an hour his friend appeared, breathless, at his door. "There's some misunderstanding," said he. "I wrote you a note asking if you could play the piano part of the trio at Brown's recital, and here you've sent me an acceptance of a dinner invitation; I'm sorry, but I didn't invite you to dinner!" "Well," returned the other blandly, "I didn't suppose you'd really sent me an invitation to dinner. But I couldn't read a word of your note, and in that case hereafter I mean always to take it for granted that you're asking me to dine."—Chicago News.

SMALL SOULS.

Upton Sinclair was talking on the Koenig Albert about certain millionaire malefactors whose crimes always went unpunished.

"It's hard to understand," said Mr. Sinclair, "how these men escape retribution, unless it be indeed that they're too small for the meshes of the net."

JUDGE GARY ON MONEY MAKERS.

Judge Gary, in his testimony at the steel trust investigation, said of a steel man who had gone under:

"He's one of those men who are always seeing where they could make fortunes—if they only had some more money to lose."

BRAND WHITLOCK'S STORY.

Mayor Whitlock, of Toledo, was talking about a Toledo heiress who had married a count.

"Well, at any rate," said he, "the girl seemed convinced that the count had no unworthy motives.

"'Don't you know,' a friend said to her some months before the wedding, 'don't you know that the count is simply marrying you for your money, so that he can pay his bills?'

"'Nonsense!' she replied. 'The count never thinks of paying his bills.'"

ROBERT W. CHAMBERS' STORY.

Robert W. Chambers, the novelist, tells a story about a friend of his who is an author.

"This young novelist," relates Mr. Chambers, "had a pretty hard time of it at first, and so had his young wife. Money was scarce, and the stories he wrote did not sell. The wife had but little respect for his talents, and kept endeavoring to coax him to try something else, whereby he could make enough money for their support.

"One day, however, his luck changed, and he began to make money. The time soon arrived when he was able to write a check for one hundred dollars and present it to his wife as a gift.

"She looked at it and her eyes filled with tears.

"'What is the trouble?' the husband asked, in surprise.

"'Darling,' she said, as she hastened around the table and put her arm around his neck, 'I'll take back all the mean things I ever said about your writing. This is the best thing you ever wrote.'"—Lippincott's.

MISPLACED SYMPATHY.

Miss Jessie Ackerman, the well-known lecturer, who has traveled all over the world, covering 400,000 miles in order to gather facts about the awakening of woman, said recently in New York:

"Woman is waking everywhere. The militant suffragettes are doing much to help the wakening in England. They who blame the militants are as unreasonable as Landor.

"The poet Landor, you know, had a violent temper. He raged especially when his meals went wrong.

"His luncheon went very wrong one day in Florence, and Landor threw his chef out of the dining-room window into the garden.

"But the man's body had no sooner vanished than Landor rushed to the open window after it, thrust forth his head, and cried in heart-broken accents:

"'Goodness sakes, I forgot my poor violets!'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

IT EXCITED HER APPETITE.

The banality of a sea poem by Alfred Noyes led a Philadelphia sonneteer at the Franklin Inn to say:

"This poem of the sea reminds me of a young woman from Illinois who saw the Atlantic for the first time last week at Cape May.

"As she stood on the windy beach, gazing dreamily out over the vast blue expanse of tumbling water, I said to her:

"'So this is the first time you've ever seen the sea, eh?'

"'Yes, the very first time,' she answered.

"'And what do you think of it?' I asked.

"'Ah!' she said, with an ecstatic smile, 'it smells just like oysters.'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

The Militant Suffragettes

By an English Resident in Chicago.

I have no wish to go into a discussion as to the merits of the Woman's Suffrage Movement in general or even as to the tactics of the English militants in particular. My opinion I know to be of little or no value—as to whether women should be given the parliamentary vote, as to whether the outrages now being perpetrated almost daily by some women in England, and threatened, I see, by some women in America, are calculated to achieve this purpose.

But opinions are one thing and facts are another and this article is by way of endeavoring to correct certain errors on matters of fact which appear to have some vogue in Chicago. I crave space to refer to three.

1. In the first place, these militant outrages—window smashing, church burning, bomb exploding and the like,—have not been the only nor the most important doings in England within the past few months. Nor are they monopolizing public attention there as the readers of American newspapers might easily suppose. As a fact there is more about them in the Chicago daily papers than in those of London, in the "Chicago Tribune" for example than in the London "Times"—almost twice as much, in fact, with a wealth of detail which apparently is not thought worth publication a few miles from the event. If all of the editorial comment on these suffrage crimes in England and America could be gathered together, nine-tenths of it, I am confident, would be supplied from this side of the Atlantic. So that the picture of all England stirred to the depths by them, the newspapers filled with little else, politics, business and pleasure suspended the while they are the only great topic of conversation, is a figment of the American imagination. John Bull is not so easily excited. He is a very stolid animal and has come to regard the whole business as a bore,—one of the minor irritations of life which may be left to the police and the law courts.

2. Another fallacy I constantly encounter here is the idea that British women are a downtrodden and ill-treated folk. Men in America know how to treat the women decently and so there is no rebellion. But in England they have suffered under masculine tyranny and oppression for centuries and now at last they are rightly struggling to be free. A few excesses may reasonably be excused at such time and are at any rate better than the acquiescence with which they have suffered for too long.

Where that idea has come from or what it is due to I have really tried, but so far have failed, to ascertain. I strike it, however, every little while in conversations with well informed people too, as well as in newspaper articles and letters. What one wants, of course, are some detailed particulars of this oppression, some tangible illustrations of it, but these I can never get, nor any evidence that those who speak of it have any real knowledge of the facts. It is nothing but a vague impression and so far as I can judge after forty years' residence in England and more than three years in America without any shadow of foundation. The law of England favors the women rather than the men upon the whole, and of course all social etiquette and custom does so. I cannot see how or where they are any better off in the United States. I have noticed that men keep their seats in crowded cars in Chicago and allow the women to stand, whereas in London they usually make place for them at once. But otherwise, I have detected very little difference. The condition and opportunities and position and treatment of women appear to be very much the same in the two countries and there is as little reason on that ground for militancy in England as in America.

3. One other widespread notion, I should like to combat—that it is only by violence and even crime that any great reform has ever been won in England or ever can be even now. What has given currency to this extraordinary notion I haven't any idea at all. It is true, of course, on both sides of the Atlantic that some reforms have to be won at the point of the bayonet. But surely it is not going to be seriously suggested that Mrs. Pankhurst's antics are to be classified with the revolutionary methods of Oliver Cromwell or George Washington, or that the occasion for them is at all similar. The parallel is rather with the blowing up of a newspaper office in Los Angeles a few years ago in order to advance certain fancied interests of organized labor or with the dynamite outrages of the Irish Invincibles in London in the early eighties in order to assist the Home Rule cause. In each case, of course, the movement concerned so far from being helped was enormously injured and retarded.

It may be true that at times of great popular excitement there has been a certain amount of horse play which has sometimes degenerated into more or less serious riot, and when the excitement was political the desire of the people has found expression in such ways. But there is nothing in common between spontaneous illegalities of that kind and a carefully organized series of attacks on property and life carried out by well paid agents and directed in the main against innocent and inoffensive people. "They tried to burn down my house," stated a minister in the House of Commons lately,—"the children's wing of it."

Interruptions of speakers at public meetings are in England a well recognized method of political warfare. So also are great open air demonstrations in the public parks at which occasionally popular excitement runs high, even to the doing of some damage to property. On one occasion the railings of Hyde Park were pulled out by the crowd and more than once the windows of certain politicians' houses have been stoned. Popular disapproval has to find expression somehow and at times is unable to control itself within legal bounds. But this, however reprehensible, is a very different thing from planning in cold blood (and employing others to carry out the plan) the setting of a church or country house on fire or the discharging of a bomb in St. Paul's Cathedral. That kind of outrage has not been of service to any good movement anywhere—certainly it has not in England. If it assists women to secure the vote, it will be the first time it has helped anyone to secure anything worth having. How people in America have got any other idea escapes my understanding. The statement that political reform has usually come by violence would be as true of the United States as of the British Isles. Of course it is not true of either country. It is altogether false and it always will be.

POEMS OF THE SOCIAL AWAKENING

Harmony

'Twas the voice of a brick in a building high,
A brick of the lower tier;
"Behold my brothers mount up to the sky
And leave me forgotten here.
But I hold my place, and I bide my time,
That must come to the great and small;
And though I be lost in the dirt and grime,
I'm the hope of the whole high wall.

There be brothers of mine at the very top
Of the building so broad and high,
And they think to go forward and never stop
This side of the sun-kissed sky.
'Oh, the poor dull bricks of the lower wall,'
They cry as they look below,
But their harsh words ruffle me not at all
For the base of their strength I know.

It is on my shoulders they upward mount
To their place in the sunlight fair,
And, though far below them, I still account
Myself with the highest there.
For the law that governs I understand,
And the law of the world to be;
It is this: We are all as one in the land,
As the drops are one in the sea."

—Charles Eugene Banks, in "The Peace Pipe."

Disciples Table Talk

Cedar Rapids Church Dedication.

The congregation of the First Christian church, Cedar Rapids, Ia., Walter M. White, pastor, is displaying much activity at the present time in preparation for the dedication of the new church, which is fast nearing completion. Breaking away from the usual program of dedicatorial services, the pastor will dedicate his own church, this being the unanimous wish of the church board. Another unusual feature of the dedication is that there will be no urgent appeal for money, only a collection to be taken at each service. The date set for dedication is the first Sunday in September and an effort is being made to have one thousand in the Sunday-school that morning. The dedication program is now being planned and not only includes the services for Sunday, September 7, but for the week following.

From Missionary to Philosopher.

Ellsworth E. Faris, of the University of Chicago and minister for several years at Waukegan, Ill., has been appointed to a professorship in philosophy at the University of Iowa, to succeed Professor E. D. Starbuck, the well known psychologist and writer of books on religious experience. Mr. Faris will receive his Ph. D. degree at the University of Chicago this summer and begins his new work in September. He will be long remembered among his Disciple brothers, as the pioneer with Dr. Royal J. Dye, in opening up the wonderful African mission station at Bolenge on the Congo. Returning to this country on account of illness in his family, he became associated with his father G. A. Faris in the editorship of The Christian Courier, at Dallas, Tex., a position he later relinquished to teach philosophy in Texas Christian University.

A Letter from Japan Missionary.

Rose T. Armbruster, Japan missionary, writes, under date of July 18, as follows: We had "Akita, Japan, July 18, 1913.—

We had special evangilistic meetings in the church here the first week in July, preaching by a spirit-filled Japanese. Church crowded each night—about 40 sitting on the floor one night. A man who had fallen into evil ways, after having been a Christian, and had not attended church for ten years was reclaimed, faith and zeal of all the Christians strengthened, and about 30 brought to confess their faith in Christ. Already, 11 have been baptized, seven of whom are Sunday-school pupils; one is editor of a daily paper. Other baptisms follow soon, both here and about city and in several towns near by. A woman 64 years old, who used to listen to Mr. Smithotengaist, also asks for baptism."

P. J. Rice Pictures "Perfect Christian."

At the first of a series of union indoor services held in Cleveland Square, El Paso, Tex., P. J. Rice, pastor at the First Church of that place, spoke before a large audience on "The Perfect Christian." I would recognize everybody as a Christian who professes to be one and who is honestly striving to follow Christ," declared Mr. Rice, "I would do this if he didn't belong to the same church I belonged to. I would do it if he couldn't pronounce all my shibboleths. I would if he didn't agree with all my pet convictions. I wouldn't be so conceited as to assume that all the truth of the universe is bound up in the little bundle I call creed. If I didn't have some convictions about Christianity beside those usually labeled doctrinal I doubt if I should be a Christian at all. I would rather be a heretic of the head than a sectarian of the heart. The only reason for building up a fence between people who cannot agree on religious matters is because one or both have a bad disposition; it is not because they have intellectual differences."

Baltimore Pastor on Woman's Dress.

Peter Ainslie reports 100 present at a recent August prayer meeting in his church at Baltimore. Mr. Ainslie states that he is doing some practical talking concerning the dress of the modern woman. The Baltimore "Sun" gives a half-column to Mr. Ainslie's views on the subject. The article closes as follows: "Fashion is a cruel and cursed thing, and the multitudes worship at its shrine frequently not because they want to but because they must. The extreme devotees reveal a degeneration of the race that ought to be treated as we do contagious diseases, for, after all, disease is not a thing confined to the body. One's taste may be as mortally diseased as the body. Dress gives a tremendous influence and as one of the channels from which we speak for the betterment of the race its approach should be guarded with the greatest care and the protest against its violation is a voice in behalf of common morality."

California Pastor Substantially Appreciated.

At its last meeting the Official Board of First Church, Los Angeles, voted to send its pastor, Russell F. Thrapp, to the Toronto convention. Considering the long distance this was an act of great generosity on the part of the church. As a further evidence of the esteem in which Mr. Thrapp is held, and as an appreciation of his work, the board gathered at his home and through their spokesman, Mr. S. M. Cooper, presented him with a magnificent gold watch and chain. The work in the First Church is going forward in a splendid way. There have been 365 people added at regular services during the first twenty months of his pastorate. The First Church recently pledged $1,350 for Southern California work at the Long Beach convention.

R. F. Thrapp.

$10,000 Supplemental Offering

Responses to the appeal of the National Benevolent Association for a supplemental Easter offering of $10,000 are coming in from many states. Will not ten thousand friends each help a little at this time that the Lord's needy and worthy ones placed under our care by the brotherhood may be provided for?

Remember, dear friends, that we now have approximately 525 children, widows, the aged and the sick in our eleven institutions.

Remember they are placed in our care by the church.

Remember that widespread storms at Easter time reduced by thousands the amount we should otherwise have received.

Remember the association is absolutely dependent upon the free-will offerings of its friends.

Send your offerings to the National Benevolent Association, 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

Church Extension Opportunities

We are so busy in our local church work that, unless we look out and beyond us, glorious opportunities will slip from us here in our Mission fields. Shall we pause in our Church Extension work. We must think seriously at this season when we are about to make our one annual offering to the work of Church Extension.

The opportunities are:

First. To house some of the foreigners at our doors, The Church Extension Board has promised $7,000 to assist Bro. Jos. Keevil get his Mission House completed at what we know as Green Point in Brooklyn, New York. Bro. Keevil has been a great help to these foreigners, a real father. A great brotherhood should count it a privilege to help him with the house for the conservation of this organization of the second church of Brooklyn. In Cleveland our board is asked for at least $5,000 for a similar building for the Russian Mission carried on by the Disciples Union of that city. In Chicago there is the third request requiring probably a larger loan. In each case it should be the right equipment or none at all, because it counts for nothing if we do otherwise.

The second opportunity is to help decide the social and religious character of thousands of new Western communities as well as new worlds of our cities. Millions of acres are being irrigated and hundreds of towns are springing up. The streams of emigration do not all flow to our cities. Thousands are going westward. Including New Mexico, Colorado and Montana on to the Pacific coast the increase in population has been fifty per cent, or more in ten years. When the Jews migrated from Egypt to Palestine, they had the portable tabernacle. In their nomadic life God thought it necessary for them to have a tent. When the tabernacle was located, then all the tents of Israel were pitched around it. This tabernacle which contained God's presence in the Ark was the social and religious center of the community. When Israel was to be a settled people, God provided the temple at Jerusalem. For centuries that temple was the center of the whole life of the Jewish people. The church building of today and the life it includes, should be the social and religious center of the community.

The third opportunity is to shape the thought of these new communities, religiously. There are too many sects. This is the sorrow of Christ, who prayed for a unity of His people. So long as there is a division of God's people, so long must we continue to make the Christian union plea upon the basis of the teachings of the New Testament. Let us be sure to start these new communities right religiously. We were called into existence as a people for just this thing. If we build up-to-date churches and equip them with modern Sunday-school facilities we shall command wholly these new communities. The Church Extension Board is helping, and anxious to help more, in this kind of work. Our church building ought to be as good or, if possible, better than any other building in the community. The board is anxious to send literature to all the churches to be used to educate our people on the opportunities that are ours and are slipping from us.

This literature will be sent free to all who wish it. Order from G. W. Muckley, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Memorial Hall—College of the Bible.

Drake University is an institution of higher learning devoted to the best in education. It believes in cultivating the religious nature in man as well as the intellectual and physical. It is standard in every department, and is so recognized by every standardizing agency in this country. No short courses leading nowhere are offered. The faculty is composed of thoroughly trained Christian men and women, who, because of their attainments, command the respect of educators everywhere. The equipment in every department is adequate. No matter how valuable your time, you can afford to spend it in Drake University. It is a school that gives value received. There is no pretense—no exaggeration.

The College of the Bible meets the approval of the Disciples of Christ. It is true to the principles of the fathers of the religious movement we would further. This college is sending out an educated ministry to bless the churches. The department of Religious Education is one of the greatest training schools for Sunday-school and other religious workers to be found in this country. The rural church problem receives attention here.

We want Two Hundred new ministerial students to enter next September. We will assist each one in many ways. Scholarships, loan funds, and opportunities that the student appreciates will be available so that he may remain in the college until he is thoroughly prepared for his world task. Last year nearly 1,600 students attended Drake University. This number included 121 ministerial students. We ask 300 to come next year.

The College of Liberal Arts is superior in every respect. Seven hundred and forty-two enrolled last year in this department.

The College of Law enrolls more than One Hundred each year, and is as well situated as any in the country.

The Conservatory of Music is acknowledged to be the peer of any in this country. The teachers are artists of national reputation. Enrollment last year, Five Hundred Twenty-six.

Write for catalogues and particulars concerning any of the departments herein enumerated.

The Bethany System of Sunday School Literature is a

SYSTEM

SUNDAY SCHOOL Workers the nation over have become familiar with the Bethany Graded Lessons. The patronage of these lessons has steadily grown from year to year until many of our most representative schools now use them.

The word "Bethany"--a meaningful word to Disciples, is it not?--has now been enlarged to cover, not the international graded lessons alone (though it still applies to these), but an all-inclusive System of literature for the entire Sunday School.

The Bethany System contains everything you need in your most up-to-date school, and you will find it all spread out before you graphically in our comprehensive order blank and Bulletin.

The Bethany System includes (in addition to the international graded lessons) international uniform lessons for adult classes and the home department, special texts for adult and young people's classes, teacher training courses, and five weekly periodicals—for Primary pupils, for Juniors, for Intermediate boys, for Intermediate girls, and for young people and adults.

This System equips your school from top to bottom.

Why continue to divide your order for supplies among several publishers? It is inconvenient and troublesome in keeping your records. It also adds to the risk of error and delay.

Put everything you need in ONE ORDER and send direct to

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday Schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday School literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the Church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the Society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, The Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT EDITORS

A Growing Temple

The building of a house of the Lord had long been a cherished dream of David. For the sake of this he brought the ark to Jerusalem and organized his temple choirs and amassed his treasures. Day and night he dreamed of it. Wandering over the hill of Jerusalem opposite his palace, he saw in his imagination the stately walls and goodly towers which were to be the house of the living God. He died bequeathing to his son, Solomon, the treasures he had accumulated and the plan he had devised. Solomon was to build the house according to the vision of his father.

Yet, not wholly according to David's vision. It must be larger, more grand. In nothing does the broad-minded statesmanship of David appear more evident than in his admonition to Solomon, "Thou mayest add thereto." Many an enterprise has been handed down to posterity permanently crippled by the well-meant conditions of those who originated it. The "dead hand" has held a fast grip upon some of the finest undertakings of humanity. Courts have been busy devising ways of loosing testamentary conditions governing bequests. Far too many good men having carried their own plans to a point where they could go no farther have supposed they served God best by devising plans and conditions forbidding their inheritance to transcend appointed bounds. David made no such restrictions. Solomon was encouraged and commanded to add to what his father had done.

To Solomon David said, "Now behold, in my affliction I have prepared for the house of Jehovah a hundred thousand talents of gold, and a thousand talents of silver, and of brass and iron without weight; for it is in abundance; timber also and stone have I prepared; and thou mayest add thereto."

Solomon must add to David's plan. No temple which David could have inspired his people to build would have been large enough for the Jewish people. There were reasons why David was not permitted to go on with his work. Some of them are given, particularly this, that he had been a man of blood, and God wanted a temple built by a man of peace. But we cannot but wonder if this was not an added reason, namely that the plan must have time to grow in the minds of the people and be handed on from David to Solomon until the people's conception of what they were to need and what they were competent to build had grown to sufficiently large proportions. The temple of Solomon was one of the wonders of the world. The temple of David might have been in comparison only a moderately attractive place of worship. Solomon must enlarge David's plan. Only so could he prove himself a worthy son of David; only by doing better than one's father can one do as well.

Solomon must enlarge upon David's sacrifice. It would have been a thousand pities if David had said to Solomon, "I in my trouble have gathered one hundred thousand talents; it is unnecessary for thee and thy wealth to add thereto." David resigned in a time when his nation was recovering from war; he sat on the throne through a long and troublesome period. If out of such conditions he could plan so great a sacrifice surely Solomon was capable of sacrifice on his own part proportionately great.

The great temples of the world had many builders. No one architect or mason made any one of the great cathedrals. He who wanders amid the myriad spires of Milan finds scaffolding still up in some aisle. He sees builders still at work in the Duomo of Florence and the Gothic pile at Cologne.

Emerson wrote of the builder of St. Peter's at Rome,

> "The hand that rounded Peter's dome,
> And groined the aisles of Christian Rome,
> Wrought in a sad sincerity;
> Himself from God he could not free.
> He builded better than he knew—
> The conscious stone to beauty grew."

The temples had many builders. Life is builded thus in successive generations.

We have inherited from the past houses of God, endowments for good causes, schools, colleges, and institutions of church and state—these are our glory and our pride. For them we may well be grateful. But as we count our inherited blessings of treasures material and treasures spiritual, the voice of the past rings in our ears with fine insistence, "I did this in the midst of trouble and as the result of economy and great sacrifice; upon thee is the great privilege in the mighty present of adding thereto."

We are the true temple. Our own lives need constant additions of glory and of grace. No plan of the past is good enough.

"Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll!
Leave thy low-vaulted past!
Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from heaven with a dome more vast!"

In Great China's Capital

Resuming the Mission Study Tour Articles.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

EDITORS' NOTE: An explanation is due the readers of Dr. Willett's mission study tour articles concerning the sudden breaking off of his series some weeks ago. Passing through Persia, enroute home, Dr. Willett suffered the theft of a valise containing, besides various valuables, the manuscripts of several chapters in this series. Since arriving home the calls to tell in public address the story of his world trip have been so numerous and urgent that the narrative by his pen has been resumed only with much difficulty.

THERE is no city in the world that compares with Pekin in the territory and population over which it presides as capital; not even St. Petersburg or Constantinople. For Pekin is the head city of the Chinese people, occupying the eighteen provinces of China proper, and in addition the outlying divisions of Manchuria, Mongolia, Turkestan, and Tibet.

Just now, to be sure, the integrity of this huge complex of peoples and interests is seriously compromised. Japan very much wants Manchuria to add to Korea as a new part of her growing empire, and is in the act of taking possession of it in all the practical and effective ways in which an active and pushful people may oust one more quiet and conservative. Russia is intriguing to annex Mongolia to her dominions, and the friction between St. Petersburg and Pekin has been acute at several times during the past few months. And England wants Tibet, and it is more than half suspected she has maintained a military force at Lhassa ever since her expedition thither three years ago.

But even without these frontier provinces, China has a territory of four and a quarter millions of square miles, and four hundred millions of population. Over such an enormous domain and citizenship Pekin rules. It has not always been the undisputed head of the Chinese nation, though its history goes back to the twelfth century B. C., the age of Israel's exodus from Egypt. In some periods it was only the capital of a province, and at other times it was wholly destroyed, and lay for years in ruins. It reached its greatest splendor in the days of Kublai Kahn, grandson of Genghis Kahn, the Mongol conqueror. In those splendid days, Marco Polo, the Venetian traveler, journeyed down the Nankow Pass to Pekin, and was amazed at the glory of the city. He went back to Europe after many years to tell such stories of the wealth and beauty of this wonderful region that all Europe was fired with the ambition to discover a pathway to the new wonderland far in the east. One of the results of that agitation was Columbus' voyage, and the unveiling of the New World.

WHEN IN DOUBT BUILD A WALL.

WHEN the Ming dynasty came into power in 1368 A. D. they moved the capital to Nanking, on the Yangtze River in the central part of the land. But the third emperor of the line transferred the headship again to Pekin, where it has remained to the present. It is not strange that a city so notable in the history of a great people should have many architectural monuments, in spite of the ravages of time and the assaults of Tartars, Mongols, Manchus and Boxers.

I have already remarked, in some of the earlier letters of this series, that the Chinese love walls. Their cities and towns are all walled. The different sections of the towns are walled in, and all the houses of any pretensions are enclosed in protecting barriers. This is partly for privacy and partly for protection. In fact the motto of China has seemed to be, "When in doubt, build a wall." And to complete all other enterprises of the sort, there is the stupendous national wall along the northern frontier, an undertaking so vast that in comparison the other six "wonders of the world," such as the hanging gardens of Babylon, the pyramids of Egypt, the Alexandrian lighthouse, the Colossus of Rhodes (if it ever existed), the Temple of Diana at Ephesus and the Tomb of Mausolus, seem like children's play tasks.

There are four cities in Pekin, each walled in for protection and to complete the Chinese idea of a place of importance. The Tartar City is the real capital, enclosing within its quadrangular and spacious walls the Imperial City, which in turn contains as its heart and center, the small Forbidden City, the former inaccessible residence of the imperial household. The foreign legations are in the Tartar City, but outside the other two, and here are the residences of the officials who represent the leading governments of the world.

AMERICAN RECOGNITION OF REPUBLIC.

AT the time we were there the new republican government of China was waiting nervously and anxiously for official recognition by the United States. The American missionaries were confident of the success of the revolution and the permanence of the republic, and hoped that our government would further the good relations between China and the United States by authoritative recognition of the new republic. The government officials of the nations watching affairs there, including our own consular and diplomatic representatives, were not so confident of the success of the great experiment, but felt that America and France would naturally take the lead in the act of recognition.

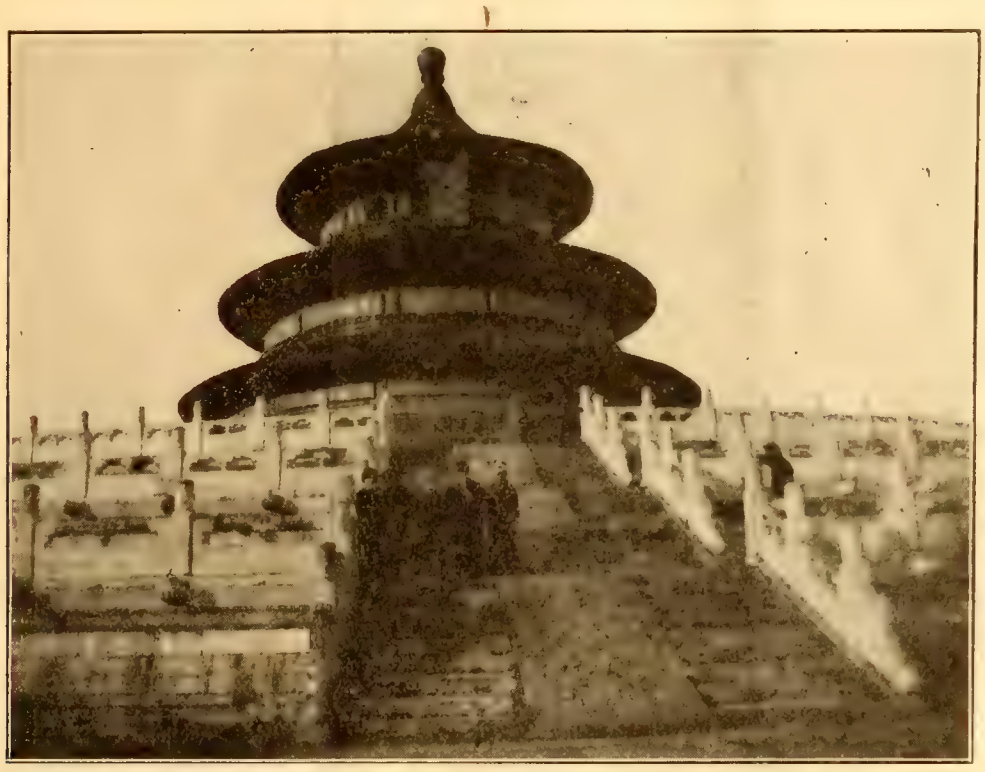
It was not till after Mr. Calhoun had left China for America that recognition came. On that occasion, in a distinguished company of Chinese and American officials, naval, military and civil, Mr. Edward T. Williams, acting head of the embassy, handed to Yuan Shi Kai, the provisional president of China, the message of recognition from the government at Washington. It was a deserved honor for Mr. Williams, and a proper courtesy to a great people, struggling earnestly, even if not always wisely, toward an assured place in the sisterhood of republics.

It is a most difficult thing for an ancient and conservative people like the Chinese to pass rapidly from the forms and traditions of a long inherited despotism, like that of the Manchu conquerors of China, to a republic. It is not alone the forms of official procedure which have to be changed. It is the entire psychology of a people. Japan has attempted to traverse the entire distance from feudalism to modern and constitutional life in the brief reign of a single Mikado, and though the advances made have been astounding, the process has been far too rapid to be complete or convincing. Most of our failure to understand the Japanese, either in their own land or on the Pacific slope, is due to the amiable error of the Japanese themselves, and our own superficial assumption, that we can understand them with the same readiness with which we can deal with people who have back of them centuries of occidental thinking and behavior.



The Temple of Heaven, Pekin.

BIRTH HOUR OF NEW CHINA.

THE Chinese are in the midst of the same throes of new birth, only later in arrival at the birth hour, and much more difficult to bring safely through, owing to their enormous numbers, the size of their domain, the low state of education, and the meagerness of the facilities for public intelligence. When you speak of a republic, the term connotes to the American all that his land and the other lands of like political creed have achieved in self-government. To the Chinese the term has but the most nebulous meaning, probably compound of patriotic satisfaction at riddance of Manchu tyranny, a comfortable dream of emancipation from taxes, a feeling that a stronger hand was needed was shared even by many of his best friends, among whom some of the most representative missionaries are to be numbered. So he resigned and Yuan Shi Kai, who had still the confidence of the Manchu party, was given the place provisionally.

Now it transpires that the two men cannot work together. Dr. Sun has been at Shanghai devoting himself to the development of the nation through his great railroad projects. Yuan Shi Kai has gone forward with his plan of nationalization at Pekin. They differed over the loan. The development of revenues is a slow and difficult thing in a land without a strong government. A foreign loan was necessary. There were the gravest objections to the "six-nation loan," and our government did well to refuse its sanction. But every difference of view was a ground of irritation among a people widely scattered, illy informed and badly led. And so rebellion has broken out, not without encouragement from the ever watchful and ambitious Japanese, and Dr. Sun has thrown his large influence against the Pekin government. Yet hardly with the chance of final success, and probably without the desire for personal advantage. But the entire episode illustrates the condition of a land of wonderful resources, destined to be the masterful leader in the affairs of eastern Asia, but now only awakening from a sleep which but recently bade fair to be permanent and fatal.

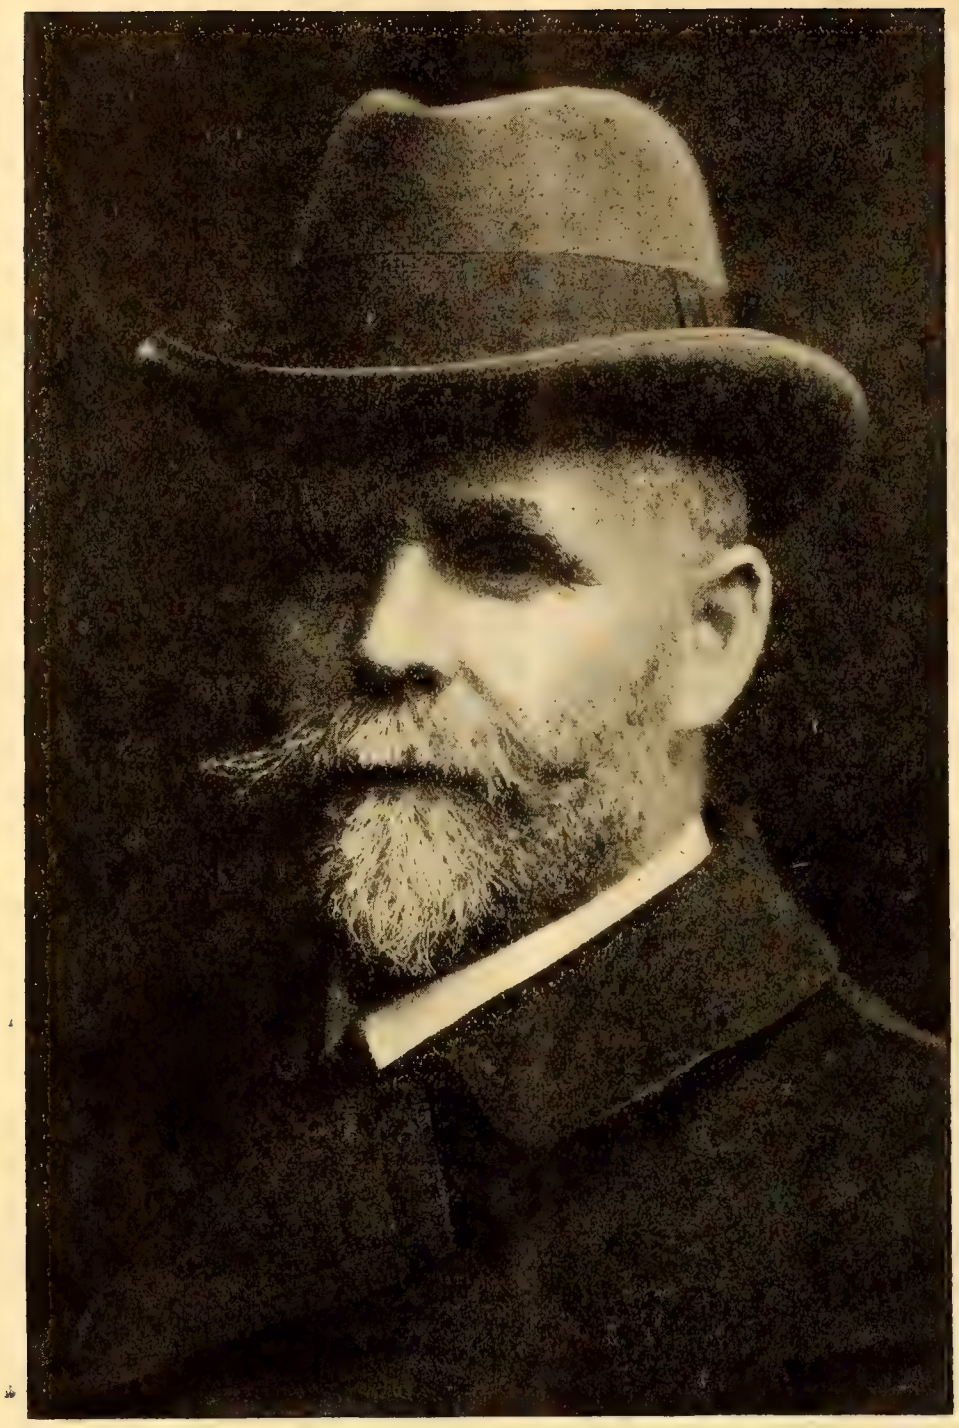
PEKIN'S TWO NOBLEST STRUCTURES.

AND now a look at two structures which are the most wonderful in Pekin, and which at the same time stand as the eloquent symbols of a changing age. I said there were four cities in Pekin. South of the Tartar city is the Chinese city, hardly four centuries old, but admirably illustrating in its commonplaceness and squalor the difference between the ruling and the subject classes in the late empire. Out on the southern border of the Chinese city is a large enclosed space devoted to the Temple and Altar of Heaven. It is a park of wide extent, wholly reserved for the annual devotions of the emperor, as the representative of the nation, before the powers of heaven. After passing a night of vigil and fasting in the Hall of Abstinence, the ruler proceeded in the early dawn to the triple-roofed Temple of Heaven, to offer incense to the Supreme Powers, and to his ancestors. Then he was conducted to the beautiful circular Altar of Heaven, with its three terraces, each reached by nine marble steps, and on the upper platform ninety feet in diameter, under the open sky, the ruler of the nation, after inspection of the sacred offerings from the three kingdoms, animal, vegetable and mineral, performed in the unique solitude of his great office the act of worship which was supposed to bring good fortune to his people for the year. Some students of religion have professed to see in this Confucian ritual a recognition of the non-atheistic creed at the back of all Chinese theology. Yet the Temple and Altar of Heaven may well be only a beautiful expression of a sense of awe in the presence of the forces of nature, and an effort to secure their favorable disposition toward the people.

THE SUMMER PALACE.

FORMERLY this immense sanctuary, covering many acres, was reserved exclusively for the royal visits and worship. Now the restriction has been removed, and it may be hoped that the park, with its exquisitely wrought marble structures, the one open to the sky, the other closed, may be given to the people for the rest and pleasure they may so well afford.

The other place of special interest is the Summer Palace. It is a magnificent artificial park, at a distance of six miles from the city. On a hill partly constructed, called the Hill of Ten Thousand Ages, rises a series of residences, pagodas and temples, crowned by a beautiful octagon building, formerly used as a royal residence, and now probably to be occupied again by the Manchu princes who are to be banished from the Forbidden City when it is occupied by the state officers. The tiles of the roofs in many colors give an almost magic beauty to the place. At the foot of the hill bordered by covered walks, decorated in elaborate forms of Chinese art, is a lake, on whose bosom seems to float an exquisitely wrought marble barge, palatial enough to be a royal residence. Over an arm of the lake stretches a camel-back bridge of marble, and from the top of the hill one looks out upon an entrancing picture of suburban Pekin, including the Hill of the Jadestane Fountain, the Temple of the Five Pagodas, the National Barracks, the buildings of the Ching Hwa College, and a large number of handsome private residences, and everywhere are the signs that the "unchangeable East" is changing with a rapidity which baffles all but the most alert observer.



The Successor of David Livingstone

A Character Sketch of Dan Crawford, the Great Explorer.

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

DAVID LIVINGSTONE dismissed Stanley with this program for his own future:

"On crossing the Lualaba, I shall go direct southwest to the copper mines of Katanga. Eight days south of Katanga the natives declare the fountains of the Nile to be. When I have found them, I shall return by Katanga to the underground houses of Rua, and travel in boat up the river to Lufira."

He did not live to carry out this itinerary, but the record of his hope became a challenge to a sick young Scotchman who had gone to the dry part of Africa to be cured of consumption. He crossed the Lualaba, and found the fountains of the Nile, and lived for twenty-two years in the long grass. England went wild over his return in the year of the Livingstone centennial, and now he is in America, intending not to return to England, but to go on to Australia and then to Africa, from which he does not expect ever to emerge. His name is plain Dan Crawford.

He is now at Northfield, but is to move westward, and will be in Chicago this autumn, and will speak in several American cities.

Mr. Crawford divides his work and all his speeches into three parts: 1, "Boring In;" 2, "Shut In;" 3, "Boring Out."

One must bore his way into the heart of Africa, he tells us, and it is not easy. Once in there arise conditions which shut him in. But after nearly a quarter century he has emerged. The division is entirely logical; the phrase "boring in" is the African description of the way one travels there.

But Mr. Crawford does not follow a logical division. There is only one division in the address or the interview—the first. The tall African grass grows thirteen feet high through all the discourse of Dan Crawford. To penetrate so far as the first concrete fact is a pleasant circuitous march through parable, quotation and reminiscence. Facts accumulate slowly, but incident and adventure multiply and grow tall as an African cane brake.

He is "unconventional." That is the adjective which more than any other has preceded him in the English papers. He is "unique." He is "sui generis." He is all of them and some more.

He is of medium height, stocky and square set, with blue eyes. His hair is cropped close over his round head. His beard is cut after the French style, full, but clipped close on the sides. He is quick, nervous, alert, fond of fun, and is a good comrade.

He has not yet visited our American cities. New York he does not know. Chicago is a name he hardly dares undertake to pronounce. No crowds of reporters have yet hunted him to his lair.

In Africa they call the pioneer a "dew-drier," for he who first in the morning starts along a trail through the tall grass is drenched by the heavy dew, but leaves the way comparatively dry for the next man. It is my privilege to act as a sort of dew-drier, for I have been making a pilgrimage through the experiences of Mr. Crawford, and am delightfully drenched.

The present interview will be his first real introduction to our American papers, for as yet he is known here only by the press reports of his English reception, and by his remarkable book.

Never has America had a speaker like Mr. Dan Crawford, nor is he likely to be heard here again, for he plans to return to the long grass of Central Africa to spend the rest of his life with his beloved Bantus. He comes with twenty-three years of unbroken service in the Garengauze country, and is the author of "Thinking Black," the most original and fascinating book in African missionary literature. Without credentials and alone, he has just won from English critics the judgment that he is "one of the most original and captivating speakers who ever stepped on a platform." In his inimitable way he tells African legends and weird stories of Bantu customs. He was the first white man to follow in David Livingstone's footsteps to the tree at Ilala where that great man's heart was buried. There Mr. Crawford conducted the funeral service.

A PIONEER OF THE KINGDOM.

THIS introduction might well be supplemented by more biographical material than either his book or address have contained. There is little of it in his book and less in his addresses. Indeed, his addresses are but bits of conversation. One of them had its outline on the back of a post-card, and he wrote it during a hymn, and crossed out each point with a pencil as he came to it. That was a wise precaution; for anything that he said under one head might as logically have been said under any of the others. He does not "bore in" to his subject. He leaps over the top of all obstacles, and then leaps in this direction or that. He always lands on his feet, but it is not a process of progressive motion, but of intellectual acrobatics peculiar to a mind of marked ability trained to phenomenal acuteness by a remarkable experience.

In the Bantu country where Crawford has been they keep no record of time. An old man will guess he is ten years of age. Crawford's chronology is little better. He preserves dates in 1889, the year he began what the natives call "boring in" to Africa. The rest of his book and his memory is "Later"—in footnotes to his timed experiences. He begins his stories: "The other day"—and you think he means the day before yesterday or last week, but he is merely saying, "Once upon a time"—if there really was a time. If events could occur with no relation to time or sequence, his narrative would be a model of all chroniclers. When he is asked for a date he says, "That was—let me see—haven't I given that in my book?" And behold it is faithfully recorded in the book, and the date-line is "Later."

Crawford can tell some things that are not lawful to utter—for he has looked upon horrors whose lightest word harrows up the soul, and starts the hair to rising. I spent two evenings in a company with him and he grew more and more confidential as the hour waxed late, and I am reliably informed that certain of the ladies spent the nights following in visions and dreams of graveyards, death and Sheol.

But it is not on these horrors his mind dwells. He lives in the exuberant memory of free, untrammeled life and of character transformed by the gospel. He is a Greek scholar, and his translations are in the New Testament. If he lives to translate the Old Testament he will learn that "Adam" means "red-earth," and the inference is that the earth of which man was made was light and ruddy. But if he fails to find a lexicon somewhere that assures him that the prehistoric mud was black, it will not in the least daunt him; for he has seen God at work creating men out of black mud, and has walked with him in the garden where the grass is thirteen feet tall, and has heard him calling his children back to himself. Crawford will make a note of that in his Bantu lexicon.

He is quick with his pen, his gun, his speech. He has shot more lions than Theodore Roosevelt ever saw; has met the black man in blackness as dense as Livingstone ever encountered, and has pushed the frontiers of the white man's knowledge hundreds of miles into the dark continent. He has seen more bloody murders, unnamable cruelties, unmentionable abominations in life and conduct, but he is a cheerful, optimistic, light-hearted, exuberant soul, with a twinkling eye and a merry laugh and a sunny faith. For he has believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living. After he has preached for a little while to us pagans in America—for such he is inclined to think us, and his countrymen in England and Scotland—he will return to Africa where Livingstone died, in hope of dying a few hundred miles farther inland, and marking with his grave another milestone in the advance of Christ's kingdom, boring into the dark continent.

RE-LEARNING TO THINK WHITE.

"I SPEAK to you in English, and it is the English I learned when I was a boy in Scotland, but I think in Bantu, the language I had to learn in Africa—a wonderful language, into which I had the incomparable privilege of translating the Word of God. I endeavored to get into the back of the black man's brain—to 'think black'—and while I speak English as I always have done I am re-learning the art of thinking white—learning it for a little time, for I am on my way back to live and die in Africa.

"When David Livingstone died he was longing, not for Westminster Abbey, where the tears of a nation watered his grave, but for the heart of his beloved Africa, where the Bantu tribesmen live. This was the spot that has been my home for 22 years. Livingstone called it 'the uttermost spot of the earth and the nearest place to the bottomless pit.' It is natural that working in a place like this, there should be days of gloom and depression; this is the missionaries' worst foe.

"When I first went to Africa, long before we were in sight of land I saw the blue of the Atlantic muddied by a dirty brown, the Congo; so Africa dirties what comes in contact with it, for 'out to Africa' is really 'down to Africa.' There the tinned abominations—you call them canned goods—go bad, the dogs from Europe go bad and even missionaries go bad. The hard thing to do is to keep singing your song even when the heart is depressed, to keep your 'heart fixed.' Your people can't do that here. I told a cabinet minister that the great difference between the England that I left and the England to which I returned was that people have lost the art of smiling. The smile is the coat of arms of the soul, none that go on four feet have it. I ask you what good it will do you in this materialistic age to gain the whole world and lose your smile?

"My specialty in Africa—for we have to be specialists there, too,—is translating the Holy Book. For I went to a land where the language was only spoken; they had no books. When I took to Oxford the other day my grammar of that language—I call it the most wonderful in the world—I showed them a tongue that had 33 tenses for the verb, 10 voices and 19 genders. What is your puny English to that? But there were many years before I could give them the written Word of God, and all that time I had to be the walking, talking Bible. The real Negro can read you quickly, no sham goes with him. You almost become their god. My friend, Cobb, visited me in the heart of the jungle. A cannibal spent fourteen days glued to him, watching his every move. Then he vanished over the hills. Ten years later I visited his country and found that there he had set up a new religion, the worship of my friend.

CONTRASTS WITH CIVILIZATION.

"MISSIONARY work is hard, but there is a great glory in going without. I could tell you the romance of a pair of shoes that came to me in my need in the heart of the jungle. Elijah's God is not powerless now. Then there is the great law of compensation. The natives have no notebooks, but they have wonderful memories. I visit them once in ten years and they can repeat my sermon, word for word, so keen is their memory. They have no artificial light; they call such lighting 'lighting God,' for they think that he has drawn down the blinds for them to go to sleep, but they have instead most wonderful eyes. They have no shoes. David Livingstone, who first came among them with boots, is called all over Africa Mr. He Hath No Toes. But their ten toes are so strong that they can trust them where I with my boots dare not go. God compensates us in his own way.

"Civilization is creeping up toward them from the south, where it means mines and liquor and sadness. When I told my native friends, as I left them at the head of the railroad, of all your wonders today, traveling in and under the earth and water, and tried to impress them with these modern 'improvements,' they said, 'Better off is not to be better,' and in that is a whole system of ethics. They know the immortality of the soul; it is not even questioned from one coast to the other; with them the body is but the cottage of the soul, death is not departing but arriving. God is his own pioneer and in the heart of Africa, black, 'heathen' Africa, he had preceded us and there everything tells of him.

"I went to Africa to be cured of consumption, and cured I am, as Cecil Rhodes was. Like him, I found wealth in Africa—not the wealth of his gold, nor of ivory, which when I went in lay on the ground in the interior, valueless to the native because it had no marrow in it to be eaten, but for which since whole villages have suffered untold horrors, but I found the riches of human life awaiting the gospel.

"I penetrated the interior—I did not intend to go alone. Three of us started, but one of my companions was taken with a terrible inflammation of the eyes; the other, too, was constrained to turn back. I kept on. I was twenty months getting in. I was sometimes two years without letters. I was nine years homeless. After that my wife was with me. There in the heart of Africa our two children were born. And she—my wife—the natives call with good reason 'the white angel.'

"I was under the dominion of the bloody King Mushidi. He entered that part of Africa 15 years before the death of Livingstone, a black adventurer. But he became a powerful ruler, with a harem of over 500 wives. I have seen him commit atrocious murders, drinking the blood of his victims. Dr. Maloney has published the statement that we were his 'slaves.' He adds that Mushidi despoiled us of our goods, which errs in the important particular that we had no goods. Dr. Maloney pitied us, and in his book says he 'cannot help thinking that a profound mistake was made when the missionaries were dispatched into his barbarous country hundreds of miles from a European port.' He might have saved his pity. We did not need it.

"By another writer I am called Mushidi's 'secretary'—and it is certain that the Belgian officials who in later years made their way to the foot of Mushidi's throne looked on my supposed influence with him with no great favor. But I taught his children; yes, and again and again he spared life for my sake. Hudson Taylor said to me once, 'The devil can wall you around, but he cannot shut you in.' The heaven was always open to us. I am glad to have gone in without a base line of communication and to have done this work and to it gladly I return.

LANGUAGE SUPERIOR TO ENGLISH!

"YOU ask about the language. It is wonderful. English seems poor beside it. What has English in the way of tenses? Almost nothing, no aorist, no future! Oh yes, I know, you have faked a future tense with the verbs 'shall' and 'will'—but this is no future tense and you adopt all manner of devices to make tenses your poor, cold, bald language does not have. We have futures—several of them. We have an immediate future and a proximate future, and a deferred future, and a progressive future, and a completed future. We have nineteen genders. The African is far too modest to make sex—the most private and delicate of all distinctions—the basis of his categories in the classification of nouns. There are nineteen categories. Everything that has a vascular system is in one. All long things, palms, cane, tall grass, are in another; all short, blunt or round things in another; all soft, flabby things in another. You would need an adjective for each of them. Not so the man who thinks black. He has sixty sounds. It is difficult to represent them with twenty-four letters. A changed prefix makes the difference. The thousands of verbs all end in 'ali'—a most musical ending. And can you imagine a language thus highly inflected in which it is impossible to speak ungrammatically? It is so, the initial letter of the principal word gives all—as if you were to say, not 'God is love' but 'God gis gove.' Do you see? That merely suggests the prefix.

"Mushidi is gone—his great head, with its Napoleonic brain, and its facial expression half fox, half pig, shipped to Europe in a petroleum can. And his harem which cost him so much to gather and so much more to guard, is gone. And there are tokens of a new day.

"I went into Africa—Eastward ho! I am returning to it, Westward ho! Across America lies Africa. I am on my way.

"It is very strange to come back to civilization after twenty-two years. Can I believe my eyes? These two long spokes of iron—jutting out of the grass—they are a railway in Africa! And here is a shop-window full of tinned foods. I stand and stare bewildered at the seductive display. We have been almost a thousand miles beyond the well nigh universal tin can. And as one emerges from the long grass into these towns on the confines of civilization, he sees the crowds of poor renegade natives, the gin-boozing degenerate, whom tourists see and wish to see no more. But we deal with the raw material—not this debased product.

"Cannibalism? Oh, to be sure! It is not nice! I make no apology for it. But try for a moment to 'think black' with me. Come, and let us tell some of these cannibal people that in the Balkans white men fought till 4,000 were killed on one side and 5,000 on the other, and he will cry out in horror, 'Oh, venom of the serpent who slays, and not to eat!' Murder is not very pretty anywhere, and what is done with the flesh afterward is not the only point worth considering. After all, when you read of war between white men, how much do they lack of being cannibals?

"We have to face the shame of the savagery of white men as our greatest obstacle, for the cruel slave trader reaches us. Are the Belgian and the Portuguese all saints?

"Even our most glorious message meets the taunt of the black man. Once when I was telling the story of the cross, a chief named Malemba interrupted me, saying, 'You white men are a bad lot. You killed the Boso One: we kill only criminals and instead of being ashamed you cross the sea to come and tell it!' Do not think I apologize for their sin—and it is sin. I sometimes think the worst men among them have barely conscience enough to light them to hell. I am trying to get you to think black—but I know it is impossible. The bad African is almost as bad as the bad American or Englishman. The Gospel of God is what we need and what they need. The night cometh when no man can work. Afar the golden-crested crane is calling. I must go back to Africa."

The Larger Fellowship

The Story of a Man Who Practiced Christian Unity All Alone.

BY GEORGE A. CAMPBELL.

THE little town of Newton had four churches, a Methodist, a Presbyterian, a Disciple and a Baptist. These churches had little fellowship with one another. It might be said, without straining the truth in the least, that most of their energy was put forth in opposing one another. Both the preaching and the feeling and conversation of the people were bitterly partisan. The art of proselyting was better understood and more enjoyed than that of winning converts.

These churches were the creations of ministers of strong prejudices. Each minister was an "expounder of the book." Each presented his narrow view as "the faith once for all delivered to the saints." To hold any other was unpardonable disloyalty and would meet with the eternal wrath of God. The nearer the faith of any two of the churches, the farther apart were the same churches in fact and sympathy. For instance, the Baptist and Disciples both practiced immersion, but neither would recognize as valid the baptism of the other. Members going from one to the other must be reimmersed.

One may well realize that life in a town so dominated by feelings of religious prejudice and hatred could not be happy and free. In every soul there was a chain and curb upon its inherent kindness and natural social instincts. Because of a mistaken loyalty to God they were disloyal to their neighbors. Dogma by them was placed far above man.

One day there moved to this little town a man who afterwards came to have a great influence in supplanting its spirit of bigotry by that of fraternity and good-will.

He was a quiet, unostentatious man of about thirty-five. His name was James Seaton. Newton was a dozen miles off the railroad; but rumors of a new railroad that would have a station at Newton were current.

Whether because he expected the railroad or for some other reason Mr. Seaton bought a considerable tract of land adjacent to Newton, and built the finest house in the village.

JOINES ALL THE CHURCHES.

AS soon as Mr. Seaton was settled all the churches were anxious to know to what church he "belonged." Mr. Seaton did not choose to tell them. He attended all the churches. The Methodists and Baptists had preaching on the same Sunday and the Presbyterians and Disciples on the alternate Sundays. So Mr. Seaton could keep quite in touch with the four churches.

One Sunday morning he united with the Presbyterian church. The members of the other three heard of it with great disappointment. But as usual he was at the Disciples church at night, and, much to the surprise of every one, he "went forward" after the exhortation and was given the right hand of fellowship. The Disciples minister had learned immediately after the morning service that Mr. Seaton had united with the Presbyterian church and consequently thought it was his duty to preach that night against the Presbyterians. Hence when Mr. Seaton came forward he thought it was because of the convincing logic of the sermon.

There was great joy among the Disciples and great lamentations among the Presbyterians.

During the week everybody talked and talked much, except Mr. Seaton.

Next Sunday Mr. Seaton united with the Methodist church in the morning and the Baptist church at night.

By this time it was the general verdict of the town that Mr. Seaton was as crazy as he could be.

The children, hearing so much in their homes about him, avoided him on the streets.

But, making liberal contributions to all four of the churches, and continuing to attend all four, he gradually came to be regarded not as insane but odd. Much discussion took place as to whether or not a man could be a member of four denominations at once. The logical verdict was in the negative. A man might as well try to be in the light and dark at the same time. In the estimation of all there was but one true church and each thought he was the representative and defender of that true apostolic church and all others were unregenerate heretics.

However, none of the four disqualified Mr. Seaton. He, on his part, did not argue, but lived the Christian life. His kindness extended to every citizen. People came to mark that whenever he spoke it was to speak well of the motives of others. The ministers came instinctively to feel that Mr. Seaton would not appreciate vituperative sermons. A new unity, springing out of the soul of Mr. Seaton, came gradually and unconsciously to pervade the community. The people came to know a deeper unity than that of logic, the unity of their natures and their common life.

ONE HUMANITY, ONE CHRIST, ONE CHURCH.

MR. Seaton never became an aggressive teacher, but from time to time he would lead the thought of the people out to the great constructive work of the kingdom.

It was not long before the people—save a few of the older ones—came to regard Mr. Seaton as a saint, as the prophet of a new day, that day when the Church of Christ shall be reunited—one Church with one God.

After Mr. Seaton had lived in Newton two years or thereabouts, there was a very destructive fire. Rendering many families homeless, this fire increased the feeling of sympathy and caused all to realize their common humanity.

The four churches were burned.

Now when it came to rebuilding the churches, the spirit of Seaton seemed to rise from the ruins of every one of the four churches and say, "One Humanity, one Christ, one Church." There was little discussion. The people's mind was for one edifice.

It is a splendid church, a temple of beauty. The praise every Sunday is led by a pipe organ and a chorus of voices representing all the people of the community. The religion of Christ now creates fellowship and good-will, where formerly for the love of God it made brother hate brother. Mr. Seaton knew the "higher loyalty" to Christ and is typical of countless souls who in our age have caught the spirit of larger fraternity.

NEAR AND FAR.

The China agency of the American Bible Society reports issues for the first six months nearly or quite reaching 1,000,000 Bibles, Testaments, and portions. If this rate of issues continues during the year, it may be expected to reach 2,000,000 copies. The agent adds, "Notwithstanding the sending out of this enormous number of Scriptures, we were unable to supply all that were called for." Amid wars and rumors of wars which the newspapers now record, such facts are the more extraordinary. It would seem as though thus far the disturbance in China had fallen out for the furtherance of the Gospel.

At Boston the Human Derelicts Association has been formed, composed of the lame, the halt and the blind. Its object is to secure better living conditions for its unfortunate members.

The first Monday of September will be observed as Orange Day by all Hollanders everywhere in the world, when telegrams of congratulation will be sent to the House of Orange.

Of Human Interest

Wilson on College Education.

"Woodrow Wilson naturally believes in a college education for boys and girls alike," said a banker at the Princeton club in New York. "Mr. Wilson, lunching with me here, once said in his quaint way that the old idea about a college education unfitting a lad for work had quite died out.

"'We no longer hear,' he declared, 'stories like that of Gobsa Golde.

"'When Gobsa Golde's son, Scattergood,' he explained, 'desired to go to Princeton he said to the old man:

"' "Pater, is it true that boys who go to college are unfit for work afterward?"

"' '"Of course, it ain't true!" snorted the old man, indignantly. "Why, I've got a Princeton graduate runnin' my freight elevator, two of my best coal heavers are Harvard A. B.'s and a Yale B. S. is my star truck driver."' "

Beecher's Power in Prayer.

My girlhood was spent in Brooklyn, N. Y., in the years of Mr. Beecher's greatest popularity. It was often my privilege to attend his church on Sabbath evenings, although ever loyal to our own church and pastor at the morning service. The thing that impressed me most in the man was not his sermons—though they were always interesting and helpful—but his prayers.

He seemed to be pouring his heart out, in such a tender way, to his Father in Heaven for me individually, as though he understood every phase and need of my case. I lost all consciousness of my surroundings and was borne as on a wave of supplication to the very "throne" itself. One can hardly wonder, then, that I came away from such a service strengthened to bear, with Christian grace, whatever the future might have in store for me of joy or grief.

No one could know him intimately without feeling sure that he was one of God's chosen and choicest messengers to reveal his love to men. I thank my God that such a Christian hero as he lived and that I was privileged to know him.—Contributor, in The Congregationalist.

Bryan on "Earning" Money.

Not only do I believe that a man can earn five hundred millions, but I believe that men have earned it. I believe that Thomas Jefferson earned more than five hundred millions. The service that he rendered to the world was of such great value that had he collected he would not have been overpaid. I believe that Abraham Lincoln earned more than five hundred millions, and I could go back through history and give you the name of man after man who rendered a service so large as to entitle him to collect more than five hundred millions from society, but if I presented a list containing the name of every man who, since time began, earned such an enormous sum, one thing would be true of all of them, namely, that in not a single case did the man collect the full amount.

Jefferson did not collect all he earned; in fact, he began public life well to do for a man of that period, and died poor—impoverished by visits of those who called to tell him how much they loved him and how much they appreciated his work. Lincoln did not collect the full amount; neither Jefferson nor Lincoln would have cared to collect five hundred millions. What would either one have done with such a sum? Or, what is more important, what would five hundred millions of dollars have done with Jefferson or Lincoln?—Chicago Record-Herald.

The President's Early Ambition.

Secretary Daniels recently presented the target practice pennant to the battleship Idaho, the crack ship of the navy. He read its officers and crew a lesson in preparedness, and commended the crack gunners for their skill. "You may not know it," he said, "but it will add to your appreciation when I tell you that as a boy it was the highest ambition of Woodrow Wilson to enter the naval academy and become a naval officer. If his father had not led him into other lines the probability is that today he would be with us as a captain or an admiral."

Secretary Tumulty Tells Story.

Joseph P. Tumulty, secretary to President Wilson, tells of a former member of the Jersey City board of education who, upon a visit to one of the schools, took a reader from the teacher's hand and addressed the nearest little girl.

"My dear, can you spell 'eggpit'?" he said.

The little girl didn't recognize the word, but was willing to take a chance, so she said:

"E-g-g-p-i-t."

"Erroneous—can anybody else spell it?" the inquisitor asked, looking over the room.

Other children tried. Some spelled it with one g, others with two t's. Still wrong. The member of the board had his big finger on the word, and knew. He turned to the teacher.

"Of course, ma'am, you know how to spell it?"

The teacher blushed and confessed that, while she was not familiar with the word, she would expect it to be spelled as it sounded—"e-g-g-p-i-t."

"Not familiar with it!" roared the guardian of the public instruction. "Not familiar with it—it's right here in the book!"

The teacher looked and saw the word—Egypt.—Chicago News.

Remembering Oliver Wendell Holmes.

Dear Doctor Holmes! What a delightful, warm, spontaneous nature was his and what a fine mind! We were always good friends and I am proud of the fact. Shall I ever forget the dignity and impressiveness of his bearing as, after the fourth course of one of my breakfasts, he glanced up, saw the waiter approaching, arose solemnly as if he were about to make a speech, went behind his chair—we all thought he was about to give us one of his brilliant addresses—shook out one leg and then the other, all most seriously and without a word, so as to make room for the next course.—Clara Louise Kellogg in Saturday Evening Post.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

WHERE WE STAND.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY is primarily a NEWS-paper, reporting to a national constituency those happenings in the field of religion that have real news value of national significance. It is not, however, a mere reflector of events and current opinion. It aims to be an interpreter of events and it holds convictions of its own which it earnestly advocates. Among those convictions which relate themselves to the issues just now drawn in the Christian world may be named the following:

I. We believe in the evangelical construction of the Christian gospel, as contrasted on one hand with liberal rationalism and on the other with dogmatic legalism.

II. We believe the Christian gospel is a social gospel, and we have full fellowship with all who endeavor to so interpret it to the social conscience of today.

III. We believe that the Christian gospel is a personal gospel, and we hold that the deepest need of our time is a fresh revealing of the message of Christ to the inner life of man.

IV. We have full sympathy with the endeavor and the methods of reverent scholarship to understand the history of the Christian Scriptures and the psychology of the Christian experience.

V. We believe in evangelism by Christian education after the manner of Christ, and we hold that the modern church needs profoundly a constructive reformation in its evangelistic method.

VI. We regard the denominational system into which the Church of Christ is now divided as provincial, wasteful, misleading to non-Christians, a constant occasion to sectarian strife, an embarrassing inhibition to missionary endeavor and a sin against the Church's Lord.

VII. We stand in the fellowship of the Disciples of Christ because we believe that their movement came into existence to co-operate with other forces of God's spirit in breaking down denominationalism.

VIII. Like the great majority of the Disciples of Christ we claim no superior status for our churches, but joyfully affirm that members of the various Christian denominations are, no less than ourselves, members of the true Church of Christ.

IX. We believe that in refusing to wear a sectarian name, to impose a sectarian creed as a test of fellowship, to limit divine grace to a sectarian order of priesthood, to practice a sectarian mode of baptism and to administer the holy communion with sectarian exclusiveness, the Disciples of Christ act consistently with their historic purpose to occupy an essentially undenominational position.

X. We hold that the Disciples should go on unto perfection in the expression of this historic purpose by practicing Christian unity in every possible way with all Christians, especially by simplifying the terms of admittance into the membership of their churches so as to receive any person whom Christ has received into His Church.

XI. We believe the Disciples of Christ have today come to a turning of the way. They are on the point of taking their place in history as (1) a reactionary, literalistic sect propagating a set of fixed dogmas; or (2) a respectable denomination, side by side with other Christian denominations as one of them—prosperous, well organized, exclusive in membership, yet tolerant and co-operative, even negotiating with other denominations for merging with them in ultimate Christian unity; or (3) a dynamic movement within the Church of Christ, unecclesiastical, as far as possible undenominational, proclaiming Christian unity as a divine imperative for the Church and as an immediate personal duty for every Christian, and opening the way to its ultimate organic accomplishment BY ACTUALLY PRACTICING IT THEMSELVES WITH ALL CHRISTIANS NOW.

The Christian Century conceives the Disciples in terms consonant with the third ideal and desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. We have no ambition at all to be an organ of the Disciples' denomination. Our relation to the Disciples' denomination is one of unceasing opposition, rooted in the conviction that it is today inhibiting, if not thwarting, the great purposes with which the movement was born. It is our earnest and constant endeavor to disentangle the movement from the denominational customs and tendencies which threaten the attainment of its divine end.

MUSIC AND BOMBSHELLS.

THE London suffragettes, having planted a bomb in St. Paul's, followed that deadly missile on a recent Sunday by another which they judged likely to be more effective. A party of forty well-dressed suffragettes interrupted the morning service by chanting a prayer in behalf of Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst. Ushers ejected the women from the edifice after a scuffle in which several chairs were upset. The disturbance took place during the singing of the litany. The women, who occupied front seats in the center aisle, chanted loudly:

"Save Emmeline Pankhurst!
Spare her, spare her!
Give her light and set her free!
Save her, save her!
Hear us while we pray to thee!"

Evidently the chant had been carefully rehearsed. It was the same tune in which the choir had been singing. When the women began their chant ushers rushed toward them from all parts of the cathedral, while numerous members of the congregation remonstrated with the disturbers, telling them to remember that they were in church. The suffragettes, however, repeated their chant three or four times, each time in a louder tone. A majority of them finally were led out quietly by the ushers, but a half dozen or so clung to their chairs and fought against ejectment. When all the disturbers were removed from the building the services proceeded. A squad of police was in attendance at vespers in the evening, but there was no disturbance. At least none was reported.

Music is capable of a wide variety of uses, but we do not remember a previous instance of its use in the supplementing of a bombshell.

OUR NATIONAL HYMN.

CERTAIN Roman Catholic priests are protesting against the use of "America" as a national hymn. They are saying that it was written by a Yankee parson and is essentially a sectarian production. And they are gathering some opinions from other sources favorable to their contention. But "America" is not a sectarian hymn. It is a finely written poem, in every way superior to that which our friends in England sing to the same melody in "God Save the King." It is no more sectarian than the English song, and is a far finer one.

The Catholics are themselves sectarian, and that is the reason for their hostility to "America."

There is opposition in other quarters. The navy department is said to have announced officially that "The Star Spangled Banner" was the national hymn of America. That proves nothing. At the signing of the Treaty of Ghent, just one hundred years ago, the American plenipotentiaries declared "Yankee Doodle" to be America's national anthem; and as neither of them could sing or whistle it, the negro servant of one of them whistled it for the band-master, who wrote it and played it in honor of peace between America and Great Britain. The navy department may denominate "The Star Spangled Banner" our national air, but that does not make it so. It is no more a national anthem than "Yankee Doodle" is.

The "Star Spangled Banner" is not, and never can become, our national anthem. In the first place, there is not a congregation on earth that can sing it. Its range is too high for any but practiced soloists. In the next place it is unsuitable. No one can understand what it means without a series of footnotes telling that a particular man spent a night on a British ship and was glad when he saw the American flag in the morning. It was an interesting experience, and the story of it makes a good ballad, but it is utterly insufficient for the basis of a national hymn. Still further, it was cast in the heat of a conflict which we do not wish to remember with bitterness. The lines:

"O where is the band that exultingly swore,
'Mid the havoc of war and the battle's confusion,
A home and a country to leave us no more?

Their blood has washed out their foul footstep's pollution,"— and so on to the end of the stanza, breathe a spirit we have no wish to remember, much less to imitate. They are almost as bad as the prayer in the British song,

"Confound their politics, Frustrate their knavish tricks,"—

doggerel as uninteresting as it is impious and unpoetical. And if it be American politics which are in the mind of them who sing, the prayer is superfluous: they are already sufficiently confounded.

There is only one hymn generally accepted as a national hymn, which people can sing, and which is worthy to be sung as an expression of high patriotism, and that is:

"My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing."

If certain Roman Catholics do not like it, it is not because there is anything the matter with the hymn. It is because America is a land of liberty, and that is not the kind of land which those particular Roman Catholics like. Wherefore we like the hymn all the better.

IN WHAT CHURCH?

THE editor of "The Living Church" has been compelled to turn aside from the grave question of the change of name of his communion, the Protestant Episcopal, and to take up another, thrust upon him by a contributor. It is this:

A person is baptized by a Presbyterian clergyman (that is by a Presbyterian who mistakenly supposes he is a clergyman, for it is impossible for a Presbyterian to be a clergyman) and becomes a member of the Presbyterian church (that is, of the body composed of Presbyterians, and mistakenly supposed by them to be a church). After many years of consistent Christian living (save for the grave sin of belonging to such an organization) this person becomes enlightened and penitent, and unites with the church, that is to say, with the body whose legal name is the Protestant Episcopal church, but which everybody ought to know is the American Church or the American Catholic Church. He is confirmed by a bishop, and lives happily ever after.

But now of what was he a member before? For confirmation makes no pretense of being a ceremony of admission to the church, being in its nature as in its name a confirmation of membership previously created by baptism. And since even the Roman Catholic church accepts lay baptism, or Protestant baptism, this man must be counted a member of some church. But of what church?

The editor of "The Living Church" gives some pages to this discussion, and answers the question. He says there is but one possible answer. This baptized church member cannot be a member of the Presbyterian church, for the Presbyterians have no church. Therefore the Presbyterian quasi-clergyman in baptizing and admitting him into the pseudo-Presbyterian church, really admitted him to the Episcopal church.

The Presbyterians will be glad to know just where they stand.

BAPTIST PAPER APOLOGIZES FOR NAPIER INCIDENT.

LAST May in St. Louis, a Mr. Napier was a programme speaker on the platform of the Southern Baptist Convention—at any rate, he thought he was. Mr. Napier was a returned missionary from Nankin, China. He had observed the workings of co-operative efforts in the university there and elsewhere. Naturally, he thought it would be a nice thing to tell the folks about it in St. Louis, and especially since he was an invited speaker. But the missionary had not gone more than fifteen minutes with his narrative, appealing to his hearers that they take part in the union efforts at Nankin, when to his complete astonishment the delegates before him set up a howl and hiss, which finally forced him to resume his seat. The incident was flashed over the wires throughout the United States. The religious press took it up—that is, that portion of the religious press not Southern Baptist. No expression of apology for the rough treatment of the returned missionary has been offered from that day, until the Christian Index, an organ of the Georgia Baptists, at last denounced the event as a scandal to the denomination. True, the denunciation is slow by some three or four months. It took heroic courage for the Christian Index to do that in the face of Dr. J. B. Gambrell and the Dallas, Tex., Baptist Standard, less than a two-days' journey away! But better late than never. We wonder now if certain other Southern Baptist papers will not join in the atonement. And yet, that wrong can never be righted, except in one way. That way is the way of repentance at the next Southern Baptist Convention. In all the controversy, it is to be noted that Mr. Napier, so far as we have been able to observe in all our exchanges, has not had a word to say.

TWO RELIGIOUS PAPERS CONSOLIDATE.

THE Watchman (Boston) and The Examiner (New York City), two Baptist Journals, have consolidated, and will be known as The Watchman-Examiner. Publication will be from both Boston and New York. Dr. Curtis Lee Laws resigned his pastorate in Brooklyn to become editor-in-chief of the merged publications. Some time ago it was reported that The Watchman had become bankrupt, but this was evidently a mistake owing to a misconstruction of certain legal proceedings, which were necessary to turn over The Watchman property to the Watchman-Examiner Company. As legal difficulties arose, a receiver was asked for to settle the old company's affairs.

A PROTESTANT CONFESSIONAL?

DR. Charles M. Sheldon has a way of saying and doing striking things that peculiarly fascinate newspaper men. During the recent Christian Endeavor convention in Los Angeles, the good doctor said something that instantly found its way to thousands of newspaper front-pages the next morning before breakfast. Apparently, he threw out a sympathetic suggestion that a Protestant confessional is in order. Doctor Sheldon is a Congregationalist, and he cannot be suspected of pro-Roman Catholic sympathies. He was speaking out of a large pastoral experience, and he knew what he was talking about. Dr. Sheldon, according to his published statement, has for years given two hours of every Sunday "to hearing the tribulations of his congregation," and maintains that he has helped men to get employment and has sometimes reconciled estranged wives and husbands

"through the medium of the confessional." Come to think of it, there is scarcely a pastor of any experience who has not a confessional of some sort. Human nature is so delicately constructed that the slightest delinquency, real or fancied, often unbalances it. Who of us has not found relief and strength after consultation and prayer with his pastor? We like Dr. Sheldon's suggestion. It encourages and beautifies the pastoral office. The abuse of the confessional in certain quarters is no argument against such encouragement. Perhaps a little more of the Protestant confessional might mean a little more of the family altar too.

WORLD Y. M. C. A. CONFERENCE AT EDINBURGH.

Thirty-two nations were represented by six hundred Christian leaders at the World's Y. M. C. A. Conference held recently in Edinburgh. Lord Kinnaird, as conference chairman, lent the event his fine personality as well as his titled name. Among the topical discussions that prevailed, higher secretarial qualification and the establishment of secretarial training schools came in for extended notice. The Y. M. C. A. is extending its world-wide influence, more particularly at this time in Macedonia and the Near East. Bulgaria and Turkey entered the alliance. The new chairman of the world's committee is Paul Des Gouttes of Geneva.

SHALL WE HEAR DR. WILLETT?

My Dear Mr. Morrison: Since reading Dr. Willett's interesting letters in the "Century" concerning his missionary tour of the world I have been wondering whether the Toronto convention might not have a chance to hear him. I wrote to the office of the Foreign Society at Cincinnati suggesting that the program makers would not, of course, overlook Dr. Willett in making up the program, and indicating my belief that a multitude would like to hear his testimony and that his testimony would be of great significance to the cause of missions.

The reply I received has considerably disheartened me. It stated that there was an element in the convention that would be seriously offended if a place was made for Dr. Willett's testimony.

I am now wondering "who's who" in the national convention. In the intent and organization of the convention it is purely democratic. Full freedom characterized first by love and fairness is guaranteed in the discussions. Besides Dr. Willett's articles on his tour I have received letters from missionaries on the foreign field who tell of the inspiration brought to their station by his visit. I feel that he could make valuable suggestions that will both interpret and guide our missionary policy. Therefore many of us—I believe most of us—want to hear him now on the missionary and the working methods now employed. We feel that this request is right and just and cannot offend any persons of true Christian feeling.

I would be the last to stir up another theological discussion, particularly if it were attended by the same bitter personalities, irrelevant argument, and the same mess of misrepresentation that has attended such discussions in the past. Neither do I think of assuming that Dr. Willett's theological views would be endorsed by all those who desire to hear him. We have not the training nor interest in those special subjects. I would resent it if he should assume such a role regarding the science of medicine. We respect him as a Christian gentleman and scholar, and as such believe that we have the right to hear his presentation of a subject that we are prepared to hear and understand.

Can you suggest a way by which we can find out who the men are that make up the personnel of this favored class?

Really it seems to me that if such an investigation as is now being carried on in Washington were instituted at Toronto the results would justify some changes in methods at home as well as on the missionary field. Sincerely yours,

Des Moines, Iowa. HUGH G. WELPTON.

We willingly give space to this earnest communication because it is one of many similar expressions received at this office concerning the same subject. These expressions taken together seem to us to represent a more aggressive state of mind into which progressive Disciples are coming. Dr. Welpton was himself a foreign missionary and is today one of the most generous supporters of the Foreign Society. He knows the problems and feels the limitations put upon the work by the forces of reactionism, and like many others he desires to see the great work freed from these handicaps.

The large body of supporters of the Foreign Society whose sentiments agree with those expressed by Dr. Welpton have ceased to fear the constant menace held over the Society by the partisan influence of a newspaper with a private grudge. Events have revealed the fact that, to put it moderately, the so-called progressive wing of the Disciples is not less consecrated, nor less resourceful, nor less numerous than is that group which threatens to boycott the Society's offerings and which hires a hall of its own, when convention programs are not to its liking, wherein to exploit its favorites and favorite views.

We offer no hint of criticism of the Foreign Society on account of its reply made to Dr. Welpton's suggestion. It is inevitable that so long as the great progressive portion of the brotherhood refrains from expressing to the Society a positive desire for a perfectly free platform the Society will continue to be sensitive to the clamant threatenings of reactionaries. Our foreign missionary work will always be behind the work of other Christian bodies while these voices are heeded. We consider it a hopeful token that Dr. Welpton and others are speaking out.

The above is written with the general situation in mind rather than this particular case of the Toronto convention. As to Professor Willett, we fully agree with Dr. Welpton that the Society should utilize his testimony on behalf of the great cause. For years our missionaries have been crying for an interpreter, some man of cosmopolitan experience, a scholar, a trained observer, to study their field and their task and bring home his testimony. On his mission study tour around the world Dr. Willett was everywhere hailed with delight by the missionaries who believed that in him they had found a voice for such an interpretation. Since his return to this country he has been in demand among all Christian bodies, at universities and colleges, and in Chautauqua programs, bearing his testimony with great power as to the wonderful work of the gospel in the Orient. The pressure upon him to speak upon this theme has been so great that his friends are remarking that for the first time in the years of their acquaintance with him he "looks tired."

The testimony of such a man ought to be utilized. Our guess would be that all save a fraction of one per cent of the convention at Toronto would be eager to hear him. Our further guess would be that his presence on the program would appreciably increase the attendance at the convention.

It is needless to say that this is written without the permission of Dr. Willett. If he knew the question was being given publicity he would use what inhibition he could to suppress it. The attitude of Professor Willett through twenty years of conspicuous service to the Disciples has ever been one of personal humility with respect to participation in convention programs. He has consistently maintained an attitude of unconcern as to places of prominence. None but his intimate friends know the difficulty with which he was persuaded, even compelled, to remain upon the program of the Pittsburgh convention in 1909 in the face of the vicious attack made upon him and the Foreign Society officials on account of his presence there. Only the flood of protests against his offered resignation made it clear to him that, however he might recoil from it, he must allow his personality to be for the time the center of one of our great battles for Christian liberty.

That is somewhat ancient history now. But its lessons we may not safely forget. Chief among these is the revelation that missionary progress rests with our men and women of vision, of intelligence, and of a co-operative spirit, and that where one dollar is withdrawn from the Society's support by reactionism five dollars are given by those who yearn to see the great cause go forward.

Is it not time to put away childish timidity in missions and to open our convention platform for the testimony of the scholar? And is it not the duty of men and women who feel that such a time has come, to express their sentiment as Dr. Welpton has done? C. C. M.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF CATHOLIC SOCIETIES.

THE massive strength of the laity of the Roman Catholic church, as usual, was dramatically exhibited recently in Milwaukee, Wis., when 30,000 delegates (a newspaper report) from the constituent bodies in the American Federation of Catholic Societies attended the annual convention of that organization. Archbishop Ireland, whose extreme Americanism cost him a cardinal's hat, in an impassioned address made a significant plea for the "awakening common sense and patriotism of America to discover a remedy for the enforced secularism of the public schools." There is not an intelligent Protestant in America that would not heartily respond to this noble plea of the archbishop. He gave a broader scope to the school question than is generally given in his communion.

The federation's secretary, Anthony Matre, of St. Louis, is attempting to form a Roman Catholic Y. M. C. A., with the obvious purpose of drawing away Roman Catholic young men whose present membership is now in the older body. The federation enlarged its borders by the creation of a woman's auxiliary. The women delegates voted not to organize a Roman Catholic woman suffrage society.

OVATION TO VETERAN CHICAGO RESCUER.

TO influence 91,250 broken-down and battered men, denizens of the city's alleys and gutters, to desire to lead a better life, in the course of twenty-five years of rescue mission service, naturally calls for an ovation to the man who wielded that influence. It was, therefore, no wonder whatever that Superintendent John Stewart of the Bible Rescue Mission in Chicago, should thus be so signally honored at the ripe age of seventy-two and after an unbroken service of a quarter of a century. John Stewart has been a silent factor in the moral reformation of thousands of men, who apparently were little more than moral debris. Recognition was certainly coming to this old, grizzled campaigner against the battalions of Chicago's rum-soaked slums, and it came, the other day, in a beautiful form that must have touched the hearts of angels. A veritable ovation, participated in by such notable uplifters as Virginia Brooks Washburn, Judge McKenzie Cleland, who is rated by The Congregationalist as a "staunch advocate of the new justice," John W. Scott, well known business man of Chicago who has acted as the mission's treasurer. The speeches were laudatory, as they should have been. And yet the ovation had a tinge of pathos about it. For twenty-five years old John Stewart has been manning his guns in the Bible Rescue Mission. During that period, it is estimated that 912,500 men have entered the hospitable doors of the mission, and ten per cent of these have gone out through those same doors, with a new light in their eyes. Perhaps not all the 91,250 followed their new light to its glorious end, but who dares to assess the value of even a flicker of moral light in the soul of a tramp? All honor to old John Stewart and the brave men like him, wherever they are.

COLOSSAL CLERGY PENSION PLAN.

THE Protestant Episcopal Church has daringly attacked the clergy pension problem for some years past, but its latest plan far exceeds all former efforts. It will be proposed to the General Convention of that church meeting next October in New York City, that an endowment fund of $3,500,000 be raised. Its present disbursements for ministerial relief are said to be about $222,000. The way in which this big endowment fund would be administered, is as follows:

An annuity to a clergyman at 65 or thereabouts, based upon his length of service and salary. The maximum would be 50 per cent of the average annual salary, no annuity to be in excess of $3,000. To widow, an annuity equal to one-half of the annuity to which her husband would have been entitled during the years of marriage, with a minimum of $300 provided the marriage was celebrated during his years of active service. Annuities to provide education for the children of a deceased clergyman, as follows: $100 before the age of 7; $200 between the ages of 7 and 14; $300 between the ages of 14 and 21 during dependence, provided that the combined annuities to widow and children are not to exceed the annuity to which the clergyman would have been entitled. This proviso not to apply if the clergyman died before the age of 40. In case of total disability, certified to by the fund's own physician, a temporary annuity during the continuance of such disability equal to 40 per cent of the last annual stipend.

CHURCH UNION THROUGH THE COURT HOUSE.

UNITED States District Judge E. T. Sanford, sitting in court at Nashville, Tenn., on August 11 filed his opinion in a troublesome case involving the Cumberland Presbyterian Church and the Presbyterian Church U. S., which united a few years ago. The case involved the question as to the right of the united Presbyterian church to possess title to the church property of Grace Presbyterian Church, when the congregation, loyal to the old Cumberland Presbyterian Church as it existed before the union, was attempting to retain the property. Judge Sanford's opinion, as filed, gives the unionists a complete victory. Church union, apparently is aided in Tennessee through the court house. Loyalists at Columbia, Tenn., and Springfield, Tenn., agreed to abide by this very decision.

From another source we learn that the same question was decided favorably to the unionists in the matter of the publishing house of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, which is reputed to be worth about $500,000. The Tennessee Supreme Court had awarded this valuable property to the loyalists. The Cumberlands held the property, but the unionists took the matter into the Federal courts. The Federal courts, according to news advices, decided in favor of the unionists. No doubt the Federal decision will now be accepted

HALF MILLION DOLLAR Y. M. C. A. BUILDING.

MRS. William Van Rensselaer of New York City has a proud name, but she has just done something most worthy of it. By her gift of $500,000, she has made it possible to construct what it is claimed will be "the largest and most complete" Y. M. C. A. building in the world. The building will be erected in Brooklyn, and the board of trustees as well as the directors have voted to call the new structure, The Clarence E. Smith Memorial Building. The late Mr. Smith was the son of the benefactress. Before his death he had long cherished the hope that he might be permitted to do something of this sort. His mother has carried out that wish in memory of him.

PRESIDENT WILSON'S SUNDAY SCHOOL MESSAGE.

PRESIDENT Wilson's messages are not always addressed to Congress. He addresses messages to large organizations that are a factor in world-civilization. Among such is his striking message to the World's Sunday School Convention, recently held in Zurich, Switzerland. We record it in the hope that every Sunday School superintendent reading these lines will be prompted to read it next Sunday morning to his teachers and scholars:

> "No study is more important to a child than the study of the Bible and the truths it teaches, and there is no more effective agency for such study than the Sabbath school. It certainly is one of the greatest factors in our lives in the building up of character and the development of moral fiber, for its influence begins almost as soon as the child is able to talk, and continues throughout life.
> "The Sabbath school lessons of today is the code of morals of tomorrow. Too much attention cannot be paid to the work which the Sabbath school is doing."

THREE LARGEST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES.

THE minutes of the last General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church U. S. A. show the three largest churches in that denomination to be: First Presbyterian, Seattle, Wash., Mark A. Matthews, pastor, 5,025 members; Bethany Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, Pa., 3,514 members; and Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, J. H. Jowett, pastor, 2,436 members. Philadelphia leads all American cities in total number of communicants, with New York City second, and Chicago a close third.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

THE editors of The Christian Century have invited me, as regularly as I will, to contribute my reflections to a department of their paper. The invitation expressly stipulates that I am not to feel the weight of editorial responsibility. I am given freedom to write "on any observation or experience that interests" me. "We wish your department," says the editorial invitation, "to be personal, not editorial, not conventional, not professional. The mask that all writers for the public inevitably put on we wish you to put aside, and forget that you are writing for the public. Let us into your moods, please. Our readers, all of them, have moods too."

I think it was that talk about "moods" that tempted me to accept the editors' request. I am not to write "articles" but to express my feelings. I am sure I shall enjoy the chance to say with frankness just how things seem to me. A book I have read, or an observation, or my reflections on my own life—these will be the subject matter of my thoughts. Oft-times, no doubt, my theme will be some quite inconsequential matter, some caprice perhaps, or a particular aspect of some high enterprise that editorial statesmen would not bother with. The weightier opinions I shall leave the editors to pronounce.

I HAVE asked that my writings be grouped under the above heading because it is in the evening, after the day's work is done, that I mean to write. One hasn't time for many moods, nor for many thoughts in the strenuous labor of the daytime. But in the twilight or the stillness of the early night—then the thought world is alive. And one tends more to think truth at the end of the day than in the midst of the day. One's practical interests are less vivid. There is a certain detachment, a felt willingness to face facts more honestly than when one is under the pressure of his tasks. The evening is the soul's culture hour.

In accepting the editors' invitation I save my conscience from the prick of undue self-importance by the reflection that the humblest soul's thoughts are intensely interesting if we could get at them. The reason men are commonplace is not so much that they have a commonplace inner life, as that they have no adequate means of self-expression. The moment they open their lips to speak, or take their pen to write, they fall into conventional formulas and phrases. They do not say what they really feel, what they really want to say.

A genius, I suppose, is just a common soul who finds a way truly to express what he feels, and behold! he finds that he has interpreted universal experience. So if my poor thoughts prove to be of any interest to others, or of any value to the Faith we are all striving to keep, it will be because I have written simply and frankly, with no axe to grind, no publisher's end to serve, no salary to earn, no dogma to propagate, no system to maintain, no institution to support. In the midst of the day, I, like all my readers, think of these things and work for them. But at the end of the day the soul itself makes demand to be heard for its own sake, and it has a way of suggesting a point of view higher than our institution, our dogma or our livelihood.

OF course the "moods" referred to by the editors are not the moods of temperament, and still less those arising out of one's physiological condition. Such moods have none but negative instruction in them. They are to be overcome. They are irrational, perverse, capricious, and misleading.

But the moods the editors have in mind, I take it, are soul-moods, the moods of faith, and they are not barren of good. The soul possessed of enough humility to ask questions is bound to have moods. Faith cannot always keep up to its keynote. It is at the end of the day that I find myself questioning the choices I have made during the day, questioning the program of my life, questioning the wisdom of this or that leader in the church or the state, questioning the arguments that in the longer stretches of my experience have sustained my faith. The moods which such questions bring are not mere temperamental moods, they have an intellectual foundation. Nor are they perverse or wayward. On the contrary they seem to be creative. One goes back to his task renewed in soul, girded with fresh strength and guided by new light.

When I hear a preacher dogmatize about his faith I no longer credit him with having stronger convictions than many more timid souls. The preacher's own personal faith is not always as positive as his Sunday sermon would indicate. There are hours when even his soul aches with doubt. The leader is not always so sure of the path as his followers might infer from the firm tone of his commands. There are times when he gropes his way.

I ONCE heard a great address in a convention. It rang with conviction. It gripped us all with an almost supernatural imperative. There was no note of question in it, no rising inflection. It was punctuated with periods only. It was the "last word." Afterward the speaker asked me to walk with him. We went out into the night and his first words in response to my appreciations were, "I wonder if I took the right side of the question."

There was a complete change in his mood. He was humble and inquiring. He walked softly in the presence of a great problem of the Church. Not for a moment did I feel either weakness in his present manner or insincerity in his public address, for I have learned that all great affirmations get themselves made only by the skin of their teeth, and all great decisions likewise. Some alternative came very near winning out against them. I suppose that, after the responsibility of public leadership was discharged, the considerations on the other side struck my friend with unwonted force. The very vehemence of his affirmations made a reaction easy. He had gotten his own opinion literally "out of his system" and was able now to detach himself and see other aspects of the situation.

LITTLE wonder is it that our leaders have moods, that their faith sometimes sags, that they challenge the decisions they have made. Think of the many alternatives that present themselves to Woodrow Wilson in the Mexican crisis. He has to act upon one that seems just a little better than some others. I can well-enough imagine him falling into a mood at the end of the day, when he questions the wisdom of his decision. If Lincoln could have had infallible assurance that he had chosen rightly he would not have been the sad man he was. The rejected alternatives haunted him.

I like to feel that our leaders have moods like the rest of us; that they are not possessed of a sense of infallibility; that they do not always see as clearly as they seem to see. Even our editors, I wonder if they are so sure of the things they say as their editorials indicate. Do they, too, have moods? I am not an editor—and I must be careful not to show any disrespect to editors, especially when I am here by their courtesy—but I would guess that at the end of the day they think out many an editorial that never gets into their columns. They must keep their "moods" out of their papers. Their "utterances" must be consistent and confident, and of course "moods" are never consistent or confident. I often wish our editors would let us into THEIR moods, let us occasionally read their unpublished editorials! But of course I am talking nonsense.

Still, I am rather startled to reflect that I have been invited to do just that, to publish the unpublished, to write irresponsibly, to set down the thoughts that arise at the end of the day as if they were the thoughts I would have on the morrow.

I say I am startled, but I shall at least try to do it.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

An Experiment in the Elimination of Illiteracy

THE National Bureau of Education has just issued a Bulletin on "Illiteracy in the United States," which not only gives us food for anxious thought, but upsets some of our most cherished convictions. When it states that there are five and one-half millions of people in this country, over ten years of age, who can neither read nor write, many of us immediately think, "O, they belong to our foreign born and negro population!"

But this comfortable conclusion, so much in keeping with our American arrogance, is not entirely in accord with the facts before us; the Bulletin states that the problem of adult illiteracy is no longer one of race or section. While there is still a deplorable number of negroes who can neither read nor write, yet in the census of 1910, the total number of white illiterates exceeded the negro illiterates by nearly one million. And of the white illiterates 1,534,272 were native born, and 1,650,361 were foreign born—that is, there were almost as many of native American stock who could neither read nor write as of immigrant stock.

Another surprise is that the larger part of this illiteracy does not lurk in the slums of our great cities, but that there are twice as many people who can neither read nor write in the country as in the city.

When we face a problem of such dimensions as this great adult illiteracy, it would be an unworthy spirit that would dismiss the question with the thought, "We will wait for this generation of unfortunates to die, and center all our efforts on the education of the children of the coming generation."

Any one possessed of a right civic and missionary spirit must believe that there is a more excellent way—and that is to teach these adult illiterates, in schools organized especially for them, to read and write, and possibly other branches of education as well.

MIDNIGHT SCHOOLS.

MORE than half of this interesting Bulletin is devoted to the consideration of what it calls "the most recent attempt to eliminate illiteracy," in a hampered section—and that is the Moonlight School Movement in Rowan County, Kentucky, organized and conducted by Mrs. Cora Wilson Stewart, County Superintendent and her associates.

An extended notice of these schools was written for this department of The Christian Century in December, 1911, so we shall not repeat it here; we shall only quote briefly what our National Bureau of Education says of this successful experiment in one of the poorest of the mountain counties of eastern Kentucky: "Having studied carefully the conditions of Rowan County, Mrs. Stewart decided to open schools for adults on moonlight nights in the public school houses of the county. She outlined her plans to the teachers, and called for volunteers; all the teachers of the county volunteered. On Labor Day, September 4, 1911, these teachers visited the homes of the people throughout the county, explained the plan, and announced that moonlight schools would be opened the next evening. It was expected that the response would be slow, but more than 1,200 men and women, from eighteen to eighty-six years old, were enrolled the first night. They came trooping over the hills and out of the hollows, some to add to the meager education received in the inadequate schools of their childhood, some to receive their first lesson in reading and writing. Among these were not only illiterate farmers and their illiterate wives, sons and daughters, but also 'storekeepers,' ministers, and lumbermen, who could neither read nor write.

"The usual studies in these moonlight schools are reading, writing, arithmetic and spelling. Brief drills are given in the essential facts of language, history, geography, civics, sanitation, agriculture, and horticulture. The reading text is the 'Rowan County School Messenger,' edited by Mrs. Stewart, published weekly for the special benefit of the adult students, and furnished free of charge. The paper deals largely with school and county affairs, and the news is made up in short sentences, designed to help the pupils in their efforts to read.

FOUNDER'S IDEAL.

"IN September, 1912, a Moonlight School Teachers' Institute was held in Morehead, the county seat, and the superintendent and teachers, who had taught in the first moonlight schools, instructed others who desired to do work of this kind in Rowan and surrounding counties. In the fall of 1912, the movement spread to eight or ten other counties, while the enrollment of adults in Rowan County reached nearly 1,600. Of these, 300 were unable to read and write at all, 300 were from those who had learned in the previous year, and 1,000 were men and women of meager education.

"These schools have proved that it is not so difficult for adult illiterates to learn to read and write as is generally supposed. Experience has shown, that a few weeks' attendance at the night schools has been sufficient to enable the adult pupils to pass over the dark line of illiteracy; reading, writing and arithmetic are simple subjects, when mature minds are concentrated on them."

From the beginning of the work, Mrs. Stewart has held out to her moonlight schools the ideal, "Rowan County free from illiteracy," and she finds her adult pupils as responsive to this unselfish and patriotic ideal, as to their own personal instruction.

In a letter just received from her, she writes:

"We are rushing our final warfare on illiteracy in Rowan County this year; we are now taking the unfortunates individually, where we formerly took them collectively; it seems all but certain that in a few months we shall be able to hold up to other hampered sections this ideal as an accomplished fact: 'A county freed from illiteracy in three years by means of moonlight schools.'"

This successful experiment for the elimination of illiteracy, which has won the approval and public endorsement of our National Bureau of Education, is interesting to every public spirited citizen. It is of especial interest to this department, because Mrs. Stewart is one of the finest types of modern womanhood; she is a mountain woman, a devoted member of the Christian church at Morehead, and received practically all of her education at the Morehead Mountain School, a mission of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Her work will not end with the redemption of her own county from this dark cloud, but she and her helpers will know no rest until a like campaign is inaugurated for the whole state, with the splendid ideal that all of the 208,200 illiterates in Kentucky shall be possessed of that inalienable right which will open up to them God's Holy Word, and the whole world of literature as well.

GEORGIA'S CHILD LABOR.

The Georgia legislature has "shelved" the child labor bill for this session. For many years Georgia women have been using their "indirect influence" to secure some protection for the children. They have had the help of the National Child Labor Committee, and of all the philanthropic and humane elements in the state. The conditions are so bad as to have become a national scandal. Only a few days ago the Atlanta Journal declared that everybody in Georgia of even a little importance had come to realize that the exploitation of child labor was not only a disgrace to the state, but highly detrimental to its industrial and educational interests. Yet the opposition of the mill owners has killed the bill. Nothing will be done at this session about establishing an age limit or putting any further restrictions upon the hours of labor. The Georgia legislature has decided that the cotton industry would be imperiled if children under fourteen were forbidden to work in the mills. Under the present system, the children are not only imperiled, but destroyed. But of what importance are children in comparison with "business interests?"

Is it likely that the legislature would have thus defied all the humane sentiment of the state if the women of Georgia had had votes?

MUNICIPAL VOTE WON IN PARIS.

The report that Paris women had won the municipal franchise has just been confirmed by an article in the New York Tribune of August 13. It was at first believed that the report was not authentic, but the Marquise de Fontenoy writes:

"The Municipal Council of Paris has, by a unanimous vote, accorded the municipal franchise to women, who will henceforth be qualified to take part in the election of the fathers."

A STUBBORN HUSBAND.

"My husband is one of the most stubborn men in the world." "He can't be any more stubborn than mine." "Oh, yes, I'm sure he must be. Yesterday I had an engagement to meet him at three o'clock." "Yes?" "Well it was nearly 4:30 when I got there, and he won't admit yet that the rest he got while he was waiting did him good."—Chicago Record-Herald.

Disciples Table Talk

Old Bethany Church Will Stand.

Little short of heroic measures were taken to prevent the demolition of the little brick meeting-house on the picturesque banks of Buffalo Creek at Bethany, W. Va. As every informed Disciple knows, old Bethany church is asociated with the name of the Campbells. For a little while, it appeared that the house would be razed. Bethany College was desirous of building a magnificent stone memorial church edifice upon the site of the little red brick meeting-house. That house was becoming a ruin. The hand of the repairer had long been withheld. The college authorities reasoned that it would be a gracious achievement to build a college church in stone as a memorial to the founder of the college. The trustees had the plans for the new structure drawn. The matter of funds presented scarcely any difficulty. But the trustees failed to reckon with the sentiment attaching to the old building. They wished nothing but honor to the name of the Campbells. As soon as it became known that the old edifice would have to go for the new one, friends rallied around it as if it were the Ark of the Covenant. These friends thought to restore the old meeting house would be better than to destroy it. Mrs. Decima Campbell Barclay, daughter of Alexander Campbell, took that view. His granddaughter, Miss Virginia Campbell Thompson, likewise shared the view of the restorationists. In fact, she is now receiving funds, in response to her urgent appeal with which to fully meet the cost of restoration. The trustees had hardly more than ordered the old meeting-house on Buffalo Creek to be razed when Mrs. Barclay, in a friendly suit, asked for a legal injunction to restrain the college authorities from carrying out the order of demolition. On August 8, Judge Charles Newman, presiding over the court at Wellsburg, W. Va., granted the injunction, on the ground that the property is still technically vested in the Campbell estate. Old Bethany Church, therefore, will, in all probability, stand. The incident, no doubt, will finally result in the complete restoration of the old edifice. Miss Thompson writes: "We are planning to have the old West Virginia Church used as a church as long as possible. A reliable architect has informed my aunt that it can be put in such good condition that it will last a century." It is probable the new building plans will go forward but on another piece of ground.

Illinois State Convention: Sept. 8-13.

The state convention to be held September 8-13, at Jacksonville, Ill., promises to be large, representative and important. The fact that Jacksonville is situated in the center of Illinois churches makes it highly probable that every section of the Illinois brotherhood will be numerously represented. Six years ago the convention was held at Jacksonville, and the 1,000 delegates in attendance made one of the record-making gatherings of Illinois Disciples' history. Jacksonville has been prominently associated with the Disciples' movement ever since Barton W. Stone organized the work there eighty-one years ago. The church has been ministered to by able pastors and famous evangelists. Its influence as a mother church in Illinois has, therefore, been state-wide. One of the first colleges in Illinois is the offspring of the Jacksonville congregation. In late years the church there has been a pronounced civic force, and it has developed rapidly on more progressive missionary lines. Its Sunday-school is especially well organized. The church edifice will comfortably seat 1,400 and lends itself well to convention purposes. Clyde Darsie, the pastor, writes:

"The Jacksonville people are large-hearted and hospitable. They are opening their homes to the delegates and extending the warmest kind of a welcome to the expected visitors. They will be disappointed if a large delegation does not attend. The plan of entertaining the convention has been changed during the last few years, so that a charge of 75c for lodging and breakfast is now made. And the Jacksonville church will follow this plan of entertainment. But this church has entertained the convention a number of times in the past without charge and while we conform to the plan set down by the convention, our spirit of hospitality is unchanged. You will be just as welcome as ever."

Every interest of the brotherhood, state and national, will be ably represented on the program. Much is being made of the announcement, and much should be made of it, that Rev. C. M. Chilton of St. Joseph, Mo., will have a conspicuous place. Dr. Chilton's statesmanlike address as president of the American Christian Missionary Society last October in the Louisville convention, has made him a national figure among Disciples of Christ.

We Take Off Our Hat To—

Mrs. Decima Campbell Barclay, for saving old Bethany church from demolition.

Rev. Finis Idleman, Des Moines, Ia., for his good service in asking the Iowa Humane Society to erect a sanitary public fountain in the center of his city.

Rev. George A. Miller, Washington, D. C., Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, pastor Franklin Circle church, Cleveland, O., and Chancellor O. N. Roth of Phillips University, who have become bridegrooms recently.

Rev. Miss Myrtle B. Parke, five years pastor at Carlock, Ill., whose engagement to Rev. W. H. Storm, pastor at Lexington, Ill., was announced recently by Rev. E. P. Gish, of Eureka, Ill.

Rev. J. L. Haddock, for organizing a church at Bloomington, Texas, while recuperating from sickness.

Rev. C. R. Stauffer, Norwood, a suburb of Cincinnati, O., for building a $30,000 Sunday-school annex.

Rev. Milo Atkinson, for clearing $8-000 indebtedness on Centennial church at Bloomington, Ill., before resigning to take a pastorate in Memphis, Tenn.

Secy. G. W. Muckley, for being on Church Extension duty for more than twenty years.

H. O. Pritchard, who begins his presidency of Eureka College, Ill., Sept. 1.

Nebraska State Convention.

The Disciples of Nebraska held their forty-sixth annual convention in a tent on the Chautauqua ground at Hastings, Neb., Aug. 12 and 13. The delegates were welcomed by Mr. J. N. Clarke, president of the Hastings Chamber of Commerce. H. H. Harmon, pastor First Church, Lincoln, president of the convention, responded, accepting the keys to the city of Hastings proffered by Mr. Clarke. C. F. Stevens, of Beatrice, preached the convention sermon, pleading for deeper spiritual life in the church. Among other speakers were: W. R. Warren, Chancellor Wm. Oeschger, Mrs. Anna Atwater, and Field Secretary E. M. Johnson of the state work. Nebraska claims 200 churches with 23,000 communicants and 25,000 enrollment in Sunday-schools. About 3.500 women in the state are working under the banner of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Secretary F. F. Wigton of Lincoln presented to the convention a plan for church federation. Mr. Wigton is secretary of the Federated Churches of Nebraska. His purpose was to inform the Disciples of the workings of the federation to which nine denominations have already committed themselves. He was courteously heard and many phases of his plan met with almost universal favor. The delegates, however, were wary about any plan whereby they would be bound to keep out of new territory or where they would be hampered in a free evangelization. The sincerity of Mr. Wigton was questioned by no one and he made a good impression in his earnest plea for concerted attack upon evil by the combined churches. Edward Clutter, of Nelson, was the most pronounced in his opposition to affiliation, while H. J. Kirschstein, of Omaha, declared that he was an adherent of the plan and has led his church in the Omaha federation.

Iowa State Convention.

First Church, Keokuk, Iowa, R. W. Lilley, minister, will be the hostess of the Iowa state convention to be held Sept. 9-12. Mayor Elder will welcome the delegates to the city. An interesting feature of the convention will be the Sunday-school department, now under the personal supervision of Professor Walter S. Athearn, of Drake University, with Leon S. Dudley as field visitor. More than 400 Sunday-schools, with an enrollment exceeding 50,000, are represented in this department. Iowa churches have 350 buildings, and the reported membership is nearly 70,000.

The local congregation has chartered a steamer and will give the delegates a moonlight boat excursion on Lake Cooper on the evening of Sept. 10. A banquet is being planned to be given at the Country Club one evening during the convention. Many local organizations, clubs, etc., are planning to extend the delegates various courtesies.

Unique Result of Methodist Revival.

It is not often the case, that a majority of converts in a Methodist revival unite with a congregation of Disciples of Christ. But that is precisely what happened at Belton, Tex. Edwin C. Boynton is pastor of the congregation at Belton. Recently the Methodist pastor near Belton held a meeting, in which the Disciples co-operated heartily. The climax of the service was the impressive baptism of eight candidates, Mr. Boynton being the baptizer. But more unique than this even, out of the eight candidates receiving baptism at the hands of the Disciples minister, five united with the Disciples, the other three preferring the fellowship of the Methodists. Mr. Boynton writes: "The service was impressive, and the fellowship cordial." For our own part, we see no reason why such a service should have been otherwise.

Judges Fail to Agree on a New Name.

The Board of Ministerial Relief conducted a popular prize contest in an effort to get a new name to designate those individuals and churches that donate a complete pension for specific veterans of the pulpit. The contest closed June 1, and on June 1 began the woes of the judges who were to pick the winner and the new name. There were a great number of suggestions, but none of them, apparently, had any persuasive force. The judges failed to agree, and the Board of Ministerial Relief now announces that fact. The board announces also that the term "Living Link" will continue to be used until a better one is found.

Stock Increase of Bethany Assembly.

The capital stock of Bethany Assembly, near Indianapolis, Ind., will be increased from $25,000 to $50,000, and at the same time a campaign will be made to make the assembly greater than ever. The lake will be enlarged. Improvements on an extensive scale under the new stock increase will be made in the equipment, the grounds and provisions for entertainment. The list of the newly issued stock is headed by William H. Everson, of Burlington, Ind. He contributes $1,000, and a like sum has been given by Indiana preachers. The directors for the ensuing year are as follows: Marshall T. Reeves, Columbus; E. L. Anderson, Anderson; Mrs. J. B. Wilson, Bloomington; A. M. Ragsdale, Indianapolis; F. E. Trucksess, Brownsburg; W. E. M. Hackleman, Indianapolis; T. J. Legg, Indianapolis; Mrs. A. J.

Frank, Brownsburg; Lee Tinsley, Morristown; L. C. Howe, Noblesville; E. B. Scofield, Indianapolis; Mrs. W. O. Darnell, Lebanon; Dr. H. J. Hall, Franklin, and John M. Alexander of Crawfordsville.

Solving the Theater Problem.

H. E. Stafford, minister of First Church, Massillon, O., is attempting to solve the amusement question in his community in a positive and constructive way. He is critical of the vaudeville, which he declares is offensive in Massillon. But he is not a negative reformer. Recognizing the fact that entertainment in itself is as innocent as it is natural, Mr. Stafford is seeking material for a course of lectures to entertain the Massillon public during the coming winter season. The experiment was successfully tried last winter, and it had the desired effect of freezing out the theater entirely. Mr. Stafford is holidaying in Canada, with his camera. No doubt he will have ample material the coming winter for entertaining his community.

Ann Arbor Pastor Summers in England.

George W. Knepper, pastor First Church, Ann Arbor, Mich., who is spending the summer in England, writes that he spent sixteen days at Keswick, England, where he has been attending a great religious convention. Mr. Knepper writes: "It was not alone the beauty of the place, which is beyond words, but it was the fact that here is held the great Keswick convention for the deepening of the spiritual life, that held me. I wanted the best that I might pass it on to Ann Arbor. Here have come 5,000 of England's best men and women. They are of every creed, of every station and you feel at once the Keswick motto: 'All one in Christ Jesus.' Such searching of hearts, such assurance of triumph, I have never before seen. For 38 years this convention has been a force in the world's church life, and this year's session has touched the high water mark." On July 28 Mr. Knepper left Keswick for Liverpool, Chester and North Wales. He says, "I have not seen or heard a telephone since I left Ann Arbor and that is rest."

Earnest Letter from Russian Leader.

More than $4,000 is reported as raised by the treasurer of the New York Russian Emergency Fund to assist the Disciples of Christ in Russia. The following letter from Prof. Ivan S. Prokhanoff to Joseph Keevil, of New York, suggests certain aspects of the situation:

"St. Petersburg, Russia, June 26, 1913. Dear Mr. Keevil: Since Z. T. Sweeney's departure from St. Petersburg, I have received many messages from all parts of Russia. Most of them speak about the growth of the "mustard seed," about the great development of the Kingdom of God. We receive calls from all the provinces of this great empire for evangelists and preachers. But alas! We are so limited, by the lack of means, that we can answer but a few and with great sorrow we refuse many, which is a great detriment to the cause of Christ. In some places the Adventists come and attack the churches, and the help and direction of the evangelist is necessary. We pray God that we may be able to send more and more evangelists into the great and needy field. We received news about various persecutions. In our paper the 'Morning Star' many cases of persecutions are stated. Mr. Patmont may translate them for you. Another orthodox priest, known as a literary man, has united with us. Conversions are reported everywhere. On September 14 we take up the studies at the Bible College. We want to admit more students. We also want to rent a house for the college. In order that we may do what we feel is necessary we shall need by August 14 transmitted from you brethren not less than $1,500, or at least $1,000. Yours in the Lord.—I. S. PROKHANOFF."

George W. Kramer, 1 Madison avenue, New York City, is still receiving funds from all those desirous of participating in the collegiate and evangelistic labors of the Russian field.

Baptist Pastor Unites with Disciples.

A. M. Levack is a notable addition to the working force of the Disciples of Christ. As pastor, until recently, of the First Baptist Church of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, for four years, he was well known in the Northern Baptist denomination. During the summer, Mr. Levack has been supplying at Central Church, Marshalltown, Ia. He was born in Scotland, September 13, 1873. In due time, he graduated from Harley College, London, England. For three years he served as a missionary in Egypt under the North African Mission. Mrs. Levack also served in the same mission prior to their marriage. Resigning his missionary task because of the illness of his child, Mr. Levack returned to England. He came to the United States eight years ago. His ministry at Cedar Rapids made him a leader amongst the Baptists of Iowa. Walter M. White, pastor of First Church, Cedar Rapids, states that Mr. Levack's preaching has proved a source of satisfaction to Disciples wherever he has gone.

The receipts for American missions, these hot summer days, are showing splendid gains in spite of the drouth. During July all classes of offerings showed gains over same month of last year, amounting to $6,563.09. Secretary Grant K. Lewis urges that zeal and promptness should be used by the churches everywhere in collecting and forwarding missionary funds. It will help greatly if the offerings could be sent in early in September, because the Toronto convention convenes September 30.

E. W. Cole, pastor Central Church, Huntington, Ind., was taken quite ill recently at Cairo, Ill., while delivering a lecture on the Redpath Chautauqua Circuit. The lecturer concealed his distress until he had completed his lecture. Two physicians were then called in to wait upon him in his hotel apartment. He is recovering, according to last report.

Chancellor O. N. Roth, of Phillips University, Enid, Okla., and Miss Ethel Mae Harris, were united in the bonds of matrimony Aug. 6, at the home of the bride's sister, Mrs. F. C. Hyndman, Elvaston, Ill. Milo Atkinson, Bloomington, Ill., solemnized the marriage.

F. W. Burnham, First Church, Springfield, Ill., and Mrs. Burnham, are taking a two weeks' automobile tour through northern Illinois and Iowa. At Hillsboro, Ia., on August 18, Mr. Burnham addressed the Men's Club. They expect to return to Springfield Sept. 1.

While M. L. Pontius is in Indiana on vacation, his pulpit in Central Church, Peoria, Ill., was occupied by a gifted young lady, Miss Laura Friedinger. Central Church is temporarily worshiping in a Jewish synagogue, pending the rebuilding of the church edifice.

Finis Idleman, Central Church, Des Moines, Ia., is noted for his social service proclivities. The other day, he engaged himself in a neat piece of humane service. He asked the Iowa Humane Society to erect a sanitary public fountain in Des Moines.

Joseph Keevil, superintendent of New York City missions, spent nearly a month at Carthage, N. Y., reorganizing the old church there with 24 members. A lot will be purchased, and a suitable place of worship will be provided.

Carl Burkhart, a graduate student at Yale, who graduated in June, is touring the British Isles, France, Switzerland and Italy, and is heading for Germany, Belgium and Holland. He will return to this country in the middle of September.

Peter Colvin, Santa Rosa, Cal., was reelected pastor of the church at a recent annual meeting. The treasurer reported all bills paid and a balance of $21.82 in the treasury after the year's work.

During the month, O. P. Spiegel at Montgomery, Ala., has been preaching to immense crowds of men at the railroad shops. He had also been preaching to interested congregations in nearby villages.

H. Clay Lee, aged 84, for many years a preacher among the Disciples of Christ, died August 4 at his home near Mooresville, four miles north of New Albany, Ind.

G. S. Bennett will succeed Vernon Stauffer at Edgewater, N. J. Mr. Stauffer goes to a professorship in Hiram College.

The Mid-Week Service

THE JOY AND PEACE OF GOD'S HOUSE.

It is useless to tell men that they ought to take delight in the house of God and find peace there. Joy and peace are not experiences that come by way of commands. If we are happy and at peace with ourselves and with God, we can discuss our experiences with profit. We may assume that those who attend the prayer-meetings derive satisfaction from their connection with the church.

To the Israelite the temple was in a special sense the home of Jehovah and therefore very sacred. We Christians profess to believe that men must worship God in spirit and in truth and that the reverent spirit makes sacred any place. Nevertheless, we need places set apart for common worship. We are helped to feel the nearness of God by the surroundings in which we sing and pray and meditate.

The temple at Jerusalem was crowded with memories that awakened the spirit of

A Low Price, Now Still Lower!

USERS of the Bethany Graded Lessons have always marvelled at the low price at which such superb literature was sold.

But this price has just been reduced to a still lower figure. In the Beginners, Primary and Junior grades the reduction amounts to 20 per cent. The price of these materials is now as low as, and in some items lower than, materials of other publishers.

The reason of this is plain. The Bethany Graded Lessons are produced by the co-operation of the Disciples Publication Society with the Presbyterian Board of Publication, the Methodist Book Concern, and the Congregational Publishing Society. The immense quantities used by these great religious bodies and others make it possible to produce the very best literature ever offered the Sunday School world, and to reduce the price at the very time when some publishers are compelled not only to raise their prices but to cut down the size of many of their publications.

The practice of Christian unity in the preparation and publication of the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature is economical as well as Christian.

The Disciples Publication Society

gratitude and praise. As the worshiper looked upon the building and walked about its courts, he was reminded of the valor with which it had been defended against malignant foes, of the zeal of holy men who cleansed it from the defilements of the profane, and of the glorious days when Israel had been gathered to celebrate before Jehovah the achievements and deliverances of the people. Much of our joy in the house of God is due to memory. We like a church with a noble history. The thought of the great souls that expressed their hope and joy and sorrow through the ritual we use gives joy and peace.

In the house of God we celebrate the success of those who have gone before us in the way of faith. Their success seems to guarantee us against failure. Quiet confidence grows as we think how our fathers met with courage the foes of their faith. The call to be worthy of our origin becomes reasonable and we gather strength for our conflicts. The continuity of life and faith is seen to be something more than a phrase. What we do may be as worthy as that which has been done by the heroes whose names have been sung to all the world. They did the work of a day in its day. We can do as well. The world needed them and it needs us.

Hope of the most daring kind is nourished in the house of God. The group of worshipers may be small and obscure, yet it will dream of world conquest. Local issues are seen in their relation to the universal empire of Christ. There is joy in knowing that we are in a fight for the liberation of the bodies and souls of men of all races and places from every sort of tyranny. And the only peace worthy of the name is that of men who are in such a fight. It is the peace of those who think and act consistently and whose thinking and acting are being justified by events.

The peace of the closed mind may easily be mistaken for the peace of the house of God. Habits are hard to break. We identify God's will with what is easy and comfortable. What we have been doing we find easy and a means of comfort. We try to forget the actual world of conflict when we sit in the house of God. We sing the old songs and stir up emotions that would have been useful in the days of our grandfathers. That is, some of us do this. We misuse the past. We think of the world as committed to ways that cannot be changed and of religion as an opiate for the troubled soul. If we see evils about us that invite to heroic action, we go into the sanctuary to sing ourselves into forgetfulness of this "wilderness of woe." For those of us who are made in this fashion, religion is too tender to be exposed to the rough elements of the social and economic world.

The joy and peace that are abiding come from right relations with the source of life and goodness. If our worship has any value, it helps us to appreciate our relation to God. God is not afar off. He is near us in the duty of the hour. He comes to us through science, art, business, and the social life. The danger is that we may not see him because we have wrong notions of how we shall find him and of the world he will speak to us.

The Best!

Many Sunday School classes will wish to study the life of Jesus this fall. They want the very best text for young people's or adult classes that can be found. This is simply to remind them that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned, as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF JESUS in Fifty-two Lessons. It is being widely used in Sunday Schools and Y. M. C. A. classes. It is now on the press for its third edition and the new edition is much larger than the two earlier editions combined. This testifies to its popularity. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. In quantities of 10 or more, 40c each.

Church Extension Offering Begins Sunday, September 7th

THE FOLLOWING SUPPLIES WILL BE SENT FREE FOR DISTRIBUTION AMONG THE MEMBERS OF YOUR CONGREGATION TO EVERY PREACHER OR CORRESPONDENT ORDERING THEM BY CARD.

1. "Hope and Realization." An illustrated leaflet telling what every Disciple of Christ should know about our Church Extension Work.
2. Collection Envelopes; one should be in the hands of every member of the church previous to day of Annual Offering.
3. Pastoral letters to be ordered only by the pastors.

THE CHURCH EXTENSION OFFERING IS THE LAST OF THE ANNUAL OFFERINGS DURING THIS MISSIONARY YEAR. IT SHOULD BE THE JOY OF EVERY CHURCH TO HELP, BECAUSE—

1. The Board can answer now but one-third of the appeals because of lack of funds.
2. Forty per cent of new churches organized must be helped to build by Church Extension loans.
3. Every preacher knows that he can do no creditable work without proper equipment.
4. Only thirteen out of 1,621 churches aided by Church Extension Loans have failed, which speaks well for the vitality of our Missions.

LAKE GENEVA CONFERENCE.

The ninth annual connference of the Missionary Education Movement at Lake Geneva, August 1-10, was an inspiration as well as a means of giving instruction and plans to the 304 delegates in attendance, who came from sixteen states, and represented eleven different church bodies. Missionaries from China, India, Burmah, Japan, Philippine Islands and Porto Rico were among the number and added greatly to the conference.

Rev. J. M. Stifler, pastor of First Baptist Church, Evanston, Ill., presided and conducted the early morning intercessional in a way that proved a blessing to all. B. Carter Milliken, of New York, was dean of the Adult Mission Study and Harry S. Myers, assistant general secretary of the Missionary Education Movement, was dean of the Graded Sunday-school department. Both had able assistants. The great benefit of their instruction was proved in the devotion of the members to classes and study. Great results are expected in the home churches. The daily open parliament which followed was a source where valuable plans for future work were gained.

Two strong features of the Conference were the immigration problem and China, which are stressed by home and foreign mission boards in the united campaign of the following year. A clock on the front of the Administration Building ticked off the number of immigrants who reached our shores during the Conference. The total number being 25,519. Besides mission study classes on these important issues, platform addresses were made by Rev. Elmer L. Williams of Chicago, on the problems of the downtown church, and by Rev. Joseph Taylor, of West China, on the situation there, as he sees it.

On Tuesday afternoon the problem from the view-point of the immigrants was illustrated by a demonstration. A barge loaded with immigrants landed at the pier and the immigrants were taken to the Auditorium, where they were put through the examination as conducted at Ellis Island, to judge their fitness for entrance to America.

A Japanese exhibit and another demonstration that brought us closer to the customs of home and street life, adult and child life, and pointing out the inferior place of woman in Japan, was given under the direction of Mrs. Laura DeLaney Garst, who represented the Disciples of Christ. In her impressive way, she brought the plea for Japan. On Sunday evening she addressed the vesper service, making a deep impression on the Conference. She was shown every consideration by the Conference. Are we, as a people, awake to our opportunity of acting out our plea for Christian union? Are we not depriving ourselves of the inspiration and help that come from these united efforts in missionary education? Only eight of the delegates were Disciples.

VIRGINIA JONES.

FOREIGN MISSIONARY NOTES.

H. A. Eicher, Harda, India, writes: "I have just baptized my first man in India. He was a Mohammedan and has renounced everything for Christ. He is about twenty years of age and the son of a grain merchant. He is well educated and gives promise of becoming a useful man among us. Quite a number of people, both Hindus and Mohammedans, were present at the baptism." Mr. Eicher also reports that the schools are starting off well since the vacation.

Last week a friend in Kansas sent $600 to help support the steamship Oregon on the Congo. A friend in Indiana donates $3,000 to the Foreign Society on the Annuity Plan.

The Sunday-school conducted by the missionaries of the Foreign Society at Union, Cuba, had an average of about sixty for July. It meets in a room twenty-seven by sixteen. They are crowded to the limit. There were two confessions at a recent meeting. The Sunday-school gave $23 for foreign missions. A friend at Union proposes to give a lot worth $800 if we can provide the funds to erect a chapel. Melvin Menges and wife are the missionaries.

The Shenandoah Valley District of Virginia has recently held its district convention and decided to make W. L. Burner, a native of that district, their Living-link in the foreign field. Geo. W. Miley, Woodstock, is the secretary.

Under date of June 18 A. F. Hensey, writing from Bolenge, Africa, says, "On the 11th we baptized seventy-eight here and on the 12th the evangelists returned to their fields, all of us leaving at the same time for the committee meeting at Longa. We had a delightful three days together and I returned this morning."

Miss Edna Eck sailed from Matadi, Africa, August 6 for America on her furlough. She has had a long and useful term. It will be remembered that she went out from Charleston, Ill.

The new hospital at Harda, India, will soon be completed now. Dr. Drummond and the missionaries have had some delay and hindrances in the work. Upon this hospital will be put a tablet as follows: "The J. W. McCleave Memorial Hospital." The money for the hospital was given by Mrs. J. W. McCleave, in memory of her late husband.

Mrs. C. C. Drummond and children will sail from Bombay for America Sept. 17th.

Memorial Hall—College of the Bible.

Drake University is an institution of higher learning devoted to the best in education. It believes in cultivating the religious nature in man as well as the intellectual and physical. It is standard in every department, and is so recognized by every standardizing agency in this country. No short courses leading nowhere are offered. The faculty is composed of thoroughly trained Christian men and women, who, because of their attainments, command the respect of educators everywhere. The equipment in every department is adequate. No matter how valuable your time, you can afford to spend it in Drake University. It is a school that gives value received. There is no pretense—no exaggeration.

The College of the Bible meets the approval of the Disciples of Christ. It is true to the principles of the fathers of the religious movement we would further. This college is sending out an educated ministry to bless the churches. The department of Religious Education is one of the greatest training schools for Sunday-school and other religious workers to be found in this country. The rural church problem receives attention here.

We want Two Hundred new ministerial students to enter next September. We will assist each one in many ways. Scholarships, loan funds, and opportunities that the student appreciates will be available so that he may remain in the college until he is thoroughly prepared for his world task. Last year nearly 1,600 students attended Drake University. This number included 121 ministerial students. We ask 300 to come next year.

The College of Liberal Arts is superior in every respect. Seven hundred and forty-two enrolled last year in this department.

The College of Law enrolls more than One Hundred each year, and is as well situated as any in the country.

The Conservatory of Music is acknowledged to be the peer of any in this country. The teachers are artists of national reputation. Enrollment last year, Five Hundred Twenty-six.

ARE YOU THINKING OF GOING TO SCHOOL?

Try a Bible College in combination with a great State University. Together we have an equipment worth $3,750,000, and an annual income of $760,000. Do you realize what that means? It insures both equipment and talent. The quantity and quality of work is not surpassed. It is seldom equalled. Over 260 teachers are at your service. Salaries are paid which command the best talent. Yet, tuition is nothing for Missourians, and is only $20 per year for students from elsewhere.

Moreover, the spiritual atmosphere both in schools and in town is of the best. A deep religious spirit results each year in students dedicating themselves to the ministry or to the work of foreign missions.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday Schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday School literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the Church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the Society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, The Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

TEACH CHRIST

To Your Adult and Young People's Classes

Better than any other course of study---Old Testament, New Testament, Historical, Literary---is the simple study of the Life of the Master

Why You Should Use Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus"

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There are few question marks in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's Life of Jesus. A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study this Fall.

The Pull of the Void

The ancient histories have preserved for us the record of a truly memorable meeting between two men of olden time—Alexander and Diogenes. It is said that the two men died on the same day, and once in their eventful lifetime they met. Alexander had things in abundance, countries to spare, cities to burn, wealth greater than he could reckon. Diogenes lived in a tub and ate out of a wooden bowl, and this short list comprises the inventory of his estate. Yet the great emperor had nothing which he could impart to the cynic philosopher, and when the prince asked him what he could do for him, Diogenes replied, "Stand out of my sunlight." A great many millions of people fawned upon Alexander and rejoiced in such things as the prince was disposed to give to them. Salaries, commissions, titles, government positions, all these were in his power to distribute, but he is said to have gone out of the presence of Diogenes saying: "If I were not Alexander, I would be Diogenes."

It is sometimes sad to see men who have suffered financial misfortunes. In their false estimate of the gravity of their losses such men will say, "I am ruined!" Ruined? Is his wife dead? Are his sons in prison? Have his daughters gone to the bad? No one of these things has happened to him. He means simply that from this time on his household must live in four rooms instead of fourteen. He must eat two courses for dinner instead of six, off a table of pine instead of quarter oak, and ride in the electric cars instead of in an automobile. Such things as these cannot ruin a man. Does his family remain, does he still possess health, is honor still his, and is there something still left to labor for and hope? The man of whom this is true is far from being a ruined man. The question whether his income is ten dollars a week or ten thousand a year, while not without importance, is far from being the all-important question of existence to such a man.

Now when we learn these things, we should be not less diligent in business, but less concerned proportionately for the incidental interests of life. It is not a question of whether a man shall or shall not seek food and raiment. These things we are compelled to seek. It is a question of proportion and precedence. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," said Jesus, "and these other things shall be added." It is not that the other things have no value, but they do not, and cannot, have supreme value. The mistake of scores of men is in assuming that the chief concern of life is after all incidental to life. Professor J. W. Powell tells of camping with a party of white men and Indians above the canyon gorge of a little stream that empties into the grand canyon of the Colorado. The little canyon did not seem very wide, yet not one of the party could throw a stone across it. The Indian chief, who would throw the farthest of any of the party, believed that he could throw much farther on a level than across an open space. He explained that the void pulled the stones down, and he illustrated his idea. "If you stand on the edge of the cliff you are likely to fall; the hollow pulls you down, so that you are compelled to brace yourself against the force and lean back. Any one can make such an experiment and see that the void pulls him down. If you climb a tree the higher you reach the harder the pull; if you are at the very top of a tall pine you must cling with your might lest the void below pull you off."

The old Indian was wrong in his philosophy of gravity. Nothing is more deceitful to the eye than distance across an open space bounded on the farther side by blank walls of rock and with no intervening objects to assist the mental measurement.

But something of the old Indian's philosophy is true in life. There is a tremendous pull of the void. There is moral gravitation in spiritual emptiness. There is a tremendous inclination toward the precipice and chasm which makes for a seeming unreality of spiritual things. There is a mighty illusion which makes the things for which we strive seem worth the dizzy climb and scramble for possession of the mirage or the pot of gold at the rainbow's end.

But the abiding things of life are not thus gained. There is a freedom from the tyranny of mere things. There is a putting first the Kingdom of God. And all necessary things are added to him who seeks that Kingdom first.

Many people err in supposing that they are living full lives. They hear the rattle of their numerous engagements like pebbles in a gourd, and suppose because they are busy with trivialities that their lives are full. Never is vacuity more fraught with self-deception. The full life is not of necessity the fretfully busy life. A life can be busy over infinitesimal trifles. The well filled life may have a sense of leisure. The empty life, the life that has no mighty and compelling purpose, may well fear the pull of the void. He stands secure whose life has found poise and assurance in the fulness of peace and power.

China in Transition

Aspects of the New and the Old in Asia's Ancient Land.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

THE story is told of a Chinese official who was entertained in London some years ago. Among the functions held in his honor was a public concert, at which an orchestra of note rendered a specially selected program of music. Toward the close of the evening the guest of honor was asked if he wished any of the numbers repeated. He said he would be glad to have them play the first selection again. This was done, but he insisted it was not the one he meant. He wanted the one that came BEFORE IT; whereupon his anxious hosts were made aware of the fact that the one part of the evening's entertainment which he had really enjoyed was the process of TUNING UP THE INSTRUMENTS.

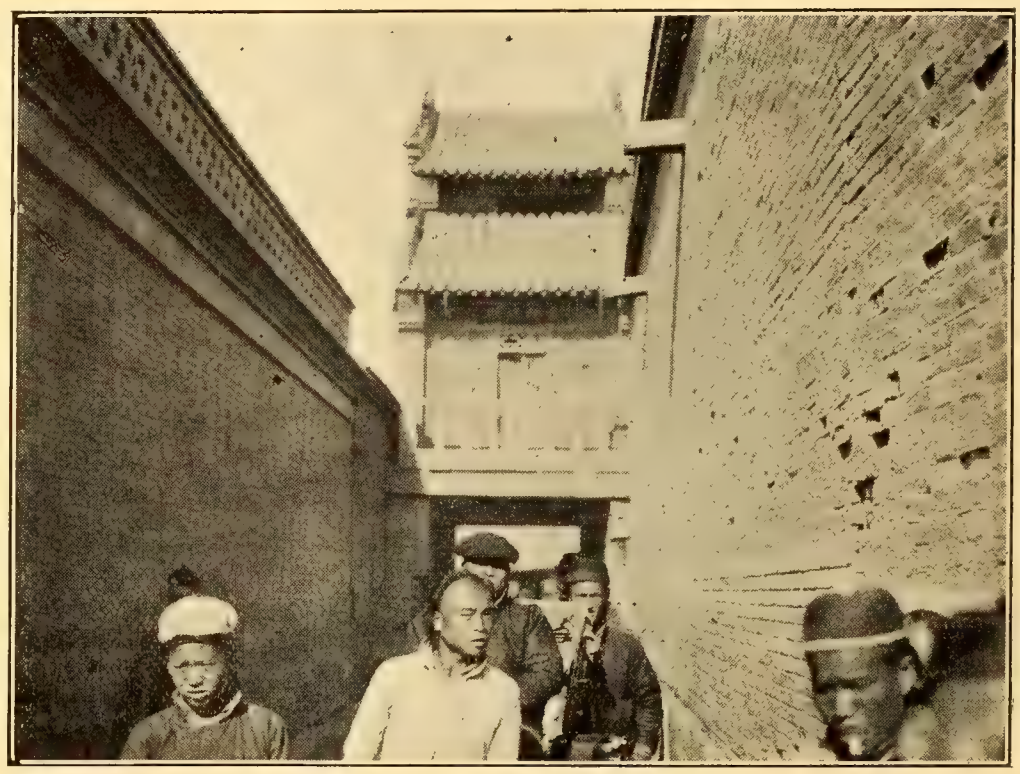
One is prepared to give this story full credence when he listens to Chinese music. The first evening after our arrival in Tokyo, Mr. Place took us to the dedication of a new Y. M. C. A. building provided for the Chinese boys who go over to Japan to study. The "music" was provided by the young men. One of them played upon a three-stringed, long-bodied, shrill-toned violin, with a bow that pressed OUT rather than IN upon the strings. To this accompaniment other youths, one after another, sang or shouted numberless verses of Chinese songs in high, shrill, ear-splitting shrieks that were both deafening and supremely funny to those of us not accustomed to such vocal antics. But the audience of Chinese youth received the performance with every demonstration of delight, and eagerly called for more.

CHINESE ART, PRO AND CON.

In many of the forms of art in which the western world has developed a different taste, there is little to give pleasure in the Chinese method. Their music we do not admire. Their drama is to us childish and interminable. A play commonly lasts half a day, and may continue for a week. Their poetry, aside from certain ballads of largely mythological foundation, is hardly existent. Indeed there are many travelers in China who contrast its people with those of Japan to the constant disadvantage of the former, and the praise of the islanders. We had one such in our group. He had lived in Japan some years ago for a time, and could hardly find words to voice his admiration for the people, and especially their art-products. But in China he was oppressed by the bad taste, sombreness and filthy condition of all he saw. Not a thing of all he encountered from Tientsin to Hongkong gave him the least pleasure.

Yet such an attitude is not just either to one's sense of appreciation or to the really worthful creations of one of the most remarkable races of Asia. The Chinese architecture, particularly the painted, curving, gabled roofs, made beautiful with tiles of green, brown or yellow, has set the type of building through all the further east. The elaborate city gateways, with three or four sloping roofed stories, one above the other, are highly picturesque. Their carving, inlay work, metal moulding, ivory decoration, painting and almost countless other forms of art work are the result of many centuries of practice as well as a high degree of native ability. If they have made less impression upon the world by their art products, it may be due in part to a less free atmosphere in which the arts could grow, and in part to a heavier industrial pressure on so prolific a people.

For the Chinese are a marvelously fertile race. The number of children in the average family would satisfy even Mr. Roosevelt. Their theory that personal happiness in the future depends on the number of children one leaves to offer ancestral reverence to the parental spirits, encourages a reckless system of propagation which is essentially selfish and inconsiderate. The only thing that saves China from ruinous over-population even now is the very large death rate, due to the dire lack of sanitary regulations. A great host of little children perishes yearly. Life is a very cheap commodity. Suicide is extremely common, and may have for its motive a simple spite at a neighbor, on whose threshold and for whose inconvenience the suicide cuts his throat.



Chinese Walls and Gates.

LIFE HELD CHEAP.

In fact the cheapness at which life is held in China has hitherto provided a partial relief to over-population. Under the Confucian system there could be little enthusiasm in the work of public uplift. If you confront a Chinese with the statistics of child mortality or of suicide, he calmly says, "Plenty more Chinamen," and remains unimpressed. Education and the labors of the missionary will slowly correct these unsocial views. Then will come the struggle with the system of ancestor worship. For when the present enormous waste of life is corrected, the baneful theory of large families must also find remedy, or China, vast as is her territory, will be swamped by her multiplying population. It is the balance between growth and decline that represses too rapid increase.

But education is making rapid progress in China. The missionary brought it first. A school was established in connection with every chapel and dispensary. At first progress was very slow. The old system of "education" was wholly hostile to modern views. The "scholar" under the Manchus was the man who knew the Confucian ethics, and could write in the classic style, with rich use of the proverbs and aphorisms of the ancient sages. Public office was dependent largely on this sort of training and the examinations which put the seal of approval upon it.

TAKING THE EXAMINATION.

In the larger cities, especially the provincial capitals like Nanking, Hankow, Tsinanfu, and Shanghai, there were sections of the city devoted to this examination process. Around the temple of Confucius were ranged row upon row of little cells or stalls, each just large enough to hold an applicant for the high honors of the test. Here they gathered at the triennial examinations, and were shut one by one in the long lines of brick niches, and set at the task of preparing a thesis whose subject was assigned, and whose contents and style would determine their fate as candidates.

Without food or release the student wrought at his task hour after hour, sometimes as long as two or three days. Sometimes the candidate died under the test. More frequently he failed and had to wait another chance to compete. From the successful candidates the civil officials were chosen, so that the system offered the only path to preferment. It required no knowledge of history, science or government, and indeed was nearly useless for the purposes sought. Yet this was the university system of China for many centuries. And in the Temple of Confucius in Pekin there is a list of the men who successfully competed in the Third Class or highest order of examinations during the entire period of the Ming and the Tatsing dynasties, covering the last seven centuries.

This system has now been abandoned. The lines of cells, numbering many thousands, have been forsaken. Those in Pekin have been largely torn down to permit the use of the material and the land for barracks. Those in Nanking are a neglected expanse, the quarry of builders in neighboring districts. During the last years of the Manchu rule the interest in popular education greatly increased, and one of the first concerns of the new republican government has been to provide for public instruction. Large numbers of youth have been sent to Japan to attend the schools in Tokyo and Kyoto. Many have gone to Europe and the United States, and are now bringing back to China the educational ideas secured abroad.

AT THE GOVERNMENTAL UNIVERSITY.

On one of the days of our stay in Pekin I was visited by the president of the governmental university with the request that I speak to the students. We rode from the hotel over to a quarter of the Imperial City just across from the gates of the Forbidden City, where there was an old palace, once a place of splendor, but now converted to the uses of the university. We walked about through several courts, each with its complex of highly decorated buildings, all inclosed in separating walls. In one of the large rooms, where a dozen men were sitting about, reading, writing and conversing, I was introduced to a number of the teachers of the institution, who were accustomed to pass here the intervals of time between their class duties.

At the door of the assembly hall where the students were gathered for the address I met three members of the faculty of the University of Paris, who were on an educational tour in China. They expressed their desire to attend the lecture, and were given seats near the platform. In the meantime the president, a young man of thirty-five, had been telling me of his experiences in the University of Berlin, where he had taken his degree of Ph. D. the previous year. When we met the Frenchmen he conversed with them in excellent French. Presently the students were assembled and we passed into the hall. Just before he introduced me, he leaned over and said, "I think you are a member of the Vice Commission of Chicago. I have read of its work with great interest. That is one of our most difficult problems in the student life of China. I wish you would bring in some reference to sexual morality in what you have to say."

INTEREST IN CIVIC UPLIFT.

He interpreted the address, though several of the upper class men seemed to understand perfectly as I went on. The attention given to the address and the interpretation was of the closest. Every reference to China's present struggle for a modern system of government, to the educational possibilities of the people, and to the civic and social responsibilities of the educated Chinese was received with approval and enthusiasm. The president of this institution is typical of the younger generation of China's educational leaders, and while he is not a Christian, he is thoroughly in sympathy with the missionary program as it affects the work of instruction in the republic. On a subsequent occasion I met him at a gathering of missionaries at the home of one of the number, and he seemed entirely at home in the Christian atmosphere.

Of course between such a man, with his modern culture and his enthusiasm for the progress of his people, and the average Chinese, even of the official class, there is a wide margin of difference. Those of the race who have traveled abroad know something of what cleanness, sanitation and good government mean. The Chinese who go out to find labor in the Philippines, Java, Indo-China or the Malay States meet vastly better conditions than they have at home, and those who return bring with them the better ideas.

FOREIGN INFLUENCES.

The example of foreign influences in the European sections of Tientsin, Pekin, Shanghai and Hongkong, makes its due impress upon the most conservative Chinese. They cannot help contrasting the broad, clean streets, substantial buildings, rickshas, carriages and motor-cars with the narrow, dirty lanes, unspeakable sights and smells, and general confusion of the native towns.

Then, too, they gradually learn that in the West government means in a large degree protection, honest interest in the welfare of the people, and wise provision for public prosperity and happiness; whereas in China public office has been recognized as a chance for graft, and every one, from highest to lowest, expected a "squeeze" of some sort on every transaction. Under the old regime there was no encouragement to thrift, for as soon as a man was known to be getting on prosperously, he became the target of all sorts of official espionage and petty persecution in the effort to get his money away from him. No wonder the men of progressive views in China felt the incubus of the former condition, and are full of enthusiasm over the new opportunity that has come to their land. And in this view the thousands of Chinese who live in other lands and under happier conditions share to the full. In the Malay States there are many Chinese millionaires who till lately dared not return to China, for fear of running into the clutches of rapacious mandarins, who upon one pretext or another would be sure to lay them low and fleece them of most of their gains.

The new China is wakening to the wonderful opportunities of the age. The problem of arousing so vast a land and so enormous a population is almost beyond comprehension. But the missionary, the scholar, the patriot and the foreign traveling Chinese all know something of the opening before the land and its people, and are co-operating, though not always consciously, to realize for China the high ends of liberty, self-government, education, and ethical and religious competence.

WHY I LOVE THE BIBLE

By William Newton Clarke.

Surely not because I am required, for that would be only an outward reason that could not win my heart.

Not because it was let down from heaven, for it grew upon earth; nor because every word in it comes straight from God, for many of its words breathe out the spirit of my fellowmen, some of them in sore trial, doubt, perplexity, and some still lacking the light and love of Christ.

But because it glows with the light and love of Christ; because it shows me him who walked the earth and hung upon the cross that he might save such men as I; because it brings me what he revealed of the living God and Father whom to know is life eternal.

Because it shames me, inspires me and calls me upward. It is the book of faith and hope and love, of comfort, holiness and power, of salvation and eternal life: It is my truest visible guide to the right knowledge and experience of God, the true estimating of myself and my life, and the spirit in which I may live worthily with men.

Because out of it I may gather, and have gathered, a little book most precious, a Bible from within the Bible, which I bind to my heart and carry in my memory and live with in light and darkness, a treasure of the strongest and sweetest words for the soul that were ever known.

The Good Angel of Hull House

An Interpretation of the Life Service of Miss Jane Addams.

BY CECIL J. ARMSTRONG.

"Is Jane Addams an optimist?" the writer was recently asked by a young lady, who had given much time to settlement work in the Hull House neighborhood.

"Of course she is," I answered.

"Then why does she look so sad?"

One cannot answer that question by merely studying the face or portraits of Miss Addams. No camera ever focused, no mortal eye ever saw, the real Jane Addams. Her portrait is "Twenty Years at Hull House." After reading that, one, even if, like the writer, he has never seen Miss Addams in the flesh, can readily behold both her sadness and her optimism, and their reconciliation. How could a clean, earnest, sensitive soul spend twenty years amid such conditions, for which modern industrialism is so largely responsible, and which could be remedied, and not be made sad? The wonder is not that she is sad, but that she is optimistic. The main temptation to pessimism, in her case, could not be the people or the conditions that have surrounded her, but the apathy, the ignorance, the indifference and the venality of the "higher" classes. It must have been trying to her soul, in the presence of such hard social conditions and the ready response of so many of her immigrant neighbors, when properly approached and developed along the lines of their traditions and ideals, to have prominent and philanthropic people withdraw their support because, perchance, Hull House filled the much needed position of a social "clearing house." Our plea for freedom of speech is so much a theory that we grow alarmed when it is actually practiced. We tar and feather "street agitators," arrest and imprison socialists for preaching against industrial conditions that are a disgrace to civilization, and withdraw financial support from Hull House when it gives the common people an opportunity to voice their yearnings and plead their wrongs. Yet in spite of corrupt politicians, fearful good people, and narrow individualists, Hull House has gone serenely on its way. From a small beginning it has grown into a great institution that has become a social laboratory for the world and a Mecca toward which every year thousands of pilgrims, rich and poor, bend their reverent steps.

LOVE A VICARIOUS SUFFERER.

The vicarious sufferer must ever be a "man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." He so shares the lot of the people, so enters into their sorrows and griefs and wrongs, that his life becomes a sacrificial labor to ameliorate their condition, and his broken heart an offering in their behalf. Upon him is laid the iniquity of our crushing industrialism. The ghetto and slum become the cross upon which the priests of criminal privilege daily crucify his soul, while the howling mob of subsidized scribes dance in frenzied glee, and the thunder and lightning of hatred and malice smite his suffering heart. But love speaks in the tones of sacrifice. Right is not forever on the scaffold, nor is wrong forever on the throne. God is not within the shadows, but in the light, keeping watch above his own. Love has a masterful personality that eventually awes into silence the clamoring minions of glutted privilege. But that love is deeper than sentimentalism—it gives itself in service, its voice in protest, and smilingly takes the consequence. It not only struggles to ameliorate poverty and suppress vice—it yearns to release the honest employer who is bound by the chains of economic conditions forged in the past, or by the hands of unscrupulous competitors.

SAD, BUT OPTIMISTIC.

All this applies to Miss Addams. The world is her home. The love that most women give to husband, children and home, she has given to humanity. She must be sad. Because of her simple faith in God and belief that Jesus has shown "the way out," she must be optimistic. She now sees many results of her labor and travail. Preachers, lawyers, doctors, teachers, artists, and business men of prominence began their advancement at Hull House. The Chicago Juvenile Court has been established. Girls and women have been kept "straight," or rescued after going wrong. Homes have been made anew. Nurseries, schools and playgrounds have been established. Grade crossings have been eliminated. Much humanitarian legislation has been passed. It cannot be claimed that all this, and much more, is solely the work of Miss Addams. It cannot be denied that she has been the largest individual factor in it, at least, so far as Chicago and Illinois are concerned. It all illustrates the lines of Sydney Lanier:

"And yet shall Love himself be heard,
Though long deferred, though long deferred,
O'er the modern world a dove hath whirred:
Music is love in search of a word."

Miss Addams' pen is dipped, not in ink, but in experience. If you are reading "Twenty Years at Hull House," "Democracy and Social Ethics," "The Spirit of Youth and the City Streets," "A New Conscience and an Ancient Evil," or her articles in current magazines (such as the series in the Ladies' Home Journal), you are impressed with the fact that her social philosophy is deduced from actual conditions and experiences—it is not theory "imposed" upon social phenomena. Therein she is scientific. It is that attitude that has enabled her to accomplish so much with the people, and to become one who speaks with authority to the world.

FIGHTING EVIL BY SUBSTITUTION.

Miss Addams deals with problems that lie at the very heart of our democracy. She would suppress our evils, but she would do it by substitution. Hull House endeavors to give to the men of the neighborhood the social features of the saloon free from its blighting curse. She clearly sees the evil of "the street" upon "the spirit of youth," and would substitute municipal playgrounds and socialized education. Her definition of education is self-expression, not repression. She would develop the child along the line of his "native bent," not compress all the children of all nationalities within the commercialized traditional "three r's." And she would hold before him the social ideal, not tell him to study hard, be good, be honest and some day "you will be rich"—a falsehood in most cases under modern industrialism. She sees the relation between industrialism and vice. She has been a profound student of the conditions that have made commercialized vice and white slavery possible. What can society expect of the children that roam the streets while their mothers toil in factories and scrub hotels and office buildings? What fate must await the girl who stands over a machine or in a department store for ten or twelve hours a day, but that her mental and physical exhaustion shall make her the prey of the man who offers her stimulants and "a good time!" She recounts the confessions of many girls, who, inspired by the display of the wealthy, have sold their souls for tawdry clothes. She opens our eyes not only to the cheap theater and moving picture shows, but to the poverty that prevents many parents from providing the necessary amusements for their children, and, thus, many little girls of eight and ten have "fallen" for the pleasure of seeing the show.

A LIVING WAGE DEMANDED.

She would substitute a living wage for present starvation pay as a long step in correcting much of this evil, and she would accomplish this by arousing the consciences of employers, public sentiment, and legislation to compel the unscrupulous and the covetous. That she looks all round this question of vice is proved by her statement that she sympathizes with the young men who are prevented by economic conditions from marrying early, almost as much as she does with the white slaves. She would substitute municipal dance halls for the notorious saloon dance halls. She cries out against the repressive methods of many homes where daughters are allowed no part of their wages for pleasure.

Miss Addams is very illuminating when discussing factory conditions. Not only are they exhausting because of long hours and unsanitary conditions, but one of their chief evils is that the young foreigner, who performs a certain operation thousands of times a day, has no knowledge of the history of the factory, machinery or crude material; not even of the relation of his "piece" to the completed "whole." He works through weary hours, at starvation wages, in ignorance and isolation, and comes home to a stifling tenement so "dog tired" that he cares not what happens.

THE IMMIGRANT AS HE IS.

One thinks a great deal more of the immigrant after reading the works of Jane Addams. She does not idealize him. She presents his faults. She also reveals his good traits and pleads for "the square deal." She has shown how faulty our present immigration laws are. Our boasted educational test may succeed only in keeping out the sturdy peasant. What we need in our immigrants is not ability to read and write, but a governmental "distributing" agency to place them where they and their children can develop into American citizens along normal lines. If the first generation of immigrants were thus taken care of, there would not be such a large percentage of criminals in the second generation. Perhaps it would be practically eliminated. Our cities are congested with foreigners, while portions of our country are crying out for just such labor as they can give. But at present the immigrant, after leaving Ellis Island, is the victim of his own ignorance, the padrone, and the unscrupulous labor agency. Many regard our immigrants as "finished and finite clods, undisturbed by a spark," but Miss Addams has found idealists, philosophers and humanitarians among them. They have the capacity for citizenship when given a chance. Miss Addams gives many illustrations of their willingness to sacrifice self for the benefit of others. One neighbor will lend another her best dress, shoes or cooking utensil. A husband, out of work, thought nothing of sleeping in a park in order that a woman (impoverished by the imprisonment of her husband) who was approaching accouchement, might have his place. They are very solicitous that a bereaved woman shall have the required robes of mourning, as well as that the dead shall have a proper funeral. The power of "Hinky Dink," "Bath-house John," and their ilk, is due, not to the innate depravity of the foreigners, but to the noble but misguided sentiment of standing by those who have helped you. The corrupt alderman is always careful to send Christmas turkey, help defray funeral expenses, add to the jollity of weddings and christenings, and to secure jobs for his constituents. The council is far off, but the alderman is near. They forgive franchise grabs and graft because of his beneficence. Besides, and this is the "clincher," what do his opponents, "the swells," do for us?

THE ROOT OF THE LABOR PROBLEM.

Miss Addams sees clearly much of the trouble that lies at the root of the vexed labor problem. Mr. Pullman built a model city for his employes. He believed that he knew what they ought to have better than they themselves knew. Yet, a disastrous strike resulted, and his men were accused of ingratitude. Today that city is dismantled, and its "paternalism" is a thing of the past. Why did that well intentioned effort fail? Miss Addams tells us. "The basic difficulty lay in the fact that an individual was directing the social affairs of many men without any consistent effort to find out their desires, and without any organization through which to give them social expression." That terrible strike was a revolt against undemocratic conditions. Is there not a lesson here? Much evil has been done in the name of labor unionism, but at its base is the yearning for freedom from conditions that make self-expression and democracy impossible. Despots, even if benevolent, are as intolerable industrially as politically. Labor unionism, as Miss Addams sees it (in spite of much perversion and many cruelties) is at heart a struggle of economic freedom that social and domestic development may be unhindered. It is the heart of the multitude seeking democracy. It is man searching for brotherhood amid a godless, individualistic industrialism.

CRUCIFYING MISS ADDAMS.

Probably nothing in her career aroused such a storm of criticism as when Miss Addams allied herself with the Progressive Party. Many questioned her judgment, none her honesty. Many of us, who could not follow her in that stand, read clearly the prompting motive. The platform of that party offered many of the things for which she had labored and suffered. How narrow many of us are! That action caused the withdrawal of many subscriptions to Hull House. How timid much of our wealth is! It can neither tolerate a difference of opinion, nor appreciate an honest humanitarian motive. When it cannot stifle independence it tries to starve it. In the long run it fails, thank God. Dives cannot now kill Hull House by crucifying Miss Addams. Would that many churches and colleges, now the pampered pets of predatory wealth, would show the courage that Hull House displayed! The love of a grateful people is far richer than millions that distort truth and enshackle democracy.

Miss Addams' work has been done under many difficulties. Afflicted with spinal trouble from childhood, she has suffered much pain. She had to surrender her dream, after one year of study, of being a physician. She had to pass through the struggle of the college girl of twenty-five years ago, of articulating her education to the demands for service on every hand. She was almost caught in "the snare of preparation." Toynbee Hall and the "great need" influenced her to launch out on the great venture. The result? Hull House and a thousand social activities everywhere! Surely she has earned the endearing name, "Kind Heart," applied to her by a blind immigrant.

A Symphony of Life

BY W. H. BAGBY.

THE LORD is my shepherd; I shall not want.
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;
He leadeth me beside still waters;
He restoreth my soul;
He guideth me in paths of righteousness for His name's sake.
Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death
I will fear no evil; for thou art with me;
Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me.
Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies;
Thou anointest my head with oil;
My cup runneth over.
Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life;
And I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever."

King David was a great musician as well as a great poet, and this masterpiece of his matchless genius is both a poem and a symphony.

To write the greatest thought of humanity one needs only to write the greatest thought of its greatest thinker. So, to depict human experience, one needs but to write the biography of one whose life has sounded all the notes in the gamut of the human heart. Such a life was the one that furnished the inspiration for this the most beautiful of all the psalms. As the dewdrop globes the starry heavens, so this short psalm holds in its heart the whole of human experience. The symphony of a large life, it is a symphony of life in the large.

A symphony is a musical composition of three movements—the allegro, the andante and the scherzo. They depict the three periods of life—joyful youth, serious maturity, and peaceful old age. In the psalm David depicts his own life which had extended through the first two, and far into the third period.

In the first three verses of the psalm we find the allegro movement of the symphony. In them we hear sounding all the glad, sweet notes of the springtime of life. They hold up to view healthy, happy, hopeful youth vying with blossoming fields, budding forests, singing birds and skipping lambs in the effort to give expression to the joy it feels in living. Not only do they sound the notes of youthful joy, but better still, they reveal its secret. The heart of youth is happy because it knows no fear of want. In the very first line of the psalm is sounded the keynote of happiness:

"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want."

Much—perhaps it would be safe to say most—of the unhappiness that shadows the heart of humanity, is born of the fear of coming to want. Youth knows not this fear. With clear-eyed confidence it looks the future in the face and sings with the psalmist:

"The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.
He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;
He leadeth me beside still waters;
He restoreth my soul;
He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for His name's sake."

IF humanity ever finds happiness, it will be when it returns and finds again the golden secret it lost when it left its youth behind—the secret of optimism. It was in an earnest effort to turn men back to the hopefulness and trustfulness of youth that Jesus uttered this wonderful warning against faithless and fruitless worrying about the things of temporal life:

"Be not anxious for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Behold the birds of the heaven, that they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are not ye of much more value than they? And which of you by being anxious can add one cubit to the measure of his life? And why are ye anxious concerning raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin; yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. If God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is and tomorrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Be not therefore anxious, saying, What shall we eat? or What shall we drink? or Wherewithal shall we be clothed?''

But humanity will never find the hopefulness of youth until it finds again the heart of youth. In the light of this fact must be interpreted the saying of the Great Teacher:

''Except ye turn again and become as this little child,
Ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of Heaven.''

The kingdom of heaven is the kingdom of happiness; and he who would find it must find again the trustful heart of a little child. The true cycle of life is childhood, maturity and youth renewed.

YOUTH, then, is not a thing to be despised, derided and devitalized. Like the mountain stream, the flow of its abounding spirits is to be directed in proper channels—not dried up. In the words of the wise King of Israel we must learn to say to youth:

''Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know that for all these things, God will bring thee into judgment.''

When we say to feather'd songsters in the spring
Do not sing;
When we whisper to the flowers May doth bring,
Do not spring;
When we say to southern breezes sighing low,
Do not blow;
When we say to mountain torrents fed by snow,
Do not flow;
Then to normal youth and childhood we may say
Be not gay.

In all nature there is nothing more charming to behold than a pure, limpid, flowing stream.

No matter how deep its waters are,
No matter how swift their flow;
No matter how high their sources far
And no matter whither they go.

No matter how loud its laughter rings
No matter how wild its leaps,
So long as it to its channel clings
And safe in its bound'ries keeps, it is to us ''A thing of beauty and a joy forever.'' As the mountain stream invites and charms us, so should the full, flowing stream of youthful spirits, when that stream is pure, and flowing within its lawful bounds. Let it lure us back to where the future will hold for us no vision of ''Meadows brown and bare''—no cheerless prospect of a waterless waste where the soul grows faint, but the certain promise

Of pastures green where lilies grow
Beneath a cloudless sky—
Where gentle, cooling breezes blow
And the river runneth by;
Where the Shepherd folds his sheep by night
And leads them forth by day
In the path that runneth straight and right
And never leads astray.

IN the fourth and fifth verses of the psalm we have the andante movement of the symphony. They describe the period of life that lies between happy, hilarious youth and tranquil, triumphant old age. One has to draw but little upon his imagination to follow through them the progress of the storm that sooner or later finds its way into every human life. Above the horizon a sombre cloud upheaves its spectral form. Athwart its dark bosom, like the darting tongues of fiery serpents, the forked lightnings play. Like the muffled roar of an angry lion, the mutterings of distant thunder are heard. A silence that is broken only by a rustling sound as of the startled world looking up from its work, succeeds the thunder's voice. Larger bulks the spectral form, and higher and higher it climbs. With its broad, black bulk it blots out the westering sun. A shadow, weird, mysterious and chill, creeps over the face of the earth. The birds in the trees cease their happy songs and with drooping plumage and frightened air, hop from branch to branch, uttering low, plaintive notes of alarm. Domestic fowls cease their predatory search for food, and with anxious, upturned eye and craning neck, scurry away to shelter. A peal of thunder, nearer, deeper, deadlier than before, sends a shudder through the solid earth. At its harsh, belligerent voice the breezes come to breathless pause; to the frowning heavens the trees lift motionless arms in mute appeal; dumb creatures, filled with fear, huddle together for the comfort and courage found in companionship; and man, startled from his work or play, stands in white-faced awe, awaiting the blow that he fears must fall. Suddenly a blinding flash lights up the heavens and gives him another, and perhaps a parting glimpse of the world he has loved and for which he has lived. It is followed by an ear-splitting, rock-rending, earth-rocking crash, and a giant oak of a thousand years lies in shattered fragments on the ground. The windows of heaven are shaken ajar and the rain comes down in torrents. On heavy, wet wings the storm sweeps on, leaving the trees it spared with writhing bodies, waving branches and weeping leaves to mourn the fate of the fallen oak.

THE psalmist needed only to mention ''The valley of the shadow of death'' to suggest to the imagination the gathering clouds of impending trouble, the awful crash of crushing calamity, and the falling rain of sorrow's tears—to recall the sad pictures of ''Rachel weeping for her children and refusing to be comforted because they are not,''

and of David, Israel's greatest king, clad in the coarse garments of inconsolable grief, crying,

''O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom!
Would I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!''

But through these verses, as through this movement of the symphony, runs the strong, clear note of confidence in the Shepherd's tender care:

''I will fear no evil; for Thou art with me;
Thy rod and Thy staff, they comfort me.
Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies;
Thou anointest my head with oil;
My cup runneth over.''

Sounding clear and strong we hear it in the complainings of Job. Listen, as from his ash-heap he cries:

''But as for me, I know that my Redeemer liveth,
And at last He will stand upon the earth:
And after my skin, worms destroy this body,
Then, without my flesh I shall see God,
Whom I, even I, shall see on my side,
And mine eyes shall behold, and not a stranger.''

As a charming melody it runs through Saint Paul's recitals of his bitter trials and afflictions.

It is the thread of gold upon which are strung the beads, and to which is appended the cross, of the rosary of real life. Does it run—this note of confidence—through the andante movement of your life? In the hour of affliction, do you say with Job:

''I know that my Redeemer lives
And ever pleads for me;
And He the blest assurance gives
That I His face shall see?''

IN the last verse of the psalm we have the scherzo movement of the symphony. As in the final movement of the symphony, so in this last verse of the psalm we hear the firm, strong, joyful note of deliverance blended with the glad, triumphant note of victory:

''Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life;
And I shall dwell in the house of the Lord forever.''

Faith has triumphed over fear. All doubts have been dispelled. The cycle of life has been completed. Old age has found its youth again.

With eyes of youth it sees again,
With youthful ears it hears;
With youthful heart it hopes again
Triumphant over fears.

Back with youth has come its optimism, and with this the joy it breeds. Again

The Lord is the Shepherd and pastures are green,
The waters are placid and bright with the sheen
That shines from the face of the Saviour above
Who cares for His own with the tenderest love.
All doubts are departed, forgotten all fears;
The night is full spent and the morning appears;
The valley of shadows is far in the rear;
The wide open portals of glory are near;
The hills and the valleys are flooded with light;
The heavens are fair and the future is bright;
The air and the ocean are peaceful and mild;
For the heart in its breast is the heart of a child.

BE PATIENT WITH GOD.

THERE is a demand that God shall show His goodness here and now. It seems a very reasonable demand. It is older than the time of Job. The tragedies of life thrill with the cry of doubt and wonder. Why does God hide himself? Why does He not reward righteousness and punish sin and do it here and now? Why does He seem to forsake His people? Why does His anger burn against the sheep of his own pasture?

We need not suppose that only bad people ask these questions. The Psalms are full of inquiries such as these. They were uttered by men who did not know the answers to the questions which they asked. They came out of the broken hearts of faithful men and women who could not understand the ways of God. It seems so reasonable to demand that God shall show His goodness just now. Yet, let us not too hastily concede the righteousness of this demand that God shall stand and deliver.

We have seen enough of human life to know that some great undertakings do not immediately disclose their full intent. We have seen the construction of great buildings begun with enormous excavations. We have seen battleships built on land that were intended for the sea; we have beheld innumerable examples in which we should have been quite mistaken if we had judged of the meaning of the intent of some great human enterprise by mere snapshots at its appearance in some stage of it.

We can afford to be patient with God.

We have so often wronged our fellow men who occupied responsible positions, we can afford to trust God and wait.

Hurry and holiness are not twins. The demand that God shall stand and deliver a reason is not so reasonable as it sometimes seems. Let us be patient with God.

WHERE IS THE AMEN CORNER?

A SECULAR newspaper not long ago contained an article on "The Vanished Amen Corner." It was a half-humorous, half-serious discussion, and it contained much food for thought. What has become of the Amen Corner?

Modern church architecture is against it. The chancel and pulpit and organ fill the whole end of the church. The cross-pews on either side have been moved out to provide for an elaborated service.

Modern church life is against it. Hardly any one now wants to be stuck up in a conspicuous place beside the pulpit, the subject of comment and the object of envious glances. The office of deacon has come to be regarded as barely desirable, and if it involved sitting up where every one could see, it would be less easy than it is to find good men for deacons. Moreover, if the deacon wanted such a position his wife might object to being seated where everyone could see that her hat was not the latest, and the deacon's daughters want the privilege of being late without having everybody stare.

So the Amen Corner has gone.

And what has taken its place?

The corner seats are a place for the storage of the contribution boxes when not in use; a place for a possible committee meeting just after the service; but as part of the actual furnishing of the church for its hour of worship, its glory has departed.

Shall it pass unwept, unhonored and unsung?

The Amen Corner was a source of spiritual power. In some of the old time churches the "praying brethren" assembled in the corner on the right and the "agonizing sisters" in the opposite corner, and the Amen Corner and the Hallelujah Corner answered each other like the cherubim and seraphim.

In churches less demonstrative, but still given to audible responses, the Amen Corner gave the preacher constant support. His prayers evoked amens, hushed and tender at the beginning as he reverently confessed his own and the people's sins; deep and low as he prayed for comfort and spiritual uplift; and loud and fervent as he prayed for the power of the Holy Ghost in that very meeting. And as he preached he could measure the effectiveness of his argument, and be encouraged in the pressure of his appeal, by the hearty amens from his deacons and other spiritually minded men.

And even in the staid and undemonstrative churches, the faces visible in profile to the people, and full face to the minister, testified by rapt attention and answering nod of assent to his proclamation of truth.

Probably it has gone for good.

Possibly it ought to go.

But what is to take its place?

Shall we not organize in every church the spiritual equivalent of the old-time Amen Corner? Shall we not bring back into the service that manifest co-operation, that demonstration of fervor, that reverberation of petition and appeal that made this old-fashioned institution effective?

Shall we not in some way hearten the preacher by a knowledge that his people are with him; that they heed and echo his message, and that in his word the whole church speaks, and in his prayers the whole church prays?

It need not be confined to any one geographical location in the church. It need not be noisy or demonstrative.

How would you like to make your pew an Amen Corner?

How would it do to be there so promptly; to come in such a spirit of prayer; to join in the whole service so heartily; to unite in the prayers so earnestly; to hear the message so attentively, that pastor and people should find the atmosphere of the church a little warmer and the heart of the church a little more responsive by reason of your own little Amen Corner?

And would it not be even better if the little group to which you belong, or which you can assemble, should join you in united effort and prayer for your own pastor and church?

Let us have back the spirit of the Amen Corner.

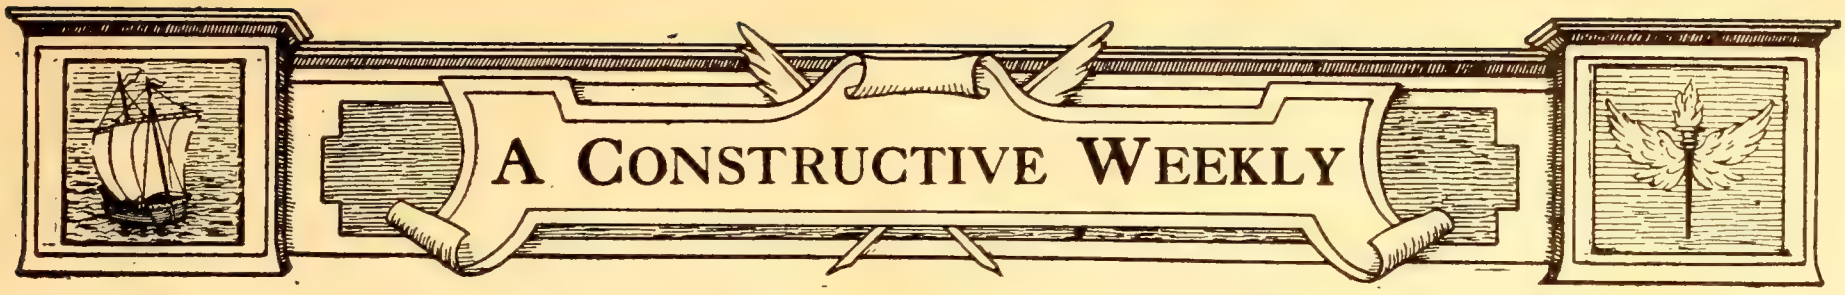
SHALL WE KNOW OUR LOVED ONES?

"UNTIL recently I have never thought much abo ut death. Now it has entered my own home and one very near to me has been taken away. I was talking with a friend the other day and said to her that I expected to meet my loved ones in heaven, but she said she thought that was a rather outgrown idea. Tell me what you think about it. Am I old-fashioned in hoping to meet and know my loved ones in the better land?"

By all means continue to cherish your faith that you shall know and be with your loved ones. God gave them to you in a love which death cannot destroy. He is not the God of the dead but of the living. Your loved ones live in him and you shall live with him and them. We shall know our dear ones and they will be ours to all eternity. This does not mean that they are to be exclusively ours or selfishly ours. It means that the affections of this life, which are really spiritual relationships, are to continue beyond death. We should be false to our noblest instincts and unfaithful to our best loves if we did not cherish the hope that we shall know our dear ones in the life to come. Do not be afraid of the old-fashioned. The reason this faith is so very old is that it lies at the heart of the sweetest and best things we know about human life and the character of God.

MORE TROUBLE WITH THEIR NAME.

OUR Episcopalian neighbors have trouble over their name in other countries as well as in the United States. Here there is a movement on foot to change their designation from Protestant Episcopal to American Catholic church. The main objection brought against the old name is that the word "protestant" is negative. As The Christian Century pointed out in a recent editorial quotation from Thomas Nelson Page, this objection is sustained neither by the etymology of the term nor by three centuries of usage.



Now comes word from China that when Episcopal missionaries attempt to translate their name into the venacular there the people can make nothing better out of it than "The Church of the Kicking Bishops." We sympathize with the Episcopalians in their predicament. But if they truly wish to be on catholic ground and to advance the cause of unity, why do they not fall in with the movement in China and all missionary lands to designate their churches as simply churches of Christ? The term "Catholic" is no more catholic than "Episcopal" or "Congregational" or "Orthodox." "Catholic" is not the name of the Church of Christ; it is simply an adjectival modifier of the name. It lends itself to sectarian use quite as easily as any other descriptive word which the denominations have adopted.

If Episcopalians wish to wear the generic name of the Church and no other, let them designate themselves churches of Christ and regard these churches as members of the one Church of Christ to which all of us belong.

TRAVEL AND CANTANKEROUSNESS.

STANDARDS by which Christian character is tested change as the centuries pass. It used to be the lions and the prison. Martyrdom was the price of discipleship. Now the test of saintliness is business integrity and neighborliness and general behavior under irritating conditions. Among the last come the inconveniences of travel that provoke selfishness. Modern travel is swift and comfortable compared with conditions a generation ago; but it has lost none of its power to evoke the worst side of even a Christian disposition. Someone said not long ago that Christianity was a failure on the trolley car. The rush for seats and the lack of courtesy in ordinary travel are a challenge to our saintliness and a test of our Christian principles.

It is strange that the very atmosphere of travel should be so provoking of irritable temper. The hurry of it, the bringing into clear relief of the individual purpose mastering every traveler, the heat, the noise, the dust and the lack of room, unite to stir up the evil disposition in us until travel makes otherwise sweet Christians cantankerous and mean.

A little reflection would help out wonderfully, but there is so little time to reflect! The clergy and the laymen, the weak and the strong, are all bustled into a common strife for comfortable places, and away go the civilities and the Christian principles that mark their intercourse elsewhere. They jostle each other and glare at their neighbors and scold the corporation. The end of it all is the transformation of a social group that would otherwise be courteous and happy into a selfish, suspicious, cantankerous company.

As a rule there is enough room for all; traveling grows more comfortable each year; a little courtesy and sweetness of temper would be a great help in making everyone happy. It is the task of Christian people to help make the change in the conditions of travel. Nero is not going to send them to the lions; but the Lord is going to send them on the cars, where they must show how Jesus would have been a gentleman in a crowd.

A PERSUASIVE STATEMENT.

AT FIRST glance at the September number of The Constructive Quarterly, just appearing, suggests two comments of interest to Disciples of Christ. Other comments will no doubt be prompted by the careful reading of this meaty looking collection of articles. On the title page we notice that the name of Dr. Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, has been added to the board of editorial counsellors, in response, no doubt, to the sentiment expressed at the Disciples' Congress last Spring. In the body of the magazine we find an excellent statement of the "Restoration Plea of the Disciples of Christ," by President Frederick D. Kershner, of Texas Christian University. Dr. Kershner seems admirably fitted to write for a non-Disciple constituency. There is a certain intellectual humility in his style which predisposes his reader to a favorable consideration of his argument. The Disciples, he says have ever pleaded for the restoration of the apostolic Church, not for the mere reformation of the present Church. Such a plea is "fundamentally undenominational," he says, and "if those who have advocated it have at times been placed in the attitude of a denomination, such attitude constitutes no feature of the original plea itself."

It is possible, he admits, that the theoretical program of restoring the New Testament Church will meet the cordial approval of many who find reason for not accepting the Disciples' embodiment of it. "The New Testament Church means many things to many minds. Doubtless every conscientious Christian believes that his religion is an expression of New Testament Christianity. It remains therefore, to state, in brief compass the salient features of the practical program adopted by the Disciples movement."

Under the triple outline of creed, ordinances and polity, Dr. Kershner elaborates his conception of the New Testament Church, a conception with which all Disciples are more or less familiar. He makes a strong point when in speaking of the creed he cites the basis of membership in the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and shows that it is essentially the same as the basis of fellowship upon which the Disciples have stood for one hundred years. The author's treatment of both baptism and the Lord's Supper seems to us to contain unscholarly inaccuracies which he himself has criticized in other places, but his treatment is tolerant and, withal, persuasive.

Under polity, the invulnerable congregational position of the Disciples is backed up by New Testament precedent in few sentences. Dr. Kershner seems to us to give a somewhat misleading description of the success which the Disciples have attained in the practice of their polity. He says it has worked well, and cites the familiar boast that the civil war left them undivided. He ignores, however, the slow rupture which has at last resulted in a second body of "churches of Christ," quite as distinct from the main body as are Baptists and Congregationalists.

UNFORTUNATE IN ITS FRIENDS.

HUGH MACDONALD'S anxious-hearted analysis of the strained state of mind in which the Disciples brotherhood approaches its annual convention at Toronto has brought to the office of The Christian Century the promptest response from men of leading that any article appearing in our columns has called forth in many a long day. If any reader overlooked the article he is advised to turn back to last week's issue and read under the heading "The End of the Day."

Most of the letters we have received ask that no public use of their authorship be made, and the others are so plainly personal that they must not be quoted. The situation is most delicate. With one newspaper pushing the delegate convention in a manner as indiscreet as it is obstinate, and with the other making capital against the convention out of its rival's indiscretion, the course of wisdom would seem to be to make haste slowly at Toronto. This is the counsel of one of the most influential men among us, who after complimenting Hugh Macdonald as a writer, says:

"His article in The Christian Century this week strikes twelve. My conviction is that the thing to do at Toronto is to mark time. The Christian Standard has created a great deal of confusion and a great deal of bitter opposition to the new organization. The thing to do now, as I take it, is to wait till the truth prevails and all are of one accord and one mind."

This is the prevailing—the unanimous—counsel so far as we have received it at this early date since the appearance of last week's "Century." One letter which has just been received as we are preparing for the press, calls attention to the grave indiscretion of the St. Louis publishing house in forcing its claim, at this delicate juncture, to an OFFICIAL origin and status as a "brotherhood house." The author cites an editorial in last week's Christian Evangelist which he asks us to "expose." "It is such talk as this," he says, "which has furnished the Standard with all its ammunition against the delegate convention."

It is against both our taste and our policy to enter into the controversy between these two papers. We have a different conception of the things our readers want and need. But we agree with Mr. Macdonald that the fate of the delegate convention is being put in peril more by the kind of advocacy given it than by the opposition it has received.

Our Readers' Opinions

HAS CHRIST COME THE SECOND TIME?

Editor The Christian Century:

Christ has been here always—the essential Christ. Christ has come—the historic Christ. Christ is here always. Christ is coming always. Nurture not rupture is the manner of his approach. The Jews as a race do not believe that Christ has come the first time. Christians as a rule do not believe that Christ has come the second time.

But may he not have come both times?

The view that he has come is the most satisfying to me, and I have trodden the wine press, as have Doctors Ainslie and Sharpe, on this theme. I believe in the main that the prophecies regarding the second coming of Christ were fulfilled at the destruction of the Holy City, and that at that time Christ came again, in the sense of crisis, and ascended on high with the worthiest of the saints, rewarding them for their faithfulness, and they enjoyed Christ's second coming according to promise in a sense that no one else will. This view satisfies me from the standpoint of exegesis as well as of experience.

Looking through my clippings I come across the following by J. J. Haley on the general theme of the coming of Christ. It appeared in the "Century" of April 4, 1907, and its reproduction now will be helpful in elucidating at least some phases of this interesting question. As so many of the popular evangelists take the other view, Gipsy Smith's postion is not without suggestiveness:

SHALL WE PREACH THE SECOND COMING?

A man in Chicago, with a hobby, rang Gipsy Smith up on the telephone, and, in a "stand and deliver" tone, said, "When are you going to preach on the second coming of Christ?" "I am not through with the first yet," said the quick-witted evangelist. Well said. The truth of the incarnation has not yet had its day. The second advent of our Lord is a legitimate theme for occasional consideration in the pulpit, and for discussion now and then in the religious press, but the constant preaching of an unknown quantity, like prophecy, is a poor substitute for the preaching of history. A half dozen of the small sects of Christendom are founded on a theory of the second advent. The romantic absurdities of prophecy mongering advocates have more attraction for some people than the grace of God or the ethics of the gospel. Apocalyptic manipulators and romancers have been in evidence since our Lord was here and long before. To visionary saints their appeals to fancy free are irresistible. The far away historic past is strewn with Edens, and the far away prophetic future has as many paradises to lure us on.

When God's chosen people had been worsted and overthrown in the conflict with heathen nations, and were about to lose heart, they adjourned the holy war to the clouds of heaven. Here with the prosaic and sinful earth out of sight, and the imagination in control, the tide of battle was easily turned in their favor. The Chicago hobbyist who demanded a sermon on the second coming of our Lord, had his apocalyptic mood strong upon him, when he 'phoned the evangelist to preach on the subject. Weary of the long and discouraging struggle with sin, he was anxious for an adjournment to the clouds. It seemed to him the only possible road for optimism to travel was the golden pathway of the apocalyptic vision. This pre-millennial theory of the second advent is held by many good people in our time. The doctrine is that the personal and final manifestation of our Savior is imminent, and that it is the duty and precious privilege of the church to keep itself constantly in an expectant relation to that glorious consummation. The gospel, they tell us, will neither regenerate nor reform the world. It was never intended to accomplish either of these purposes. Christianity will not prevail universally or generally under the present dispensation of the Holy Spirit. The world will not be converted during the mediatorial reign of Christ. Things will not get better but worse under the present economy of grace. Mankind in the gospel age will wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived. More and more in rapidly extending folds darkness will fill the earth and gross darkness the minds of the people. Anti-Christ will gain the ascendency, sin and depravity and the abomination of desolation in the holy place will be crowned with victory, and when the world is so bad that it can not get any worse, Christ will suddenly appear to begin the thousand years of his reign on earth. It is during this reign that the enemy will be destroyed, the world converted, and the divine wisdom vindicated. The elect who have been gathered out from among the nations, by the gospel, to bear witness for righteousness and the kingdom of God, are waiting now in breathless expectation of the visible and final appearing of the Son of God.

It is true that the first generation of disciples, including the apostles, believed the Lord would come again in their life time. This expectation had great power in the primitive church. It did not convert the world, but it sustained the church, and gave it the transforming influence of a mighty hope. There is a certain inspiring utility in the message of the second advent in its application to the church of today, but pains must be taken not to carry it too far. If the inspired Apostles were mistaken in their anticipation of the immediate return of the Lord to the earth, and small groups of disciples in every generation since have been similarly mistaken, perhaps it would be wise for us not to spend too much of our time in trying to figure out the date of the second coming. If the calendar of our Lord's personal and final manifestation has been made up in the mind of God, it has not been revealed to us. Both the date and the fact are divine, not human, questions. "It is not for you to know times or seasons, which the Father hath set within his own authority." The man who accepts and lives and preaches the gospel of divine holiness in the unsearchable riches of Christ has the only rational or possible preparation for the second coming of the Lord.

SOME APPRECIATIVE OPINIONS.

Editor The Christian Century:

The "Century" just arrived. I am delighted with its new dress and with all it contains. The platform you announce in eleven paragraphs is concise, unequivocal, broad and aggressive. No one can misunderstand it, and no one can fail to appreciate its spirit. There is a freshness and vigor about every paragraph that will inspire enthusiasm and hope.

By all means the convention at Toronto should hear Dr. Willett. I am surprised that he has not been invited to speak. I am sure that no one of us would wish to promote an unseemly war of words as occurred previous to the Centennial convention, but it is of no advantage to truckle to the agency that promoted that strife. I wish the Foreign Society would declare its complete independence. I do not believe it gains a single thing by any degree of compromise with the unworthy behests of the Standard.

El Paso, Tex. PERRY J. RICE.

Editor The Christian Century: Just a line to say how much I appreciate the new form in which The Christian Century apears. I hope it will continue to improve in its mechanical and even in its literary features, although they were always excellent. It has a field, as long as it maintains its open platform where good men with worthy messages may be heard, even if they haven't been heard ten thousand times before. We need new voices as well as old; few voices devoted to the task of repeating what is scarcely worth repeating, mere shibboleths, in the hope of keeping down discussion, and of intimidating the progressive spirits among us.

Richmond, Ky. E. B. BARNES.

Editor The Christian Century: Pardon me for bothering you, but my pen insists on working a bit since I have gone over the last "Century." Believe me, I must tell you how satisfied I feel since I have read your good paper of this work. A Disciples paper and not a thing in it to make me lose my religion! I dream that perhaps I can read a religious paper and still be religious. Your paper helps me, feeds me, inspires me and that is what I want. After all, all I wanted to say was thank you.

Ipava, Ill. CLARK WALKER CUMMINGS.

Editor The Christian Century: My copy of the "Century" came as usual on Wednesday and I read every word of it except some advertisements. This number is so fine that I gave away my copy and wish another for myself.

Crittenden, Ky. VIRGINIA FENLEY.

Editor The Christian Century: I want to congratulate you on last week's issue of the "Century." It is the best I have ever seen.

Paris, Mo. FRANK WALLER ALLEN.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

CURIOUSLY enough, a book I had just finished reading had set my mind reflecting on the doctrine of the return of our Lord when my Christian Century came last week with those illuminating human documents by Doctors Ainslie and Sharpe.

I say "curiously enough," because it is not my custom to be reading literature dealing with this subject. In truth I must confess that I have read very little of it. It has never appealed to me, somehow, as either well digested or important. I may have missed something very vital to my religious life—one never can tell what is in a doctrine until one "tries it on"—but the sense of need of any such dramatic return of Jesus has never arisen in my soul with any urgency. In fact I have hoped that there might be no necessity for such a second coming.

How differently we read the Scriptures! I have read them all my life, and I study them today with perennially fresh interest, and yet I have never been impressed with the presence on their pages of an urgent doctrine of the second coming. There is something of the sort there, I have in a vague way always known, and it is more or less a problem to me to interpret it, but it has never obtruded itself upon my mind as of great consequence.

BUT here comes Dr. Ainslie who says this apocalyptic element is the main thing in the Scriptures, that his early return was the theme for whole sermons in the ministry of Jesus, consuming entire chapters in the gospels, and that there is more even in the Old Testament about the Lord's second than about his first advent. To Dr. Ainslie the second coming is the key to the Scriptures; to me it has always been more or less of a mystery while the Scriptures themselves were clear.

Dr. Sharpe seems to read the Scriptures differently, too. To him the apocalyptic teaching was upon the "circumference" of Jesus mind "not at the center." Instead of its being the key to anything at all, Dr. Sharpe regards the expectation of the spectacular return of Jesus as an illusion which has been already "falsified" by history, and he seems able to distinguish the essential and absolute teachings of Christ from this romantic conception which floated in the atmosphere of Jesus' day.

ALL this interests me greatly. To my sorrow, my own habit —I can hardly call it a method—of reading these scriptures finds not a bit of support from either of these writers. I have had the habit—uncritically, I admit—of glossing over all references to the second coming by spiritualizing them. Our Lord is evermore coming, I have said, and he is coming more fully in the lives of men and in their civilization as his kingdom grows. Men put him away from themselves in the days of his flesh. They murdered him. But now he is conquering their brutishness, their hatred, their selfishness, with his own spirit of love and courage. There was found no room for him in the inn at his first advent; nor was there found room for him in the world. But he is making a place for himself in the lives and institutions of mankind and will finally reign as our spiritual king. This was my way of reading the Scriptures.

But both Dr. Sharpe and Dr. Ainslie show scant sympathy with this habit of mine. Dr. Sharpe says that to construe the words of Jesus in this spiritual fashion is to make of him a "modern evolutionary philosopher" and this he feels is inconsistent with the essential idea of the incarnation, namely, that divinity "emptied itself" and became a man subject to our human limitations, of intelligence as well as of body.

DR. AINSLIE attacks my spiritualizing habit by calling it an "exegetical 'tour de force.'" He says it leads one into more bewilderment than ever. "If I spiritualized those passages that had reference to his second coming because I did not believe them, why should I not spiritualize those that refer to his first coming which I did believe?" And when one starts on this spiritualizing type of exegesis where will he stop? he asks.

Well, I confess that the impact upon my mind of both these arguments, coming from opposite sides has been wholesome. It has stirred me up to think my thoughts through. I suppose of the two men Dr. Ainslie would have even less sympathy with my method than would Dr. Sharpe. For with Dr. Ainslie my uncritical method is not only bad exegesis but untrue to fact. The world is not getting better, he says; it is getting worse. The Church, he grants, may be getting some better, but sin is waxing in the world outside. It was this at first depressing observation that drove Dr. Ainslie to his pre-millenial view. "The tremendous forces of the world's smooth and polished evil," he says, "were leaping forward like uncaged and sleek lions, and more men and women from my side were going to destruction than to salvation."

THIS pessimistic reading of the facts of modern life and of history cuts straight across my own faith. Quite apart, now, from exegesis, I cannot see the world as Dr. Ainslie see it. He says he is not a pessimist, and points to the success of his local church work—a success, which his brethren would have described much more glowingly than the Baltimore pastor's modesty allowed—to prove that he has no personal reasons for being one. Yet his view of the social order is the essence of pessimism, and, with all respect to him, seems to me to be determined by a cramped and subjective perspective.

I find inspiration in the faith that mankind is getting better, a faith that feeds partly on what facts it can observe, but rests chiefly upon the deeper faith that God is and that he is working in his world now, still creating it.

I can more easily conceive that my understanding of any particular Scripture texts is in error than that this faith is misplaced.

I could—if it were necessary—give up those texts of Scripture altogether, or hold their interpretation in abeyance until I meet the Lord face to face, much more satisfactorily than I could adopt the view of the world as a sinking ship and the Church as a saved remnant caught before the wreck went down.

Prof. Sharpe's interpretation of the Scriptures may be right or wrong, but Dr. Ainslie's observation of the world of human life is wrong and radically wrong.

I SIT at the end of the day and think of the wondrous spiritual progress our humanity is making. I think of its new conscience on many ancient evils. I think of its new social sensitiveness, of the consecration of its scholars and its ten talent men and women. I think of the vast program now actually going forward to banish disease, and legalized sin, and woman slavery, and poverty—poverty, think of it!—and I cannot think for a moment that a society that is able so much as to face such stupendous moral enterprises, to say nothing of actually embarking upon them with courage and hope, can show radical signs of moral deterioration.

And besides, I do not like to admit to my own soul that the intrinsic moral energies operating through our humanity are so unequal to the task of righteousness that a cosmic miracle has to be worked some day to save us from ourselves. I like to believe, and I find inexpressible inspiration in believing that the forces released in our humanity by Christ—or imparted to it, if you will—are competent to win the day, without falling back, as premillenialists do, upon ultimate supernatural intervention. There is something weakly and helpless in the attitude of those who stake the final victory of the Kingdom of God upon such a "Deus ex machina."

No it is my battle, and yours, Christian readers, and if with the help of the living Christ we do not win it, it is lost!

But I also meant to speak of the book I was reading, and here my space is full. We will talk of that at the end of another day.

Of Human Interest

Thomas W. Lawson's Story.

At a dinner one evening Thomas W. Lawson was talking on the subject of success.

"Success in finance," said Mr. Lawson, is due in a great measure to prompt action. The doubting, hesitating, Hamlet type of man had best keep out of finance. He is quite sure to be swamped. The street hasn't much use for him. I had a boyhood friend of this type, named Grimes. He was a falterer, a doubter, a Hamlet.

"One evening I stopped to call on him and found him in a deep study, bent over a white waistcoat lying on a table.

"'Hello, Grimes,' I said. 'What's the trouble?'

"'This waistcoat,' he replied, holding the garment up to my view. 'It's too dirty to wear and not dirty enough to send to the laundry. I don't know what to do about it.'"—Everybody's Magazine.

Roosevelt on Doing the Next Thing.

To play the demagogue for purposes of self-interest is a cardinal sin against the people in a democracy, exactly as to play the courtier for such purposes is a cardinal sin against the people under other forms of government. A man who stays long in our American political life, if he has in his soul the generous desire to do effective service for great causes, inevitably grows to regard himself merely as one of many instruments, all of which it may be necessary to use, one at one time, one at another, in achieving the triumph of those causes; and whenever the usefulness of any one has been exhausted it is to be thrown aside, declared the ex-president in the Chicago News.

If such a man is wise, he will gladly do the thing that is next, when the time and the need come together, without asking what the future holds for him. Let the half-god play his part well and manfully and then be content to draw aside when the god appears. Nor should he feel vain regrets that to another it is given to render greater services and reap a greater reward. Let it be enough for him that he, too, has served, and that by doing well he has prepared the way for the other man who can do better.

President Wilson's Progress Parable.

In that sage and veracious chronicle, "Alice Through the Looking Glass," it is recounted how, on a noteworthy occasion, the little heroine is seized by the Red Chess Queen, who races her off at a terrific pace. They run until both of them are out of breath; then they stop and Alice looks around her and says, "Why, we are just where we were when we started." "Oh, yes," says the Red Queen; "you have to run twice as fast as that to get anywhere else."

That is a parable of progress. The laws of this country have not kept up with the change of economic circumstances in this country; they have not kept up with the change of political circumstances; and therefore we started. We shall have to run, not until we are out of breath, but until we have caught up with our own conditions, before we shall be where we were when we started; when we started this great experiment which has been the hope and the beacon of the world. And we should have to run twice as fast as any rational programme I have seen in order to get anywhere else.

I am, therefore, forced to be a progressive, if for no other reason, because we have not kept up with our changes of conditions, either in the economic field or in the political field. We have not kept our practices adjusted to the facts of the case, and until we do, and unless we do, the facts of the case will always have the better of the argument; because if you do not adjust your laws to the facts, so much the worse for the laws, not for the facts, because law trails along after the facts. Only that law is unsafe which runs ahead of the facts and beckons to it and makes it follow the will-o'-the-wisps of imaginative prospects.—Chicago News.

Humbling Secretary Bryan.

The year after coming to Nebraska, in 1888, I delivered fifty speeches against the Republican candidate for governor, and in each one made it clear why he should not be elected.

He was elected, however, by the usual majority.

On the following St. Patrick's Day I was to make a short speech, and Governor Thayer (whom I had tried to defeat) presided. It was a varied program, consisting of songs and speeches and vaudeville numbers. It was the first time I had been in the presence of the governor, and I wondered whether he felt any resentment toward me for all the work I had done against him.

At last my turn was reached. The governor, having been prompted by another man, arose and said: "The next person on the program is W. J. Bryan," and as I came forward he stepped toward me, smiled, and extended his hand. I felt greatly pleased that he did not harbor any resentment against me, and grasped his hand warmly as he drew me toward him and whispered: "Quick! Do you speak, sing, or dance?"

He had never even heard of me.

Wickersham Likes Chinese President.

George W. Wickersham, former attorney-general of the United States, is an enthusiastic admirer of Yuan Shih-kai, president of the Chinese republic, with whom he had a long conversation before the outbreak of the revolution. He believes Yuan to be one of the great men of the day.

"President Yuan," said Mr. Wickersham recently, "is a fascinating man to meet. His face is mobile and shows quick changes as he listens to what is being said. His eyes are bright and expressive. He is the one man who can save China."

Mr. Wickersham believes the charges that Yuan Shih-kai is trying to become dictator are unfounded.

A Joe Jefferson Story.

Alligator Joe was a well-known figure at Palm Beach. Once, when Joseph Jefferson was in Florida and fishing in the lake, a lady approached him, and said, "Excuse me, but are you Alligator Joe?" Mr. Jefferson looked up, and his eyes twinkled. "I confess to the 'Joe,' madame," he said, "but I deny the Alligator."—Town and Country.

George Ade on Ministers.

Once upon a time a manager asked George Ade if he had ever been taken for a minister. "No," replied Ade, "but I have been treated like one." "How was that?" "I have been kept waiting for my salary six or seven months."

Dr. Hale's Illustrated Lecture.

Dr. Edward Everett Hale who used often to sound the praises of sleep, is reported to have remarked that he had been giving throughout the West a lecture on sleep, with illustrations by the audience.

From Near and Far

The French aviator Pegoud, who on Aug. 20 made a parachute drop from an aeroplane from a height of 900 feet, accomplished a much more remarkable feat Sept. 1, which at first sight appears to have been a piece of extraordinary aerial acrobatics, but which experts declare was an epoch making experiment towards the attainment of safety in the air. Pegoud caused his monoplane to describe a gigantic letter S in the sky, during which he was flying upside down for about a quarter of a mile. Secrecy was maintained prior to the test and only a few persons were present when Pegoud took the air. He mounted rapidly to a height of more than 3,000 feet, describing a curve; then the forward part of the machine was observed to incline towards the earth.

After five months of preliminary work in studying historical authorities, a company is ready to photograph for moving pictures scenes from the sixty-four years' reign of Queen Victoria at a cost of $25,000. Actresses will appear as the queen at different stages of her life. The incidents depicted will include the first council of her ministers a few hours after her accession, her coronation, her reception of the explorer, David Livingstone, and the marriage of the Prince of Wales, afterward King Edward VII. Then come pictures representing her audiences with the Duke of Wellington, Lord Melboure, Gladstone, Disraeli and John Bright.

Theodore Roosevelt has advised Gov. Sulzer to make a "full and straightforward explanation and answer in reference to the charges" that resulted in the governor's impeachment. In a letter replying to two communications relating to the gubernatorial situation sent by the governor to the former president while he was traveling in the west, Col. Roosevelt says: "You owe it to yourself and to all those who have supported you to take the earliest opportunity to answer the charges made against you."

"Woman's suffrage is all right," says Thomas A. Edison. The inventor expressed his views just before he and his wife left for Lake Lunape, N. H., where they are guests of Richard Colgate of New York. "I believe American women have as much intelligence as the Slav who, after a legal residence here, can be naturalized and then register as a voter," continued Mr. Edison. "I do not think the actions of the militant suffragettes in England have helped the woman suffrage cause."

Efficient Presbyterian Layman Dead.

In the death of Robert C. Ogden, which occurred on August 6, at his summer home in Kennebunkport, Me., Christian philanthropy and Christian education have lost a very earnest and influential friend. He was prominent as a merchant in Philadelphia and New York, where he was sole manager of the New York branch of Wanamaker's and in which important task he was engaged for some years, retiring in 1907 only when he had established that great business enterprise upon a firm and successful basis. He then turned all his attention and his wonderful powers of organization to philanthropic work and especially to the cause of negro education at Hampton and elsewhere, in which he had long been greatly interested. He established educational conferences in the South, and out of his efforts grew the General Educational Board, to which John D. Rockefeller gave $42,000,000, the greatest single amount ever given to the cause of education. Mr. Ogden not only thus induced others to become interested in this great work of the Christian education of our dependent races, but gave freely of his own time and talent to this work. The late Julian Ralph once said of him in that connection: "He is a trained and a great organizer, and the talents he displays in business are the same which made him hit upon this as the best way a man of his comparative small means could help the greatest and most sacred movement now beginning to stir this nation."

The Y. W. C. A.'s Fall Campaign.

The Young Women's Christian Associations of the country will enter this fall upon a campaign having three lines, each to continue for five years. These lines are to carry out suggestions made recently by committees and adopted unanimously by the associations. The basis of the campaign is the fact, as stated by the associations, that the people of the United States are in the throes of a great moral and spiritual awakening. The associations say that religious leaders are keenly alive to the blurred standards of character and conduct in political, commercial, and in some cases even religious life. Speaking about young women of America the associations officially say that far too many are narrow, aimless and irreligious, leading superficial lives at a time when the world is demanding consecration and spiritual purpose at home and abroad. The three parts to this new campaign are character standards, social morality from the Christian point of view, and thrift and efficiency. One plan to attain to former, apart from study, is to try to gain the great meanings underlying Christmas, Easter and the universal day of prayer for students. The social morality involves the question of motherhood, education, society and woman's responsibility for public and private conditions. Thrift means the well balanced life, not mere money saving, and efficiency is that which makes the woman helpmeet of man, of herself, and of the world in largest ways. All of the campaigns are intended expressly for young women in colleges. Nationwide efforts are now planned, ready to start with the opening of the fall college terms.

Work of the Federal Council of Churches.

The Federal Council of Churches is appointing a national committee to take up religious work in San Francisco in connection with the Panama Exposition. Through its influence, resolutions relative to the exploitation of commercialized vice at the exposition are now being sent to Exposition and San Francisco authorities from Christian bodies in nearly all parts of the country, and the general secretary of the council is soon to go to California to assist in a campaign against such vice and for religious meetings during the exposition. Owing to the Council's agitation several states have passed laws insuring to industrial workers one day's rest in every seven. New financial support has been secured for the Council's Commissions on Country Life and Peace and Arbitration, and these lines of work are to be increased. It is the belief of the Council's leaders that the agitation against it has subsided. That agitation was fiercest in the Presbyterian Church South, but in the General Assembly of that body, in favor of withdrawal, only twenty-seven votes were mustered. There are thirty Protestant bodies in the Federal Council, representing something like 16,000,000 of actual church members.

English Pastor at Northfield.

Next to Dan Crawford, the most striking figure at the Northfield conference this summer has been Rev. J. D. Jones, Congregational pastor at Bournemouth, Eng.

For the mornings of the first week of the conference he expounded focal events in the life of Christ on his pathway to the cross. His selection of gospel incidents covered the baptism of Christ, the temptation of Christ, the confession of Peter, the transfiguration and the last supper. A gleaning from his first address gives a touch of the temper of his message to his Northfield hearers:

"This baptism was for publicans and sinners, yet Jesus submitted to the rite, for 'thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness.' Why did our Lord submit to it at all? Why submit to a baptism of repentance? . . . In spirit the cross and his baptism are the same—part of his humiliation showing his love. . . . But when we talk of baptism we do not eliminate repentance. Whose sin could Jesus repent of? He was harmless and undefiled, but he bore our sin and he made it his very own. That an absolutely innocent person should bear sin is not unknown to the world. . . . The literature of confession is not that of the sinner but of the saint. The Lord offered himself to God through the atonement of a perfect penitence for sin. The baptism was an anticipation of the cross."

Four years ago Mr. Jones was elected chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales. During the year of his chairmanship he directed the movement for raising a fund to be used in equalizing the salaries of the Congregational ministers in the smaller parishes. During the past year this fund, amounting to £250,000, was completed, marking the consummation of his diligent labors in this direction continued during his chairmanship and since. Mr. Jones is minister of a group of five churches having a membership of thirteen or fourteen hundred. His brethren say that his manse at Bournemouth on the south shore of England in its outlook over the English Channel has one of the most beautiful locations of any home in the world. His stay in America will not be long. He came almost entirely for the Northfield Conference, where he takes his part along with Prof. A. T. Robertson of Louisville, who is teaching in exposition the epistle of Philippians, and the more familiar Northfield names of Rev. J. Stuart Holden, Len G. Broughton, John Thomas, John A. Hutton and Charles Inglis. Mr. Jones preached for two August Sundays in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York City for his friend, Dr. Jowett.

Mr. W. H. Anderson of the Anti-Saloon League of Maryland was recently subjected to a horsewhipping by an enraged liquor devotee for writing a letter to a Baltimore newspaper as follows:

"Before long, when a brewer buys an automobile, people will figure out how many little children were robbed of carfare to the parks before the price of the auto filtered to him in profits. When some distiller contributes to charity, or builds a church, or finances some similar enterprise, folks will begin to wonder how many men were robbed of the hope of heaven by the stuff which he sold for profit, knowing it to be injurious, to enable him to pose as a generous patron of the church. When the wife of some distiller or wholesale liquor dealer or prominent grocer who makes a specialty of liquor, blossoms out in a diamond necklace at the theater, the margins of programs may be covered with calculations of how many children and mothers have gone without decent clothes in order that she may shine resplendent. And the day is not far distant when the socially prominent wife of a man who has made his money out of the liquor traffic, upon giving some lavish entertainment in a palatial home, will find that even the guests will involuntarily trace the connections between that luxury and the hovels in the slums, and the pitiful sight of household goods on the sidewalk where a drunkard's family has been evicted for nonpayment of rent, and regard her as a social parasite."

Efforts have thus far failed to induce Rev. Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, who is this week visiting Chicago, to give up his London church and become pastor of a church in America. The Madison Avenue Reformed Church of New York, in which Dr. Morgan preached Sunday, Aug. 17, extended a call to him offering him a much larger salary than his London congregation is paying him, but he declined to consider the call. A similar effort on the part of the Second Presbyterian Church, of Chicago, to obtain Dr. Morgan's services, nine years ago, before Dr. John Balcom Shaw became pastor, also failed. It is the hope of a number of Chicago religious leaders that Dr. Morgan may be induced to become pastor of a Chicago church, either the Second Presbyterian or the Moody Church.

The First Congregational Church of San Francisco, whose pastor is Rev. Charles F. Aked, formerly of England, is building a new church during this summer. In a brotherly spirit, the Jewish congregation in the neighborhood has offered its temple to the Congregationalists for its Sunday services until the new church is completed.

Disciples Table Talk

Meets "Uncle John" Ade.

Edgar DeWitt Jones, pastor of First Church, Bloomington, Ill., has been visiting at Remington, Ind., where he delivered a series of chautauqua lectures before the Fountain Park Chautauqua. On one Sunday morning he preached the morning sermon for the day, and in the afternoon gave a lecture in place of Hon. James E. Watson, who failed to appear to fill his place on the program. Mr. Jones writes to friends of a stroke of good fortune which came to him while stopping at Remington. This was the meeting with John Ade, the father of George Ade, the famous writer and humorist. Mr. Ade has a cottage on the chautauqua grounds. Mr. Jones says that he became well acquainted with Mr. Ade, senior, and one day last week he took the Bloomington man for a visit to the country home of George Ade, near Brook, which is fifteen miles from Remington. John Ade is known in all the countryside as "Uncle John," and is a noted character of the vicinity. One of his accomplishments is great skill in throwing horse shoes, being known as the champion of the neighborhood in that line. Mr. Jones had a try with him at his favorite game one day, and Mr. Ade showed up the Bloomington preacher as a veritable tyro at the game.

Professor Athearn Commended.

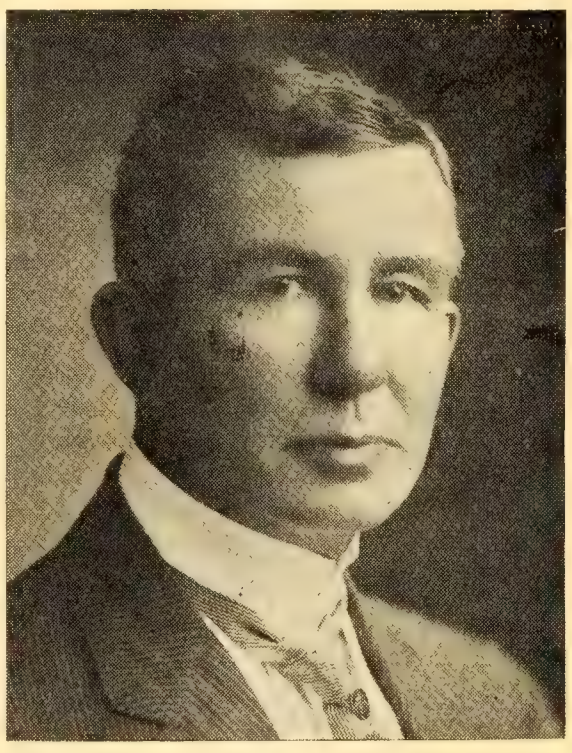
C. M. Burkhart, who has been attending Columbia University, New York, during the summer, writes, regarding Prof. Walter S. Athearn, of Drake University: "I confess that a sense of pride filled me in finding our own Prof. Walter S. Athearn, of Drake University, on the teaching staff at Columbia. Prof. Athearn's course, 'The Administration of Religious Education in a Parish,' is thorough, practical and satisfying. In the past our Sunday-school leaders have come enthusiastically before us exhorting us to 'get a vision,' etc. Prof. Athearn dignifies the work by explicitly pointing out where we have been violating fundamental laws of body and mind, and by indicating clearly how to become more efficient laborers in this realm. The following resolutions, signed by the members of the class, were handed to him at the close of the term: "New York City, Aug. 14, 1913:—Out of experience and knowledge, rich in the field of religious education, Prof. Walter S. Athearn has presented to us an admirable and consistent program of religious education in a course of lectures characterized by virility of thought, lucidity in expression and enthusiasm for an ideal. We beg to assure Prof. Athearn of our gratitude and thorough appreciation of his valuable service to us."

Little Rock Pastor Resigns.

Accepting a call to the First Church, Johnson City, Tenn., after fifteen years of service in Little Rock, J. N. Jessup last week resigned the pastorate of First Church at Little Rock, Ark. He will preach his farewell sermon Sunday, October 14, the fifteenth anniversary of his work there. Mr. Jessup came to Little Rock when the First Church was only a small congregation, worshipping in a small church building. During his service here, the church has grown into one of the largest in this section and now owns property valued at $80,000, or about ten times that owned when he took charge. Two new churches have been formed of the membership of the First Church, the Third Street Church and the Wright Avenue Church. But fifty who were members fifteen years ago remain in the active work of the church and 1,623 members have been added. This is an average of 108 for each of the fifteen years of Mr. Jessup's pastorate. The church has grown steadily under his guidance and direction, gaining 280 members the first five years. 455 the second five, and 888 the last five years. He has baptized 705 people, solemnized 349 marriages, and conducted 359 funerals. In addition to his work in the church, Mr. Jessup has been prominent among Little Rock's social workers, always being identified with those who labored for the city's welfare.

Walter Scott Priest, Nature Lover.

Walter Scott Priest, pastor at Wichita, Kan., finds sermons not only in stones, but also in mountains. After five weeks spent vacationing in Colorado, at Lake George and Manitou, Mr. Priest preached a sermon on "Echoes from the Mountains." The Wichita pastor declares that, if for no other reason than to be awed by the grandeur and immensity of the mountains, one is justified in spending a vacation among them.



Rev. J. Fred Jones, Illinois' State Secretary.

H. O. Pritchard and Family Honored.

The resolutions adopted by unanimous vote of University Church, Bethany, Neb., Aug. 24, speak highly of the work that has been done by H. O. Pritchard and family during his six years' pastorate at Bethany. The committee states that the congregation has come to know their minister and his family as "friends and helpers, always doing everything possible by precept and action to further the work of the Kingdom." Testimony is given to a doubling of the church membership during the past six years; to a notable improvement in organization and efficiency in the Sunday-school; to a large increase in missionary offerings; and finally to a worthy achievement on the part of the congregation under Mr. Pritchard's leadership, in the erection of a new building.

Alumni of School of Methods Organize.

At the School of Methods held at Bethany Park, Ind., in August, an alumni association of the School of Methods there was organized. The purpose, as stated, is to cultivate a spirit of loyalty and interest toward the school as the pioneer of its kind among the Disciples of Christ. Among those promoting the organization were W. T. Barbre, of Rockville, Ind., Miss Cynthia P. Maus, of St. Louis; Dean Garry L. Cook, of the School of Methods; E. H. Clifford, of Indianapolis. A complete organization was effected and constitution adopted. The following officers were elected: president, W. T. Barbre, Rockville, Ind.; vice-president, Mrs. Max Shireman, Martinsville, Ind.; secretary-treasurer, Mrs. A. J. Clark, Indianapolis, Ind. The following committees were appointed: Reading Course Committee, Garry L. Cook, chairman; Finance Committee, E. H. Clifford, chairman; Publicity Committee, Dr. H. J. Hall, Franklin, Indiana. The Resolutions Committee of the organization commended the work of the lecturers before the 1913 School. The commencement address was given by R. M. Hopkins, and diplomas were conferred upon the 93 members of the school by the state C. W. B. M. president, Mrs. Nina W. Greist, and by Dean Cook.

Eastern Pennsylvania in Convention.

The convention for eastern Pennsylvania meets this year with the church at Canton, September 8-11. Mrs. T. W. Phillips, state president of the C. W. B. M., will preside at the sessions of that organization, and Mrs. Laura Gerould Craig, of New York State, will be a speaker. The General Society interests will be represented by G. W. Muckley, Grant K. Lewis and F. M. Rains. In the Sunday-school session Guy L. Carter, of New York City, and Robert M. Hopkins will speak. Irving S. Chenoweth, of Philadelphia, is to make three addresses. E. C. Lunger, the newly elected secretary, will present the needs of the district for the ensuing year. The First Church of Philadelphia is expressing its appreciation of the work of its minister by sending him to the Toronto Convention. Mr. Chenoweth has been with the church for a little more than a year and there is new hope and enthusiasm about facing the winter's work. At least six from the church will attend the convention in Toronto, writes Kinley J. Tener, of Philadelphia.

Montana as a Mission Field.

Walter B. Reed, Billings, Mont., missionary secretary of that state, holds that Montana is "the largest mission field in the United States." And he has facts to back up his statement. A state 900 miles long and 300 miles wide, and people are just discovering that among the snow clad mountains are nestled fertile valleys stretching far and wide that in the days to come will rival, in magnificence, the Alhambra, Mr. Reed writes. "Every train crossing our borders unloads its cars of human freight and thousands of people are coming never to return, but to settle down and make their homes here and dig out the treasures in fruits and grains, coal and copper, and by the magic hand of thrift and industry to convert them into wealth. No other state offers such opportunities for rich and poor alike. Thousands in the past months have filed on homesteads and during the next month Uncle Sam will allot 8,000 more to his citizens. So far as material things are concerned, we lack no good thing. Good lands, good homes, good fruits and grains, and good schools, but there is a woeful want when we consider the matters of the Kingdom. Deserts are growing into gardens and villages into cities like mushrooms in a night, but in the unceasing search for treasures, the Christ and the Christ life are neglected and forgotten, for the field is white unto the harvest and the laborers are few.

"Yet, what are we doing as a church for Montana?" asks Mr. Reed. "Less than three thousand dollars was available for mission work last year. $10,000 could have been used to advantage. Fields are now calling for help, scattered Disciples all over the state are calling for a leader to come among them to organize. Had we only the men and the means, more than a score of churches could be organized in good cities and these churches would be composed of people who would support the cause at home and abroad. I say again, Montana offers great opportunities for the Disciples to do real work and get results than any other quarter in the United States."

Rockford, Ill., Lays Corner Stone.

Wm. B. Clemmer, pastor at Rockford, Ill., realizes the new opportunity and responsibilities with the church there, now that it has its new $25,000 building started. The corner stone was laid August 26. G. L. Snively had charge of the service, and held a ten days' tent meeting for the church following the dedication. He was assisted by Lucile May Park, singer. O. F. Jordan who was pastor at Rockford for seven years, gave an address, and his presence at this glad time was greatly appreciated by his friends. The church services will be held in the county court house until the new basement is ready for occupancy.

Among the Missouri Lead Miners.

Chas. H. Caton, who has been preaching at Flat River, Mo., since April, reports that he is trying to "turn the light of Christianity on the problems" that obtain in that region—"the biggest lead mining district in the United States." A strike has paralyzed business there for several weeks, but is now settled. Four sermons bearing upon industrial and economic conditions have won Mr. Caton much praise. The topics discussed were: "The New Good Samaritan," "Bricks Without Straw," "The Golden Calf," and "Women and Children First." A local paper, in words of commendation, declares that Mr. Caton "is in the front rank of the increasing number of men who believe that the church should be rallied to cure the social ills and redeem society as a whole, and that equal emphasis should be put upon social regeneration with personal regeneration." Mr. Caton has been asked to preach these sermons in another mining town near Flat River.

Church Builds Tuberculosis Cottage.

H. H. Webb, pastor at Portland, Ind., formerly an architect, will have general charge of construction of the tuberculosis cottage to be erected there. He will be assisted by Grant E. Derbyshire, superintendent of schools at Portland, and a Disciple. The cottage will be used to house an anti-tuberculosis exhibit on the Jay county fair grounds and thereafter will be maintained on the court house grounds.

Death of A. T. Ross.

A. T. Ross died at Winchester, Ind., Aug. 26, 1913. For ten years Mr. and Mrs. Ross were in charge of Lida's Wood, the girl's dormitory of Eureka College. Before they came to Eureka, they had rendered splendid service at the Southern Christian Institute, Edwards, Miss. At both institutions Mr. Ross was deeply interested in the welfare of the students and proved himself a friend to many when a friend was most needed. His death will bring sorrow to hundreds of young people who were associated with him during their student days. The last year of his life his heart was in Liberia, where his only son is engaged in the work of a missionary of Christ. News that this son was faithful to his trust cheered the last days of the father. Mr. Ross promoted the educational and missionary enterprises of the church by his sympathy with Mrs. Ross in her advocacy of these enterprises. It was a joy to him that his wife and son were devoting their lives to education and missions.

Notable Celebration in Indiana.

About one thousand persons attended the seventy-fifth anniversary celebration of the Mt. Auburn Christian church near Shelbyville, Ind., August 24. One of the features of the day was the singing of the church hymns of many years ago in the style that was then in vogue. A basket dinner was served at noon. A table 150 feet long was used. The exercises began in the morning. John Howard Clarke, one of the oldest members of the church, read the church history. The morning sermon was delivered by Professor Morro, of Butler college. The afternoon sermon was delivered by Clay Trusty, pastor of Seventh Church, Indianapolis. After the sermon the Lord's Supper was observed. The evening sermon was by George Clarke, pastor of Sixth church, Indianapolis. He is a former member of the Mt. Auburn church and is a son of John H. Clarke. Hugh Shields, formerly of Indianapolis, is the present pastor of the church. The Mt. Auburn work was organized in the summer of 1837.

Union meetings covering ten Sunday nights have been held in Franklin, Ind., where William J. Wright ministers. The crowds have grown steadily from 400 to about 2500 under the preaching of the local pastors, and hundreds of non-churchgoers have been in attendance. Regret is general that the meetings are at an end. The best of relations exist and the spirit of union is strong. The whole congregation of the Christian church has gone on two Sunday mornings, led by the pastor, to the other churches. The work prospers.

From Lotumbe, Africa: "July 13, '13. There was a very large ingathering of inquirers at Lotumbe during the month of June. After a thorough examination of these, 81 were admitted to the baptismal class and were baptized Sunday, June 29. Mr Eldred and I expect to spend the next two months itinerating far above Lotumbe. There are many inquirers waiting for baptism there, so we expect many additions to the church.—H. C. Hobgood."

He has raised in the places where he has worked practically the entire cost for which the Society was responsible. Mr. McPherson goes at once to his new work in the Maritime Provinces.

County Superintendent Geo. W. Brown, of Paris, Ill., is prominently mentioned as a candidate for State Superintendent of Public Instruction in this State. Mr. Brown has been County Superintendent of Schools in Edgar County for ten years and is active in all kinds of community work. He has been Superintendent of the Sunday-school of First Church, of Paris, for a number of years.

S. C. Parker, pastor at Main Street, Waxahachie, Tex., reports that he has received 103 persons into the church during his summer vacation, and has lost only four pounds in weight. Mr. Parker spent six days preaching in the community where he was reared, in Young County, and preached several nights.

The church at Decatur, Ind., will have a homecoming the latter part of September. At that time every one that ever held a membership in the church will be invited back home for the day and all the present members will be their hosts. Several charter members will likely be present.

The Church of Disciples and the Baptist Church of Swampscott, Mass., have united, forming the First United Church of Swampscott, which is equally affiliated with the Disciples and the Baptists. The minister and the church building of the Disciples have been retained.

Frank A. Higgins, Tonawanda, N. Y., writes that the statement recently made in this paper that he had accepted the work at Niagara Falls, N. Y., was in error. Mr Higgins is now entering the fourth year of a very successful pastorate at First Church, Tonawanda.

C. E. Pickett, for the last six years pastor of the church at Petoskey, Mich., is planning to enter Yale University in the fall to take a course in theology for a year, at the end of which time he expects to return to his pastorate in Petoskey.

On Labor Day, the Central Christian Sunday School celebrated by asking William Houston, district president of the United Mine Workers, to address the school. The service was in charge of the men of the church.

For the purpose of spreading the gospel through the surrounding territory where the churches do not have regular pastors, members of the Dowagiac, Mich., Church have organized an evangelistic alliance.

G. C. Stearns, pastor at Dodge City, Kan., because he delivered a stinging attack on the city administration, spent a day in the police court as a witness.

Official separation of the First Christian and Central Christian churches, Richmond, Ind., has been consummated in a friendly manner.

A homecoming is announced for the Paris, Ill., church for Sept. 28. The building has been undergoing extensive improvements.

Russell F. Thrapp, First Church, Los Angeles, is opposing prize-fighting in Southern California.

O. C. Bolman has been extended a call to continue with the Pekin, Ill., church for three years.

STATE MISSIONS AND THE BUDGET COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

On July 18 I sent, at the request of the Budget Committee, a letter to every State Board in the United States asking two things, viz., First, that each Board furnish our Committee a statement giving the amount received from the churches of its state last year for State Missions and also an estimate of what would be needed from the churches for State Missions next year. Second, that each State Board indicate whether or not it would agree to act as the General Apportionment Committee in its State, if the report of the Budget Committee were adopted at the Toronto Convention.

Up to this time—Sept 1—the replies received are classified as follows:

1. State Boards giving estimates and agreeing to act as Apportionment Committee—Ohio, Indiana, Missouri and South Idaho.

2. State Boards giving estimates but failing to say whether they will act as Apportionment Committee—New Mexico, Kansas, Texas, Delaware and Maryland.

3. State Boards promising to take the matter under consideration, but not yet reporting action—Illinois, Virginia, Nebraska, Kentucky, Minnesota, Arkansas.

It will thus be seen that only four States have complied with the requests of the Budget Committee, four others have partially complied, six others have promised to take action—thus making 14 that have in any way responded.

When our Committee made its first report, there was much criticism from State Secretaries because we had not given a larger percentage to State Missions. In the final report of the Committee, State Missions are given a place just as large as the various State Boards wish it to have. Our Committee can include in its report only such states as comply with the two requests of my letters of July 18. Any reports sent to me so as to reach me here not later than Sept. 25, and any sent to me at The King Edward Hotel, Toronto, Canada, after that date and prior to Sept. 30 can be included in the report the Budget Committee will make to the General Convention. No state can be included in our report unless the information asked for is sent. This is a matter of such importance that I have again asked for space in the papers to call the attention of State Secretaries and State Boards to it. May we not have the matter presented to all the State Boards that have not yet acted on it, and answers to our two requests sent to me?

Liberty, Mo. GRAHAM FRANK,
Chairman Budget Committee.

NOTE:—It will be seen from the above program that the representatives from the Churches to the General Convention of Churches of Christ should be in Toronto not later than noon of Tuesday, September 30th. The first session of the Convention, at which its organization will be perfected and its constitution considered, begins, at 2:30.

Those who come by special trains, which have been arranged for by various organizations, will need to come through to Toronto by train without delay, as the steamer route brings them into the city too late for this first session. The Committee suggests that all delegates to the General Convention postpone boat trips and the Niagara trip until after the Convention, taking those in on their way home. Parties reaching Detroit Monday afternoon can easily reach Toronto by railway by Tuesday morning.

The programs of the missionary societies, which constitute the chief features of the convention, will be published later.

Convention Expectations

BY C. O. REYNARD, TORONTO.

As the time draws near for the gathering of our people in Toronto, our joy in the prospect increases. Everybody locally expects a great gathering. We receive numerous inquiries daily, as to entertainment details and constant encouragement from the attitude of our people as expressed in their expectation in coming. There seems to be a general feeling that the convention this year will be "different." I think we can guarantee that expectation will not be disappointed. A combination of conditions exists which seems to me to guarantee exceptional advantages to ensure a most delightful season of refreshing to all who can be present.

Toronto is a most beautiful, substantial city. All residences and other buildings are of stone or brick. You will see no frame buildings. Rather monotonous, but solid. It is a large city, too. Population increasing about 25,000 each year, with a good class of immigrants from Great Britain mainly. Public buildings are exceptionally well built, and streets and parks well kept. There is nothing exceptional in all this, of course. About the same could be said of a number of cities on the continent; but I imagine it will somewhat surprise some of our visitors to find such a city outside the boundaries of the U. S. A., in Canada, which country is traditionally associated in our American minds with Indians and deep snows.

The Convention Hall.

Then you will be pleased with Massey Hall, donated to the city by one of Toronto's wealthy citizens, the donor of Massey Memorial Pipe Organ to the Chautauqua Institution. The Hall is most comfortably seated. Noise from the street and entrance vestibule is shut off from the main auditorium by a second hallway. Any speaker with a moderate voice will be heard distinctly in any part of the hall. You will be comfortable during the sessions. We will have access to the great pipe organ for our musical program. The Convention will be conspicuous among those of recent years by the quiet and decorum which will be made possible in meeting in Massey Hall.

Under An Alien Flag.

But no small part of the "difference" will be due to the fact of our people meeting in convention under a flag that will be new to the greater part of them. There is an indefinable difference between Canada and the United States, in the general "atmosphere." One in blood, one in religion, and with a future destiny which must inevitably link these peoples in increasing knowledge and appreciation of each other, yet when you cross the line you will find that you pass from one country into another in a very real sense. It will be worth while for our people to make this a matter for observation during the convention. The discriminating, who come expecting "something to lerne as well as something to teche," will hardly expect to find in all matters of difference, that the superiority is invariably for either side of the line. In all things, humility fits us best. And our convention visitors will return home with a new appreciation of the fundamental differences between these two peoples, but also with a larger sense of the responsibility that each people bears to the other, and that both owe to the world at large. The convention will, we believe, prove to be truly international. It will serve, as perhaps no other convention has been able to do, to emphasize the part that a religious body can have in cultivating international acquaintanceship, and in contributing to the world's peace.

Better Obey the Policeman!

I must warn you not to trifle with the integrity of the policemen or street car conductors! And if you have a difference with them, you would do well to come round their way at once. They have an unpleasant custom of really seeing that the general public toe the mark pretty squarely in the matter of obedience to laws and customs. It is

ARE YOU THINKING OF GOING TO SCHOOL?

Try a Bible College in combination with a great State University. Together we have an equipment worth $3,750,000, and an annual income of $760,000. Do you realize what that means? It insures both equipment and talent. The quantity and quality of work is not surpassed. It is seldom equalled. Over 260 teachers are at your service. Salaries are paid which command the best talent. Yet, tuition is nothing for Missourians, and is only $20 per year for students from elsewhere.

Moreover, the spiritual atmosphere both in schools and in town is of the best. A deep religious spirit results each year in students dedicating themselves to the ministry or to the work of foreign missions.

sometimes easy to identify the unsophisticated United Stateser on the car. The conductor has a fare box which he carries, and into which each passenger must deposit his own fare. You hand the con. a dollar, we will say. He gives you your change, which you glance and pocket, assuming of course that he has kept out your fare. But you find him holding out his farebox to you.

Con. "Fare, sir."

Yan. "I gave you my fare."

Con. Still holding out the box, "Fare, sir."

Yan. Objects strenously, the whole car takes notice and finally the reluctant fare is dropped into the box. This little farce is enacted very often in the summer time, when American visitors are numerous in the city, much to the delight of all beholders.

Street Cars Free.

The homes of Toronto are being offered to our Committee at very reasonable rates. The Toronto Street Railway Company has agreed to carry all persons wearing our Convention Badge, free. The hospitality of the city will be extended to the Convention and our people in all ways possible. We are expecting a largely attended Convention, and will be greatly disappointed if it does not compare favorably in that regard, to any of our recent Conventions. Our cause in Canada is not strong. It will do us great good to experience a great Convention here. We trust that all of our brethren can feel that the Convention is their's as much as anybody's; and that whatever regulations as to representatives being qualified to vote are enforced in accordance with the action at Louisville and the constitution of the A. C. M. S. for many years, that it will hinder no large number of our brethren from coming to Toronto, to enjoy a Convention that will be "different" from any that have preceded it, and to participate in a great spiritual, businesslike Convention that will set our work forward in Canada, the United States and the world.

Inter-woven Hymns.

Let us know that you are coming, so that we may have your entertainment provided for. Bring your ,wraps for fall weather such as you would expect in Boston or Detroit in October. With credentials, or without them, come; and you will find that the Toronto Convention will fulfill your expectations, however high they may be.

I trust that none of our American friends will hesitate to sing the following hymn, every verse, please!

God save our gracious King,
Long live our noble King,
God save our King!
Send him victorious,
Happy and glorious,
Long to reign over us,
God save our King!

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing.
Land where my fathers died
Land of the Pilgrims' pride,
From every mountain side
Let "Freedom" ring.

Two empires by the sea
Two nations, great and free,
One anthem raise.
One race of ancient fame,
One tongue, one faith we claim,
One God, whose glorious Name
We love and praise.

Jehovah at Work in His World

Creating and Sustaining Energy.

The immensity of the universe is given as a reason to doubt God's interest in the individual man. But the infinitesimal as really demands God as does the immense and measureless. It takes the same kind of wisdom and just as much of it to construct the eye of a fly as it does to make a world. We are reverent before magnitude and unappreciative of the still more wonderful minute. The microscope gives as much reason for awe as the telescope. Biology is more startling in its revelations than astronomy. A single blood corpuscle contains more of mystery than the ocean. A live microbe is more commanding of thought than a dead moon. This is the idea: God is great enough to do little things divinely. The Creator and Sustainer of the universe is such simply because to his thought nothing is insignificant or unimportant. Either God can and does hear the cry of the least child of humanity or he has nothing to do with the world in which we live. The littleness of man is no argument whatever for the indifference of God to human need. Now the great unappreciated fact is that all energy wherever we find it is from God. Not a grass blade or a flower, not a bird or beast of the field has other than an imparted energy. God is actively in the very least thing in the whole world that expresses power. He is nearer too than any material object can be. He is in, with, through, yet over all and above all. Greater than the whole universe, he is yet in a very real sense in every part of his world, and here at work. God is as really doing things right now as when he created the world. Omnipotence and omniscience are not mere theological terms. They are more than definition or explanation. They convey the thought of divine immediateness of activity and interest. The truth is, miracles over which a weak faith and a visionless soul stumbles, are only an extra emphasis on some point of God's working. God not only works but he works to a defined end, always known to himself. He works unremittingly and untiringly. He works creatively, controllingly, sympathetically and effectually. He is here, not only as active energy, but as intelligent power. He adapts the unveiling of himself to human capacity. Revelation is progressive because the mind of man is of growing ability. The human will is the greatest fact in the universe, next to God. He permits the will of man to work unhindered until it interferes with his larger plan, then he interferes and stops it. He permits evil because he cannot wisely prevent it. Yet he has fixed limits beyond which evil may not pass.

The Footprint of the Infinite.

You can see the footprint of Jehovah at every point from the pitch-lined box among the reeds of the Nile at the princess' bathing place to fire-swept Sinai. Visions of the glory of Jehovah appear at every turn of the great historic highway. A voice other-worldly, supernatural, breaks the silence again and again. Invitation, exhortation, appeal and admonition all declare the presence of One who is no mere spectator but an interested Father, affectionately directing and empowering his children.

The narrative, historic, inspired, that has held the attention of millions during the past three months has the commanding declaration from first to last. It is this: "God is here."

He is graciously, gloriously, here, the source of all life and of all progress. The splendid symphony has variety and beauty but running through it is one theme, a sacred melody that speaks of the infinite presence. A succession of dramatic and often tragic scenes is unfolded of which God is the central fact. He holds the center of the stage though sometimes temporarily veiled from view. Let us throw the searchlight on the successive events and learn anew the timeless truth they teach.

Scene I. The Duel of Decrees.

The Monarch of Egypt stands in the midst of his court. He holds a papyrus roll upon which is inscribed his last decree. It is a death warrant for every newborn Hebrew male child. In the foreground is the River Nile. At the right and in the distance children are being thrown into the flowing waters while mothers weep unpitied upon the bank. In the distance a group of Hebrew slaves, smarting under the lash of cruel task-masters are trying to meet the demand for "Bricks without straw." At the extreme left where the river turns, a princess and her suite are taking from his floating crib, a beautiful child which has been doomed to death by the king's decree. In the center of the scene and overlooking all is One about whom the floating mists rise to conceal him from those who have no faith in his presence and no interest in his purpose. In his hand he, too, holds what has the appearance of a roll. That roll contains the decree of life, for this very child Pharaoh has decreed to die. Here then, is the battle of decrees. When God decrees can man defeat his purposes? God uses the king's own daughter to defeat him. Moses lives. The event has one abiding lesson. God is in his world victoriously. He rules. He defeats the devices of wicked men. There is a limit beyond which man's decrees are not permitted to stand. He sweeps them aside as easily as you would brush away a cobweb.

Scene II. The Irony of Providence.

In the foreground a palace of Pharaoh. A young man just returned from university training is leaving, passing through the palace gate. He was the child taken from the waters of the Nile. God not only saved his life by one of the king's own household but he compelled Pharaoh to feed, clothe and educate him. His step is measured and resolute. He will no longer be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter. He has seen the oppression of his people. Race pride, patriotic fervor, a sense of outraged justice, all these have led him deliberately to turn his back on the luxuries of the palace that he may aid his people. He has reached a group of his countrymen who are toiling hopelessly. A little apart is a fellow Hebrew cowering under the cruel stroke of pitiless wrath. In an outburst of indignation he strikes down his oppressor. Next, we are following him, a refugee, toward the desert of Midian. But he is not the chief figure of the scene. Behind all we see Jehovah. He has been all along the active director throwing the shuttle between the parted threads, at will, and bringing out the pattern to his purpose. "He compels the wrath of man to praise him." Moses, in Pharaoh's household, declares once and for all the ease with which God can and does bring to naught the plans of evil men. It declares: "God is here with plan and power."

Scene III. Redemptive Commission.

The scene introduces us to the desert of Midian and to a shepherd advanced in years. Here is a student in God's desert university. He is just graduating. Ancestral covenant has held him in close fellowship with the unseen. A seeming fire plays about a mountain shrub and the bush is not consumed. The supernatural blaze of glory holds him. A commanding voice speaks of redemption for the oppressed in Egypt and calls him to the task of leadership. That glowing bush had one meaning for people of every age. It is this: "God is in His world revealingly." God speaks, calls to holy tasks. Happy is he who says, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." "Here am I, send me."

Scene IV. Refuge and Ruler.

We are in the palace of Pharoah. The shepherd of Midian has audience with the king. He daringly confronts the oppressor of his people and presumes to speak for Jehovah. "Jehovah saith let my people go." "Who is Jehovah? I do not know him nor will I let the people go." Then followed the miracle—seal of the commission on this man who has had aroused in his soul that greatest of all emotions—redemptive passion. The heroic courage of this ambassador from the court of heaven is explicable only on the ground of the reality of God's sustaining and empowering presence. With the mystic wand he demonstrated the divineness of his mission. The whole scene declared: "God is here supernaturally accomplishing His holy will." He manipulates nature to suit His holy and all-wise purpose.

Scene V. Surrender or Suffer.

No law is more inexorable than the law of retribution. Obey or suffer. There is no escape. Nine times Jehovah shook Egypt with his foot-fall seeking to lead the obdurate king to emancipate the thousands of slaves who suffered under his cruel decrees. Each plague was followed by merciful suspension of affliction. In vain God demonstrated His presence and His power. Each plague proved the truth of Moses' claim to divine authority. His "Thus saith Jehovah," was no mere fancied commission. The mighty acts proclaim to men that God is in His world as a wonder-worker, warning, expostulating and punishing always with a redemptive passion directing His acts.

Scene VI. The Folly of Fighting God.

This scene reveals a startling human audacity. Here is a challenge to mortal combat.

Pharaoh dismisses Moses with a haughty contempt. He defies the God of Isreal to do his worst. The challenge is answered in the death of the first born in all Egypt. People fill the streets of the Egyptian capital in a frenzy of fear and in pitiful lamentation. In the distance we see a representative Hebrew group. Blood marks the step and lintel. Here there is no death. The Israelties feast, the Egyptians mourn. The Passover declares for every age: "God is here redeemingly."

Scene VII. Undertaking the Impossible.

The scene is impressive. A vast camp fills the plain near the sea. They are Hebrew slaves moving toward full freedom. Yonder Pharoah's army is ready for attack. A pillar-veil moves to a point between the two camps. Then there is a command to advance. "Forward." But the sea. "Forward." They undertake. They advance to the water's edge. The waters part and they pass. The pursuers essay to follow and are covered by returning flood. Who parted the waters? "God is here deliveringly." There are no emergencies with God.

Scene VIII. Storehouses of the Infinite.

A famine-stricken host in the wilderness. Then what? Petition followed by provision. Quails and Manna represent the divine munificence. God is here providingly.

Scene IX. Voice of Thunder and Eye of Flame.

A mountain, a valley, a famished multitude dying of thirst and—God. Then, fountain, from flint. The desert brook declares: "God is here satisfyingly."

Scene X. Law God's Method of Life.

Trembling, fire-swept Siani! Rolling thunder with blinding flashes of light. Then—the law. Ten times a voice spake, followed by the awful silence. Every commandment proclaimed the fact that God is here controllingly. He is a God who governs. He who commands, empowers. We falter and fail. He loves and redeems. "The Lord of hosts is with us." To obey is better than sacrifice. "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith."

The Midweek Service

By Silas Jones.

Sept. 17—The All-Important Test
John 21:15-23

Our topic for this week may excite suspicion. To many it implies that we are expected to answer a question that is too deep for us. Who knows enough about life to tell what is the all-important test of life? The wisest men have never been able to explain to us what life is. More than one of them has made himself ridiculous by attempting a definition. If sages are dumb when they keep within the bounds of their knowledge, what reason can the rest of us offer for speaking on a subject so difficult?

A distinguished American preacher was once on a committee to examine a candidate for the ministry. It had been the custom of such committees to require from each candidate a statement of his theological opinions. This preacher astonished his brethren by putting just one question to the young man and that was, "Do you love the Lord?" The fact that this question is yet regarded as insufficient shows that we have wandered far away from the simplicity of the faith. Perhaps this accounts for many of the weaknesses of the church of the present. We are using the wrong tests of efficiency for the disciples of the Lord.

"Do you love the Lord?" is not a simple question. We cannot love unless we know. The mother bird instinctively defends her young. Her actions are beautiful. If we human animals fail to admire her, we are poor specimens of humanity. But the love that Jesus pronounces the test of discipleship is more than an instinct. It is appreciation of human values. Neither wealth nor fame nor power nor pleasure is first with him who loves his fellowmen. He thinks in terms of the abundant life. "Seek first the kingdom" means for him not the adoption of some plan of organization, not confession of faith, courts for the trial of heretics, but working with God for the spiritualization of all life. Wealth, power, churches are means to this great end.

"Lovest thou me?" Jesus makes prominent the personal relation. Our relation to him is greatly simplified when we remember that he is represented in every person we mette. This beggar whose importunities annoy us, how shall we think of him? Is he just an inconvenience which we may dispose of by avoiding or by casting out of our presence? Yes, if we hold the opinion that our business is to be free from care and to think of others as instruments of our pleasure. We are then at liberty to have about us only those whom we can use profitably. All others we ought, to be consistent, to put out of sight. But the disciple of Jesus has a different conception of his relation to men. His Master was the servant of all. He therefore suffers when others suffer, for he identified himself with humanity.

"Follow thou me." No situation is so complex and confused that it does not afford an oportunity to obey this injunction of Jesus. We are often disturbed by the power of the wicked. We become interested in the work of our friends and we may even venture to dictate to them what they ought to do and be and we lose heart because they fall below our expectations. The church to which we belong may be engaged in foolish controversies while it is neglecting its proper work. All these perplexities and a thousand others need not keep us from obeying the law of love as that law has been written for us in the life of Jesus.

The nature of love requires that we be on our guard lest we make its duties too easy to understand. Because there is always at hand some duty of love it does not follow that all its duties are so simple that a fool can see them. They are not. With infinite pains science discovers the causes of disease. We cannot drive away the plague by pious ejaculations. Social diseases are not cured by resolutions passed by groups of comfortable churchmen who are ignorant of causes and afraid of rough work. Those who love study hard and labor incessantly.

A Low Price, Now Still Lower!

USERS of the Bethany Graded Lessons have always marvelled at the low price at which such superb literature was sold.

But this price has just been reduced to a still lower figure. In the Beginners, Primary and Junior grades the reduction amounts to 20 per cent. The price of the Bethany Lessons is now as low as, and in some items lower than, the materials of other publishers.

The reason of this is plain. The Bethany Graded Lessons are produced by the co-operation of the Disciples Publication Society with the Presbyterian Board of Publication, the Methodist Book Concern, and the Congregational Publishing Society. The immense quantities used by these great religious bodies and others make it possible to produce the very best literature ever offered the Sunday School world, and to reduce the price at the very time when some publishers are compelled not only to raise their prices but to cut down the size of many of their publications.

The practice of Christian unity in the preparation and publication of the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature is economical as well as Christian.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday Schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday School literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the Church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the Society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, The Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

In What Life Consists

Life is more than mere possession; everybody knows that. But there is a point in possession below which life seems not worth while.

Our Lord uttered what the practice of men in his own age and in ours disputes when He affirmed that a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth.

These words of our Lord surprised the young man whose eagerness to acquire what he considered his own had led him to break in upon one of our Lord's discourses. If things do not constitute life, at least they may add very greatly to some of its enjoyments. This the young man knew very well, and he might have said that he never claimed that life does inhere in these accessories. "I know there is such a thing as life," he may have said, "apart from its convenient comforts, but I also know that life itself is not worth living when reduced to its lowest terms."

So far the young man was more than half right, and his mistake was in assuming that the things which he was pursuing were life's real concerns. He was a man who had suffered wrong, or thought he had, and constant brooding over that injustice had made him incapable of giving consecutive thought to any other subject. Our Lord had been speaking of great things, of the spirit in which his disciples ought to serve him, of their conduct in persecution, and the assurance that the Holy Spirit would not forget them in the day of trial, and just at that moment this man with a grievance blurted out his untimely interruption, "Lord, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me." It is entirely possible that the young man was right as against his brother and it is quite possible that the brother was as soulless and narrow as he himself appears to have been, and if so nothing is more likely than that he was suffering from the withholding of what properly belonged to him. Our Lord did not enter into any discussion of the subject with this young man who aired his family troubles in public. The young man was making a mistake that narrowed and impeded his life and the Lord told him so.

This would have little interest for us if that young man were the only one who had made, or was likely to make, the same mistake, but the truth is, we are all in more or less danger from the same error. This is not wholly to be wondered at. We spend our lives to a greater or less degree in bondage to mere things. We know that we ourselves are other and more than the things for which we strive and labor. Yet things, mere things, have their value to us quite beyond their intrinsic worth. We spend our days in an effort to acquire things, in storing and dusting and arranging things, in worrying lest other people as misguided as we, and less fortunate, break in upon us and rob us of the things we have gathered, and in breaking our hearts because we cannot get as many things as our neighbor.

Now, the greater number of things which we possess are undeniably superfluous. No one man can live at any one time in more than one house, or drive in more than one carriage, or, except in severe weather, wear more than one coat; yet the greater part of our effort is expended in acquiring manifestly superfluous accessories of life.

It is in the totality of its influence for good that real life consists. The lives of great and good men do much to show us how wrong is our customary method of comparison and contrast. Epictetus was a slave and Marcus Aurelius was an emperor. Such was their contrast so far as the possession of mere things was concerned, but the world has long since forgotten those temporary accidents in their lives and you are accustomed to buy their books together, bound in companion volumes.

If Jesus were to come again, a great many excellent people would value his advent in proportion as he increased for them or their neighbors the visible supply of material comforts.

But this is one of the minor values of the gospel. It is life itself that counts. Christ came to give life and give it abundantly.

The life which He gives us is the abundant life. Every other form of life in comparison is meager and disappointing. Every form of life which depends primarily on the possession of things external is doomed to ultimate disappointment. The life that cannot wholly fail is that which has learned the secret which Jesus knew, taught and lived. In Him was life. In Him is life. Slowly but surely the judgment of wise men comes into accord with the estimate of Jesus. A man's life consisteth not in lands or gold or bonds or stocks, but in love and righteous character.

The Historical Pageant of Early New England Days

BY MILTON AINSLIE

ILLUSTRATED WITH THE FAMOUS DEERFIELD PHOTOGRAPHS.

There is a rattle of wheels and a whoop of voices, and down through the village street under its overarching elms, thunders an old-time stage coach, its top filled with shouting, painted savages! And this occurs in the month of August, in the year of grace 1913, and right in the center of old New England

"That old coach has done well to have retained so bright a red through all the years," I remarked to the pageant mistress.

"The color is b r a n new," she answered, "but still it is the original color. We had it painted up for the occasion. We got it from Fitchburg. We have ransacked the state for properties. We had to send a distance for our oxen and carts. Still, most of our material was gathered right about here, and all the performers are local."

"How many are there?" I asked.

"There are six hundred parts, and only two hundred people on the street; so most of the performers have to appear a number of times."

A little later I met one of the prominent citizens going home with the costume of a Puritan on one arm and that of a savage Indian on the other.

"I guess I'm the only man who ever tried to be a saint and a savage in the same day," he remarked to me

"Not at all," I said, "I have known it to be done often, and with considerable success, off the stage as well as on."

Old Deerfield had a pageant in 1910 and gathered in about $1,200 to expend on the saving of her fine elms. Whether it is that the elms are again in danger, she is having another pageant this year. It lasts four days, being given twice in the afternoon and twice in the evening.

Indian Carrying Eunice Williams Captive.

Here is a ten acre meadow, twice as long as it is wide, the end opposite the street backing up to thick woods, and with a few old apple trees scattered up the farther slope. Right through the middle runs a brook, just now dry, but temporarily flooded, cutting the meadow into two five acre lots that slope and meet at the brook. On the side next the street the audience is seated; the other side is the stage. The dry brook has been dammed, and a timely rain has filled it, so that this ten feet wide ditch makes a very good Connecticut River, and the canoes sail in as prettily as one could wish, right in the foreground near the footlights. For there are footlights. Several large gas tanks supply them, and the automobiles are so parked as to help out.

I was there on the opening day, and talked with the pageant mistress, Miss Margaret Maclaren Eager, who has been doing this sort of thing in Plymouth and Salem and other old towns, and who is a capable and energetic woman.

There were eight episodes in the Old Deerfield pageant. The first showed the war between the Pocomtuck and the Iroquois Indians. Then appeared the first white settler, Samuel Hinsdale. The third episode showed carts of wheat drawn by oxen and guarded by the settlers, and led up to the massacre of Bloody Brook.

The next was the prettiest of all the episodes. T h e "d a m e s c h o o l," taught by Dame Hannah Beeman, was shown, the little tots at study and at morning prayer, and then the hurried skedaddle as the terrible news of the Indian outbreak reached them.

Next came the pathetic procession of the captives led to Canada, and then the return of the Rev. John Williams, and the assembly of the people in the meeting house where he m i n i s t e r e d, to give thanks for their deliverance. But his daughter Eunice did not return. She married an Indian. Years afterward she made a visit to Deerfield but returned to her husband and children.

It will be remembered that Rev. John Williams of Deerfield had this sad experience, and related it in his remarkable book, "The Redeemed Captive," of which a reprint was made a few years ago by the H. R. Huntting Co. of Springfield, Mass., as also of Steele's "Indian Captive." They sell at $1.50 each, and are valuable items for the historian or the book lover. You may remember that Mr. Williams tells that the Indians, instructed by the Jesuit missionaries, baptized the babies before killing them, having no desire to do them any damage in the next world, but only to be well rid of them in this. That was very considerate, and I have often thought about it and the type of missionary work which that result represented. How lovely it must have been for those savages to have returned, bringing babies' scalps bloody with gore, but blessed by baptism administered in the very act of murder!

I was very glad to obtain a copy of "The Redeemed Captive" in this reprint, and I commend it very heartily as one of the most interesting of the first-hand documents of the colonial period. The old editions are almost impossible to obtain, but this reprint is altogether excellent.

Then came the Revolution. Parson Ashley was a Tory. He was not dependent on his salary, which was lucky for him, for his salary was always behind, and his Tory principles made his congregation none the more desirous of paying him. He imported some tea, marked on the outside of the package, "Monongahela Balsam," and invited Tory friends to a tea-party at his house. Such a hunting of attics for old bonnets and calashes, and for dresses of the olden time! And behold the grace of the stately minuet, performed at Parson Ashley's! Yes, and it was as modest and pretty as could be, and as unlike the modern dances in their loud vulgarity and shameful immodesty as one could imagine. If ever it becomes my pastoral duty to provide a dance of any kind at the parsonage, which I greatly doubt, and I have liberty to choose between the modest old time dances and the modern abominations, I know which I shall choose.

The Tory Tea Party.

I got pictures of all these things. Old Deerfield has some remarkable industries, among them the photographing establishment of the Misses Allen, whose pictures command high prices as works of art. They photographed the pageant, and I was able to secure early prints of some of the most desirable scenes. I acknowledge their courtesy as well as their skill in the accompanying illustrations.

The scenes continued down through the Revolution, including the hoisting of the Liberty Pole, and on to the year 1857, when it closed with a group of symbolic scenes. Indeed, there was free, and as it seemed to me not wholly consistent, use of symbolism throughout the performance.

The idea of the historical pageant came to us from England, where in recent years they have been celebrating in a number of the early cities. York and Bury Saint Edmunds and other of the old towns were able to begin with the Romans, and come on through the Norman Conquest and down to date. They called for the co-operation in action or chorus of nearly the entire populace, and they transformed the ordinary English tradesman for a day into a knight or a lord.

The story is told of one of these pageants, and an American approaching the grounds and meeting on his way a man in Roman toga. The air was cold, and the wind blew the sheet around the blue knees of its wearer, who nevertheless advanced to do or die. The visitor, wondering what great Roman this might be, asked the native, "Sir, are you Appius Claudius?" "No," replied the wearer of the toga, "I'm un-'appy as anythink!"

Nevertheless, a large part of the human race enjoys dressing up in strange attire, and looking at one's self in the mirror of admiring spectators.

Oxford, Mass., was two hundred years old this summer, and celebrated its second centennial with a pageant under direction of Miss Emily Tudor Strang.

The scenes of the pageant began with a prologue, the years 1674-1704, and covering the early history of Oxford. The first scene was John Eliot's visit to Manchaug, the Indian name of Oxford. The second scene was the coming of the Huguenots, the first white settlers. Then followed the presentation of land, and the Johnson Massacre and the departure of the Huguenots, fleeing before the savages.

The first episode, 1713-17, showed the life of the English in Oxford, in the following scenes:

SCENE I. The Coming of the English.
SCENE II. Life in the Colony.
SCENE III. Troublesome Times.

The second episode covered the period of the Revolution, 1775, and the years that followed to 1800:

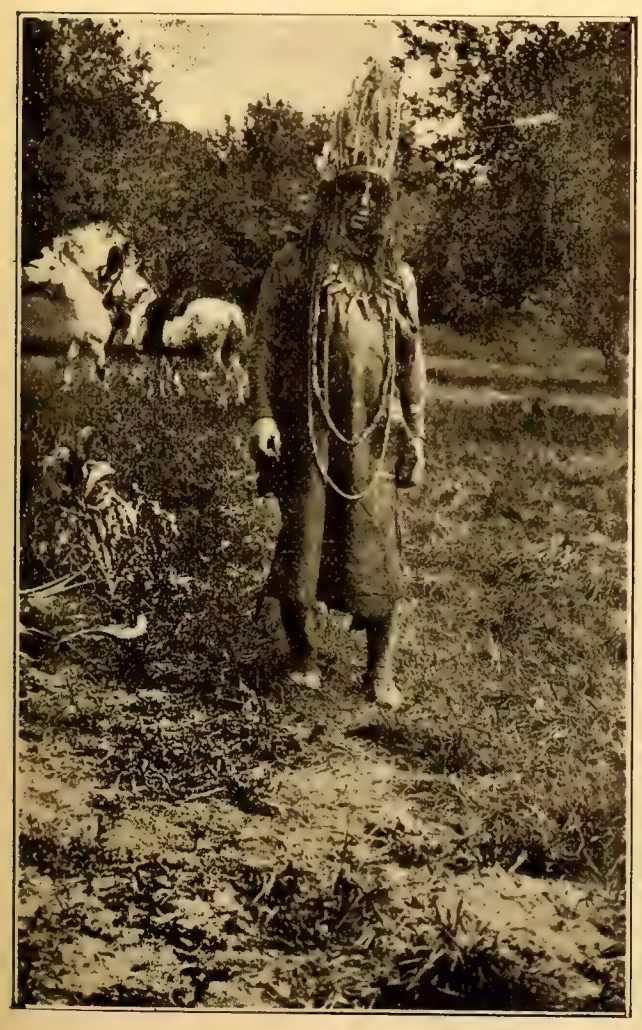
SCENE I. Minute Men.
SCENE II. Funeral Honors for Washington.
SCENE III. The visit of Maj. Gen. Alexander Hamilton.

The third episode began at 1690 and illustrated the rise of industries.

The fourth episode dealt with the War of the Rebellion, 1861-1865:

SCENE I. The Departure of the "DeWitt Guards."
SCENE II. "The Angel of the Battle Field."
Epilogue. Oxford, Past, Present and Future.

The funeral of Clara Barton, which occurred in Oxford only a few months ago was still fresh in the minds of the people, and her spirit brooded over the Pageant and her presence in the last episode formed the culminating feature. On the Sunday of the Pageant a memorial window to her memory was unveiled in the Congregational Church.



The Noble Red Man.

The Reconnoitre.

The Fight.

Salem had a delicate problem last year in its pageant, for there still live in and about Salem, descendants both of the witches and those who hanged them, and they have fought over the historic details of the matter so many generations that it is not a good thing to stir up that quesion. But Allegory helped out, and it is always safe to take a fling at Cotton Mather; so they managed it.

The Flight of the Dame-School.

This is the rather gingerly way in which Salem handled the witchcraft incident so as not to hurt anybody's feelings regarding his ancestors. I quote from the official program:

EPISODE V.

"SALEM DELUDED BY WITCHCRAFT. WITCHCRAFT UNVEILED AND DRIVEN OUT.

"In the brief space allotted to this Episode, the general subject of Witchcraft can be treated only in the most superficial way.

"Two common errors of opinion, today, should be corrected here:

"1. No witch was ever burned in Salem.

"2. Salem is not peculiarly responsible for trials or executions for Witchcraft. These were in strict accordance with the laws of England, which extended at that time to Massachusetts as a dependent province.

"Salem Village was the scene of a great moral conflict between the powers of Darkness and Light, in which the latter won a glorious triumph.

"For obvious reasons it has been deemed wise to withhold the names of the historic characters represented: but in The Fearless One, in the Magistrates, Clergy, Defenders, and even in the children who appear as petitioners for mercy to the Accused, the old Salem families will figure.

"SYNOPSIS—Symbolism, Entrance of Fear, Superstition, Witchcraft and Cruelty.

"Salem bewitched. Townspeople enter in groups with great fear. Enter judges followed by the accusers. Salem signs warrants. Enter The Fearless One and his family. Enter defenders followed by petitioners. Judges refuse to grant petitions.

"Enter procession: Ministers of the First Church and Salem Village—Judges of the Court—the Accused with the Jailors—the Accusers—the Defenders—the Petitioners.

"The procession passes Salem and winds up Gallows Hill.

"Entrance of Justice, Light, and Peace.

"Witchcraft unveiled and driven out.

"Salem orders the release of prisoners.

"Hymn of Praise."

It was difficult, too, for Salem to see very much honor paid to Hawthorne, who is popular there only to the extent to which his stories help to sell souvenirs of one of the contending houses of seven gables. And indeed Hawthorne was not quite a model, and half the people in Salem can prove it to you. But they managed that by giving him a silent part, and keeping the spotlight somewhere else while he was on the stage.

It need not be supposed that only those towns that are very old can afford the luxury of the historical pageant. Many a town of fifty years has events of thrilling interest which may suitably be commemorated. The mere lapse of time is only one element, and not the chief one, in the successful pageant. Almost every town in America begins with the Indians, and then come the first settlers, and the railroad boom, in one or the other order, and the years of struggle and of failing crops, and the years that follow with their varied experiences. The founding of the first church; the beginnings of the school; the incidents in the growth of the community in numbers and in conscious power, afford material in almost any town for such a celebration. What could not Galesburg, Illinois, do with its prophetic beginning, and its college carted overland in a prairie schooner, and its Lincoln-Douglas debate? And Princeton, Illinois, which brought a fully organized church before the Black-Hawk war? Or Shabbona, Illinois, in its wealth of legend surrounding the good old chief whom some men living still remember? Or Springfield, Illinois, with its Lincoln Associations? Or Grinnell, Iowa, or Lincoln, Nebraska, or Portland, Oregon? And for that matter, why should any town feel compelled to begin with strictly local incidents? Sedalia, Missouri, has as good a right as Plymouth, Massachusetts, to date the beginning of its history in 1620, and to have as its opening episode the sailing of the Speedwell, or the landing of the Mayflower.

Landing of the Savages.

I had been in several towns where pageants had been given and it occurred to me to gather some information as to the effect of these performances upon the people. Moreover, I had recently been connected with The World in Chicago, with its great Pageant of Darkness and Light, and this stimulated me the more to an interest in the matter. These opinions, therefore, I picked up in a number of places in which scenes in local history had been celebrated, some of them under Miss Eager's direction, some of them under other management.

"It did us a world of good," said one friend whom I asked. "It brought out unsuspected talent. It compelled recognition of some people whom we had hardly thought of recognizing socially or otherwise. It gave us a new sense of social solidarity. Our little village, small and broken into all manner of neighborhood cliques, came together to do a great thing in the name of the whole town. It required the assistance of everybody, and everybody, nearly, took hold and helped. It was good for us. Nothing else could have given us the same sense of unity."

"I am working with it very heartily," said another friend, a minister, "because I believe it is a good thing, and that by working with it I can exercise a degree of supervision over the young people, and do good in that way."

The Old Stage Coach.

The Old Ox Cart.

The Redeemed Captives' Return Through the Wilderness.

"It is not an unmixed blessing," said a friend in another place, not Deerfield. "The aim was too thoroughly commercial. The man in charge was a good manager, but he did very superficial work in setting forth the really notable history of our town. It was rather as a spectacle, a rival of the moving picture show, that its success should be judged."

I talked with a lady who had produced a pageant in another New England town. She had lived there for several summers, and her husband had died there. She undertook to do a great thing for the village he and she had grown to love. Among other interesting things, she told me how gradual had been the work of unifying the people and making them see how great an enterprise it was. She said that in the preparation of the grounds it became necessary to ask the men to work on Sunday, which some of them objected to doing, but she made them see that this was really a great and sacred thing, and they worked. A few weeks later it became necessary to have the dress rehearsal, and Sunday was the only day for it, and there was objection, but at length she made the village people see that this was an eminently religious use of the day.

On the Way to the Meeting House to Give Thanks for the Return.

I did not think so. Had I been minister of one of the little churches in that village, I should have been deeply pained that a woman of talent and of really earnest purpose should have deemed it necessary to break down the all too few safeguards of the Lord's Day in either of those two ways. People from the outside world who spend their summers in rural communities are as a rule none too careful in the matter of preserving intact all righteous institutions and customs as they are found to exist. It was saddening to me to hear this good woman, to whom that historical pageant had become a really religious festival, telling in good faith of her success in showing the country people that it was right for them to break the Sabbath in preparation for it.

In one of the places in which a pageant was held, the only building near the grounds and available for the purpose of dressing rooms was a large barn. The two ends were properly screened apart, and yet the rapid changes necessitated by the large number of parts and the small number of actors encouraged a too free commingling of young people assisting each other in the completion of their toilettes, and occasioned some anxiety. It is easy to see that some things that one would hardly be likely to think of in advance ought to be thought of, and carefully guarded by responsible people. Dressing rooms ought to be sufficiently separated so that there shall be no brushing of the bloom from modesty. And there ought to be matrons in charge whose social standing would give them unquestioned authority in delicate matters of propriety.

Where the historical pageant has been thoughtfully planned, and the history has been written by competent authority, and the production has been properly supervised, the results have justified the experiment. Not always does the financial return equal the expenditure. But the whole community is wakened to a sense of the value which it has in its history. A new sense of civic pride is awakened. Young people learn, as young people ought to learn, such reasons as exist for pride in their own town. Too many towns think meanly of themselves. A citizen ought to rejoice, like Paul, in the thought that his is no mean city. Historical celebrations have sometimes resulted, and may be made to result, in awakening in the mind of the present generation a sense of responsibility for the maintainance of the ideals of the past. If John Doe founded the town of Doeville, and laid its foundations in righteousness, and John Doe of the present generation is an easy going, pleasure loving man, rich on the unearned increment of his ancestors' toil, it may do him good to ask how to impersonate the original John Doe; and appear as the bearer of his name.

As to the Second Coming

A Chapter from the Experience of Another Former Believer in Our Lord's Immediate Appearing.

BY ELLIS B. BARNES.

SO interested am I in the interpretations by Dr. Ainslie and Dr. Sharpe of the doctrine of the second advent, that I cannot refrain from adding another chapter to theirs. For several years I was a firm believer in the literal coming of Christ in the clouds with glory. I was nurtured in that faith through experiences with Adventists, Plymouth Brethren and others, in my boyhood days, imbibing from their conversations the idea that the first coming was superfluous if the second be not a fact. "He shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go," seemed to me to be the end of controversy on the matter of a literal descent from heaven.

NORTHFIELD AND KESWICK SCHOOLS.

Later I became familiar with the Northfield and Keswick school of theology, and read the works again and again of one of the greatest exponents of the doctrine. I can say without exaggeration that I was thoroughly saturated with the idea. I visited the church of a noted advocate of the doctrine in Boston, a few years after he had died, and found that so great was his influence in the congregation that no man could be found on either side of the Atlantic with sufficient strength to bend his bow. All the activities of that great church radiated from the "blessed hope" as a center. All doctrines were anchored to that. If I ever felt the fascination of the hero worshipper it was when I sat in the great preacher's chair, stood in his pulpit, saw in imagination the immense crowds that thronged the sanctuary to hear him; when I handled some books in the remnant of his library, looked down from his study windows upon the great city as he did every day, stood beneath a marble tablet on which were inscribed the names of missionaries that had gone to many lands from that congregation, and tried to enter into their spirit, and finally when I had looked with devotion upon the painting of the great preacher himself, I concluded that the "blessed hope" as understood by him was really the hope of the race.

MISSIONS AND THE ADVENT.

I well recall the impressions made upon me by a deacon in that congregation who told me something of the church's trials and the pastor's struggles to realize the worth of such a doctrine and to put it into practice. For it was put into practice, if ever a doctrine was. Missionary enthusiasm was kindled by emphasizing the text that to preach the gospel for a witness to all the nations was a sure precursor of the second coming. Missions were conducted among the foreigners of the city with wonderful success; a school to train lay workers was maintained with gratifying results for many years. Faith healing was more than a pious possibility. As for records, few churches in this country ever made a greater. I learned, however, that the life of the church was austere, that the young people naturally drifted to a neighboring church, that only old people and the middle aged were to be found in the congregation of the zealous and godly preacher. The deacon wondered what the fate of the church would have been had not the worthy pastor died at a comparatively early age. It is self-evident that a church without young people cannot have a very long career.

LIFE TINGED WITH MELANCHOLY.

I read this remarkable preacher's biography. I found that the great story was tinged with melancholy, but I set that down as natural, as I did the drifting of the young people away from the congregation. I said to myself the preacher's meat is too strong for the babes; the melancholy is that of a man weighed down with the burden of the world's woes. What seemed to be the defects of the system were to me but additional proof of its worth. Not a gleam of sunshine is to be found throughout the entire volume when it deals with theology or church life. It is taken for granted that the world is doomed, that Christians must have no fellowship with it, even in pleasures which thousands of the noblest men and women believe to be innocent, that the age is decidedly worse than any former age, and that the only hopeful solution of the problem is the speedy advent of the Redeemer. All of which I most steadfastly believed.

UNEXPECTED CHANGE.

My views, however, were destined to change in an unexpected manner. I found myself becoming gloomy over the state of the world. I had drunk in the spirit of my teachers. I was reaching the point where the virtues of scores of good people who did not share my views were but splendid vices, and the vices of those who shared my views were becoming noble virtues. Wars and rumors of war were good omens to me because they were fulfilling the Scripture; disasters, no matter how awful, were viewed merely as hastening the world to its final doom. In a word, my outlook on life, my theology, my thinking, were all swathed in gloom.

When the world was smiling I saw cause for tears; when it wept, I saw occasion for satisfaction, if not for smiles. But I clung to my doctrine as a drowning man to a comrade who had risked all to save him. I was beginning to find new meanings in the text "Jesus wept." Why shouldn't he, not only at the grave, but in a world that was to be the graveyard of a race? I saw the crowded street cars and railway trains on Sunday, and the empty seats in the sanctuary; I saw the parks filled with the children of Christian people, and the Sunday school deserted until the winds of autumn drove them in. I knew to what Scriptures to turn to find compensation even for such conditions.

PHILIPPS BROOKS' APOTHEGIN.

Somewhere in that period, I read a sentence from Phillips Brooks that upset my pre-millennial theories completely, not at once, but by degrees. Here it is in substance: "We should remember that the world is God's with the devil trying to break in, and not the devil's with God trying to break in." It was the antithesis that held me at first rather than the thought. I didn't dream that my view of the second coming had collided with a statement that was certain to revolutionize my thinking in many ways. I began to lose interest in second advent literature, and naturally all that I ever knew of it is to-day as dim in my mind as a bank of cloud hanging over a range of hills, growing more indistinct with the years as horizons do with the speed of the ships.

In time I came to believe that if the earth was the Lord's he would be the victor in the struggle, for many of the millennarian doctrines say in effect that the devil may triumph now, but he won't after a while. It must be evident that if God cannot maintain his supremacy temporarily, he cannot maintain it permanently.

CHURCH AND KINGDOM.

Besides, I was led into the belief that the kingdom and the Church are by no means identical. I am ready to concede that if one takes the view that the progress of the kingdom is to be measured by the activities of the Church alone, he may well grow discouraged, and hope only for the events of some remote future to bring about an adjustment in favor of the Church.

But the glory of Christianity to me today is not in the numbers alone who hear its doctrines taught from the pulpit, though that number is not inconsiderable, but in the manner in which those doctrines have leavened society. I wish we could have in statistical form the work which the reforming and high grade magazines alone have done for Christianity, while not professing to have done anything for it in the prospectus. And other agencies are just as active. though not allied with the churches. It must be ever true that the progress of the world is upward. We wish that all the glory might be given to the churches; still the church must recognize works which she would praise had they come from her activities, even though they bear not the name of a single church. "He that is not against us is for us."

WORLD GROWING BETTER

If one would know whether the world is growing better or worse, let him contrast this age with any former age. There will be no doubt as to his verdict in favor of our age. It is this conviction in the final triumph of the good that makes me believe that the cataclysms of the millennarian will not be necessary.

If one should ask me how I interpret

Of Human Interest

Senator Cockrell's Apples.

Former Senator Cockrell, of Missouri, always ate two apples for luncheon. He was fond of the luscious fruit and so particular about the variety that he kept a quantity of apples in his office in anticipation of the noon hour. Senator Cockrell had a way of sending a page to his office with a note calling for the homely repast. Most of the boys knew of the custom, but one day he caught a new boy. After the lad had delivered the envelope to the Senator's secretary—of course not knowing the contents—he started to go, but was called back by the secretary and presented with two beautiful red apples. A half hour or so later Senator Cockrell went complainingly to the Assistant Sergeant-at-Arms in charge of the pages. The page who had been sent with the message was hastily summoned.

"Where are my apples?" Senator Cockrell inquired.

"Your apples," the frightened boy replied. "Do you mean the apples your secretary gave to me? Why, Senator, I thought they were for me. I ate them."

Beecher's Purpose in Preaching.

The purpose of his preaching Beecher thus sets forth himself: "When I am gone, do not let it be forgotten that my one aim was the winning of the souls of men for Jesus Christ; that I have restated old doctrines in new language for this purpose—to make them acceptable to living men—and not out of desire for destruction nor innovation. My business has always been, and always will be, not to make theology, but to save men by bringing them to Christ."

Murdock on the Tariff.

Representative Murdock was talking in Wichita about the tariff.

"In handling the tariff," he said, "we must take every precaution. We must be as careful, and, at the same time, as ingenious as the Kansas farmer.

"A farmer in the cyclone district was building a superb stone wall. He was building this wall stanch and solid—five feet across the base and four feet high.

"A stranger stopped his horse and said to the farmer:

" 'You're taking lots of trouble with that wall.'

" 'You bet,' the farmer answered, 'I'm putting her here to stay.'

" 'What's the good of that?' sneered the stranger. 'A cyclone'll come along, and she'll blow over just the same.'

" 'Well, let her,' said the farmer. 'She'll be a foot higher if she does.' "

Postmaster General Burleson's Story.

A canny Scot, says Collier's, was listening to former Secretary Wilson delivering one of his lectures on what the microbes had done.

The secretary of Agriculture said: "We have microbes in the cabbage and microbes in the wheat and microbes in everything that grows."

The old Scotchman paid strict attention to the lecture.

When he left the hall one of his Scotch friends asked him how he liked the lecture.

"I doan't see how it ees thot the Secretary of Agriculture should put so much stress on what the McCrobes done. They've done no more than the McGregors or the McPhersons, and there lives no such clan as the Campbells anyway."

Secretary of War Garrison Tells This.

During the summer of 1896 I went fishing with a party of friends in Pennsylvania, and upon being called back on business I arranged to meet the through train at a rather inconsiderable station. The train stopped and the Pullman conductor got off. I was garbed in camping clothes, with campaign hat of black hue, and I asked the conductor whether he could give me two seats in the Pullman. He replied that he would very much like to do so.

I said to him: "I didn't ask you that; I asked whether you could."

He remarked: "You are a lawyer."

I asked him: "How do you know I am a lawyer?"

And he replied: "Because you look like one."

I said: "What else do I look like?"

And he replied: "You look like a cross between Bryan and McKinley."

I told this story the other day to Secretary Bryan, and I am not able as yet to determine from his expression whether he felt complimented or insulted.

Edison on American Flying.

America, thanks to the immortal Wright brothers, gave flying to the world; but France has now forged ahead of America in flying, the reason being that American capital and American energy will only busy themselves with things that pay.

Apropos of America's present sorry place in the world of flying and its cause, Thomas A. Edison uttered in New York the following epigram:

"We don't fly well here because we have too many practical men. Practical men, you know, laugh at the poor pioneers of today while they grow rich from carrying on the work of the poor pioneers of yesterday."

Turning the Tables on Roosevelt.

As a rapid fire talker, a machine gun of wit, and a cannonade of denunciation Col. Theodore Roosevelt is hard to beat. But there was one time when he met his match, and it was in the state of Indiana, where every man, woman and child becomes expert in politics before learning how to walk, and dies expressing regret at not being able to live until the next election.

The colonel was rushing along in the last presidential campaign with a fine demonstration that Woodrow Wilson was totally unfit for the white house.

"I don't like you!" a man on the outskirts of the crowd interrupted, rising to his feet and shaking his fist.

"You're a democrat, I suppose," said the colonel.

The man agreed that he was a democrat, and the speaker asked him why.

"Because," replied the disturbing element, "my great-grandfather, my grandfather and my father were democrats."

"My dear friend," said the colonel, with excellent sarcasm, "if your great-grandfather and your grandfather and your father had each been a fool, what would you be?"

"Sir," said the interrupter, "a bull mooser."

Charles F. Murphy Tells Story.

A good politician, a successful politician," said Charles F. Murphy at a Tammany luncheon in New York, "has the persistency of poor Joe Blackburn.

"When Joe Blackburn was a rising young man, he chanced to attend an execution in Louisville.

"The scene was a solemn one. The sheriff, before he adjusted the noose, asked the condemned man if he had anything to say.

" 'No,' said the poor fellow, clearing his throat. 'No, I don't believe there's any remarks that—'

"But here Joe Blackburn shouted cheerily and eagerly from the crowd of spectators:

" 'Say, Jake, if you ain't got anything special to say, I wish you'd give me about fifteen minutes of your time, old man, just to let me tell these good friends gathered here that I'm a candidate for their suffrages, and to lay before them some reasons why——'

" 'Wait!' said the condemned man 'Wait! Is that Joe Blackburn's voice I hear?'

" 'Yes. Sure,' chorused the crowd.

" 'I thought so. Well, he can have my time. He can have all of it. But go ahead and hang me first, and let Joe Blackburn talk afterward.' "

From Near and Far

Every state in the union will be asked by Gov. Major of Missouri to join in the proclamation of two "road days" in 1914, according to a statement issued by the governor. The governor's hope to make the movement instituted by Missouri national is based upon reports to him showing the success of Missouri "road days" to be beyond all expectations. Net results of the two "good road days" show that at least 250,000 men worked during the two days.

At the Illinois state penitentiary in Joliet the officials have adopted the honor system for convicts, which so far has found favor only in a few states. By means of this system forty prisoners have temporarily been turned into free outdoor laborers. The officers of the state prison have no other guarantee than the word of honor of these convicts that they will not run away.

Kansas City is to have a men's equal suffrage society—the first separate organization of this kind in the state. Mrs. H. B. Leavens, president of the State Woman's Suffrage Association of Missouri, in speaking of the new society said: We already have the names of a dozen of the best business men of Kansas City, who have promised to help us in this as soon as we call on them."

According to labor leaders, the last was the most enjoyable labor day in the history of union labor in Chicago. They said the old custom of having parades and speeches would never be revived. In recent years the union men of Chicago held official picnics, but it was decided by the Chicago Federation of Labor to abandon the plan.

The Chicago chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution took in the memorial ceremony on Sept. 6 on the summit of Starved Rock in Illinois State park. The organizations honored the heroes of Illinois who fought in the civil war.

On Sept. 1 the United States government offered 1,345,000 acres of land to settlers in the Fort Peck Indian reservation, Montana.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

PROPHETS

THE prophets of the Old Testament and the moral leadership of today, whether in the ministry or without it, have essentially the same task. It is theirs to interpret the universe in terms of God. To translate current events and relate them to the whole sweep of the divine movement of human history is a task given not only to an Amos or an Isaiah but to scores and hundreds of obscurer men—in the twentieth century after as well as in the eighth century before Christ—who perform for a smaller circle of people what has been done by the greater men for the multitudes. Many a minister toiling away in an obscure corner, except for an occasional mention in a local or denominational paper absolutely unknown, is buoyed up by reminding himself every now and then of the essential greatness of the prophet's work. Of that noble company of men, who have lifted up truth's torch in every age making little circles of light wavering against the surrounding pall of ignorance and superstition, he is a successor. What matters it, then, if at times his work leads him up against an impassable wall? What matters it if now the clouds shut in on all sides and not even a single gleam relieves the darkness? What matters it if only the few understand, and the crowd laughs to scorn the message as impractical and visionary while it rushes on heedless of God, and greedy for gold? The prophet of today is not alone. Bearing witness with him still is the spirit of God. May he give to his messenger a living message.

BEN LINDSAY

IN Denver the burning question appears always to be Ben Lindsay. There may be, probably are, other burning questions, but some of them subside or go up in smoke, while this question for several years has raged almost uninterruptedly.

We do not know the merits of the particular issues involved, and on which men and women range themselves in hostile ranks. We doubt if Judge Lindsay is either so good as his devoted worshipers believe or so bad as his worst detractors declare. We certainly should be most unwilling to believe anything very bad about him, and if half that he tells in his book is true, he has won the ill-will of men so bad that good people ought to support him.

But we do believe that Judge Lindsay has proved himself something less than a really great man. He did a great work in his juvenile court, and taught other judges how, but his speeches concerning that work showed his own marked limitations. His stories were not always convincing, and his own attitude, which at times was nothing less than flippant, showed far less than a statesman's grasp of the very difficult question which he had set out to answer. He seldom showed a serious attempt to solve the problem of juvenile delinquency, but rather appeared to be in search of good stories that would illustrate a platform lecture. These stories may all have been true; if so, they did not illustrate on his part a consistent theory and a steady and well-controlled method. He is not a large man physically, and he does not bulk large in the hope of a real solution of the problem of juvenile lawlessness. Perhaps he will yet learn better. Perhaps the fact that his enemies can no longer be said to be wholly from among the bad element of the city will teach him what he greatly needs to learn.

The criminal tendencies of American youth are not to be regarded as material for a funny column. They must be dealt with by men who do something more than joke about them.

But Lindsay has done something, and that has been very important, in dealing with boys and girls in an intimate and personal fashion, without the archaic and stupid forms of procedure which in many cases have made the courts instruments of injustice. Courts now tend to deal with boys and girls in far more human fashion than twenty years ago. Part of this much needed reform, the country over, is to be credited to Ben Lindsay.

CONQUERED CHAMPIONS

BUFFALO BILL has gone bankrupt. Cole Younger has been converted. Thus vanish simultaneously two of the heroes of the paper-backed, blood-and-thunder book of the last generation.

We are sorry for Buffalo Bill. He has had a hard time with his affairs both financial and matrimonial, but he had good qualities, and he filled the eye of the popular imagination with the vision of the frontier hero. He and a group of men who had shared his experience emerged from the plains into civilization and brought back with them very interesting and vivid pictures of life on the plains. Their long hair, buckskin breeches and wide sombreroes made most picturesque trappings, and they could ride and they could shoot. Buffalo Bill, while not a fancy shot, was a good all-round marksman, and his horseback shooting, when he was in his prime, was evidence of a clear eye and steady nerve. His Indians were real Indians; his horses were indubitable horses; and his show was a great show of its kind.

Cole Younger was a legacy of the Civil War. One of the most desperate of Quantrel's men, he, with his brothers, conducted notable border forays, and after the war joined with the equally desperate James brothers in some of the most dramatic robberies in American history. Violent deaths and long term imprisonments broke up the gang, and Cole Younger now is an old man. Led by a little child, he walked down the aisle in a revival meeting and confessed his faith in Christ. It happened on the fifty-fifth anniversary of Quantrel's raid, the first conspicuous event in his lawless life. It must have been a pathetic sight. We would have journeyed far to have witnessed it. What we heard about Cole Younger in days agone was something to keep a boy awake at night. Not even the whirring war-whoop of Buffalo Bill's sure-enough Indians was quite so terrible as the fearful fame of Cole Younger and of Frank and Jesse James.

They have all gone. The bullet and the noose have been busy among them; "drink and the devil" have had their share, and Time himself has done something. Time is the one absolutely invincible conqueror of all desperate men.

We are glad Cole Younger is converted. It was high time. And we will not doubt the reality of his confession both of faith and of sin. God grant him real penitence, and the pardon of one whose sins have been scarlet.

Time is not the only conqueror. The Gospel of Christ can subdue even so old and bloody a man as Cole Younger. Long did he defy the hangman, but what the law could not do, God sending his Son has done. Cole Younger, the desperado, has confessed Jesus Christ.

There is pathetic joy in the presence of the angels.

THE HOPELESSLY GOOD

THERE are two kinds of hopeless people in the world.

To begin with, there are the hopelessly bad. There seem to be a good many of them. Fortunately, we discover now and then that some of those whom we had believed hopeless were not really so. God appears to have hope for a great many people whom the world counts hopeless, and every now and then some of the hopelessly bad justify God's hope for them, and so shame the meager faith of those who thought them hopeless.

Then, there are the hopelessly good. These are less well defined and not always easily recognized, but they exist and have to be reckoned with.

Now, as between the two, the hopelessly bad is the less desirable neighbor. One must guard with some care his orchards and his hen roosts from the hopelessly bad, but if it should come to the matter of living not next door but in the very same house with him, one may not be too sure that he would prefer to live with the hopelessly good.

There is a goodness that gets in its own way and stops and refuses to budge. There is a goodness that is so infernally well-satisfied with itself that its near approach to heaven has in it more than the "good intentions" which are said to "pave the way to Hell." The good is the enemy of the best. For the sinner who knows he is a sinner there is always hope, but for the sinner who has begun to be good and has set wilful limitations upon his own progress in goodness, the word "hopeless" is very little too strong.

Not only so, but there is a goodness whose self-satisfaction is a close approach to hypocrisy. We may not wholly sympathize with the scorn of Robert Burns in his address to the "Unco Gude." Burns was far enough from being good, so that we have some right to suspect him of prejudice in the matter, yet those who were so good themselves, so pious and so holy they had naught to do but see and tell their neighbors' faults and follies were a stumbling block in his day and have been so in other generations.

Two men went up to the Temple to pray and one seemed hopelessly bad, but he prayed, "God be merciful to me a sinner," and went down to his house justified; but the other man who fasted and paid tithes and did many excellent things went back to his house condemned and never suspected it. He was hopelessly good.

PATENT MEDICINES

WE believe in medicine. The human body, whatever else it is, is a laboratory. An acid and an alkali will neutralize each other as surely in the human stomach as in a laboratory jar. There are times when disease can be checked and health promoted by a right use of medicine. We do not condemn all patent medicines. Some patent medicines are pure in their composition and are capable of good use. We know of some such remedies which have grown in reputation through their merit and deserve the patronage which they have secured.

But we believe most people who take medicine at all take too much, and that the constant habit of dosing is bad for health and morals. Further, we believe that the makers of some medicines make or imply promises to cure diseases which they cannot cure.

The Christian Century needs every dollar it can get from legitimate advertising, but it does not want any money derived from advertising articles which are harmful or deceptive.

These in general are the kinds of remedies for which we will not sell advertising space:

(1) Remedies whose analysis shows a percentage of alcohol, opium, cocaine, or other stimulant or sedative, such or in such quantities that there could be any probable temptation to use the medicine for the sake of the stimulant, or a harmful habit be engendered or encouraged through its use as prescribed.

(2) Remedies which seem to us to promise cures which they probably cannot perform. Under this head we have refused cancer cures, rupture cures, consumption cures, and so-called cures which are intended to be used in cases that ought to be treated by fresh air, sanitation, or surgery.

(3) All medical advertisements with illustrations either personal or anatomical.

(4) All advertisements that seem to us likely to awaken false hopes, or to return no equivalent for the money expended.

(5) All advertisements which describe disgusting or unpleasant symptoms, or which in any way are unpleasantly suggestive, or which contain anything which a mother could not with propriety explain in its full meaning to a child.

We do not claim to be omniscient in matters of this kind, and we may not yet have arrived at perfection in this particular, but this is where we stand at present. We may go farther forward, but we shall not go back. At whatever financial loss we shall maintain the ground we have taken.

A CHRISTIAN UNION PASTOR.

ONE of the interesting episodes of the Illinois State Convention held last week at Jacksonville was the presence and participation of Rev. Edgar LeRoy Dakin, of Memorial Church of Christ of this city. Mr. Dakin is a Baptist minister, who has held important pastorates among his own people. Two years ago he was called to the ministry of Memorial Church as the colleague of Dr. Willett. A year ago, when the latter left for the Orient, Mr. Dakin became sole pastor of the church. Recognizing the dual relationship of the church, as composed of Baptists and Disciples, he has identified himself in the fullest manner with the work of the Disciples in Chicago, has served on important committees, and is at present vice-president of the Disciples' Ministerial Union. It was in this spirit of sincere and thoroughgoing identification with the interests of the Disciples in the city and state that he attended the state convention. When introduced to the gathering, he took occasion to voice his conviction that Disciples and Baptists must see the wisdom and necessity of closer fellowship and ultimate union, and his hope that the example of Memorial Church covering now a period of five years, and of other unions of the two bodies in local churches, might prove exemplary for a much larger number of efforts in the same direction. The presence of Mr. Dakin at the convention was both satisfactory and significant.

MISSIONARY COMMISSIONS.

THE missionary experience and success of the Disciples has reached a point at which there should begin a new feature in the effort to bind in close unity the missionaries and the churches. We have a notable volume of literature coming from the field in the form of reports from the Board and from individual representatives in the non-Christian lands. On rare occasions a secretary has visited the mission stations. The value of such secretarial visitation is very great, and such visits should be increased in number.

The return of the missionaries on furlough is a blessing to the churches, and greatly augments the sense of awareness on the part of interested Christians. And now and then some independent Disciple goes out to the mission fields and brings back to a limited group of friends some informing reports regarding the work.

But the time has come when something more systematic should be undertaken.

Every year or two a commission should be sent out to visit, not the mission fields as a whole, but some definite part of the missionary territory of the Disciples. We are not quite ready as yet to pay the expenses of such commissions out of the funds of the Society, nor is such an outlay of missionary money necessary. There are many men of experience, wisdom and deep missionary interest among us who can afford to take such a journey, and should be commissioned by the Society or the brotherhood to do so.

Such a commission should consist of three men, two ministers and a layman. They should visit some one field, and remain not less than three months, long enough to study the situation with care, and to render such assistance to the missionaries and native churches as might seem of value, in the form of addresses, institutes and evangelistic meetings of the type suited to the locality. The results of such a visit, by carefully selected men, would be beyond estimate. On their return to America they could speak with authority upon the theme of missions and the problems of the special field.

Nor is the cost of such a visitation too high. There are some ministers among us who can afford it, and would be honored by such a commission. Others there are who should be sent by their churches or friends as a fitting mark of faithful service. Any intelligent church might well covet the privilege of yielding its minister for a time to such a notable service, and be glad to provide him with the means to make the journey.

In successive years, or more probably periods of two years, we should like to see such commissions go to Japan, China and the Philippines, India, Africa, and the missions we have in Europe. Similar commissions would naturally go also to Mexico and the Islands. We are not forgetting that women should have a place in such work, both because of the service of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in most of these lands, and because of the value of women's judgment regarding many of the problems that arise on the field. Is it too much to hope that steps may be taken soon to inaugurate the selection and dispatch of such commissions?

Consolation

By George Horton

There's another land and better,
  We are told,
Where the slave shakes off his fetter,
And where worth is never debtor
  Unto gold.

Thither often we are turning
  Weary eyes,
And our heavy hearts are yearning,
Night and day are throbbing, burning,
  For its skies.

There that foolish superstition,
  Pride of birth,
Finds its sudden demolition,
And our being's final mission
  Is of worth.

There the insolence of power
  Falls away,
And the proudest soul must cower,
For the spirit takes no power
  From the clay.

Common lives have wondrous splendor
  In that light,
For the spirit meek and tender
Puts to shame the king's defender
  Shorn of might.

Natures touched with fires serapic
  Shed their care,
And no peace-girt islands Sapphic
Far from fretful toil and traffic,
  Dream and dare.

Laws through years of wrong descended
  There are changed;
Customs with injustice blended,
Creeds for centuries defended,
  Rearranged.

Heaven has solace without measure—
  You and I
Should not dream of earthly pleasure,
But should think about our treasure
  In the sky.

Spring at the Poorhouse

A Little Story by a New Author

By William La Favor

The editors ask for this bit of a story a more than ordinary attentive reading. The name of its author now appears in print for the first time. We have other and longer stories by him, and they will appear in later issues. The scene is the same—the poorhouse. It is not a promising field for romance, is it? Certainly it is a field neglected by authors seeking local color for their stories. Like a violet in a spot hidden and unpromising, this little blossom of a story rears its modest head. Is there not something in it that touches the heart? How do you suppose the author knows so well the background of this bit of romance? This story is a slight sketch. The others have more of plot and narrative. But no one who reads this little tale can doubt that the author knows whereof he writes. In the article which follows, a distinguished woman tells the story of his life.

Spring comes to the Poorhouse. There is no reason why she should. No one pays her a fee. No glad hearts tryst her here, and yet, in our own way, we manage to keep faith with her.

The homely smell of the good brown earth in the plowed fields; the silver sheen of the April shower; the greening of the patient grass; the furtive call of leaf-hidden birds; the benison of the warm breeze; the broad splashes of yellow where dandelions, in the riotous gladness of neglect, proclaim the right to life and liberty—these all are witnesses to the generous heart of spring, even on the Poorhouse Farm.

The goodly fellowship of songbirds choir here, too, their morning hymn. Our ragged old lilac bush swings out a pale lavender plume or two laden with oriental richness of perfume.

Across the fields, blue pennons of smoke from sociable bonfires trail across to us. The farmers are burning up last year's rubbish. The reek comes to us on the breeze and our eyes smart with the tang.

Crippled Charlie leans up along the back steps, resting on his elbows. His crutch and cane lie alongside his twisted, misshapen limb. From his lean arms his flabby hands hang dejectedly. His bulging eyes and wry mouth and drooping head would discourage any goddess less resolute than Spring.

Annie Evans comes to hang out the wash. No one could think her pretty, and yet not one could resist the appeal of her plaintive voice and wistful eyes. Sometimes her face writens, and Annie falls to the floor. Anyone near enough twists a knot of her gingham apron and presses it between her teeth, and they leave her to "come to."

To-day the spring wind ruffles the pale, brown hair across her forehead and tints the white cheeks with faint rosy bloom.

Crippled Charlie catches her eye, and shifting his weight onto one elbow he waves his free hand to Annie and, crimsoning with pleasure, she waves back to him. Her thin lips part in a smile.

"Flirting with the girls, this morning, are you Charlie?"

The brusque voice of the county doctor accuses.

"It's all right, Doctor. We are engaged."

"What's that? We don't allow marriage here."

The doctor really supposes he has found something to report.

"I didn't say nothin' about merridge. Annie's the girl I would have merried if I—if she—if we was like other folks. I know the rules of the poorhouse, and the laws of the township, and I hain't no notion of gettin' merried, and no more has Annie. But I reckon I kin look at her, can't I, and not break no law? An' if I can't, I'll look anyhow! There ain't no law again' lovin', nohow, is there? An' all the laws of the whole endurin' township can't keep our one drop o' gladness from us!"

Oh, yes, Spring comes, even to the Poorhouse.

It has no real business to come there, but it comes.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I WAS led farther afield last week than I intended to go in my reflections on the second advent of our Lord. The book I had in my hand when the articles by Dr. Sharpe and Dr. Ainslie arrived was really the theme I started out upon. But one's thoughts at the end of the day have a way of their own, and do not submit easily to the restraints of their author's will, much less to the limitations of an ever so indulgent editor's space.

It is not of one of the new books that I am now going to speak. New books, just because they are new, have but little charm for me. Long since I gave up the fierce race with the fast running presses. Somehow I feel a sort of pity for those whose conception of their duty as persons of culture is to keep up with the very latest in the book world. A few books of the hour I have read, and it will be my pleasure to speak of some of them at the end of some not far future days. But there is more satisfaction, to me at least, in taking up a book that others have stopped reading and reading it leisurely, with a sense that perhaps I alone in all the world am holding communion with its author. There is something more intimate—it may be even selfish—in such an experience than when one knows the communion is shared by a multitude of all sorts and conditions of readers.

So here is this book that the Scribner house published some seven or eight years ago entitled, "Father and Son." It appeared anonymously but is now generally known to be the work of Mr. Edmond Gosse, the distinguished English litterateur.

BRIEFLY, the story is that of a religion which blights and narrows and dehumanizes life. If any of your readers, Mr. Editor, are not prepared to believe that there can be such a religion, such a devotion to the Bible and to Christ and to conscience that has the effect of blighting and narrowing one's life, I recommend that they read this book.

The story is a true and faithful autobiography—a "genuine slice of life," to use the author's own words. His father and mother were members of the sect known as "Plymouth Brethren." Dying when the author was but a lad the mother left to the father the care of their only child. He was possessed of one of those phenomenally precocious minds, and the experiences of his childhood made deep-graven impressions upon it. These he held in memory with great vividness and accuracy and has here set them down with a frankness wholly free from any taint of unfealty toward his father.

The father was a zoologist and a writer of books in natural history, evidently a man of standing among scholars. He was also a minister of the "Brethren."

NO fiction of any kind, religious or secular, was admitted into the house. The rapture of the child who delays the process of going to bed by cajoling "a story" out of his mother or his nurse, as he sits upon her knee, well tucked up, at the corner of the nursery fire,—this was unknown to the lad. "I was told about missionaries but never about pirates; I was familiar with humming birds, but I had never heard of fairies. Jack the Giant-Killer, Rumpelstiltskin and Robin Hood were not of my acquaintance and though I understood about wolves, Little Red Riding Hood was a total stranger."

At six years of age the child had become familiar with most of the Bible and was especially expert in the Epistle to the Hebrews. As a diversion he was led by his father "in lighter moods" into the Book of Revelation "chasing the phantom of Popery through its fuliginous pages." Hand in hand father and son investigated the number of the Beast, which number is six hundred sixty and six. Hand in hand they inspected the nations to see whether they had the mark of Babylon in their foreheads. Hand in hand they watched the spirits of devils gathering the kings of the earth into the place which is called Armageddon. Together the two watched the signs among the nations for the imminent return of the Lord.

THE child lived constantly amid the uninterrupted solemnities of life. He had been formally dedicated to God shortly after his birth. Of this dedication he was ever being reminded by his parents. At the age of ten the way was opened by his father for admitting the boy into the membership of the "Saints" as the congregations of Plymouth Brethren called themselves. He passed an examination at the hands of the leading elders, and was prepared for baptism, which was performed by immersion.

"To me," says the author, "the baptism was an event dazzling beyond words, inexpressibly exciting, an initiation to every kind of publicity and glory. There were many candidates, but the rest of them—mere grown-up men and women—gave thanks aloud that it was their privilege to follow where I led. I was the acknowledged hero of the hour. The news of this remarkable ceremony, the immersion of a little boy ten years old 'as an adult,' had spread far and wide. The chapel was crowded to the ceiling and the crowd had come—as every soft murmurer assured me—to see ME."

YET his baptism marks the beginning of disillusionment. His father, the minister-zoologist, kept the son in his close companionship intent on protecting him from "the world." In spite of this systematic watch-care the lad found the books of romance and poetry, fell in love with forbidden Shakespeare and felt his imagination kindle with new thoughts. Gradually the infallibility of his father was shaken in the son's mind and gradually the father's conception of religion came to be challenged. Away at school the unknown world of Greek literature was opened up and in London the vaster reaches of human interests from whose existence he had been shut off were revealed. He perceived that his father's religion had kept him shut up in a tiny pocket of the world and his heart found other satisfactions besides reading the Bible and watching for the expected return of Christ.

FROM this expectation the son had been emancipated in a dramatic emotional experience which led up to the definitive confession of his doubt. "The Lord has not come, the Lord will never come," he muttered to himself, and in his heart the artificial edifice of extravagant faith began to totter and tumble. From that moment he and his father walked in opposite hemispheres "with the thick o' the world between them."

I must not trace the story in greater detail. The break was complete. The father's solemn pursuit of the son with the charge that he had become a victim of "the infidelity of the age" and with quotations from the patriarchs and "holy Job" had the effect of producing a distaste for the Holy Scriptures. At last on a visit home the father's customary interrogations, "Are you walking closely with God?" and "Have the Holy Scriptures still their full authority with you?" brought forth replies that were violent and hysterical. "I have no clear recollection," says the author, "what it was that I said. I desire not to recall the whimpering sentences in which I begged to be let alone, in which I demanded the right to think for myself, in which I repudiated the idea that my father was responsible to God for my secret thoughts and my most intimate convictions."

IN closing I wish to quote a great paragraph:

"After my long experience, after my patience and forbearance I have surely the right to protest against the untruth (would that I could apply to it any other word!) that evangelical religion, or any religion in a violent form, is a wholesome or valuable or desirable adjunct to human life. It divides heart from heart. It sets up a vain, chimerical ideal in the barren pursuit of which all the tender, indulgent affections, all the genial play of life, all the exquisite pleasures and soft resignations of the body, all that enlarges and calms the soul, are exchanged for what is harsh and void and negative. It encourages a stern and ignorant spirit of condemnation, it throws altogether out of gear the healthy movement of the conscience; it invents virtues which are sterile and cruel; it invents sins which are no sins at all, but which darken the heaven of innocent joy with futile clouds of remorse. There is something horrible, if we will bring ourselves to face it, in the fanaticism that can do nothing with this pathetic and fugitive existence of ours but treat it as if it were the uncomfortable ante-chamber to a palace which no one has explored and of the plan of which we know absolutely nothing."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

A LAST CALL FOR TORONTO.

Our General Missionary Conventions have come to be the great annual events in the calendar of our churches. Those who have felt the fellowship and the inspiration that come from these splendid gatherings have a sense of irreparable loss when they are prevented from attending them. The reports of our constantly growing missionary societies—the programs bearing on the extension of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—never fail to enrich our hearts and broaden our minds. Who that attended our Centennial Convention at Pittsburgh in 1909 can ever forget the thrill and uplift of some of those memorable sessions!

Two things make an urgent appeal to our people for their loyal support of the Toronto gathering. The first is, that Toronto is removed from the main population of the Disciples of Christ, and we can hardly expect the attendance to be up to the usual average. This should make a stronger call than usual for the presence of all who may find it possible to come—even at the expense of personal inconvenience and sacrifice.

The second is, that it is a new experiment in our history, and will call for both wisdom and patience to bring it to a successful issue. Every new thing, no matter how needed and beneficent it may be, means the passing of some older things—and this is never accomplished without the spirit of concession and self-denial. It is not a question of whether the old things were good in their time and their place, but whether the new are better.

We need, then, a representative body of the best and the wisest in our brotherhood, who will come, not only in adequate numbers, but filled with the spirit of God, not only with the backward look on the accomplishments of the past, but with the forward look to the perpetuity and ultimate triumph of the ideals for which we stand.

The delegates appointed to this Convention may be either men or women. I sometimes think we women of the Disciples of Christ do not fully realize the significance of this privilege. The women of several of the great evangelical bodies of Christians are pleading and struggling for lay representation in their Conferences and General Assemblies. This thing for which they are making so good a fight has come to us as our birthright—let us see to it that we prize it and use it!

The Roman captain said to Paul, "With a great sum, obtained I this freedom," and the Apostle to the Gentiles answered, "But I was free born."

Like Paul, we were born free. Let us appreciate and use our freedom in this first representative convention of our church, by coming to it in great numbers, and in the spirit and wisdom of him who gave us the truth that has made us free!

THE VICTORY IN FRANCE.

Even the most optimistic friends of equal rights were taken by surprise on reading that the Municipal Council of Paris had voted unanimously in favor of extending municipal suffrage to women. The Latins as a rule have been less inclined toward the enfranchisement of women than the northern nations. Such action in so important a city as Paris makes a great breach in that ancient and mossgrown Latin wall.

But France has been moving in this direction, along with the rest of the world. The French Parliament appointed a committee with M. Ferdinand Buisson as chairman to study into the workings of equal suffrage where it prevails. After a thorough investigation, covering more than a year, the committee published the result of its researches in a large volume. Its report set forth in detail the benefits that had followed the granting of equal suffrage elsewhere; and the committee recommended that France should give women full suffrage eventually and municipal suffrage at once.

The Municipal Council of Paris has shown itself progressive before this, on more than one occasion. Thus it has voted over and over again for the abolition of the State regulation of vice; but the French Parliament is not yet ready to put an end to that discredited system of dealing with the social evil, and Paris continues to have "regulation," the vote of the Council to the contrary notwithstanding.

The Municipal Councils in several of the smaller French cities have lately voted in favor of municipal suffrage for women; but the action taken in Paris is of much greater significance. Verily, the world moves!

SHALL MRS. PANKHURST BE ADMITTED?

Chicago and Illinois Women Say Yes.

Protests against the possible refusal of the government to admit Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, the English suffragette, into the United States on a lecture tour were drawn up last week by the Woman's Party of Cook County and the Illinois Woman's Democratic League.

Action was taken by the board of directors of the woman's party at a meeting held in the Hotel LaSalle, at which plans were discussed for a public reception and tea for Mrs. Pankhurst. A suggestion was made that the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association and the Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs ask all women's clubs in Cook County to join in receiving Mrs. Pankhurst.

The resolutions adopted were as follows:

"Whereas, It has been the boast of America that it is the land of the free and the home of the brave, and that the 'latch string' has always been out to welcome those patriots and lovers of liberty from Ireland, Poland, Germany and other countries who have shown themselves ready to do and die for freedom and equal rights, now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Woman's Party of Cook County condemns any attempt to alter these American ideals, and protests against the denial to Mrs. Pankhurst of the right to set foot upon our hospitable shores; and be it further

"Resolved, That while we do not approve of militant methods for this country, we recognize Mrs. Pankhurst as being a soldier in the war for liberty and equal rights, and that her deeds have in no sense emanated from an evil mind, but have been done, in her opinion, for the good of her country and humanity; and be it further

"Resolved, That we protest against the growing tendency of the United States to close its doors against the patriots of other lands, who love liberty more than they do their own lives."

The petition of the Illinois Woman's Democratic League asking for the admission of Mrs. Pankhurst was drawn up by Dr. Lucy Waite, chairman of the league's civic department, and was addressed to Secretary Wilson of the Department of Labor. Dr. Waite hopes to have the petition signed by 50,000 women before the arrival of Mrs. Pankhurst.

WOMEN SPEEDY VOTERS.

The women of Rock Island, Ill., voted twice as fast as the men and showed greater familiarity with the important questions involved at the special bond election there last week, declares a local paper, when they exercised for the first time the newly granted right of franchise. All the propositions which the women favored were carried at the election.

WOMAN AND THE CITY.

If a woman is concerned to keep herself or her husband and children in good health, she cannot fail to have some concern about the way in which the health department of the city helps or hinders her in doing so. Without its help she cannot be sure that the water is fit to drink, and that the milk will not kill her baby. Not only for safe plumbing, but for air and light, enough to make her house wholesome, she must depend upon the city's sanitary inspection. When she does her marketing it is only the city sealer who tests the weights and measures so that she gets what she pays for, whether it be a loaf of bread and an ounce of tea or a ton of coal. The school and playground, to which most city women send their children, are parts of the city government.—GRAHAM TAYLOR.

AS TO THE SECOND COMING.

my proof texts now to which in my earlier ministry I was so devoted, and thought I understood, I have to say that I don't interpret. I give up any satisfactory understanding of the doctrine because of such chapters as Matthew the twenty-fourth, many portions of the book of Revelation, and those which seem to teach that the advent would occur during the ministry of Christ, or soon after his ascension. There may be a personal return of the Lord to the earth; I do not know. If the scriptures which so teach have been veiled to many eyes, I am glad that to other eyes they have been opened. But there are so many difficulties to the doctrine, as Prof. Sharpe has pointed out, that I did not so much renounce as lose interest in it. I came to believe that one may live a devout life under the inspiration that Christ might come in the clouds of heaven to-morrow, and as well under the inspiration that Christ is ever coming into his own inheritance in the onward march of the world. The heavens may be brass through which Christ will never break, to those who like myself cannot longer hold to what seems to be a too literal interpretation of Scripture, yet we are content to hold that the divine presence is being revealed in the progress of history as well as in the ancient burning bush, and in the hearts of believers everywhere as surely as it now fills the measureless heavens.

The Larger Christian World

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

A School for Church Music.

Till now there has been in all America no school for the instruction of organists and choirmasters to serve in Episcopal churches, where the music is most difficult, and no organists' school of any kind save a small private venture that was established in New York three or four years ago. The increase in the number of expensive organs of late years has been enormous, yet organists have been compelled to study under other organists. Many of the best organists in America came from England. The profession of organist and choirmaster is reported to be good, and growing better. Salaries are $1,000 to $5,000 a year, and many organists make as much more from teaching and from extra services, chiefly weddings and funerals. Trinity Church, of New York, takes the initial steps this fall to establish the American School of Church Music. Private persons have furnished funds, and the parish named will utilize its great organs, of which it has four, and some of its famous choirmasters. It is the hope that in time there will come into existence an American school that will compare with Oxford in England. The new school will be expressly for organists to render the service from the Book of Common Prayer. It is expected that students will be drawn from all parts of the country. The term will be thirty weeks, and sessions start in October. Organ, piano and vocal instruction will be given to fit for the conduct of choirs having boys for trebles and altos, and those having women. Eight foremost American organists, all of them trained in England, are on the staff of instruction.

Foreign Sunday School Work.

A significant step in the future development of missionary work in China through the Sunday-school has been made by the Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the appointment of Rev. Wallace H. Miner as superintendent of Sunday School work for Foochow Conference. Mr. Miner will cooperate with the missionaries and pastors in developing effective methods of Sunday-school organization. It is hoped to raise up an army of officers and teachers by the introduction of training courses in the schools where the students will be fitted for this work when they return to their home communities, and by training special workers among the native Chinese to aid the native pastors. For the past five years the Board of Sunday Schools has made great progress in its work in the home field, and the new undertaking in China marks the beginning of an aggressive campaign in Sunday-school work there. A missionary writing from this field says: "We must capture the Orient for Christ through the Sunday School and do it now, for this is the time of foundation-laying here. If we miss it through negligence or failure to match the opportunity of the century with an adequate plan, we shall be traitors to the Cross." On account of inadequate resources and the pressure of already existing tasks, the over burdened missionaries have been unable to give the necessary emphasis to this important branch of the work and as a result the percentage of increase has been very small with a decrease in a number of instances so that an advance step has become imperative Already the Board has sent workers to Germany, Japan, Norway and Sweden and through its increased resources of ten per cent of the Sunday-school missionary offerings, the work will be extended to South America, Africa, India, Korea and the Philippines.

Congregationalists Ready To Move.

The Congregationalists are also doing some wrestling. The "Commission of Nineteen on Polity" will present its report to the National Council at Kansas City in October. It declares in an advance statement that the adoption of this report will "mark a real advance toward that 'more efficient Congregationalism' which shall make our churches yet more adequate to the task to which God has called them." Some of the recommendations of the report are: Greater permanency for the Council, in relation to the missionary societies; the consolidation of the seven existing societies into three, one for foreign missions, one for home evangelization and one for home education; greater definiteness of understanding regarding the powers and duties of the secrtary. Frank K. Sanders is chairman, and Wm. E. Barton secretary, of the Commission of Nineteen.

The Methods of Mormonism.

The Woman's Home Missionary Societies of the evangelical churches, awakened to the methods and political power of Mormonism after a year of study, have issued an appeal for an agitation against the recurrence at the Panama-Pacific Exposition, of the prominence given this body in the government exhibit at the Alaska-Yukon Exposition at Seattle in 1909. While other exhibits were financed by the societies whose work they represented, the Mormon Church display was given in the government building, and apparently at government expense, portraits of the leaders of this movement occupying a prominent place, and being designated as "True Nation Builders," and "Pathfinders of Civilization"

The holy synod in plenary session at St. Petersburg, approved the measures taken against the followers of the "heretic doctrine of the divinity of the name of Jesus," and referred those who have not repented to the canonical judgment of the patriarch of Constantinople The holy synod will order the Russian priests to combat the heretical propaganda which is spreading in the monasteries. It says that the heretics among the monks on Mount Athos drove out the believers in the true orthodox faith, many of whom are wandering about the country begging. Twenty-five of the heretics were slightly injured during the expulsion of the monks by the troops, and forty accused or suspected of having been implicated in criminal projects were imprisoned at Odessa.

Baldwin University and German Wallace College, both located at Berea, O., are to be consolidated as the result of a resolution adopted by the German Methodist Conference at its session recently held at Kenosha, Wis. The new shool is to be known as the Baldwin-Wallace College and it will have a plant and endowment valued at more than $1,000,000. For more than fifty years both schools have contributed many distinguished men to the cause of Methodism, but the competition between the schools has resulted in a certain loss and recognition of the conservation possible through consolidation brought about the merger.

A commission has been appointed by the Pope to revise the translation of the Vulgate Bible which was prepared in Latin by Jerome during the fourth century. The work of revision has already begun and it is announced that it will probably take fifty years to complete it. Abbot Don Gasquet, chairman of the commission and president of of the English Roman Catholic Order of Benedictines is now in this country obtaining funds for carrying on the work.

When the World Federation of the Student Volunteer Movement was formed in 1895 there were about six hundred local organizations. These have now increased about four-fold. This movement originating less than thirty years ago has had a remarkable development and has not only been a great force in influencing the character and methods of mission work but in the attitude of the home field toward the work of missions.

A project for the establishment of a Jewish university at Jerusalem was discussed at the Zionist congress at Vienna. The cost of the university is estimated at $500,000, one-fourth of which has already been promised. Dr. Weigmann, of Manchester, England, urged the necessity of such a university owing to the restricted facilities afforded Jewish students in Russia and Roumania.

A building containing an auditorium and committee rooms will be erected at Winona, Ind., for the exclusive use of the Interdenominational Association of Evangelists. This organization which has a membership of 275 will have its headquarters in Chicago in the future and the publication of literature on the subject of evangelism is contemplated.

Organization has been completed for the Church Peace League, authorized by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America at their meeting last December. While no formal organization is contemplated, is is hoped that all who are interested in the cause of international peace may be enrolled.

In a recent address at Elgin, Ill., Bishop John H. Vincent said that the church of the future will make political economy and sociology as important as the study of religion and that the combined forces of church, home and school will bring about a more effective education and a more practical religion.

The annual meeting of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew will be held in New York during the first week in October, preceding the general convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Over six hundred delegates are expected to attend and Dean W. T. Sumner, of Chicago, will be one of the principal speakers.

Protestant interests in downtown New York are beginning the fall work with added equipment that has cost $3,500,000. Among these are the Beecher Memorial to be opened in connection with Plymouth Church, a new Baptist church costing nearly half a million, and costly improvements for several Presbyterian churches.

Reports for the first six months of 1913 from the China agency of the American Bible Society show that nearly one million Bibles and Testaments have been issued, and notwithstanding this enormous number, it was impossible to supply many requests.

The percentage of Sunday school enrollment to population in the Samoan Islands is 29.1; in the Marshall Islands, 26.5; in Great Britain, 21.2; in the Fiji Islands, 18.33; in Newfoundland, 17.8; in the United States, 16.6.

Cambridge University, England, by a vote of 335 to 269, decided to annul the statute which limited the degrees of B.D. and D.D. to ministers of the Church of England. Oxford University, however, holds to the old-time rule.

The statistics reported at the World's Sunday School Convention show that the Sunday school army of the world now numbers 28,701,489, a gain in three years of 690, 295.

The First Presbyterian Church, Durham, N. C., led all Southern Presbyterian congregations in contributions to foreign missions during the past year. Its total was $15,727.

Disciples Table Talk

A Meeting Place for Laboring Men.

An original vacation was that taken by W. A. Moore, pastor of First Church, Tacoma, Wash. Dressed in the clothes of a laboring man, he spent two weeks in employment offices, I. W. W. headquarters and other meeting places of the men and in the police court, his purpose being to learn their ways and to find some means of reaching and helping them. In a sermon following this study of conditions at first hand, Mr. Moore said that while as a class they are rough-speaking, it is because they know no other way, and beneath this exterior they are sociable and companionable, but ardent seekers after truth. One of the sad commentaries on the failure of the church to avail itself of practical opportunities to do good is that the men feel that they have no common meeting place outside of the saloon. Commenting on this Mr. Moore said: "Some things ought to be done. We, as intelligent Christian men, ought to face it; I think we are big enough. During the winter we will have a lot of idle men here. I would like to see some of you men here get together and rent a hall and gather together the best speakers from trades' unions, I. W. W. (if they have anyone who can interpret their ideas), the churches and the capitalists. We ought to have knowledge. If there could be a great gathering of people to discuss the problems of labor from as many viewpoints as possible, that would be the way to solve the question. I want to express sympathy for the men who are down and out. You say: 'Give the man in the gutter what is coming to him.' Do you want what is coming to you? We ought to put ourselves in sympathy with the man who is down. To help him I think should be the aim of every man who is a Christian. I think the church ought to interest itself more in the affairs of labor. Men of the trades' union complained to me that it was impossible for them to get a meeting place outside the saloons. There are 22 rooms in this church, and, I venture to say, if there are no other places for trades' unions to meet, the people of this church will back me up when I say that they can hold their meetings here. I believe this church and every other church in this city, would be doing what they ought to do by turning over their rooms to the laboring man."

Dr. B. B. Tyler Retires.

Dr. B. B. Tyler, the oldest minister in point of service among the Disciples, closing a thirteen year pastorate at South Broadway Church, Denver, humbly boasts that he has been absent from his pulpit because of illness only three times in his fifty-two years of preaching. In his farewell sermon, delivered Aug. 31, Dr. Tyler stated that the church, under an indebtedness of $10,000 when he began his services as its pastor, is now free from debt and in a flourishing condition. A significant fact about the South Broadway pulpit is that it has been occupied during the generous Dr. Tyler's period of service by preachers of many faiths — Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, Lutherans, Jews, Episcopalians. One of Dr. Tyler's best friends in the Denver ministry is an Irish Catholic priest. The first church served by Dr. Tyler was in Charleston, Ill., where he remained for five years. The second pastorate was in Terre Haute, Ind., the third in Frankfort, Ky., the fourth in Louisville, the fifth in New York, and the last in Denver. Dr. Tyler was reared in Kentucky. As a boy he had the intention of becoming a farmer. As he grew older he determined to be a preacher. His wife urged him to devote his time to the ministry, and the young man forsook the plans which he had made. Since he first applied for the Charleston church pastorate, Dr. Tyler has never been idle a day, has always had an income, and everywhere was given more than he had expected for his services. He has made four trips abroad, and has visited Palestine each time. In his farewell sermon, on "Reminiscences," Dr. Tyler said, in part: "I retire from this pastorate full of joy and buoyant of hope. The past is glorious. The future will be far more resplendent. I cannot permit this occasion to pass without expressing to you my appreciation of your patience and loving fellowship during the thirteen years that we have worshiped together. I bespeak for my successor in this pastorate the same sympathy, patience, fellowship and loyal support that you have so freely extended to me. I am sure that you will grant this request and that, as a result, the future life and achievements of the South Broadway Christian Church will exceed anything in the past. As I look back over these two and fifty years I can see that there has been an encouraging growth in the respect which the denominations have for each other and the fraternal relationships existing. And as we more and more comprehend the spirit and purpose of the Christ, and enter His fellowship, we are helping in this movement. It is the spirit of the Christ that the true Christian works for and loves. We have been greatly blest in this church during these thirteen years in which we have lived together in an unusually happy fellowship, not alone, nor chiefly, in freeing our church from debt, not alone, nor chiefly, in the important improvements that have been made in our beautiful house of worship, but in the growth of the spirit that I am commending; this is the tremendously important thing."

Dr. Tyler will continue to live in Denver. D. Y. Donaldson, formerly of Kansas City, has taken the pastorate of South Broadway Church, with Dr. Tyler as pastor emeritus.

The Keokuk Convention.

The churches of Iowa convened at Keokuk, for their annual meeting, Sept. 9-12. C. H. DeVoe was president of the convention. Among the addresses given were the following: President's address, by B. W. Garrett; "Church Extension Values," by John H. Booth, secretary; "Profiting from Our Experience," by J. S. Coffin; "Going Forward," by C. S. Medbury; sermon, J. W. Babcock; "Perfecting the Organizations," by C. V. Allison; "Rich Things from the Ephesian Letter," by S. J. Epler; "Christian Endeavor in the Rural Church Problem," by H. E. Van Horn; "Will the Christian Endeavor Organization be Supplanted by the Adult Bible Class?" by Roy Deadman; "Christian Endeavor and State Finances," by C. H. Morris; "Heads and What's in Them," by Prof. W. S. Athearn; "The Graded Curricula," by Grace Jones; "What a Village Sunday School Can Do," by Roy Hytem; "Resources for Iowa Sunday School Leadership," by L. S. Dudley; "Christian Endeavor Address," by J. A. Burns; "Our Plea and Religious Education," by L. S. Dudley; "Pulpit Problems," by G. E. Roberts; "The Philosophy of Religious Education," by Prof. W. S. Athearn; "The Rural Church and Country Life," by F. D. Ferrall. An instructive feature of the convention was a symposium on "Results of Christian Endeavor as Seen in the Twentieth Century." There was great interest shown in the moonlight excursion on Lake Cooper, the new body of water formed by the damming of the Mississippi by Hugh L. Cooper, engineer of the great dam just completed.

H. O. Pritchard's Farewell.

H. O. Pritchard, the newly elected president of Eureka College, Eureka, Ill., was greeted by a large representation from the neighboring churches on the occasion of his farewell address. Mr. Pritchard emphasized the need of unity in all churches that a bigger and better work might be accomplished, and said in part: "What does the average community emphasize? What is the point of emphasis of the community? From my observations, I believe that the average community emphasizes material success, individual power and individual pleasure. Men are held in the grip of these things, and I say that they are the pagan shrines of our civilization. These are the things that are worshipped. The getting of money and the getting of power which goes with the getting of money are things that are emphasized. I do not believe that our civilization can survive if it is half Christian and half pagan. The churches today are not coping with the world problems because they are not united. They are not presenting a united front and drawing the line of distinction between right and wrong. Then too, the churches, to solve the problems that they should solve, must use modern methods. This they have not been doing. But the church, making use of its opportunities, has a new future. I believe that the church is now awakening to its possibilities, that newer methods for the solving of these social and industrial problems will be adopted. The church must adapt itself to modern activities and work in harmony with the progress of the world.

"In order to cope with these problems the church should present a solid front. It is not a divided church but a united church that will meet the demands of the hour. This should be our one great plea." After the address E. F. Snavely, W. O. Baldwin, H. H. Harmon, J. W. Hilton and Bert Wilson represented their respective churches in expression of tribute to Mr. Pritchard.

Interesting County Meeting.

According to the local press, nearly five thousand people from Clinton and adjoining counties attended the all-day meeting held recently at the fair grounds at Frankfort, Ind. The speakers were George W. Watson, pastor of First Church, Lafayette, Ind.; and Rudolph Spray, of Frankfort. The central theme of the latter's address was that the success of an individual or an institution is in proportion to the loftiness of its purpose and the constant consecration to its obligation. He said: "The church must have a more hearty co-operation of the home, a more efficient, trained leadership, a more pedagogical course in religious education, which includes equipment and buildings for the carrying on of a work which will help keep the children from sinning rather than rescuing them after they have gone astray. If we are going to mature child life into Christian character we must have a program as big as the character with which we have to deal. Our Sunday-schools must educate the mind by means of graded instruction suitable to the child's unfolding, so that the child may come to know God, the Heavenly Father; must educate the emotions by means of graded worship so that the heart may come to love Jesus Christ as his ideal; and educate the will by Christian activities graded to the ability of the child to develop Christian conduct and service for society. Directors of religious education must be employed by churches to sustain the same relation to the educational functions of the church as a superintendent of public instruction relates himself to the public school curriculum. Christian character cannot be developed with thirty-minute doses administered once in seven days. There must be more time given to this, which is the most important task under the canopy of heaven. There must be a correlation of all church societies to contribute to this unified aim."

Gain for Foreign Society.

During the month of August receipts for the Foreign Society amounted to $52,901, exceeding the receipts for the corresponding month last year by more than six thousand dollars. There was a small loss in the number of personal offerings, but a gain in the number of churches, Endeavor Societies, and Sunday-schools contributing. The latter reached the sum of $1,963 and annuity gifts show a steady, healthy growth. In the month of September, last year, the receipts amounted to $112,380 and it is hoped that this may be exceeded this year, so that it is important that all offerings be forwarded promptly to F. M. Rains, secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio, before the books close on September 30.

A Ten Years' Pastorate.

Invitations have been issued announcing the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the pastorate of Robert Graham Frank, at Liberty, Mo., to be held September 16. Mr. Frank's decade of service in this field has been one of consecrated, constructive leadership and a united membership working together harmoniously, demonstrates the value of this long pastorate.

Allen T. Shaw begins his third year at Macomb, Ill., with great hope. He reports 126 additions during the past two years. The Sunday School has reached its highest state of efficiency, with an enrollment of 500 and average attendance of 350. A debt of $7,000 has been materially reduced.

The congregations at Chesterland and Towners Mills, Ohio, have asked their pastor, Alfred Johnson, to remain with them another year, and as an appreciation of his services will send both Mr. and Mrs. Johnson to the Toronto convention.

Following an operation, Mrs. W. A. Baldwin passed away suddenly at Lincoln, Neb. Mrs. Baldwin was widely known and beloved throughout the state through her association with Mr. Baldwin's long service as state secretary.

Mr. and Mrs. John R. Ewers returned Sept. 5 on the "Mauretania" from a six weeks' trip in Europe. The East End Church has been extensively repaired and improved during the summer.

Gifford Ernest, recently pastor of Stuart Street Church, Springfield, Ill., has been engaged as assistant pastor of First Church in the same city to co-labor with F. W. Burnham.

Illinois Disciples in Convention

In the heart of the state the convention of Illinois Disciples met last week. Jacksonville was host to about five hundred visitors. Seven years ago when the convention met at Jacksonville, the attendance was close to 1,000. There was some local disappointment over the number this year. But the quality of the convention was of the highest. As usual the Women's Sessions started the program.

Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, president of the national organization of the C. W. B. M., made an address on Monday evening. Tuesday morning was given over to hearing the farewell counsels of Mrs. Lura V. Thompson-Porter, who had been for many years state secretary, and Mrs. A. I. Zeller, the retiring president. Miss Jennie Call of Springfield was elected to succeed Mrs. Porter as secretary and the latter was made president for the coming year.

WE TAKE OFF OUR HAT TO—

The Illinois Disciples who can afford such a feast as was accorded the tribes that went up to Jacksonville last week.

The Keokuk, Iowa, Disciples, who arranged for a moonlight excursion for its convention visitors.

W. A. Moore, of Tacoma, Wash., who donned overalls to get to the heart of the labor problem.

B. B. Tyler, who has not been idle a day since beginning his work as minister fifty-two years ago, and who now retires with his heart full of hopefulness.

R. Graham Frank, who has proved by his ten years of excellent service that the long pastorate's the thing.

Mrs. Lura V. Thompson-Porter, who, after a score or more years spent in the field as state secretary of the Illinois C. W. B. M., has been elected state president.

W. W. Weeden, of Mt. Carmel, was president of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. His formal address on Tuesday evening pleaded for the statement of the old gospel in terms of modern life. J. Fred Jones, for eighteen years the state secretary, kept the convention in a good humor with his original putting of the facts which the present day church faces. He made a report of the service rendered by the Society during his period of secretaryship which left little room to question whether he should be continued in his present office. Later on the convention voted resolutions whose effect will be to dispense with the office of "office secretary," a position capably filled for many years by W. D. Deweese, and to make the field secretary a solicitor of funds and an administrator of affairs, with a salaried superintendent in each of the six districts of the state. How soon the new policy will be carried into effect will depend upon the securing of the funds for the support of the district superintendents. It is felt generally that a more aggressive policy of construction should be carried on by the state organization. The admirable work of settling church troubles, protecting the congregations from unworthy preachers, and similar conservative activities, does not fully satisfy. It is felt, moreover, that a single field secretary can hardly touch the great task with his fingertips. Hence the district organization with the suggestion of a capable superintendent for each district was brought into service. The state of Missouri has been laying the emphasis upon the district organization for several years, and has recently dispensed with the state secretary, retaining in his place an office secretary who acts as a medium connecting the state board with the district superintendents. The plan is declared to be working fruitfully. Illinois, however, feels that J. Fred Jones is too good an asset to be displaced by any change of organization. The churches will look to the new board under Stephen E. Fisher's presidency to exhaust every resource to put the new plans into effect as soon as possible.

The two most impressive addresses made at the convention were those by the new president of Eureka College, H. O. Pritchard, recently of Bethany, Nebr., and by Dr. C. M. Chilton, pastor First Church, St. Joseph, Mo. Pres. Pritchard struck a new note in the advocacy of the claims of Eureka College on Illinois Disciples. It was a note of passion. As we listened to him we felt that here at last is an educator who finds as much—perhaps more—in the educational ideal to thrill his soul as the evangelist finds in the evangelistic ideal. At any rate he spoke with prophetic abandon. Yet his address was clearly conceived and effectively composed. No plea for Eureka College has so gripped an Illinois convention before. It is generally believed that Mr. Pritchard will get money and students and higher academic standards for this school, and get each without the sacrifice of the others.

Doctor Chilton spoke two evenings. The first address dealt with the need of our churches caring for one another. He pleaded for the realization of the Body of Christ as over against a group of disjointed members. He interpreted a set of conditions among Disciples which call for representative conventions and the mutual subordination of congregations to the general welfare. His main insistence was that this organizing of our churches should begin in counties and districts and afterward extend to the national convention. Without touching on the subject expressly many inferred that Doctor Chilton favored moving slowly at Toronto on account of the sad lack of inter-congregational consciousness among us at this time. His second address was an optimistic note. He called attention to many "signs of the times" which should comfort and inspire the Christian. These were selected quite at random, apparently, and treated casually but with a great heartening effect. Among the "signs" were mentioned Woodrow Wilson our Christian President, Socialism, The Constructive Quarterly, etc., etc., etc. Doctor Chilton's messages deserve no word less meaningful than that much abused word "great." He lightened up every theme he touched.

Mr. Abram E. Cory thrilled the convention with an address announcing substantial progress on the two million dollar campaign, before the campaign has been begun! Dr. H. L. Willett was asked to tell of his mission study trip in the Orient, and E. L. Dakin, of Memorial Church, Chicago, was introduced to the convention as representing a concrete and successful effort to practice Christian unity.

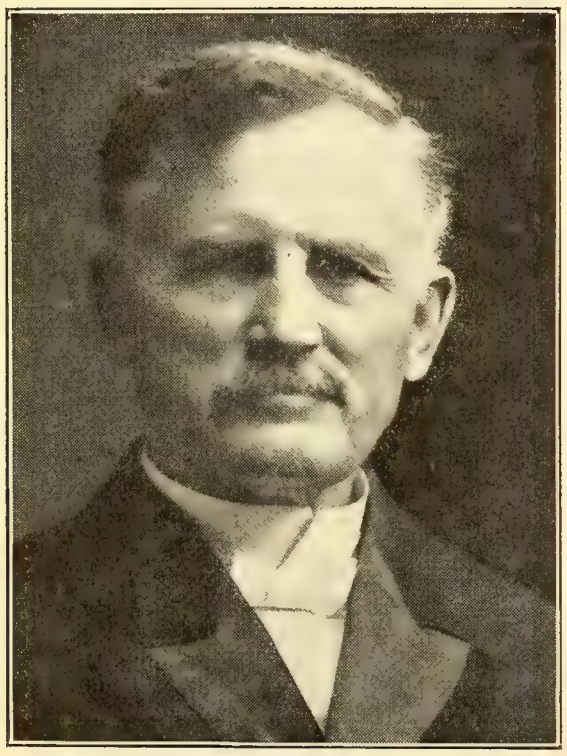
A "Representative" Not a "Delegate" Convention

A Statement Issued by the Committee on Credentials of the Toronto Gatnering

The time for the Toronto Convention draws near. The plan of a representative convention adopted at Louisville has had much publicity but this publicity has not always been informing and much that has been said concerning it has been based upon a misunderstanding of what it actually involves. Attention is therefore briefly called to a few important points in the hopes that what is said may remove doubt, overcome unfavorable prejudice and prove generally helpful in aiding to an understanding of what is in store for those who go to Toronto.

Toronto's Leading Pastors



Rev. Rufus W. Stevenson, Dean of the City's Ministers.

Rev. C. O. Reynard, Pastor Cecil Street Church.

"Representatives" Not "Delegates."

The Toronto Convention is to be a convention of representatives of the churches and not of delegates. To some this may seem to be a distinction without a difference but to others there is a clear recognition of the fact that the word "delegate" denotes something which the word "representative" does not. The primary meaning of the word "delegate" is one sent and authorized or empowered to transact business for another. Hence if a church were to send a delegate to Toronto he would be one upon whom had been conferred the power to transact business for the entire church. Such an idea is to many persons obnoxious. On the other hand the primary meaning of the word "representative" is one who is sent to receive or impart, or both to receive and impart, benefits for another because of the impossibility of the second party going himself. Hence a church that sends a representative to Toronto sends one to give and to receive for the entire church because it is manifestly impossible for the entire church to attend. This latter idea is manifestly more in accord with what our conventions have always been and always will be. It is for this reason that the constitution adopted at Louisville always uses the word "representative" and never the word "delegate." The churches therefore are asked to send representatives to Toronto and it is evident that the authority of the church is not delegated to them and that they without its consent can not bind it in any way nor commit it to any policy.

A Convention of Freedom not of Bondage.

These representatives will go to Toronto without restrictions upon their liberty and in no way bound unless they are bound by instructions given them by the appointing churches. There is no other power that can restrain the freedom which they have in Christ. Furthermore the convention can not bind them except as they are willing to be bound. They will go to the convention free men in Christ and the convention can deprive neither them nor the churches of the liberty which they have in the Lord.

Not a Convention of Revolutionary Ideals.

The Toronto Convention will not be the beginning of a revolution. It will neither destroy the past nor introduce a day of strange things. Should one who has been accustomed to attend past conventions arrive at Toronto one day late and be com-

The Best!

Many Sunday School classes will wish to study the life of Jesus this fall. They want the very best text for young people's or adult classes that can be found. This is simply to remind them that there has never been offered to the Sunday School world a Life of Christ so practical, so usable, so true to the best scholarship, so bristling with questions that wake up the pupils, so well proportioned, as Dr. Loa E. Scott's LIFE OF JESUS in Fifty-two Lessons. It is being widely used in Sunday Schools and Y. M. C. A. classes. It is now on the press for its third edition and the new edition is much larger than the two earlier editions combined. This testifies to its popularity. You must have it in your school. Price 50c. pelled to leave one day before the last Amen of the convention is spoken, he would see scarcely any change from former conventions. Probably the most significant thing which he would notice would be certain indications of a more concerted action on the part of the missionary and other organizations of the churches. This spirit of united action is not the result wholly of the plan to hold a convention of representatives of the churches but such convention will give this spirit of unity an opportunity to manifest itself.

The General Convention.

On Tuesday and on Monday, the first and the last days of the convention, there will be sessions of the General Convention of the Christian churches. No person but accredited representatives of churches will have a part in these assemblies. Others may attend but they will have no vote. Certain questions of interest to all or at least to many of the churches will there be considered. The decisions reached will be presumably the consensus of the views not only of these representatives, but of the churches which they represent also, but no church will be bound by these decisions unless it is willing to be bound by them. This representative convention will not interfere with the integrity of any church, nor can it legislate for the churches. There is no ecclesiasticism in the plan for a convention of representatives.

No Reserved Seats for Representatives.

Representatives and others attending the Toronto Convention will be seated in the convention hall as they themselves may choose. Previously an announcement was made that certain seats would be reserved for the representatives and that they would be seated in a body. This corrects that previous announcement. The representatives will, however, receive official badges which will distinguish them from others.

TORONTO'S ANXIOUS INVITATION.

Dear Brethren in Christ: Will you not all who possibly can come to the convention in Toronto? As many as can, should come, whether chosen as delegates or not. You are all delegates at large of the cause of Christ.

The Canadian churches are tremendously anxious to have you here in great numbers. Our influence on the Canadian people, and especially on this great city, depends upon a large representative body being present.

You may not be pleased with the delegate convention, but suppress your feelings for this year and fight it out next year in Denver or some place where our brethren are in greater numbers and are better known than they are in Canada.

Everyone of the Disciples of Christ in Canada is hoping for a large attendance. Do not disappoint us. Do not cause us to go about ashamed because few came. Come over and help us. We will do all in our power to give you a good time. The city fathers are anxious to have you see Toronto. So pick up and come. Come from the East, and the West; the North and the South and sit down with the Churches in Canada in a great Convention. Send in your names to Mr. C. O. Reynard 16 Harbord St., and he will locate you in good homes.

R. W. STEVENSON.

CHURCH EXTENSION OFFERING JUST BEGUN.

Sunday, Sept. 7, was only the beginning of what should be a great harvest for the enlargement of the Church Extension Fund.

The church at Fremont, Mich., with but sixty members secured over $40 on August 31st. This is an average of more than one dollar for those who gave. Bro. Thibes is the pastor.

The Name Fund churches are nearly all promptly in line with offerings of $300 each.

The offerings taken Sept. 7th should be collected promptly and all offerings sent to G. W. Muckley, 603 New England Bldg. Kansas City, Mo.

We start into the offering with nearly $14,000 ahead of last year. This gain is in individual receipts. The churches, as churhes, are over $1,000 behind last year.

During August an annuity of $2,500 was reeived from California, $700 from Oregon and a friend in Indiana sent $2,000.

At their meeting Sept. 2nd, the Board was not justified in making grants. Over $75,000 of applications were before the Board. All the money in the Treasurer's hands must be used to pay loans already granted.

Unless these appeals are answered great damage will be done these churches.

The appeals are really pathetic. Banks will not loan money to churches. Many appeals have been before the Board for four months. Here is an appealing and touching letter from Smith Center, Kansas. We seem to be unable to explain to these churches that we have no money to loan and that this is the only reason why we do not promise the money.

Some big-hearted Christian should answer this appeal from Smith Center by sending $1500. Other appeals are equally urgent. The churches have every inspiration to send liberal offerings. Many good people over fifty years of age should send annuity money.

THE RACE FOR A $6,000 PRIZE.

All friends of a pure Gospel ministry should understand that only a few days of the year remain in which the work of Ministerial Relief may secure an extra gift of $6,000 by receiving offerings of $30,000. The year ends September 30, and the convention at Toronto begins the same day. The total receipts of the eleven months to August 31, are $20,919.51, but of this amount $1,599,07 is interest on the Permanent Fund, leaving $19,320.44 to apply on the 20 per cent proposition, which will give us $6,000 if we reach $30,000 this year.

On the same date last year the total receipts were $9,764.63, of which $1,263.92 was interest, leaving $8,501.71 to apply on the 20 per cent proposition. September 1912 brought us nearly $12,000 and made the total offerings of the year $20,262,68, which won $4,052.57, which with the total interest of the year of $1,665.54 brought the year's offerings up to $25,980.99.

Last year September brought us $5500 from bequests. Of course nothing of the kind can be depended upon for this year and so our sole reliance must be upon the regular offerings of churches, Bible schools and individuals. Those must reach a total of $10,679.56 in September if we are to have the $30,000 and so secure the $6,000. This sum can easily be reached if all the friends of the work will promptly do their duty. It is not to make record but to meet the dire necessities of veteran ministers and widows of ministers that every church is asked to have fellowship in this offering. If this splendid increase of the eleven months is maintained for thirty days the goal will be not reached but passed. This gain to date is $11,154.88.

SINKING SHIPS AND SAVING SUPPLICATIONS.*

Stupid Students.

The neglect of today doubles the trials of tomorrow. The half-mastered lesson today makes tomorrow's task difficult. The Grammar-school period spent carelessly means the High School course a burden. The Freshman year fooled away, makes the remainder of the college course a perpetual drag. The garden half-weeded in June insures either overrun vegetables and flowers for July and August or five times the labor that would have been necessary if care had been taken at the beginning. Only a fraction of life's burdens would have to be borne if each day's tasks were well performed and each day's lessons were well learned.

Sinai repressed but did not regenerate. The Israelites wondered but they did not will. Golden-calf insurrection was controlled but the spirit behind it was not changed. The calf was cremated but the conscience was not sensitized. It only required the occasion to reveal latent insubordination. It is one thing to intimidate and quite another to inspire. The conversion of scared sinners is usually transient.

Light After Lightning.

They had to be impressed before they could be instructed. Attention first, then teaching. Thunder and fire arrested and awakened, then came the Decalogue. After the commandments, analysis and application.

Weeks passed in the shadow of Sinai. Political, social and religious rules of conduct were issued. The noble leader with face aglow had come from the Mount with heaven's halo attesting his recent fellowship with Jehovah. After the pattern in the Mount the tabernacle was constructed, the ritual of service adopted.

The census was taken and organization elaborated. It was a period of education in civil government. They little realized the importance of the instruction they were receiving. They were allured by the visions of the "land flowing with milk and honey" which semed almost within reach. Had they learned their lesson as they should, nearly forty years of desert wandering would have been avoided.

The Advancing Standards.

What excitement must have attended the announcement that the pillar was lifting from the tabernacle and moving out and on! Then came the command: "Forward." The standards of the tribes were lifted. Judah led with Nahshon in command, then came Issacher and Zebulun with banners aloft and all eager for the march. Bearing the carefully packed tabernacle came the sons of Gershon and Merari. Reuben lifts the standard of his division and Simeon and Gad follow with the Kohathites bearing the holy Sanctuary. The line of march is taken and Ephraim, Manasseh, Benjamin, Dan, Asher and Naphtali take their places in the great procession leaving solemn Sinai with ineffaceable memories of "mysterious association with the eternal Jehovah.

The recognized leader was the man from the Mount. His commands were given in the name of Jehovah. He in turn was obedient to the call of the cloud. The ark which was the visible evidence of the personal presence was carried forward. Moses issued the order and the people under their commanders moved on. At the first advance the leader cried: "Rise up Lord, let thine enemies be scattered and let them that hate thee flee before thee."

Had all been loyal how differently the record would read. But there were the camp-followers, the parasites who impeded progress. Three days' advance was made successfully and with the manifestations of divine presence.

The "bread from heaven" supplied their needs. None suffered with hunger. None was poorly nourished. Thev had a sufficiency. The manna completely met every physical requirement. But it did not satisfy the "mixed multitude." Here were a lot of people who had no religious bond holding them together or to the more devoted children of Israel. To them the Covenant promises were meaningless. They had left Egypt as adventurers. They had heard of the wonderful land of Palestine and determined to ally themselves with this people who were so sure of untold wealth when they had reached the "Land of the Fathers." Marching Canaanward under restrictions was not to their liking. The Ten Commandments had no attraction for them. They were not used to restraints. The way is always tedious when controlled wholly by law. Delayed delights lose their attraction. The Christian can march and wait, because though deferred he knows that blessing awaits the end of the journey. Not so the unbeliever. He must have the pleasure he seeks now. There is no vision of the unreached goal to inspire him. The disappointed hangers-on play havoc with human enterprise always. The church drags herself along wearily because the "mixed multitude" hang to her skirts. Revenue religion is the bane of church life. Indolence is often mistaken for patience. On-lookers want the best and deserve nothing.

Contagion of Complaint.

"Israel also." There you have it (verse 4) the contagion of complaint. One chronic grumbler will destroy the peace of an entire establishment. There is a wide disparity between wants and needs. They did not need flesh. The manna-diet was the very thing needful for health and vigor. Discontent fans its own fires. It distorts vision, misconstrues motive, becomes cynical and sour. Malcontents merit no consideration. There is such a thing as pious protest. There are real grievances that demand attention. But these people had no slightest ground for grumbling.

Minimizing Mercies.

The habit of minimizing mercies and magnifying miseries is nothing less than base ingratitude. (Verses 5-6). Gifts treated with contempt make further gifts difficult if not impossible. We grow discouraged because so much real philanthropy is accepted with the air: "It is no more than you ought to do" or "Why don't you do more?" Before this they had hungered and complained. Jehovah was patient. Quails and manna met the want. Wholesome food without plow or sickle had daily been provided. What more could they ask? They had thirsted and the smitten rock had sent forth refreshing waters.

Fed without labor and watered without wells, how despicable an attitude of dissatisfaction. But that is life. That is a present day chapter. There is nothing antiquated about this experience. It is occurring right now. The "mixed multitude," the moody malevolent loafers who never work without the compulsion of hunger and have only acrimonious criticism for government and for all social restrictions, these are the wreckers of modern industrialism. Villainous, venturesome, vulture-clawed agitators who never earned an honest dollar spread discontent through misrepresentation and entire communities become seething cauldrons of distrust and hate.

There are wrongs to be righted and evils to be corrected but nothing is accomplished by the growling, garrulous crowd that refuses to see the value of law and the blessings of heaven freely showered upon them. "Nothing at all besides this manna." (Ver. 6). As though it were nothing to eat daily at the king's table. That is the way to a troubled life. Minimize your blessings and you will soon be on the gloom side of the valley. A woman wearies of her luxuriant gowns and languidly complains, "I have nothing to wear." Palaces become cabins and wealth becomes pinching poverty, when we say "Nothing at all but this manna." Minimize your blessings and you rob life of its glow and glory. It is this everlasting "lusting" that works havoc with homes and turns heart-gardens into deserts.

Exhausting the Patience of Jehovah.

Trifling with heaven-sent gifts cannot go on indefinitely. "The anger of the Lord was kindled greatly." (Ver. 10). There was righteous indignation at the gross ingratitude manifested in complaint. Their picture of the halcyon days of Egypt with the fish and the melons and cucumbers and the leeks and onions and garlick was all a pretense to give color to their complaints. We do the same thing when we despise today's blessings and contrast the present with the "Happy days of childhood" or the "School days, School days, good old Golden Rule days." We remember the "rule" but forget the "hickory ruler."

Besides all, why were they so absorbed with their stomachs? Canaan was before them. They had been emancipated. They were free. A thousand reasons for song and none for sulking. Again we have "life." Thousands of tourists think only of the next hotel and nothing of mountain and valley or of art and architecture. It is lamentable that the time of the multitudes is spent so largely in asking "What shall I eat?" The purse passion is fully equaled by the pastry passion. When they first complained the waters of the sea had not yet parted; quails and manna had not yet provided the feast; Sinai had not sent the law and the altar had not been builded. But now they knew better. We are judged according to the light we have. The Lord simply will not stand for persistent contempt of his sacred gifts which because daily enjoyed become commonplaces.

Sinking Ships.

The cargo that sinks a ship is fault-finding and complaint. Homes go down under the weight of grumbling. The pity of it is that nine-tenths of the world's trouble is perfectly preventable. The rocks on which our none too strong barques sail are easily avoidable. They are not in the nature of providenes at all but are created by our peevish, perverse and persistent complainings. These inexcusable irritants fret and lacerate until all is confusion and every task becomes difficult. It is not work that withers the world but worry, and worry induced by despising the manna. The load that kills is the load of our own and other people's grumbling. We are thus needlessly overwhelmed.

Saving Supplication.

Even Moses felt the influence of the discontent. He over-estimated his own importance. Six times in as many verses it is "I" (Ver. 10-15). "The burden of all this people upon me." Even he had not seemed to discover that he was a mere agent in God's hands. On the other hand what wonder that he complained. "I am not able to bear this people alone." He was tired of turning the whole caravan into a hospital-train, when he knew there was no real ailment. So are we today. Too much time is spent in lullabies. Every church has a large hospital contingent who are pitying themselves for fancied wrongs. "And if thou deal thus with me kill me." That was commonplace cowardice. How faithfully the Bible portrays character. Our kinship with Moses appears in his weakness even more than in his superb strength. Then followed the division of labor by the appointment of seventy who should share the burden of responsibility. This in turn was followed by promise of flesh to the point of satiety. Quails came in abundance and as usual greed over-reached itself. They had despised the manna and their prayer was over-answered. They had flesh until they were nauseated. Greed carries with it its own correction. Pestilence followed excesses. Better the manna and health than the satisfaction of appetite and death. Accept the daily mercies of Heaven with grateful appreciation. Even ill-worded petition with sincerity of purpose finds acceptance of God. Peace and plenty will both abound when every professed disciple of God can truly say, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am therewith to be content."

The Midweek Service

By Silas Jones.

A VISIT TO A WELL-KNOWN HOME.

Sept. 24—Luke 10:38-42.

We may be sure that the home which Jesus loved and in which he found rest was of the right kind. It was no sham. The spirit of mutual helpfulness guided the actions of its members. In it the best traditions of the Jewish race were honored. There was doubtless much discourse on the ideals which had been handed down from the fathers. The doings of the heroes of the faith were discussed with enthusiasm. But the past was not the sole topic of conversation. The welcome which Jesus received is evidence that there was eager desire for the redemption of Israel.

It was a home of industry. The anxiety of Martha to have her work well done is to her credit. Jesus did not chide her for being industrious but for overlooking for the moment an important aspect of life. Good homes are the product of labor. Good sense is needed in their management. Love has a thorny path to travel when financial ability is lacking. What we get by our toil we prize. Good nature is a poor substitute for hard work. There is drudgery and plenty of it in every home that is worthy of the name. But kindness and appreciative understanding bring the hardest toil into the service of happiness.

It is the persons in the home that make it dear to us. "Be it ever so humble, there is no place like home," because there is nowhere else the companionship which so fully satisfies the heart. If what we call home does not furnish us the peace and rest we crave, we really have no home. Beecher says, "It is very dangerous for any man to find any spot on this broad globe that is sweeter to him than his home." The persons with whom we live ought to be the persons whose presence gives us the greatest spiritual benefits.

The home of Mary and Martha was not self-centered. It was a part of the national life. The interests of the people of Israel were the interests of this home. The father who is so devoted to his family that he has no time for the duties of citizenship is a bad father.

The guest in the home in unworthy of his welcome if his test of hospitality is the food he receives. Food he needs and this is provided for him by the friends whom he visits. Martha was unjust to herself when she neglected the conversation of Jesus. This has been commonly recognized. It is not so commonly felt that she was not treating Jesus right when she gave all her attention to household cares. He expected more than a good meal. He sought friendship. He needed to hear what these good friends had to say of his work.

Many have written in praise of the home and of these no one has excelled the author of the following paragraph: "This is the true nature of home—it is the place of peace; the shelter, not only from all injury, but from all terror, doubt, and division. In so far as it is not this, it is not home; so far as the anxieties of the outer life penetrate into it, and the inconsistently-minded, unknown, unloved or hostile society of the outer world is allowed to cross the threshold, it ceases to be home; it is then only a part of that outer world which you have roofed over, and lighted fire in. But so far as it is a sacred place, a vestal temple, a temple of the hearth watched over by Household Gods, before whose faces none may come but those whom they can receive with love,—so far as it is this, and roof and fire are types only of a nobler shade and light, shade as of a rock in a weary land, and light as of the Pharos in the stormy sea; so far it vindicates the name, and fulfills the praise of home."

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday Schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday School literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the Church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the Society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, The Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Opportunity

There are impulses within the human soul which are suggestions of the Spirit of God. He who finds himself prompted to say a kind word or do a worthy deed should not hesitate too long before obeying the impulse. As we grow older we act less from impulse and more from what we suppose to be reason; but the great souls of earth have trusted not merely their logic but their intuition.

Philip saw the chariot coming. He did not know who was within. But the path he was traveling intersected the road at such an angle that he could meet it at the parting of the ways, and something within his heart prompted him to meet it. It was as a voice saying, "Go near, and join thyself to this chariot." Philip was not wholly concerned with the opportunity of riding. He spoke the word that won to Christianity one of its most notable converts among men in official life.

So many things happen incidentally that have within them the secret of a wonderful providence. How many things Jesus did that were quite incidental to some other purpose or plan! He saw and called Matthew "as Jesus passed by" on another errand. He healed blind Bartimaeus as He was passing along the way. He saw Zacchaeus in the tree as he was passing underneath. He healed the woman who touched the hem of his garment as he was in the throng, hurrying to an important engagement. All these things and more Jesus did quite incidentally. In every one of these instances he had another errand. These and other instances represent his use of incidental opportunity. It comes to us all, and it must be acted upon or neglected.

The old fashioned revival seems to have lost something of its power. We are training our children up, so we say, into Christian life. We are employing nurture and normal development instead of the unwholesome pressure of the revival. Perhaps so, but let us not forget that the revival had this inestimable advantage, that it brought home to the heart the truth of the necessity of choice.

We must choose. The man who spends his whole life considering what profession he shall enter never makes much of a success. The man who halts idly between two opinions dooms every enterprise with which he is associated. The man who enjoys courtship but shrinks from marriage finds in his mail some morning an invitation to act as best man at the wedding of his lady to some other man; and it serves him right. We must choose.

There are opportunities that will not wait. Not all of them come our way even once. We have to hasten down the path to the cross roads to meet them. And we cannot let them go by with any assurance that they will return.

Philip employed his opportunity in speaking a word for Christ. It was not a hard thing to do, and it made a vast difference in the life of the man to whom he spoke it and with the efficiency of his own religion.

There is need of better preaching and more efficient organization of the Christian Church. But there is no one thing that is needed so much as that every Christian should be a witness for his Lord.

We must not suppose we have no opportunities. The history of success in business is largely the record of men who have taken up and used opportunities that other men have despised. God make us faithful to our daily opportunities! Some of them we threw away and another caught up and used. It is a parable of life. They will never return to us if we neglect them now. But if we improve them it shall be for our everlasting joy and the blessing of others.

Perhaps you know that little poem by Sill on the opportunity which one man despised, but which another with royal spirit turned into a triumph.

This I beheld, or dreamed it in a dream:
There spread a cloud of dust along the plain,
And underneath the cloud or in it raged
A furious battle; and men yelled, and swords
Shocked upon shields. A prince's banner
Wavered, then staggered backward, hemmed by foes.

A craven hung along the battle's edge,
And thought, "Had I a sword of keener steel—
That blue blade that the king's son beareth,
But this—blunt thing—" He snapped and flung it from his hand,
And lowering, crept away and left the field.

Then came the king's son, wounded, sore bested,
And weaponless, and saw the broken sword
Hilt-buried in the dry and trodden sand,
And ran and snatched it, and with battle shout
Lifted afresh, he hewed the enemy down,
And saved a great cause that heroic day.

Humane Missionary Work at Ellis Island

BY REUBEN L. BREED.

ELLIS ISLAND is one of the very smallest portions of dry land surrounded by water over which Old Glory waves. In this case, as in so many others, size and significance have no relationship; indeed, it may be questioned whether any part of our national domain holds any more important place in the present or future life of our people than this same little Ellis Island.

Situated geographically where the mighty Hudson pours its far-gathered waters into the salt of Sound and Ocean, it is also where the distinctly racial streams are turned into the currents of our own fresh young social and national life. Ellis Island is the greatest citizen factory on earth. Out of all nations and tongues and peoples 725,040 passed into America through its portals last year. Besides this huge number 12,917 were there "weighed in the balance," physically, mentally and morally, and were debarred or deported because they were found "wanting."

FIRST IMPRESSIONS.

Since first impressions are so lasting, and the ideas these seven hundred and twenty-five thousand gained the first few hours on America's soil may tinge and color a lifetime, there are no positions of service in the government where higher standards of character should obtain than here at Ellis Island, where America, as such, first touches this alien throng. In this, generally, we have been most fortunate, and the more one studies the men in authority at the island, and sees them at work day after day at their most important tasks, the more the assurance takes root that no other men would probably make fewer mistakes than they.

UNUSUAL MISSION FIELD.

Ellis Island affords a field for missionary work of a very unusual quality. Here are bewildered and distressed souls who need comfort and counsel as they are face to face with the open door of a new and untried land; here are young men and women who need warning as to the trials and temptations of a country that is not quite "money mad;" here are parents who, before the life of our factory towns claims them, need to be told of the emphasis America lays on educating the children. Here also are the thousands being detained for special examination or awaiting deportation, to whom the missionary, if he be the right kind, can minister in the spirit of Jesus, explaining just why it is that America refuses them entrance and interpreting to them the love and sympathy Christian America really feels in her heart for them—even though she is compelled to send them back. Rightly or wrongly, America believes that she has a great contribution of brotherhood to make to the world's life, and she dare not, for the world's sake, imperil it by admitting into her numbers the sick, the pauper and the criminal. The pace of our life, the struggle for existence, is so swift and keen that many will fail here among strangers who can succeed at home among their friends. In order to protect the world ideals entrusted to her, as well as to insure her own life, examinations at our ports of entry must be most thorough. Much of this the missionary at the island may help the detained and the deported to see—if he be of the right sort himself. Rev. P. D. Vassileff, a native Bulgarian, has been under commission as such a missionary now the past year. His special "parish" is among the Bulgarians, Armenians, Macedonians and kindred peoples from the Balkan States and Eastern Asia who are knocking for admission at our doors. Mr. Vassileff works under the closest direction of the New York office, investigating conditions into which immigrants come — immigrant hotels, transportation and labor agencies, etc., in the vicinity of New York City—but finds his special field on the island itself.

INTERESTING TYPES.

Let us in imagination go to the island and permit Mr. Vassileff to point out to us a few special cases in which he has

There is a young Macedonian. He was going to his brother, but a telegram was sent ten days ago, and no answer came, and deportation awaits him within a very few days. Then the missionary is called in, and inquires whether the telegram reached its destination, and found that it was undelivered. The brother had probably moved and did not get it. The missionary found that the boy had another address—that of a cousin, and so sent a telegram to this cousin, urging that he secure and send to the Ellis Island authorities an affidavit, pledging that he will adequately care for the young man. Within a few days the affidavit arrived and all was well; the boy went to his brother.

One day an Armenian arrived with his family, but the oculist at the island discovered that the fourteen year old daughter had inflamed eyes. She was immediately placed under treatment in the hospital. After some days the father comes to the missionary and with tears begs him to go to the hospital to see how his daughter is getting along, and tell him if there is any hope of their admittance, and how soon. She has already been in the hospital three weeks, but the Armenian peasant did not know that he had a right to go and see her, and if he went, how could he, unable to speak English, talk with the doctor and find out what the outcome would be? You may be sure that the missionary's aid was prompt and comforting.

A HELPLESS MONTENEGRIN.

There is a Montenegrin—a tall, strong mountaineer. Yet brave as he might have been fighting the Turk, he is now utterly helpless. There is a great anxiety on his heart. His wife and little baby, born on the steamer, are in the hospital, another three year old child in the Children's Room, and he himself has been in the Detention Room now for ten days. He wants the missionary to go and bear his greetings to his wife and baby, and also to the other child. The missionary saw the mother as she lay in bed, and as he began talking in her language, she almost jumped out of bed. "There he is," she says, "Alexie Coronia is his name." The baby is given the name of the steamer Coronia on which it was born, for the captain wished it so. The father is told that the baby and the mother are doing very well. His face brightened for a moment but another thought came and beclouded it. He has only eight dollars left, and is afraid he will be deported! The missionary rushed to the steamer "Coronia" before it left that night, found the captain and collected a little money from among the passengers, wrote to interested friends and got some more, sent it to the Montenegrin and all was well.

IN THE DEPORTATION WARD.

Eleven Bulgarians were brought in—they were charged with being contract laborers. They landed two months ago at Quebec, Canada. After they finished the work at one place they went to the labor agent for another, and agreed to go with an employer who said he had work for them not very far from Montreal. They got a boat and crossed some water, not knowing it was the St. Lawrence River, and that they were going into the United States. A policeman came to inquire, but some way he changed his serious attitude, and the men went to work on a railroad. A few days later a secret service agent from Ellis Island found them and brought them to the island. Here they stayed for three months in the tile floored and walled room with two or three hundred men. The secret service agent wanted to bring a case against the company, and the eleven Bulgarians are, to be the witnesses and so are detained. They are in great suspense.

WOES OF BULGARIAN GROUP.

No one knows what is going to become of them, or how long they will have to wait in this stuffy room, void of every comfort, even a chair to sit on, their beds made of canvas stretched on iron rods, rising in a three story line one over another, and populated with innumerable former inhabitants. For six months in this country they could not even replace their worn out clothes with something to protect them from the cold; their children at home are unprovided for, and besides, being Bulgarian soldiers, they are wondering what will be the judgment of the martial law when they return to Bulgaria, since being detained they are unable to appear under the colors during the war with Turkey. When they were brought to the island the missionary found these men in a state of torment. He explained the matter to them, telling them that they are not responsible and not punishable, either by this government or in Bulgaria, and that he would take the matter up and help them in whatever way he could. He wrote letter after letter to the Commissioner of Immigration and the department at Washington, and after three months of effort, the men were deported to Bulgaria, and supplied with letters certifying that they had been detained at Ellis Island, and were therefore unable to go to Bulgaria in time for the first part of the war.

Another time talking with a group of Russian immigrants, a Russian girl asked where her young friend Melvina may have gone with the baggage she was helping to carry, for she had all her good clothes in the bundle. The missionary took her to the room of the temporarily detained, where she found Melvina and also her good clothes, and she could not find words to thank him.

Another day a Croatian woman came who had lent a woman friend $25. The friend was going to the same place with her, and she expected to get the money after they had passed the inspection. She was greatly distressed that her friend could not be found, but thought the missionary might be able to tell her where Uleka may be with her $25. He took her to the detention room, and she received the money from her detained friend.

ALMOST LOST HIS BRIDE.

There was another and more curious case. A brilliant, well-dressed young Pole was all excited and anxiously rushing around the waiting room. The missionary approached him with a greeting in his native tongue. He brightened up. "Can you tell me what became of my wife?" he asked. "Oh, yes, what's her name and how did you come here?" returned the missionary, "and what is your name?" Well, the name of his young bride whom he married just before starting was Jusipha Shishkovsky. His name was Ludwig Valentavsk. Her ticket had been sent her by her brother in America, made out in her maiden name and for second cabin. He bought for himself a third class ticket, and so was separated from his wife both on the steamer and at Ellis Island, and she was detained for having no money or address while he was admitted, and was waiting for the railroad barge to come to the island for its day's load of passengers. If he did not claim her before he was taken to the barge she might have gone back on the same steamer the next day! This case was hurriedly undertaken. Full explanation was made to the Ellis Island authorities, and the good bride admitted. The missionary told them how this advice of his was made possible, and how we must all care for each other as one in Christ. With many thanks they went away happy, to make their new home in this new land.

What a portrayal of missionary work of the highest character this is! The socialization and Christianization of these aliens ought to be very much easier now because of the way in which we have touched them at the Island.

Coming to Find Father.

Christian Forces in Northern China

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

A FEW months since there appeared in an American magazine an article written by a man who had recently made a trip around the world. The paper was chiefly a diatribe against Christian missions. It dwelt first upon their failure, as proved by the fact that the author saw little evidence of their presence or influence in the places he visited. Then with hardly pardonable inconsistency it pointed out the evil they were working among the oriental nations, by changing their beliefs and customs, and thus rendering them discontented with the simple, happy life they had previously known.

The writer showed all too plainly that his acquaintance with the actual character of mission work in the Orient was of the most superficial sort. It is no difficult task for a globe-trotter to cruise out to the East, dodge in at a few ports, talk with traders, tourists, government employes and others least likely to be interested or informed regarding Christian activity, and then come back to declare with the air of finality that missions are a failure. There was a time when such declarations might deceive even well-informed people. But today the most casual readers of contemporary literature are prepared to disregard or refute such crass and superficial assertions. And one of the best arguments to silence the cynics is the story of China during the past ten years.

The arousal of interest in a new faith in such a people as the Chinese is an achievement of almost incalculable difficulty and moment. For China is one of the oldest of the nations. If the records of Babylonia and Assyria go back further into antiquity, it is in part due to the highly painstaking work of experts in the field of research, who have brought to light inscriptions of very remote date. Perhaps when a similar service is rendered to Chinese history, the dawn of its civilization may be set at much earlier times than is now the custom. But even with the limitations of a history as yet accepted at only its naive face value, the story of China goes back to the third millennium before Christ.

CHINESE ANTIQUITY.

In the days when the Assyrians were strengthening their fortresses along the frontiers of Mesopotamia, and the early Pharaohs were spreading out their capital at Thebes, the foundations of Chinese nationality were already laid. When the story of the Trojan war and the wanderings of Ulysses was being sung by Greek bards, minstrels in China were recounting the exploits of their ancient chieftains. As early as the age of Alfred the Great, the founder of English literature, the writings of Chinese poets and sages were widely scattered through the far east. Firearms were used in China before the days of the First Crusade, whereas the first use of gunpowder in the western world was at the seige of Constantinople, in 1453 A. D. Printing was invented in China five hundred years before Caxton and Guttenberg. The Chinese sold silks to the Romans in days when the inhabitants of England wore the skins of beasts, and America was unknown.

OLD TESTAMENT ALLUSION TO CHINA?

Two thousand years ago the silk commerce of China extended westward via Kokand and the Pamirs as far as Samarkand, Seleucia and Antioch. Before the Danes invaded England the Chinese had commerce by sea to Ceylon, India, and the Red Sea lands. On the broad map of the world the generals, statesmen, sages and philosophers of China took equal rank with those of Europe, and continued to do so till the reigns of the famous emperors, Kaughi and Kienlung, the contemporaries of Cromwell and Warren Hastings.

Students of Chinese affairs have tried to convince themselves, probably without warrant, that the "land of Sinim" of Isa. 49:12, was China, and that the "middle kingdom" was thus known to the writers of the Old Testament. But in any case Confucius was a contemporary of the Evangelical Prophet, Mencius lived in the age of Ezra, and the great wall was well under way when Judus Maccabaeus rallied his Jewish compatriots against the power of Syria.

It is hard to imagine an ancient and well-nigh immovable nation, with a distinguished history covering twenty-four dynasties, a literature of distinction, and social institutions of great antiquity, taking to itself an almost wholly new set of ideas during a single generation, and confessing that most of these ideas are taken over from a civilization and religion hitherto regarded with suspicion and aversion. Yet such is the case. It is to the impulses drawn from the Christian nations that China owes most of her rapid changes. Out of the twilight of self-satisfaction, which assumed under Manchu leadership that the Emperor of China was the real sovereign of the world, whose right it was to issue proclamations to other rulers as if they were subjects of China, and that all intercourse with foreign nations was to be forbidden, the Chinese have begun to emerge, and this liberation, intellectual and social, has been in large degree the result of Christian missions.

MISSIONARIES SENSITIVE TO PEOPLE'S NEED.

From the first the missionaries have been sensitive to the physical and social, as well as the religious, needs of the people. They were quick to discern the need of better agricultural and manufacturing methods in order to sustain the ever-increasing population. To the deepening poverty of these multiplying people was due a large amount of the loss of life during the terrible famine of 1877-79 when not less than fifteen millions perished.

The crippling of women by the barbarous practice of foot binding was one of the superstitious customs which needed eradication.

Between the various classes there was deep division, resulting not so much in open strife, from which relief may come, as in the unchecked oppression of the poorer people by the nobles and gentry. Taxes, which were very heavy, were diverted to the pockets of officials. Graft was the order of the time. Interest of from 20 to 30 per cent was charged those who were least able to pay. There were not more than five daily papers in all China until within a few years.

FAILURE OF NATIVE RELIGIONS.

But worst of all, the native religions wholly failed to inspire the people to nobler living or hopes of better things. Confucius, who lived five centuries before Jesus, wrought a masterful work in teaching his people better morals than they had known. The emphasis he laid upon the Five Relations and their duties did much to lift the nation to a higher level of ideals and conduct. Though not a religion, the system of Confucius seemed to presuppose belief in a Supreme Being. The same is true of Mencius and Laotze, the later sages of China. They assumed a universe of law and order. They taught, in a general way, that men are rewarded for love, mercy and justice, faith in this world and the next. In this way Confucianism and the other systems of belief prepared the way for a more perfect faith. They triumphed, especially Confucianism, because of striking superiority to the superstitions that had prevailed before.

Yet these cults, while professed by vast multitudes, have little apparent effect on the lives of the people. The admirable ethics of Confucius and Mencius find expression rather in popular proverbs than in character. Even Buddhism, which entered China as a reforming faith, sunk to ignorance and weakness. The Buddhist and Taoist priests seem to live only to enjoy the revenues of the temples, and are often so ignorant that they can not tell even the names or histories of their gods. It is time a new voice was heard, and a new Name proclaimed. Like the Roman Empire of the first century, China needs the message of the gospel.

ONLY A BEGINNING MADE.

It must not be supposed that more than a beginning has been made in the struggle for better things. But that beginning has actually taken form, and the missionaries have brought it to pass. Their efforts have been directed toward the improvement of the material condition of China by better agricultural, medical, sanitary and industrial conditions; the establishment of a better educational system; the promotion of peace within and without the nation; and the renewal of the people, by moral and religious instruction. In no small degree have the missionary forces in China been responsible for the reforms of 1895-8, which the emperor approved, and to which he became a martyr; the abolition of the old Confucian system of examinations, and the adoption of the new education; and the overthrow of a government which stood as an obstacle in the path of reform, and the establishment of a constitutional rule, under the leadership of such men as Dr. Sun Yat Sen and Yuan Shi-Kai, the first and second provisional presidents of the Chinese Republic. The missionaries are not political agitators. They are not disturbers of the peace. It is no part of their task to engage in civic controversies. Yet their constructive work of education and moral guidance must inevitably issue in a desire for better things and such has been the case.

MISSIONARY ACHIEVEMENTS.

The campaign against foot binding was organized by a Christian woman, Mrs. Archibald Little, and the reform has spread widely over the land.

The Anti-Opium Society, of which Mr. E. W. Thwing of Pekin is the energetic secretary, has aroused a nation-wide protest against an iniquity forced upon China originally by England. Today, in spite of the profit to be derived from the culture and sale of opium, a war of extermination is being waged by the Chinese themselves against the drug, and reluctantly the dealers have been compelled to consent to the gradual limitation and final abandonment of the traffic.

Against the liquor business, tobacco and gambling the missionaries have set their faces, with notable results among the Chinese.

The Christian Literature Society for China, of which Dr. Timothy Richards of Shanghai is secretary, has distributed enormous quantities of books and pamphlets among the reading classes throughout the nation, with very notable results.

Today there are sixty-six daily papers in the country; a hand book of Chinese missions is issued annually; a magazine for women is being published in Chinese; Christian ideals of decency, sanitation and cleanliness are making their way among the people, and in many places the officials are taking the lead in the work.

The influence of Christian practices was seen when, after the recognition of China by the United States on April 8th, of this year, a request was made by the officials of the republic that a day of prayer be observed by all Christians, in the interest of the new government, and April 13th was solemnly set apart for that purpose.

MANY ORGANIZATIONS REPRESENTED.

It is an inspiring sight to see the representatives of the various missionary organizations laboring in northern China, gathered in any of the meetings they are accustomed to hold. Among these groups are the Scotch Presbyterians, the English Baptists, the Canadian Presbyterians, the Wesleyans, the American Protestant Episcopalians, the London Mission, the Church Missionary Society, the American Methodists, and the Rhenish Mission. On a Sunday afternoon I had the pleasure of meeting the missionaries in their weekly union service, and no more interesting and inspiring audience could be found. There were veterans, like Dr. W. A. P. Martin, whose writings are household possessions of all students of missions. And with such additions as Secretaries Daily, Burgess and Edwards of the Young Men's Christian Association, there seemed nothing lacking to the impressiveness and efficiency of the missionary forces. On the Monday night an even greater company met in the home of one of the missionaries, and the discussion that followed the address bore evidence of the alertness and wide information of the company, as well as their enthusiasm in their chosen work. Not one of them doubts that China is the new "Holy Land," in which our Lord is manifesting afresh the marvels of his redemptive work.

Christ Has Already Come!

Our Lord's Promise to Return Has Been Faithfully Kept.

BY JAMES M. CAMPBELL.

EDITOR'S NOTE: It was our expectation to close the discussion of the Second Advent theme with the publication of the article by Mr. Barnes last week. But the following statement from so helpful an interpreter as Dr. Campbell, has unlocked the hard editorial heart and gained admittance to our readers' attention. Dr. Campbell's recent book entitled "The Presence" was given an appreciative editorial review in The Christian Century some time since, but by an oversight, only the title of the book was given. It is published by Eaton & Mains, New York, sells for one dollar, postpaid, and is being heartily received by the large constituency which this well-known author has created by his many other volumes.

ONE of the frequently recurring subjects of interest and discussion is that of our Lord's second advent. I am pleased to see it taken up in the pages of The Christian Century. A subject which occupies such a prominent place in the teachings of the New Testament ought certainly not to be relegated to the background. It is a living issue; for upon our understanding of it, and our attitude towards it, depends whether the coming of the Lord is to us a promise or an experience.

In considering any subject a great deal depends upon the way of approach. We can come upon it directly, and deal with it as detached from all its antecedents; or we can look upon it in the line of its historical development. That the latter is the correct and scholarly method goes without the saying.

Now, the doctrine of the second coming of Christ can never be understood until it is set in its proper place in the unfolding of the presence of God to the children of man. Elsewhere I have tried to show that there are five stages in the realization of God's presence in the world. It is veiled in natural religion, limited and localized in the Old Testament; visualized and personalized in the incarnation; spiritualized in the resurrection, and universalized through the Holy Spirit. The question then is, what point in this process of divine self-manifestation does the second advent of Christ come in? Unquestionably in the latter stage. It follows the resurrection, which gives to us a spiritual Christ; and consists in the revelation by the Holy Spirit of the risen living Christ to the hearts of men.

Rev. James M. Campbell, D. D.

NEW TESTAMENT TEACHINGS.

In the midst of much that is bewildering, there are certain things touching this subject which are clearly taught in the New Testament. Among these are the following:

I. The immediacy of Christ's return.

That Jesus promised to return speedily, and that the early disciples looked for his speedy return, cannot be questioned. Nothing could be more definite than his promise, "I will not leave you orphans: I come unto you. Yet a little while and the world beholdeth me no more, but ye behold me." His coming was to be in the life time of his disciples. There were those who listened to him who were "not to taste of death till they saw the Son of Man coming in his Kingdom." The generation then living was not to pass away until all these things should be accomplished. What shall we say then touching these plain and explicit statements? Was our Lord himself mistaken about the time of his return, as writers like Renan and Huxley have assumed? Or were the disciples mistaken regarding the meaning of the Lord's words? That they made a mistake is evident. Premillenarians think they were mistaken as to the time of the Lord's coming. But is it not more reasonable to suppose that they were mistaken regarding the nature of it? The declarations of Jesus as to the time of his coming are so clear and emphatic, that mistake on that point was scarcely possible. To stretch such an expression as "this generation" over centuries is to play fast and loose with the Master's words. His words can have only one meaning. That he kept his promise to the letter we dare not doubt. He came when he said he would come, but he did not come as his disciples expected him to come.

II. The second coming of Christ was to be accompanied by certain outward signs.

Of these the chief one was the destruction of Jerusalem. But note, the destruction of Jerusalem was not the coming of Christ, as some thoughtlessly affirm, it was merely the sign of his coming. It was an outward sign of a spiritual reality.

III. It was to be at the end of the age then current, namely at the end of the Jewish age.

Endless confusion has arisen from not seeing that the words of Jesus refer not to the end of the "Kosmos," but to the end of the "eon." The thought of Jesus did not reach as far forward as to the end of the world; what he was thinking of was something closer at hand.

IV. It was to be accompanied by judgment.

So also is the end of every age. Every age has its crisis, to which everything leads up. Borrowing from the apocalyptic literature of his times, with which his hearers were familiar, Jesus sets forth the judgment at the close of the Jewish age in intensely dramatic figures. Such expressions as "coming in the clouds of heaven" were used regarding portentous national events. To interpret them fairly there is no need to spiritualize them; all we have to do is to deal with them as with all similar forms of literature.

V. The second coming of Christ was to introduce the new age.

It was to be "the consummation of the ages" and was to take its place as the final stage in an ascending series of revelations. By it Christ was to break through the limitations of his earth-life and become the Christ whom we are to know no longer after the flesh, but after the spirit. By it the spiritual kingdom, for which everything that went before was preparatory, was to be ushered in.

VI. The nature of the second coming is indicated by the terms which are used to express it.

The two principal terms are "erchomai" and "parousia," the one indicating the approach of one who is near; the other indicating that the one on the way has arrived, and is now present. There is a point at which the approach passes into the presence. Hence it is in the presence that we are now to rejoice. What the second advent gives us is a living Christ who is with us "all the days"; even unto the end of this Christian age, as he was with his people to the end of the Jewish age.

THE VIEW THAT HARMONIZES.

This view of things harmonizes the doctrine of the second coming of Christ, which is ever from the outward to the spiritual. Into that conception of things the early disciples grew; as witness the change in the mind of Paul, and especially the spiritual interpretation of that event by John in his gospel —an interpretation which agrees with universal Christian experience. There is something pathetic in seeing Christians today harking back to Paul's earlier experience, when he looked for the Lord to return in some outward, visible form, instead of entering into his later and riper experience, when the actual presence of his Lord was the very life of his soul. There is nothing that the Christian soul needs more for its quickening, nothing that the Christian church needs more for its empowerment than the recognition of the blessed fact that the Lord has kept his promise; he has come back to this world that needs him; that he is here, the indwelling life of the believer, the Lord and Leader of his church, the mighty Conquering King who is seeking to unite the hosts of righteousness, that he may lead them on to final victory.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

CLOSER CO-OPERATION OF WOMEN'S SOCIETIES.

When Champ Clark took his seat as Speaker of the House of Representatives, with its overwhelming democratic majority, his feelings found vent in the words of the old hymn, "This is the hour I long have sought."

The women of today might truly echo the same sentiment, for this is the hour when their work in the Kingdom and for the Kingdom has reached its fullest flower. It is true that the door of liberty and service was opened to them nineteen hundred years ago, when Jesus accepted their ministrations, and permitted their presence in the little company that journeyed with him along the highways of Galilee and hillsides of Judea. And the greatest honor ever bestowed on womanhood was that to her eyes was granted the first vision of her risen Lord, to her lips was committed the first proclamation of the Great, Central Truth in the world's history—the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ.

But, as the plant can only reach its full, consummate flower in the fit season and the right environment, so woman could not enter on her heritage of liberty and service till the fulness of her time arrived.

The "more life and fuller" that was her dower has come in this day and in this land. Many subtle forces, both in the social and religious world, have long been contributing to this modern uplift of womanhood, but we have only space to mention two in this brief article.

INDUSTRIAL RIGHTS OF WOMEN.

The substitution of machine for hand labor, which made skill and dexterity rank with physical strength, made the entrance of women into the industrial world possible, and thus insured to an increasing number of them an income of their own. This was a great advance, for a certain amount of financial independence is necessary to self-respect—the highest price any worthy being can pay for anything is to ask for it. Certainly, initiative is impossible, when one lacks the means of carrying out one's plans. Now that there are about seven millions of women engaged in all the three hundred wage-earning occupations except five or six, and that juster laws are giving them the ownership and control of their property, this power of promoting the interests of the Kingdom is immensely increased.

WOMEN'S EDUCATIONAL RIGHTS.

Previous to the nineteenth century, the most rudimentary education was considered all that was necessary for a woman; anything beyond that was supposed to unfit her for the sphere to which she belonged. When one visits Oxford University in England, where the most generous provision has been made for the education of men for eight centuries, and where women have been admitted to a limited share in its privileges for only thirty-five years, the injustice of this discrimination is evident. Now, after a long and hard fight, women are fully admitted to educational institutions in this country, and the only limits put to their scholarship are those they set themselves.

The struggle for these two fundamental rights, the right to a choice of vocation, and the right to equal educational advantages with men, crowded the first half of the past century. It was not until the last half was well on its way that assured victory perched on her banners. But even before she secured the industrial, educational and legal rights that are now accorded to her in most of our states, she heard the call of the great and needy world about her, to use her new-found strength for its help and uplift.

COMMON AIMS OF WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS.

In order to do this, there must be united effort, and so came the impulse to organization. It is not possible even to mention the multiplied women's organizations that we now see on every side; while they follow widely different lines of endeavor, yet they all have the altruistic note in common; the deep, underlying motive in every one of them is the desire and purpose for social service. One of the needs of today in the organized work of women is a recognition and appreciation of their common aims—a vision that looks beyond the superficial and extraneous and sees the secret springs that are moving the women of our land to do their part in the betterment of our race and all mankind.

I have faith to believe that all these forces are tending to some ultimate good; not only the distinctly religious organizations, like the Women's Missionary Societies, the Young Women's Christian Associations, but the Woman's Suffrage Movement, the Temperance Associations, the Women's Clubs, the Red Cross Movement, the Civic Leagues, the Patriotic Societies, and other organizations—all are tending to make this old world better and in this way are forwarding the interests of the Kingdom of Heaven. They may seem to be following widely different paths, but all are traveling to the same great goal—the preparation of the way of the Lord, the making straight his paths.

CLOSER CO-OPERATION NEEDED.

When the women's organizations mutually recognize the nobility of each other's aims, then there will be a better understanding and a closer co-operation among them. When they feel the tie that binds them, then can they move as one united army and bring to bear a new point of view on age-long evils that have afflicted our whole social structure. When the voice of the mothers of the race, potential, as well as actual, is lifted up, the wrongs of women and children in the labor world, the social evil, the white slave traffic will no longer be tolerated, and the loathsome sex diseases, that are working such havoc in society today, will become as much things of the past as the plague, and the black death of the middle ages.

With such great tasks before us—tasks which need the united voice and influence of the womanhood of our land, and of the world for their accomplishment, should we not cultivate a fuller appreciation of our common aims, and seek a closer co-operation and fellowship than ever before in the history of women's organizations?

Pennsylvania's new eugenic marriage law, which went into effect August 1, is eliciting such varied comment as to show that it is not by any means ideal.

BILLS ENDORSED BY WOMEN PASS.

The magnificent batch of legislation in the interests of the women voters by the last Legislature of California has aroused so much favorable comment that the following list of statutes actually endorsed by the women is of interest. The College Equal Suffrage League of Northern California in a recent statement says that these were the only measures endorsed by the women voters:

A.B. 353. An act providing for the abatement of houses of prostitution, making houses of prostitution a nuisance and providing for enjoining persons who conduct or maintain such a house, and the owner, lessee, or agent of a building where such nuisance is maintained.

A.B. 199. Equal guardianship act, providing that the father and mother of a legitimate unmarried minor child are equally entitled to its custody, services and earnings.

A.B. 795. The bastardy act, requiring fathers to support their illegitimate children.

A.B. 1251. Minimum wage act, regulating the employment of women and children; establishing an industrial welfare commission to investigate and deal with such employment. This commission has power to fix a minimum wage.

S.B. 466. An act limiting the hours of labor of women. This act increases the scope of the eight-hour law, which provides that women shall not be employed more than 48 hours in one week, nor more than six days in one week.

S.B. 1034. Regulating the employment of children; providing that no minor under eighteen years shall be employed more than eight hours in one day, and no minor between the ages of twelve and fifteen shall be employed for wages or profit. Exceptions are made.

S.B. 10. Defines crime of rape. This act raises the age of consent to eighteen years.

S.B. 55. Raises the penalty for the crime of rape, minimum ten years' imprisonment, maximum fifty years. Formerly minimum was five and maximum ten years.

S.B. 46. Establishes a state training school for delinquent girls, and appropriates $200,000 therefor.

A.B. 16. Provides for the free use of all public schoolhouses and property, and for establishing a civic center at each and every public schoolhouse in the state.

A.B. 803. Provides for the support of public kindergartens, making kindergartens a part of the public school system.

A.B. 1263. Provides for the payment of pensions to public school teachers' pension fund.

S.B. 32. Establishes a standard of weights and measures, and provides for a state superintendent of weights and measures.

S.B. 788. The net container act provides for indicating on the label the net quantity of food stuff in a container.

S.B. 526. Provides for the state registration of nurses.

A.B. 511. Providing for cases in which a married woman may sue and be sued separately from her husband, as when her separate property is concerned, her right to homestead property, etc.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

FACING A CONDITION.

IT IS to The Christian Century that the credit or blame of first proposing and urging a national delegate convention of Disciples is due. Through the dozen years of discussion this paper has held to its original position, and while in recent years its advocacy has not been ardent there has been no suggestion of opposition.

Nor are we now, in the abstract, opposed. The arguments brought against it by present opponents are, to us, without point or meaning. That the Scriptures forbid a church of Christ to send delegates to act for it in conference with delegates from other churches of Christ is, to our mind, unthinkable. And as to the cry of "ecclesiasticism," The Christian Century frankly says that it believes in ecclesiasticism. It believes that every local church of Christ is, and should regard itself as being, subordinate to the whole Church of Christ. The kind of ecclesiasticism we are opposed to is denominational ecclesiasticism—the subordination of a local church of Christ to a part, and that an artificial part, of the Church of Christ.

Against denominationalism, whether in the larger Christian world or among Disciples of Christ, The Christian Century has set itself, with full awareness that its attitude is bound to evoke opposition from forces which have established themselves within our own communion as well as from those without.

In the present crisis, however, it is not a theory alone but a condition that confronts us. It grows clearer each day that actually to take the step decided upon at Louisville last year means alienation and a gradually opening rupture between the main body of our people and a not inconsiderable section.

The Christian Century believes that an irrecoverable blunder will be committed if the procedure at Toronto furnishes substantial occasion for the opponents of delegate conventions to call a mass meeting of their own and eventually to interpret it as the successor of our traditional mass conventions with which the new order has broken.

JANE ADDAMS' CONVERSION.

HOW impossible it is to state the experience of conversion in a pat formula! And how fascinating with moral romance is the story of any soul that has learned the simple art of telling just what happened to it in the experience of accepting Christ and allying itself with his disciples!

The time has not long passed since Miss Jane Addams' work in Hull House, Chicago, was criticised by some church people on the ground that it was secular, or at best motived only by the ideal of ethical culture. It was said that Miss Addams lacked a Christian experience! Here, however, is her own "conversion" story, told in her autobiography, "Twenty Years at Hull House," and told with such freshness of spiritual feeling and moral insight as to make it an illuminator of the experiences of all of us, especially of those of us who have had to depend on conventional set phrases to describe what took place when we took the great step. She writes as follows:

> The summers were spent in the old home in northern Illinois. And one Sunday morning I received the rite of baptism and became a member of the Presbyterian church in the village. At this time there was certainly no outside pressure pushing me toward such a decision, and at twenty-five one does not ordinarily take such a step from a mere desire to conform. While I was not conscious of an "emotional" conversion, I took upon myself the outward expressions of the religious life with all humility and sincerity. It was doubtless true that I was
> "Weary of myself and sick of asking
> What I am and what I ought to be,"
> and that various cherished safeguards and claims to self-dependence had been broken into by many piteous failures. But certainly I had been brought to the conclusion that "sincerely to give up one's conceit or hope of being good in one's own right is the only door to the universe's deeper reaches." Perhaps the young clergyman recognized this as the test of the Christian temper, at any rate he required little assent to dogma or miracle and assured me that while both the ministry and the officers of his church were obliged to subscribe to doctrines of well-known severity, the faith required of the laity was almost early Christian in its simplicity. I was conscious of no change from my childish acceptance of the teachings of the Gospels, but at this moment something persuasive within me made me long for an outward symbol of fellowship, some bond of peace, some blessed spot where unity of spirit might claim right of way over all differences. There was also growing within me an almost passionate devotion to the ideals of democracy, and when in all history had these ideals been so thrillingly expressed as when the faith of the fisherman and the slave had been boldly opposed to the accepted moral belief that the well-being of a privileged few might justly be built upon the ignorance and sacrifice of the many? Who was I with my dreams of universal fellowship, that I did not identify myself with the institutional statement of this belief, as it stood in the little village in which I was born, and without which testimony in each remote hamlet of Christendom, it would be so easy for the world to slip back into the doctrines of selection and aristocracy?

Here is an apologetic for the Church which one will search many theological volumes to surpass—and search in vain.

EYES OPENING TO A NEGLECTED DUTY.

THE Disciples of Christ are giving fine proof of both their vigor and their essential Christianity by the way they are meeting the necessities of their retired ministers and missionaries through the Board of Ministerial Relief. They are overcoming the feeling that the mere location of any general board's headquarters restricts its interest or its support to one state or section.

This board is in Indianapolis, but Missouri has taken the lead both in offerings and pensions, while Texas and California are evidently coming to feel that it is just as much their own. It was not a citizen of Indiana who offered to add twenty per cent to the whole brotherhood's offerings to Ministerial Relief for five years, but Indiana vied with Pennsylvania and Ohio in meeting his challenge last year and passing his minimum of $20,000. This year the goal is $30,000. The offering was begun at the communion service of the Louisville Convention, which happened to be made on Kentucky soil, but came from Canada and Georgia also. An Illinois physician's bequest of $5,000, an Ohio widow's $1,000 and an Indiana merchant's $2,500 are among the outstanding gifts to date.

From the secretary's statement in the Jacksonville, Ill., Convention we judge that the offerings of churches and individuals are widely distributed. The Honolulu Church took the lead by pledging $100 at Louisville. As to the churches, it is reassuring that not one has yet been reported that heard the facts of this cause and refused to give. This puts the responsibility squarely on the pastors. Even in the one week that remains something can be done by every man who has not already acted. To refuse bread to our fathers in the faith is to deny the faith. Practically, the failure of even a dollar gift may leave the whole body short of its $30,000. On September 1 there lacked $10,680; September 8, $7,866. The margin remaining makes our duty plain.

A SUGGESTIVE PARALLEL.

PROFESSOR C. M. SHARPE, speaking on the program of the Illinois Convention of Disciples in behalf of the Divinity House at the University of Chicago, drew an interesting parallel between Alexander Campbell and the late William R. Harper, president of the university. Religion was the soul of Pres. Harper's conception of education, said Dr. Sharpe. He pointed to the Religious Education Association of which Dr. Harper was the founder, and to his far-reaching and stimulating influence as a teacher of the Biblical literature. Dr. Harper did in his day what Alexander Campbell did in his. Each interpreted the Bible in the light of the best science of his time; each was fearless in his pursuit of knowledge about the Scriptures and each was humble enough to accept the consequences of discovered truth no matter what they might be.

The analogy is suggestive. Mr. Campbell's great heresy in Biblical interpretation was his contention that there is a difference in the values of different Scripture. In an age when men turned indifferently to the Old or the New Testament to find the way of salvation Mr. Campbell declared that the Old was incomplete and that in the New Testament alone was God's will adequately revealed. He stood strongly against the superstition of what Professor Willett calls the "level Bible." The theory of successive covenants—of "starlight," "moonlight" and "sunlight" dispensations—of the "right division of the word," evoked bitter opposition among those who were in the habit of allowing the Bible to open of itself and then superstitiously taking whatever verse first met the eye as the especial message of God.

Dr. Harper stood for precisely Mr. Campbell's method of Biblical interpretation, except that his was more thoroughgoing and vitalistic. This, however, was because Dr. Harper lived two generations later than Alexander Campbell. The evolutionary conception of the Scripture of which Dr. Harper was a renowned interpreter is simply the working out in modern terms of the dispensational conception which brought to Mr. Campbell no less renown than opposition.

It is important for Disciples of Christ to keep in mind that all the precedents of their history ally them with the progressive and scholarly interpreters of the Bible in our day.

DELEGATE CONVENTIONS—BUT WHAT FOR?

COULD there be a better time than just now for the Disciples of Christ to arrest the denominational tendency which their movement has in the past taken?

The proposed delegate convention called to meet in Toronto, as conceived by those now urging and interpreting it, is a natural further step into the ecclesiasticism which our ideals have always condemned. It fits in perfectly with the conceptions of those who have been leading our people during the past generation. It is quite essential to the program of those who see for us no significance in the enterprise of Christian unity beyond diplomatic Commissions and Church Federation.

A delegate convention is a natural enough affair; it is innocuous enough, desirable enough—we will go so far as to assert that it is even necessary. No reasonable objection can be urged to the appointment by the churches of delegates to represent them in a national convention.

It all depends upon what the convention is FOR.

If the convention is called to devise ways and means of carrying forward the distinctive purposes of the Disciples' MOVEMENT FOR CHRISTIAN UNITY it is not only legitimate but admirable.

But if it is called to advance the interests of the Disciples' DENOMINATION it should be opposed by all those who yearn to see us break the denominational fetters with which we have already been bound.

It seems clear that the consummation of such a representative organization at this time will only crystallize yet more solidly this ecclesiastical denomination we have grown to be. It will make our ecclesiasticism more respectable; it will give it caste; it will therefore make it easier for our consciences to tolerate it.

Were our movement once fairly freed from its denominational character there is no doubt that this kind of convention could be used effectively, and without danger, for the great non-denominational purpose for which we were born.

It is doubtful that a convention called for the purposes usually urged by the advocates of the present proposal could be so used.

The standing model to which the Disciples are pointed is the Northern Baptist Convention.

Behold what a good result has been accomplished since Baptists gave up their mass meeting and adopted an orderly convention based upon congregational representation!

But what is this good result? The Baptist denomination has had its ecclesiastical efficiency increased. That is the result, and it is good.

But it is good because the Baptist denomination is a denomination. It does not follow that such a result would justify the Disciples in adopting such a convention. On the contrary, those who have not yet surrendered the historic ideals of the Disciples would not hesitate to affirm that such a result among Disciples would be sad beyond expression.

If there is yet a chance to rescue our historic ideals from the ecclesiastical denomination into which we have allowed ourselves to be moulded it would seem as if the agitation against the delegate convention affords as good an occasion for us to stop and think as has come to us in many years or may come again.

THE PASSION FOR SOULS.

OUR churches are installing new and improved machinery. They are planning more and more effective methods. They are ordering systems and plans to prevent waste and promote efficiency. But all these will be as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal if there be not a possion for souls. The world needs knowledge, but knowledge will never save the world. The world needs eloquence, but eloquence will not save the world. Much as the church needs a learned ministry and an eloquent presentation of the gospel message, its first and greatest need is spiritual fervor, born of a passion for souls. Education cannot save a soul from sin. Erudition cannot give peace to a guilty conscience. Rich music and an elaborate service cannot bring pardon and peace. The Church of God needs to feel in its heart and manifest through all its activities, a passion for the saving of souls.

OPTIMISM AND FACTS.

COMMENTING upon Hugh Macdonald's statement in The Christian Century recently concerning Dr. Garrison's "unquenchable optimism" in refusing to face certain ominous facts among Disciples of Christ, the latter asks from his "Easy Chair" in The Christian Evangelist: "Has not our optimism been vindicated by the character and results of these [our national] conventions?" Replying to his own question Dr. Garrison says:

> Everyone of them has been a mile-stone on the way to a larger and more useful career. Timorous spirits have predicted strife where there has been remarkable unity with brotherly love. Last year, it will be remembered, dire results were feared and prophesied; but in the whole history of the Disciples no convention has ever marked greater progress than that at Louisville and a most important issue was decided with remarkable unanimity.

As we understood Mr. Macdonald, Dr. Garrison has altogether missed his point. Our contributor was not referring to the conventions but to the brotherhood. He could probably point to the Omaha convention and the Topeka convention as exceptions to Dr. Garrison's optimistic characterization. But his point was that, quite apart from whatever harmony and progress our conventions have exhibited, the years have witnessed increasing bitterness and alienation in the brotherhood itself. This no observer will deny.

Dr. Garrison ventures "another optimistic prediction." He says: "The convention at Toronto is going to be one of the very best in our history. It will probably not be so large as the one in Louisville last year, as it will not be so central, but it will be marked by great harmony and spiritual power."

In this prophecy we agree. And we pray that it may not fail.

Our optimism is clouded, however, by the reflection that our "harmony" will be purchased by the absence of those who might disturb it.

A GREAT YEAR FOR BIBLES.

THE circulation for the British and Foreign Bible Society for the last year reached the astounding figures of 7,899,000 volumes. The Bible Society of Scotland for the last year, has a circulation of 2,359,985 volumes. If these figures are added to the issues of the American Bible Society, which have already been published as 4,049,610 volumes, a superb total of 14,308,595 volumes represents the missionary circulation of the Scriptures on the part of the English-speaking world. To this great total number should be added the commercial circulation of the Scripture by the great Bible presses, small and large, the circulation of Continental Bible Societies which, at the present time, we are not able to give. It requires some effort of the imagination to see the significance of this vast sowing of the seed of the Kingdom in the field of the world.

SIR OLIVER LODGE.

THE presidential address of Sir Oliver Lodge before the British Association for the Advancement of Science is one of those rare documents on religious subjects that finds its way with any degree of adequacy into the secular press. This address was printed in full by many metropolitan newspapers as if it possessed equal value with the doings at the nation's capital, or with some well advertised sporting event. And it surely is a live human document. Academic, careful, but flashing with imaginative suggestion, it digs below the foundation upon which physical science rests and finds there a sound basis for the spiritual order.

Some may not regard it as quite accurate to call Sir Oliver's address a religious document as we have done. But if a challenge and expose of the materialistic interpretation of the world in defence of an idealistic interpretation be not a religious document we know not where to find one. Certainly one's faith in God and righteousness and the future life feels itself being girded about with strength while reading his words.

"Continuity" was his theme, by which many took it that his address would deal mainly with the possibility of consciousness after death. Only in a small section does he speak directly to the problem of immortality, and then he but bears his testimony that he shares the universal hope, without bringing forward any proofs to support it. He says that, in his opinion, "memory and affection are not limited to that association with matter by which alone they manifest themselves here and now, but personality persists beyond death."

With science Sir Oliver, himself a distinguished physicist, has no quarrel, but he protests against the claim of some scientists that their methods exhaust the content of reality. The actions of living things cannot be fully explained by physics. Following is a sample of his reasoning:

> It has been becoming more and more certain that, as regards performance of work, a living thing obeys the laws of physics, like everything else; but undoubtedly it initiates processes and produces results that without it could not have occurred—from a bird's nest to a honeycomb, from a deal box to a warship. The behavior of a ship firing shot and shell is explicable in terms of energy, but the discrimination which it exercises between friend and foe is not so explicable. There is plenty of physics and chemistry and mechanics about every vital action, but for a complete understanding of it something beyond physics and chemistry is needed. I will risk the assertion that life introduces something incalculable and purposeful amid the laws of physics; it thus distinctly supplements those laws, though it leaves them otherwise precisely as they were and obeys them all.

To his fellow scientists he says that his function is "to remind you that our studies do not exhaust the universe, and that if we dogmatize in a negative direction, and say that we can reduce everything to physics and chemistry we gibbet ourselves as ludicrously narrow pedants." On the whole Sir Oliver may be said to reflect the dominant point of view among philosophizing scholars, with whom his thesis has become commonplace enough, albeit it takes some time for the non-academic world to realize it.

The wide publicity given this presidential address will help greatly to carry out to the popular mind the reassurance which science nowadays is bringing to religion.

BAPTIST AND CONGREGATIONAL UNION.

A BAPTIST and a Congregational church were merged in a single congregation in England during the past summer. The event is treated as a foretoken of many such unions in the near future. The especial difficulty of Baptists and Congregationalists standing together in America is not present in England where baptism is regarded by most Baptist churches as a purely optional matter with each individual, just as the Lord's Supper is regarded. Many Baptist churches there contain unbaptized (unimmersed) members.

At the dedication of the new house in which the united congregation is to worship, Rev. J. Morgan Gibbon in a striking address spoke on "The Church." It is, he said, to provide the spiritual with a foothold, to send witnesses to do God's work, that the church is called into existence. A man can be a religious man without being a member of a church, but he cannot fulfil the functions of a religious man without uniting himself with other religious men into a church in order to hallow by religion other men, and to remind them of it, to call them to it, to show them the way to the Church of God." He continued:

> This is a union church, a union of two denominations in the persons of people representing them and uniting here. Well, if you Baptists are going to conceive the possibility of the salvation of a Congregationalist, and if you Congregationalists are going to conceive the possibility of the ultimate redemption of the Baptists, that means you must go much further than that. You must not keep that to yourself, you must extend it, so as to proclaim the ultimate salvation even of a Methodist, Primitive, Wesleyan, and of all church people. You must show you are all members and brothers—all children of God, otherwise your union church will be a piece of costly sarcasm, and people will say, "In union they are narrower than in disunion." God forbid that it should be. Nonconformists have waited long for further ecclesiastical union. When our brethren, the Church of England, say, "Come back to us," I venture to say we are never going back. "You come on, gentlemen. You come on to us. We are waiting for you, and will unite with you. If you want to have priority, you shall have it. If you will lend us your Bishops occasionally, they will be of great use to us." I should like immensely to pool the gifts of the Church and pick the brains of an Archbishop, and the Archbishops could pick the brains of such a man as Dr. Clifford. They would find some good pickings there.

The Island of Dreams

By Thomas Curtis Clark.

Over the mist-shrouded Ocean of Years,
  Lighted by memory's gleams,
Far from the Mainland of Sorrow and Tears,
  Lieth the Island of Dreams.
Cometh no winter to that blissful Isle;
  There summer reigneth for aye;
On its fair gardens abideth the smile
  Of a ne'er-vanishing day.

Far o'er its meadows, where wild roses blow,
  By its soft-murmuring streams,
Children play ever, with faces aglow,
  Rapt in the joy of their dreams.
Never a cloud mars the blue of those skies,
  No dark'ning tempest or rain.
Sunshine abides where that happy Isle lies,
  Far o'er the mist-shrouded main.

Yet, from that Island, in ships passing fair,
  Light hearts embark all the day,
Seeking the City of Knowledge, somewhere
  Out o'er the billowy way.
Over the waters the ships bear them far,—
  Lost is the Island of Dreams;
Outward they speed them, past hindering bar,
  Seeking the City's fair gleams.

Far in the Westland the Island is lost;
  Soon from the East cometh night;
Over the Ocean of Years they are tossed,
  Longing for day and for light.
Still for them shineth Hope's radiant star,
  Beckoning evermore on
Over the ocean that stretches afar
  Unto the eternal Dawn.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

HOW many religions there are that go by the name Christian! And how remote they are from one another! I have been wondering if our Christian name does not itself cover as many varieties of religion as are represented by the leading cults of mankind.

These reflections were started by a series of attempts to hold profitable conversations with a Seventh Day Adventist. We both believed the Bible; we both believed in God and in Christ; but I found that his Bible was as much unlike mine as mine is unlike the Koran. His idea of God was, it seemed to me, less Christian than a Hindu's idea, and I found little in common with him in our views of Christ.

We are both serious minded men, and naturally our talk, when we are together, gravitates toward the deeper levels upon which our religion rests. We weary of the casual things. But we no sooner get into a religious theme than we become conscious of living in two worlds which overlap very little. I try, and I think I can observe him trying too, to concede as much as I can, but I am aware that even my concessions mean one thing to him and another to me.

We are good friends; our casual circumstances would make us intimate friends; but we are conscious that despite our utmost efforts at courtesy and mutual understanding, our views of life will not mix. At times when one has pressed the other too far, there is a sharp contention, and our conversation gets tied up into a hard knot, and it is very difficult to release the tension and end the evening gracefully.

After such an experience I vow to myself that I will never discuss religion with him again. Our next evening together is spent, therefore, talking about politics, and our neighbors, and relating to each other our business experiences, and so forth. But neither of us is comfortable. Each is conscious that he is only whiling away the time, and each longs to dip into the overflowing spring of his religious experience and impart therefrom something to the other.

AFTER all, what is there to talk about, if one cannot talk about religion? Your intimacy with your friend does not extend very far into his life unless your main conversation is upon religion or things in which religion is implicit. I can imagine no full depth of love between a man and woman whose religions are disparite. There is a good deal more in the Roman Catholic provision against children of the church marrying outside the Church, than her mere fear of losing institutional control over them. When it comes to the deep things of life how much is missed in a home where the husband is a Catholic and the wife a Protestant—assuming that each is conscientious and faithful. It has often come before my observation as a positive tragedy. There might be much consideration on both sides, mutual respect for each other's conscience and habits, a working convention, well defined, providing that two of the children should be trained as Catholics and two as Protestants, that the family's gifts to religion should be equally divided, and that on Sunday morning the attendance of both sides of the house at the church of its choice should not be interfered with, while the evening hours might be spent together at home or in quiet enjoyment.

Such conventions obtain in cultivated and considerate families whose religions are heterogeneous. But how sad! In spite of the utmost kindliness on both sides how much must be missed from those lives. Would a Christian Protestant have less in common with a Mohammedan than with a Roman Catholic? In the fundamental sense in which we conceive Christianity, is the Roman Church a church of Christ? Or, (with less implication of bigotry than that question contains), on the assumption that our conception of Christianity is Christ's conception, is the Roman Church a Christian church? Does its connection with the historical institution make it Christian? Does its possession of the same book and its declared devotion to the same Name make it Christian?

Wherever the Roman Church rules there is superstition and paganism. Who will say that Mexico and Spain need missionaries less than Japan?

ON another side I see Unitarianism. It also wears the Christian name. But I have often felt my inability to hold intimate communion with a Unitarian. We have more in common, perhaps, than the Seventh Day Adventist and myself, but after we have gone a certain distance we reach a point where we cannot walk together. He is an out-and-out rationalist. By this I do not mean that he is devoid of emotion, or that he acknowledges no truth except that derived from reason. I mean that he insists upon stating truth in rational terms alone.

But I have never found any scientific or philosophical terms that are adequate to express all that my soul feels when I pronounce the great words, "grace" and "cross" and "atonement" and "redemption" and "Saviour" and many others. I am a symbolist. Some would like to call me a mystic, though I do not like that word so well. The best word of all is "evangelical." I am an out-and-out evangelical. And my Unitarian friend soon reaches a point in our intercourse where he cannot walk with me. He calls himself a Christian and I call myself a Christian, but we are far apart in the depths of our souls—not far apart in our sense of need or our aspirations or in our problems, but far apart in the way we answer our problems.

I remember well a dinner party given in honor of the distinguished Hindu, Swami Vivekananda, who visited the World's Congress of Religions in Chicago twenty years ago. I found to my surprise that we had much in common. But I found that he could not follow us in the evangelical statement of our faith. The vital touch between us in the things of the soul was possible only by positive mental effort. There was no spontaneity in our communion. I do not think this was wholly due to the differences of our ethnic habits.

I have the same feelings with my Unitarian friends.

AND here is Christian Science. It too is a "Christian" religion. But with my religion it has definitely broken. And it is more foreign to my soul than the religion of Vivekananda, although I must admit that I think I can find more intimate communion with a Christian Scientist than with a Seventh Day Adventist.

I gladly concede the obvious virtues of many Christian Scientists I have known. But I have been wholly unable to establish a contact with any believer of that cult whereby we could walk together in exploration and interpretation of the deeper things of our life. A Buddhist would not be farther from me than one of Mrs. Eddy's disciples.

Yet we read the same Bible and own the same Lord and wear the same name. But our souls are shut against each other in respect of the treasuries of our religious experience quite as effectually as are our private bank accounts. Can our religions both be Christian?

Your readers, Mr. Editor, will recall the story of Father and Son which I told on this page last week. The religion of the Plymouth Brethren was the religion of the father. To his mind the son had chosen a literally pagan course when he refused longer to consent to the doctrine of the Second Coming and to limit his world of interests by the boundaries of his father's sect.

Yet the son had not denied the Scriptures, nor Christ, nor God. He still would call himself a Christian. But between them there came to be a great gulf, and all communion of spiritual life was cut off.

This is one of the tragedies of our spiritual experience. We are alike in the things of outward aspect, in the names we wear, but unlike and even contradictory in our inward satisfactions.

When I call the roll of the religions that go by the same name as my own, I wonder whose is the true Christian religion!

And I am not so bigoted, Mr. Editor, but that I sometimes wonder whether I am, in truth, a Christian myself.

HUGH MACDONALD.

Of Human Interest

President Wilson's "Jessie."

She is fair, with blue eyes and regular features. She wears her hair simply, the two braids wound about her head, and she has an infectious laugh and charming voice. For the last two years she has been intensely interested in sociological work, and to the various branches that concern working girls she has devoted herself with practical earnestness. When she engaged in settlement work in Philadelphia and went about in the Kensington mill district she often sat down with the mill workers at the bare tables of the Lighthouse restaurant, where the menu was chalked on the wall and the dinner cost 15 cents. She lived in the settlement houses and proved herself one of the most efficient workers in the community, where personal, direct understanding means more than charity or creed. "There is no charity in this work," Miss Jessie Wilson said not long ago concerning the settlement, "but self-sacrifice and interest in others." When she was working for the vacation camps and urged the pleasure and benefit derived from life in the open with good comradeship, the democracy of it all was appealing. "It is splendid," she said. "There you become acquainted just as little children do who say, 'What's your name and where do you live?' and are good friends ever after!"

A Mark Twain Story.

A good old Mark Twain story will bear another repetition. A friend once wrote him a letter, saying that he was in very bad health, and concluding:

"Is there anything worse than having toothache and earache at the same time?"

Twain wrote back: "Yes—rheumatism and St. Vitus dance."

Secretary Daniels' Boys.

I happen to have four boys who are healthy specimens of the North Carolina type of youngsters.

My oldest boy is in school in North Carolina, and when I became a member of the Cabinet it meant temporary separation of this lad from his parents and younger brothers.

Tears were flowing freely in a family gathering over this thought, when the cause of the trouble flashed suddenly into the mind of one of them.

He wailed out:

"Doggone Mr. Wilson!"

But it did not take the boys long to become Washingtonians.

Just as I returned from a Cabinet meeting I was startled one day to find upon my desk a Black Hand epistle. It read:

"Leave $10,000 on the old stump or you die."

After the first shock I sent Captain Palmer, my aid, to ask if either of my four sons had been in to see me, and learned that two of them had called and made themselves at home at my desk.

George Gould on "Fine Feathers."

George Gould was talking at Piping Rock about the Sackville-Scott will contest in London.

"All society was there," said Mr. Gould. "Society even brought its luncheon. The courtroom between 1 and 2 o'clock resembled Sherry's or Ciro's at Monte Carlo, or even Armenonville itself.

"It's like a story they tell.

"'How about that famous society divorce case?' said one man to another.

"'Postponed,' was the reply.

"'Why was it postponed? Lawyers not ready?'

"'Oh, the lawyers were ready, but the dressmakers weren't.'"

A. Graham Bell's Philosophy.

Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone, hit on his marvelous discovery while studying and while teaching the deaf.

At a dinner in Washington Professor Bell said, apropos of this fact:

"Yes, we can learn valuable secrets from the most unlikely sources. A Persian poet, famed for his wisdom, was once asked by his king where he had learned his philosophy.

"'From the blind, sire,' the poet replied—'from the blind, who never advance a step till they have tried the ground.'"

Bryan on "Hiding One's Light."

Secretary Bryan, at a luncheon in Washington, said of a man who, through modesty, had declined an important and useful office:

"So he wants to hide his light under a bushel, eh? Then perhaps the country is just as well off without his services."

The secretary smiled and added:

"When a man talks of hiding his light under a bushel, I usually think that a thimble would answer the purpose just as well."

Bishop Doane on Marriage.

The late Bishop Doane of Albany, a strict conservative, had his own views as to woman's place in the world. No feminist this good Tory bishop, no advocate of militancy, no exponent of Ellen Key, or Bernard Shaw, or "newness" of any sort.

Bishop Doane believed in marriage of the real old-fashioned kind, and to bridegrooms at weddings he used sometimes to make a little speech.

"My young friend," he would say to the pale and nervous bridegroom, patting him on the back, "you are now embarking, my young friend, on a long, hazardous voyage, and I bid you remember the Finnish proverb.

"For the Finnish sailors, my young friend, have a proverb to this effect:

"'The man who on the ship of matrimony signs as mate will never get promoted.'"

How Roosevelt "Held" His Audience.

When in 1900 I was nominated for vice-president I was sent by the national committee on a trip into the states of the high plains and the Rocky Mountains, writes the Ex-President in the Chicago News. These had all gone overwhelmingly for Mr. Bryan on the free silver issue four years previously, and it was thought that I, because of my knowledge of and acquaintance with the people, might accomplish something toward bringing them back into line.

It was an interesting trip, and the monotony usually attendant upon such a campaign of political speaking was diversified in vivid fashion by occasional hostile audiences. One or two of the meetings ended in riots. One meeting was finally broken up by a mob; everybody fought, so that the speaking had to stop. Soon after this we reached another town where we were told there might be trouble. Here the local committee included an old and valued friend, a "two gun" man of repute, who was not in the least quarrelsome, but who always kept his word. We marched round to the local opera house, which was packed with a mass of men, many of them rather rough looking. My friend, the two gun man, sat immediately behind me, a gun on each hip, his arms folded, looking at the audience; fixing his gaze with instant intentness on any section of the house from which there came so much as a whisper. The audience listened to me with rapt attention. At the end, with a pride in my rhetorical powers which proceeded from a misunderstanding of the situation, I remarked to the chairman: "I held that audience well; there wasn't an interruption." To which the chairman replied: "Interruption? Well, I guess not! Seth Bullock had sent round word that if any son of a gun peeped he'd kill him!"

From Near and Far

Returning to Chicago from the International Medical Conference, Dr. J. B. Murphy is taking up a fight against so-called "social disease." "There should be a city ordinance," he said, "compelling all persons infected with the so-called social diseases to report at once to public authorities. A commission for the handling of such cases should be appointed. When a person is infected he should be quarantined until he is completely cured and then there would be none of the visitation of suffering upon the mother and children that we hear so much about."

Mrs. Catherine Booth Clibborn, of the Salvation Army, introduced last week at the convention of the Chicago Christian Endeavor union as the greatest woman evangelist in the world, was to speak on "The Gospel Smile" at the opening meeting in the Northwestern University building. But Mrs. Clibborn did not mention the gospel smile. She told the Christian Endeavor delegates that they were too complacent, too self-satisfied, that they had made friends with the devil, that with their numbers they should sweep the country.

It is rumored that Mrs. William H. Taft, wife of the former president, has written her reminiscenses of four years in the White House for a woman's magazine. The report has excited a great deal of comment, as it has been an unwritten law that no first lady of the land ever permits herself to be interviewed or writes for publication.

When Andover Theological Seminary was moved to Cambridge, Mass., and became allied with Harvard University, it had enrolled five students. This was five years ago. During the coming year, the seminary will have forty students; twenty of them will be in the junior class.

Sir William Ramsay of London, England, the Scottish classical scholar and church historian, will deliver a series of lectures in Chicago under the auspices of the Moody Bible institute.

Suffragists in Ohio are confident that their senators, Burton and Pomerene, will vote for the nation-wide suffrage amendment.

Celebrating Judson's Anniversary.

The Baptists are making elaborate preparations for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of the beginning of the work of Adoniram Judson's work in Burma. But the Baptists are not alone interested in this event. The work Judson did was of universal import. It was laid on broad and deep foundations and out of it has grown one of the most successful and wide-reaching movements in modern missions. Judson made for himself a place among the wisest, strongest and most far-seeing of the leaders in missionary work. The centennial of his going out is to be celebrated in a special manner in Burma. Judson and his wife, it will be remembered, started for their field as Congregationalists, but on their journey they became convinced that immersion was the scriptural mode of baptism and this led them to change their church connections and appeal to the Baptists for support.

The "Catch-My-Pal" Movement.

The Irish Presbyterians are getting into the paper now through the prominence being given to the "Catch-My-Pal" movement, of which Rev. R. J. Patterson, a minister of that community, is the originator and chief promoter.

The Presbyterian Banner describes Dr. Patterson as "a rosy faced Irishman, with a most genial air and delightful manners." The origin of his work was very simple. While a pastor in Armagh he was walking along the street one day when he passed six young men who were given to drink. He got hold of one of them and sent him after the others and all six met in his house. Presumably they resolved to quit drinking and he persuaded them to go out, each one to find another, and at the next meeting there were thirteen. At the third meeting there were thirty-one, at the end of the first year there were 130,000, with 500 branches. Then Mr. Patterson gave up his congregation and is devoting all his time to his movement. It has widely spread in England and he is introducing it in this country.

Christian Endeavor Pledge Adopted.

The pledge proposed at the Los Angeles Convention of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor is being adopted by many communions. At the Mount Hebron Institute, Old Fort, N. C., the Monthly Meeting of Friends—it is a Friend's school—adopted the pledge by a standing vote. This is the pledge: "Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, no political candidate or party not declaring for the destruction of the liquor traffic, can have my support or vote. I will do my best to get others to sign this pledge."

What "The Advance" Stands For.

"The Advance," the leading western paper of the Congregationalists, edited in Chicago by William E. Barton, declares its platform in clear and ringing tones in a recent issue of this paper. We are sure Dr. Barton will be joined by most of the Christian world in such declarations as the following:

"We are living in times when Christian people need to come nearer together, and unite on a few great simple truths. The forces of sin are mighty. Sin is an uncomfortable, but an indisputable fact. The world needs to be saved from its guilt and power. We want to help the churches to present the gospel so directly, so positively, so unquestioningly, so lovingly, that men shall be won to Christ, and the work of the churches shall go forward.

"We believe in righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. We hate the liquor traffic and every other unclean and blighting trade in the souls and bodies of men and women. And we shall speak out with all emphasis on these and all other questions. But in all matters in which Christian men differ, we shall seek not only to be charitable and fair, but to remember that other men have equal right with ourselves to convictions.

"This, then, is our platform,—a positive gospel, with faith in God, in the Lord Jesus Christ, and the need of salvation from sin by faith in Him; the fellowship of the Church; the love of the brethren; the freedom and communion of the Congregational churches in the communion with the whole Church universal, and the hope of the coming of the Kingdom, and the eternal reign of Jesus Christ."

Baptists to Push Missions.

In his report on the campaign for missions, presented at the recent Northern Baptist Convention, Dr. Shailer Mathews stated that out of the campaign had grown a new spirit of co-operation among the Baptists of the country. Concretely speaking, he reported that the amount raised for general missions during the last year was $250,000 more than ever before in the history of the church.

The fifth annual report of the general apportionment committee, which included a recommendation that the convention make the raising of $6,000,000 for missions annually the ultimate objective, was presented to the convention, and the recommendation was approved.

Episcopalians Stirred by Popular Novel.

Episcopal clergymen are taking some active steps to warn their people against statements contained in Mr. Winston Churchill's recent novel, "The Inside of the Cup," which is being so widely read and discussed. The parish paper of the Church of the Redeemer, Chicago, has analyzed some of the more radical charges of the book. One of the Chicago clergy has engaged Mr. Churchill in personal correspondence during the summer, especially requesting the names of the novelist's authorities for the following statement about the Nicene Creed:

"This creed is said to have been scandalously forced through the Council of Nicea by an emperor . . . against a majority of Bishops, who would if they had dared Constantine's displeasure, have given the conscience freer play."

A correspondent of the Living Church reports that Mr. Churchill very courteously stated in this correspondence that his authority was primarily Mr. Chamberlain's book, "The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century," but adds the statement that investigation has disclosed the facts that this Mr. Chamberlain is not mentioned in the Who's Who of either American or English authors, and that this particular book, which was published a dozen years ago and re-published three years ago, was very unfavorably reviewed by nearly all of the great periodicals, weekly and monthly, published in this country and in England, the chief objection being the whimsicalness and prejudices vitiating its erudition. This is an interesting point, the above correspondent declares, "that Mr. Churchill should have quoted so obscure and unreliable an authority for his attacks upon the dignity and credentials of Christendom's grandest and best attested creed."

Bishop Potter's Proposal Consummated.

A short while before his own death, The Living Church informs us, Bishop Potter officiated at the funeral of a fireman who lost his life, as others did, at a large fire in this city. In an eloquent address the Bishop paid high tribute to the men who defend our lives and property, and especially to the many heroes who had lost their lives in the performance of hazardous duties during the history of the city. He proposed that a monument be erected by a grateful people in memory of the departed heroes of the fire department. The suggestion was immediately taken up and the Bishop became the first Chairman of the Firemen's Memorial Committee.

On September 12 the monument was unveiled. It is of Knoxville marble, and is placed at the end of One Hundredth Street at Riverside Drive. The memorial is a tablet twenty-five feet long and twenty feet in height, flanked by two marble groups typifying Duty and Sacrifice. The flags which veiled the monument were drawn away by cords in the hands of a number of children whose fathers had lost their lives as firemen. The inscription reads:

"To the Men of the Fire Department of the City of New York
Who Died at the Call of Duty,
Soldiers in a War That Never Ends,
This Memorial is Dedicated
By the People of a Grateful City."

As the annual convention of the International Association of Fire Engineers was in session, there were present at the ceremony fire chiefs from England, Holland, Canada and the remotest parts of the United States, besides a great gathering of firemen from the local department and neighboring cities. In the parade there were veterans and active men; primitive pumps and the most up-to-date apparatus; a number of aged and infirm horses still tenderly cared for in their days of uselessness. Ministers of the Christian religion participated in the ceremonies. A beautiful memorial float was in the procession, and bore this legend: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends.—St. John 15:13."

A New Catholic Society.

The Roman Catholics, who already have societies innumerable, have organized a new society. It is called the Daughters of Isabella, and is based somewhat on the plan of the Knights of Columbus. It will number hundreds of thousands and will have to do with women as a civic as well as social factor. The Central Christian Advocate suggests that "doubtless it will ultimately be arrayed against the public schools."

Disciples Table Talk

Epoch-making Book for Missions.

The Congo mission of the Foreign Society has just published an important book. The title is "English-Lonkundo and Lonkundo-English Vocabulary." It gives the English word and the Lonkundo word corresponding; also the Lonkundo word and the English word corresponding. The completion of this work marks an important step in the history of the Disciples mission in the Congo. This is the first lexicon ever printed in the Lonkundo tongue. Heretofore the missionaries had to pick up the words as best they could from written lists and by word of mouth as the people had no written language. This beautiful book, of more than 400 pages, was printed on the "Mexico Press," a press donated to the mission by the church at Mexico, Mo. It is well bound and on excellent paper. The volume is appropriately dedicated to Secretary Stephen J. Corey, to whom the mission is ardently devoted.

Church Stands by J. M. Rudy.

The reform work of J. M. Rudy, pastor at Quincy, Ill., has made him some enemies, as would naturally be expected. It is gratifying to note that the official board of the Quincy church stands behind their new pastor in his fight against graft. The following is a part of a set of resolutions recently passed by the board:

Whereas, This official board learns through the public press that the sincerity of motive and the honesty of purpose of our pastor has been questioned and very unbecoming language used to characterize him, and—Whereas, the interests and issues for which our pastor contends are vital and fundamental and have already been overwhelmingly demanded by the people, therefore, be it—Resolved, that it is the sense of this board that we commend our pastor for his efforts and that we call upon every citizen and patriot and church to acquaint themselves with the issues involved and join in this crusade now sweeping over the country for honesty of party leadership as well as a higher moral type of men for the trusts and responsibilities of office.

Virginia Disciples Meet.

The sessions of the state convention of the Virginia Disciples were held in the chapel of Virginia Christian College, the delegates and visitors being entertained in the college dormitories. The convention began Sept. 8. Geo. W. Kemper, Richmond, presided at the general sessions. Among those represented on the programs were the following: J. O. Helsabeck, Dunnsville; J. D. Hamaker, Strasburg; A. F. De Gafferelly, Danville; F. M. Rains; Mrs. F. W. Long, South Richmond; Mrs. G. W. Oliver, Lynchburg; Mrs. Bertha F. Lohr, of India; Bert Wilson, Cincinnati; Prof. J. Whitt, of China; G. W. Muckley, Kansas City; Dr. Jennie Crozier, of India. The state auxiliary of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions elected the following officers: President, Miss Ellen Kent, Louisa; corresponding secretary, Miss Gillie Cary, Richmond; recording secretary, Miss Isabel Hill, Richmond; treasurer, Miss Lillie Pearce, Richmond; auditor, D. W. Durrett, Richmond.

New Building at Peoria, Ill.

M. L. Pontius, pastor of Central Church, Peoria, writes that the architect is completing plans for the new $50,000 building, and a local contractor has been engaged to build the structure on the percentage basis. The house will be of brick and stone and situated on the old lot in the center of the city. Besides the auditorium and a modern basement, there will be a third story containing club rooms and rest rooms, and arrangements will be made for a roof garden. The location is an ideal one for a down-town church with institutional features prominent. Central church is sending its pastor to the Toronto convention. W. J. Burner and family, Mr. Pontius reports, have come to Peoria to give their children the advantages of manual training in Bradley Institute. They were so successful in their work in South America and are so well known in Illinois, that Mr. Pontius deems it an honor to have them at Peoria. Brother Burner is available for pulpit supply work and may be addressed at 303 N. Orange St., Peoria, Ill.

W. C. Bower in New Field.

Prof. William C. Bower, Dean of the School of Religious Pedagogy in Transylvania University, Lexington, Ky., was called and has already begun his ministry, as director of the Central Church department of religious education. Prof. Bower had been a successful pastor in New York and California before he accepted a professorship at Transylvania. He is enthusiastic in view of the opportunity now afforded him to introduce strictly pedagogical methods and to carry them out in a thoroughly systematic atmosphere. A new equipment is being planned. This will consist of a three-story building upon a larger area than was occupied by the former structure. It will have assembly rooms for five or six departments and nearly half a hundred recitation rooms and offices. Several of these will accommodate more than a hundred pupils. It is expected that the new edifice will have been finished by the first of January. I. J. Spencer, pastor and also superintendent at the Central school for seventeen years, has for many years sought diligently, with the co-operation of an intelligent executive committee, to bring about a reformation in the ideals and methods of Biblical instruction in the church school and is happy at the prospect of immediate realization of his cherished hope. Mr. Bower, of course, still continues his efficient service in Transylvania.

A Class That Achieves at Ordway, Colo.

A few months ago, the Loyal Women's class paid one of the notes then due on church extension, and now they have in the bank money sufficient to pay the last note and have requested it and the mortgage. This leaves the church organization entirely out of debt. This class also has a large box ready for shipment to the Children's Home in Denver. J. Mack Mills writes from Ordway that this church has no pastor, no preaching, and do not observe the Lord's Supper. The members all attend other churches. There is a good Sunday-school and Endeavor Society. An up-to-date preacher can find a fertile field here, he declares, and will be well supported financially and otherwise if he is energetic and aggressive. Eighteen persons have been added to the membership this year.

Judge Discusses Divinity of Christ.

A remarkable address was listened to by a large audience on the occasion of a recent meeting of the Christian Brotherhood of First Church, Oklahoma City, Okla. The speaker was Judge John B. Harrison of the state supreme court; the theme, "The Divinity of Jesus Maintained Under the Rules of Evidence From a Lawyer's Standpoint." Judge Harrison treated the matter in a manner entirely new and original. The address will later be published and sent out to the bar of the state.

Denver Church Bestows Pension.

A pleasant feature of the recent resignation of B. B. Tyler from South Broadway Church, Denver, was the act of the official board of the church providing a permanent pension of $50 per month for the retiring pastor. This is the largest pension ever granted to a Denver pastor. The pulpit chair which Dr. Tyler has used during his thirteen years' pastorate is to remain in place, and for Dr. Tyler's use. On its back there will be placed a silver plate, inscribed as follows: "Chair of Honor, the Rev. Benjamin Bushrod Tyler, 1900-1913."

R. F. Trapp Greeted at Jacksonville.

It is not often that a pastor, returning to a former charge, is welcomed so warmly as was Russell F. Thrapp, former pastor at Jacksonville, Ill., on his recent visit with the church there. The magnificent building at Jacksonville is a worthy monument to Mr. Thrapp, but the high regard in which he is held by his former flock is a matter for highest congratulation. The only unsatisfactory feature of his late visit was that Mrs. Thrapp could not be present to share with Mr. Thrapp the honor of this happy occasion, being detained at Los Angeles by the illness of her mother. Mr. Thrapp is now serving with conspicuous success as pastor of First Church, Los Angeles.

Passing of Mrs. W. A. Baldwin.

The announcement of the death of Mrs. W. A. Baldwin at a hospital in Lincoln, Neb., came as a shock to the many friends of Mrs. Baldwin and of her husband, who has served Nebraska so long as state secretary of the State Missionary Society. In two years Mrs. Baldwin served as president of the missionary federation of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions in Lincoln and vicinity. Two children are left, Gertrude, who graduated from Cotner University last spring, and Morris, now a student in that institution. The funeral service was conducted by H. O. Pritchard, assisted by H. H. Harmon and W. P. Aylsworth.

Work of B. A. Jenkins Commended.

A Kansas City paper speaks as follows, commending a recent sermon by Burris A. Jenkins, of Linwood Boulevard Church: "Such sermons as that preached by Dr. Burris A. Jenkins in the Linwood Boulevard Christian Church last night indicate the trend of religious thought today. It was a plea for the church to keep in touch with the social and industrial life of the times, for a more thoroughgoing democracy and a more practical religious life. And while much remains to be done—and always will remain to be done—the leadership of ministers and laymen who are profoundly concerned with social problems, already is showing its effect."

County to Have Delegate Convention.

The sixteen churches of Johnson County, Ind., held their annual meeting at Franklin last week. Speakers from outside the county who made addreses were Dr. Royal J. Dye of Eureka, Ill., Dr. F. E. Lumley of Indianapolis, and C. C. Morrison of Chicago. Dr. Dye gave his thrilling message on Monday evening, Dr. Lumley presented a scholarly, stimulating statement of country church conditions on Tuesday afternoon and Mr. Morrison spoke twice—in the forenoon on "Modern Confirmations of Disciples Ideals" and in the evening on "The Next Step in Christian Unity." The remarkable statement was made during this convention that one-half of the real estate of Johnson County is owned by Disciples of Christ.

There is a marked determination on the part of the church leaders to see that the resources of this group of churches are invested in enterprises of the Kingdom of God. William Mullendore, living at Franklin but caring for two churches near by, was the president of the gathering. Next year the plan of having formally chosen delegates sent to the convention will be tried. It is believed that the problems of the county can be solved better through the active discussion of lay representatives than by the passive enjoyment of ever so inspirational addresses from the platform. Franklin is the home of W. J. Wright, who as pastor of the church there is loved by his people for his scholarly and consecrated ministry.

Lloyd-George Not to Be at Toronto.

David Lloyd-George writes that political duties will debar him from attending the convention at Toronto. He states that he is "about to undertake a considerable campaign on the land question" in England.

Death of R. Ray Eldred.

No sadder news was ever received at the office of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society than that of the death of R. Ray Eldred, of Longa, Africa, September 3, by accidental drowning. On November 9 last his wife died while the two were alone at the station. They leave three little orphan boys. They are in the mission home at Hiram. Mr. Eldred went out in 1902. He was a valuable pioneer missionary.

Pastor Enters New Field.

J. C. Mullins has resigned the work at Carlisle, Ind., and in connection with John W. Marshall, will enter the evangelistic field, in an attempt to do a work somewhat different from that of most evangelists. The novel feature will be daily institutes given up to the discussion and consideration of problems and methods pertaining to the modern Sunday-school, Christian Endeavor, and general church work.

J. P. Myers writes from Bellaire, O., that the official board of the church there asks him to make a statement concerning his brief stay of only six months in that field. Everything is reported harmonious and pleasant. Church and pastor very much regret that almost constant sickness in the family of Mr. Myers has led to his decision to leave. Churches wishing to communicate with Mr. Myers, may write him at Indianapolis, Ind., from which point he can supply pulpits for the time being.

Prof. Walter S. Athearn, of Des Moines will be one of the speakers at the next Union Ministers' Meeting to be held at Chicago, Sept. 29, under the auspices of the Chicago Church Federation Council. Miss Margaret Slattery, famed Sunday-school educator, will also speak. The meetings will be held at 10:30 a. m. in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium. The general theme of the conference will be religious education.

The week of Sept. 15-20 was set apart by the church at Crawfordsville, Ind., as "Visiting Week." By the novel scheme formulated, every member of the church and school was called on during the campaign, and in turn received many calls. The rule was that no topic of conversation could be introduced during the calls except some phase of church work.

During July two members of the family of the mayor were baptized in Siniloan, in Laguna province, Philippine Islands. The mayor himself was baptized some time ago. And during this month thirty-three were baptized at Infanta. Some of the Negritos of the mountains nearby were baptized, among whom was the king of the Aytos.

Walter Scott Cook, pastor at Wilkinsburg, Pa., is devoting evening services during September to a discussion of the four reformers. Luther, Calvin, Wesley, and Campbell. The largest Sunday-school attendance and offering, outside of rally days, is reported for September 7.

Miss Eva Lemert, who conducted a remarkable efficiency campaign in the school at Bloomington, Ill., last spring, has been engaged by the Second Presbyterian Church at Bloomington for a similar campaign in October.

POINTS FOR TORONTO VISITORS.

The Toronto Street Railway Company has granted free transportation to all delegates and visitors wearing the convention badge. This is an unprecedented courtesy and will be an inducement to all to register promptly on arrival.

The registration booth will be in the basement of Massey Hall. On registering and paying the small fee of fifty cents, the official badge and the official program will be received. The fee pays for the badge and program and for some of the advertising. No part of it goes to the churches in Toronto. In the same part of the hall the visitors will be assigned to their homes. Nearby is the information booth.

Massey Hall is on Shuter Street, and is a short block from Yonge Street, the principal street of the city. The cars marked Yonge, will take the people from the Union Station, and from the steamboat landing, to the corner of Yonge and Shuter Streets. From there it is a very short block to the Hall. The King Edward Hotel is reached by the same line of cars.

Massey Hall is by far the best hall engaged for our conventions. It is as much superior to some halls into which the national conventions have been forced, as a royal palace is superior to a cattle barn. The auditorium is perfect. It is supplied with a pipe organ and a piano. The doors are hung on noiseless hinges. The aisles are covered with heavy matting and the floors are deadened. If the order is not perfect it will not be the fault of the hall. In the basement there is ample room for the exhibits, for the post-office, rest room, correspondence room, hospital and committee rooms.

The Cecil Street Church of Christ, the place where the Boards of Managers of the Foreign Society and the American Society meet on Tuesday morning, is on Cecil Street and near Spadina. It can be reached on the Belt Line, or on the Harbord, or College, or Carlton from the King Edward or Massey Hotel, in ten minutes.

The King Edward Hotel is within two blocks of the Hall. The management has placed the banquet hall at the disposal of the convention for the entire week. Each morning, from 7:30 to eight o'clock, there will be a prayer service in the banquet hall. That hall will be used by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions for its Board meeting on Tuesday morning, and for the morning conferences that follow. In the other hotels occupied, similar prayer services can be held.

The committees in Toronto understand their business, and are at work with intelligence and enthusiasm. Nothing is being overlooked or neglected. No pains are being spared to make the preparations as complete as possible. The delegates will find everything in fine shape.

Those who go to Toronto should bear in mind that they must use Canadian postage stamps and postal cards, and not the postage stamps and postal cards of the United States. Most people who cross the border need to be reminded of this fact.

On the train and on the steamboats, prayer services can be held to advantage. It would be a good thing to go to the beautiful city of Toronto asking the blessing of God upon the convention, and upon all those who participate in the exercises. It is possible to make this convention by far the best in the history of the Disciples.

CHURCH EXTENSION FACTS.

Our churches should be acquainted with the facts concerning the Church Extension Treasury.

At the Board meeting on September 2, the cash balance was only $16,886.79. There are loans in the course of closing, amounting to $44,300.

Papers, notes, etc., have been sent out for loans to the amount of $19,750. Here, then, is $64,050 that will be needed to pay our loans promised to churches that have buildings finished, or nearly finished. These must have their money to pay their bills or they will be seriously damaged in their work. To meet this $64,050 the Church Extension Board has a balance of but $16,886. The Board pleads with the churches to allow nothing to interfere with the annual offering and its prompt remittance to the Church Extension Board, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo. It should also be noted that we have $75,000 of applications on hand, yet unanswered.

It is well to note that we start into the September offering with a gain of nearly $15,000 over last year. The churches are $1,100 behind, but the individuals are over $16,000 ahead.

Another important fact is this—that all the money sent to Church Extension, goes into a permanent fund that is never spent. The interest at 4 per cent on the general fund of over $500,000 pays all expenses and more. The annuity fund of over $400,000 takes care of itself, as the Board loans all annuity money at 6 per cent, the price we pay. The name funds bear 4 per cent, which goes back into these funds.

Send offerings promptly, so they reach the office by the 30th.

Remit to G. W. Muckley, corresponding secretary, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo. G. M. Muckley, Sec'y.

The Defeat of the Demoralizing Demons.*

TWIN DEVILS

Jealousy and envy are the twin demons ever working havoc with human happiness. Beware, Moses. Know this: You cannot be called up and into the cloud with God without arousing envy. Do not think that a shining faith will be accepted as a symbol of superiority to awaken admiration. Halos are beautiful, but they are expensive. They cost more than a ring of gold or a necklace of pearls. Do not suppose for a moment that conspicuous expressions of Divine approbation will exempt you from the caustic criticisms awakened by human jealousy. The noble leader and hero deliverer, had already been the object of bitter scorn, contempt and accusation. He had heard all with meekness and without complaint. Hitherto, there had been no evidence of conspiracy in his own household. He could well endure insinuating reflections from the lips of strangers or mere acquaintances, but when they were uttered by members of the household, it was a different matter.

HOUSEHOLD JEALOUSIES.

"And Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses because of the Ethiopian woman he had married." Miriam's jealousy of her brother's wife was the actuating cause of the conspiracy which followed. Whether this wife was Zipporah, or a woman he had found among the "mixed multitude," or some other woman is a matter of no consequence in this connection. It is evident there had been contention and controversy during which violent accusations had been hurled at Moses by Miriam, and she was supported in her abuse by Aaron. It is equally apparent that Moses had meekly endured the abusive epithets though conscious of their injustice. Jealousy never wants for a pretext. Just how long Miriam had been entertaining this envious attitude toward Moses we do not know. Without question, they had felt keenly the rebuke administered at the time of the Golden Calf episode. In the original commission, Aaron had occupied a place as honorable as that of Moses. Miriam had received Divine recognition as a prophetess. These honors did not satisfy them so long as there was one prominently above them. It does not take long for jealousy and envy to frame up an indictment.

A QUESTION OF INSPIRATION

"And they said, 'Hath the Lord spoken only by Moses? Hath he not spoken also by us?" That is the kind of question that wrecks faith. It was a denial of special revelation. They did not dispute the fact that Moses was a divinely appointed interpreter. They did not deny that God had spoken through him. They accorded him a high place as the Lord's prophet. What they objected to was the position of isolated grandeur which he was occupying. They would simply divest him of any special right to recognition beyond themselves. They were as intelligent as Moses. They had received manifestations of Divine approval, as he had. Why were not their words worth as much as his? Why was he accorded the right to lead, the right to judge, the right to rule? The very thing they denied was his authority. But if this were true, where then were the ten commandments received solely through Moses? What would become of the whole legal code, the ritual of worship and the tabernacle? The acceptance of their assumption would have reduced all to a common level, and would have given to every individual the right to claim that the seat of final authority was in himself. The interrogation sounds wonderfully like some of the interrogations and inquiries of today. "Hath God spoken only by the Bible? To be sure it is a good book, but of no more authority than many another good book. Truth is of equal authority everywhere. The Bible has literary merit, but no right to command and control. Every member of the human race is a son or daughter of God. We are all inspired." It is just this attitude that brings God's Holy Book into contempt. So also with the church. Regard it as a passing phase of religious expression, merely a human organization with no peculiarly Divine features, and you rob it of its rightful place among the institutions of the world. Moses' position was unique. He could only be contrasted and not compared with other Israelites, even though they were as gifted as Aaron and Miriam. The Bible and the church occupy a place of solitary grandeur and an authority that is not shared by any other book or order.

QUALIFICATION FOR LEADERSHIP

"Hath not also the Lord spoken by us?" They would not accord to Moses the monopoly of Divine communication. To them Moses was merely a younger brother. The elimination of distinctions and differences results in nothing but confusion in all matters of religion. Assumptive, presumptive, visionless men today echo the question of Miriam and Moses, "Hath not the Lord also spoken by us?" An assertive and pretentious attitude is taken. The especial authority of the Bible is questioned and it is assumed that Moses and all the prophets who followed him are thoroughly discounted by the intellectual luminaries of the present day. Real inspiration at every period of progress is not to be denied. God is still speaking through his appointed leaders, but there is a difference, and a most important one, between the utterances of the most learned theologians of today and the Apostle Paul, for example. It is nothing but inordinate conceit and unholy presumption amounting to sacrilege, that leads a teacher or preacher today to say, "I am as much inspired as Paul, and know a great deal more about religious life and Christian obligation, and can teach with just as much authority as he."

AUTHORITY REPUDIATED

Behind the question of Miriam and Aaron was an impatience of all authority. They did not want to be ruled. They did not wish to occupy second place. The spirit of humility was wholly wanting. Had they accepted the doctrine of special inspiration they must also have accorded to Moses the right to command and their duty to obey. Right here you have the secret of present day protest against the Scripture. Humanity is naturally impatient of restraint. Once accord the Bible and the Church exceptional authority and you necessarily accept the right of both the Bible and the Church to loyalty, love and obedience. This is, of course, uniquely true of the Bible. This in turn carries with it the condemnation of sin and the needed atonement. Then there is demanded repentance, regeneration and a reconstructed life. These things men desire to avoid because it calls for sacrifice and humility.

ARRESTED AND ARRAIGNED.

"And the Lord heard it." God hears the very thought of the human heart. What is here signified is a judicial notice. It was a matter of so grave importance that it could not be passed by without judgment. Had the conspiracy succeeded it would necessarily have defeated the whole plan and purpose of the emancipation of the children of Israel. The statement of verse three that the meekest man in all the world was Moses presents decided difficulties. It is very properly put in parenthesis. It indicates that the quarrel which had been stirred up by Miriam had no worthy basis. It furthermore emphasizes the reason for divine interference. The man who was perfectly capable of defending an entire nation was too sensitive and too humble to undertake his own defense, therefore God took cognizance of the sedition and took means to suppress it. The difficulties of this verse, however, lie in the line of authorship. It is unthinkable that Moses would have written this about himself unless, indeed, we regard him as an amanuensis to Jehovah. There is good reason to attribute this to subsequent interpolation. "The Lord spake suddenly to Moses and unto Aaron and unto Miriam." The whole plan of the Lord was in peril. If the leadership of Moses was called into question successfully then the revealings of Sinai would naturally go. Sooner or later the pillar of cloud would be only the smoke ascending from signal fires and the voice on Sinai would be but the utterance of a deceiver speaking out of assumption. Dismiss the prophets and Paul and Peter without ceremony and Jesus Christ is soon uncrowned and reduced to a common martyr.

DISTINCTIONS AND DIFFERENCES DECLARED

"If there be a prophet among you, I, the Lord, will make myself known in a vision." Once and for all God Almighty declared for the special sanctity of revelation. Words cannot more emphasize the fact of the uniqueness of revelation. God speaks to appointed men through his providences and in various ways makes His will known. He has guaranteed a spiritual vision to all who will to see and who will to obey. That is as true today as in the ancient days.

Spiritual insight accompanies faith and in turn produces faith. It is more and above mere intellectual apprehension. There is a second sight, a call given by the Holy Spirit whereby we apprehend and understand spiritual truth. Visions are granted which enable men to speak effectively in calling for spiritual repentance and the righteous to a higher life. Nevertheless, there is a difference. "My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house. With him I will speak mouth to mouth." Right here you have the gist of the whole matter. For the purposes of revelation God peculiarly endowed and inspired Moses.

PUNISHMENT OF APOSTASY

"The cloud departed from off the tabernacle." It is a sad day for the individual church when, on account of contention, or the denial of inspiration, or faithlessness to the ordinances and sacrament, the Lord departs from the tabernacle. "Behold, Miriam became leprous, white as snow." The enormity of any sin is seen by the punishment which is visited upon it. Leprosy was the most loathsome of diseases. In this judgment upon Miriam we have God's estimate of the sin of jealousy and envy.

EFFECTIVE PETITION

Persecution often precedes preferment. The magnanimity of Moses shines forth in his immediate and hearty response to the appeal of Aaron. Indeed, it required no appeal, for the punishment of his sister brought to him the most poignant grief. His prayer is a model. There are no vain repetitions, no professions or protestations, no long introduction, or wearisome interlude, but just a straightforward appeal from the heart. "Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee." It was an effectual prayer, but she must suffer. Even forgiveness may be held too cheap. It costs to forgive. Seven days she endured isolation outside the camp. She had time for reflection and for repentance.

HINDERING PROGRESS

"And the people journeyed not until Miriam was brought in again." Two important truths are here suggested. The interest and sympathy of the people in one who had been cast out was a blessed expression of human love. Patience and pity are heaven-created virtues. How could they advance and Miriam be not of the company? Contrast this with the indifferent way in which the church often goes straight away from the men and the women who have fallen by the way. Again it becomes apparent how even one disciple may hinder the advance of an entire church. Wrath is cruel, anger is outrageous, but who is able to stand against jealousy and envy?"

*International Uniform lesson for October 12, 1913.

THE EVIL WORD—and oh, remember this—is a step, a long step, beyond the evil thought; and it is a step toward the precipice's edge.—F. W. Farrar.

Why This Final Call?

Because American Missions lay the foundation for all our church enterprises. To neglect America is suicidal.

Because non-Christians and scattered disciples of Christ need the Gospel.

Because every community in our country needs a church without denominational creed or human name.

Because the order of the great commission is first the near, then the far.

Because last year 439 American Missionaries visited 604 places, baptized 9,233 persons, and gathered 16,514 accessions into the church.

Because Home Missions pay and, therefore, every church and member of the body of Christ ought to contribute each year to this far-reaching and glorious work.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

WORK, GOD'S GIFT TO MAN.

Oct. 1—Mark 13:34; 2 Thess. 3:7-10.

"Blessed is he who has found his work; let him ask no other blessedness. He has a work, a life purpose; he has found it, and will follow it! * * * Labor is Life; from the inmost heart of the Worker rises his God-given Force, the sacred celestial Life-essence breathed into him by Almighty God; from his inmost heart awakens him to all nobleness—to all knowledge, "self-knowledge' and much else, so soon as Work fitly begins. Knowledge? The knowledge that will hold good in working, cleave thou to that; for Nature accredits that, says Yea to that. Properly thou hast no other knowledge but what thou hast got by working: the rest is yet all a hypothesis of knowledge; a thing to be argued in schools, a thing floating in the clouds, in endless logic-vortices, till we try and fix it. 'Doubt, of whatever kind, can be ended by Action alone.' "—Thomas Carlyle.

"To each one his own work." To have your work and to do it well is to know what the dignity of man is. The common soldier feels his importance when his country is in danger, for he sees clearly his duty, and he knows the safety of himself and of his countrymen depends on him and his comrades. Generals would not amount to much without common soldiers. "Captains of Industry" would never be known if there were not thousands of patient, skilful laborers. It is the laborer who can feel himself a man. He who exploits labor is less than a man. There is something fictitious about his success. The achievements of the worker are solid and lasting. If he has to walk, he knows that the man who mortgages his future to buy an automobile is a fool. The worker, when he keeps his eye on his work, knows what things cost. When he plays the fool, he forgets what he knows as a worker.

Work is the true source of inspiration. The "inspiring" talks that are made by men who will not work are principally nonsense. The lazy man with the gift of speech is a curse to the church. The reason the midweek services of the church fail to inspire is often a very simple one; nobody has done anything that is worth mentioning and nobody feels that the church is of any particular use in the world. The church is useless, it is contemptible, when it is filled with loafers. Too many of us expect to reform the world by shouting, overlooking the fact that shouting is intended to cheer the workers, or to express the joy that follows the completion of a difficult task. We are growing suspicious of enthusiasm that is "worked up." Exhortations are not as popular as they once were. What the church needs is members whose deeds commend it to the world.

Work is the cure for disappointment and sorrow. Have you failed in your life's ambition? Go to work and do something that will give you a sense of your worth. To sit around and complain is to show your lack of common sense. Any kind of work done well gives self-respect. Have you lost friends? You cannot let them pass from your memory, perhaps you can never be as light-hearted as you were before your loss, but you can honor them, and you can sweeten your sorrow by doing something that ought to be done. The formalities of mourning are of little value. If those whom you have lost were really noble, and you identify yourself with them by tasks which enable you to understand better their motives, you will feel that you have them still, that they are a part of your life, and you will rejoice. Honest work will make us less selfish. Much of our bitter sorrow is selfish.

Intelligence, happiness, friendship, science, religion, morality, all depend upon work. But it is the work of free men. Work can be made, and is made a curse. Long hours, unsanitary conditions, brutal employers, underpay, all tend to change this blessing into a curse. God's gift is not slave labor. It is not work that destroys mind and body. It is employment that satisfies the heart and gives health to the body.

THE CHALLENGE OF THE DAY.

On his return from a six weeks' absence, Charles S. Medbury delivered two inspiring sermons to his congregation at University Church, Des Moines, Iowa, the subjects being the challenge of the day to the Christian, and to the non-Christian. Mr. Medbury emphasized the fact that the prayer that Christ taught his disciples to pray, has to do with the here and now in life in an intensely practical way. In the social problems of the cities and the attitude toward the rapidly increasing foreign element, reform must come through demonstrating the divine government in the everyday relationships of men, and the church must cease to exist on the community's support, but instead for the community's service and the actual pratial uplift of men of every class.

A Low Price, Now Still Lower!

USERS of the Bethany Graded Lessons have always marvelled at the low price at which such superb literature was sold.

But this price has just been reduced to a still lower figure. In the Beginners, Primary and Junior grades the reduction amounts to 20 per cent. The price of the Bethany Lessons is now as low as, and in some items lower than, the materials of other publishers.

The reason of this is plain. The Bethany Graded Lessons are produced by the co-operation of the Disciples Publication Society with the Presbyterian Board of Publication, the Methodist Book Concern, and the Congregational Publishing Society. The immense quantities used by these great religious bodies and others make it possible to produce the very best literature ever offered the Sunday School world, and to reduce the price at the very time when some publishers are compelled not only to raise their prices but to cut down the size of many of their publications.

The practice of Christian unity in the preparation and publication of the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature is economical as well as Christian.

QUALITY QUALITY

The Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

What the Leaders Think:

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upón the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday School pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned. We are planning to introduce it into the school at 27th and Wabash Avenue, beginning October 1st, and we anticipate great pleasure and profit from the study thereof.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday Schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday School literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the Church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the Society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, The Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

International

The Bethany System of Sunday School literature is international: International uniform lessons, international graded lessons, with writers of international fame, selected because they are experts in their several fields, not because they belong to a particular denomination. The production of the literature of religious education by the co-operation of the leading Christian communions is a most notable example of CHRISTIAN UNITY IN ACTUAL PRACTICE.

The Divinity of Christ

BY
SCRIBNER
AMES

Is a popular statement of both the theological and practical truths centering in our evangelical faith in Christ.

It is scholarly, but not technical.

It lifts the problem of the nature and character of Christ out of the setting of the old-time dogmatism and places it in the light of the more empirical, human and meaningful thought of our own day.

Its Treatment of Unitarianism is original, fresh, illuminating. A single chapter entitled, "Why I am not a Unitarian" will furnish any reader, conservative or liberal, a new point of view.

It is glowing with religious earnestness. It is a living word spoken to the hearts and souls of living people.

Appreciations

Professor George A. Coe says: "These sermons display a remarkable union of intellectual boldness and spiritual warmth. I know of nothing else in print that brings out quite so clearly the positive religious values that can be reached by a rigorous application to Christian dogmas of the functional and valuational point of view. Even readers who cannot accept Professor Ames' position at all points must agree that such a book helps to clear the air, and to focus attention at the right point."

The Indianapolis News says: "One would go far to find a finer interpretation of religious thought and experience in terms of spiritual laws. Mr. Ames is emphatically a man with a message."

The Chicago Inter-Ocean says: "Six sermons full of broad humanity."

The Watchman says: "Professor Ames is avowedly a "liberal" in theology but his liberalism seems to be of a wholesome kind, in the sense that he is less concerned about doctrines and creeds than he is about service and the helping of people to their best life."

The Independent says: "Dr. Ames does not deny being a liberal, but strongly objects to being styled a 'Unitarian', quoting with enthusiasm a saying of one of the early leaders of his denomination: 'I am neither a Unitarian nor a Trinitarian, but strive to be simply a Christian.' The sermons are thoughtful, moderate in tone and straightforward in expression."

Unity says: "Those who were privileged to listen to these sermons must have found their spiritual natures quickened."

The Advance says: "These are strong, virile sermons, appealing to the reason and satisfying the heart."

Professor Edward C. Moore, of Harvard, says: "It is a very clear and convincing statement of the issue as it stands in the minds of modern men. It makes us realize how the old formulation of the question has become obsolete, no one any longer states the question in the old terms. Dr. Ames has availed himself in admirable fashion of the opportunity for a new statement of the case, and the spirit in which he writes must convey confidence and reassurance to all."

The Sins of Today

Ministers preach less about sins than they did. Excepting for the stock sermons against dancing, card playing and theater going, we have few sermons against sins. This trinity of doubtful amusements feathers the arrow of the professional evangelist, but even he says comparatively little about sin in general, or other sins in particular.

Time was when men came to God through deep consciousness of sin. Perhaps they overdid it; perhaps they came to take a certain pride in it; perhaps they rather vied with each other in thinking how much wrong they could confess; perhaps they got a certain fatuous glory out of remembering what terrible sinners they had been; perhaps they came to delight in that process of self-flagellation whereby they called themselves worms of the dust and thought of themselves as utterly vile in the sight of God. Perhaps they sang too much those mournful hymns:

> "Depth of mercy! Can there be
> Mercy still reserved for me?
> Can my God His wrath forbear,
> Me, the chief of sinners spare?"

Or

> "Shall such a worthless worm as I,
> Who sometimes am afraid to die,
> Be found at Thy right hand?"

Nevertheless, the time has not yet come for us to forget altogether that we are sinners in the sight of God; nor is it enough that we have sermons against sin. A sermon against sin is one thing; a sermon against sins is another. Sin is an abstraction; nobody commits it, but sins are concrete, personal, the kind you and I have. God does not call upon his prophets to show the people their sin; he is told to show the people their sins. He is not told to rebuke them, nor abuse them, nor denounce them, but just to show the sins of the people of God.

What are the sins of the people of God today?

The foremost sin of the present day is that of indifference to religion as the supreme fact of our modern life. In theory we all acknowledge that religion is the supremely important interest of life, but in practice not every good person acts as if it were so.

Religion is not simply one among many good things. If it is not first of all good things, then it has no place at all among them. There was a time when religion had to defend itself against the attacks of the scoffer and the infidel. That time has very nearly passed. This is an unmixed blessing. Indifference is often more dangerous than hostility. The people who no longer hate the truth but are simply indifferent to the truth are more of a menace than those who blaspheme and deny.

Another sin of today is worldliness. One need be no cynical critic of good living. God gave us the good things of life freely to enjoy, but we no longer possess our possessions, we are possessed by them. The things which we have striven to acquire have very largely acquired us, mastering our souls, monopolizing our affections, crowding our religion into the corners of our life. This fatal self-seeking has gone far toward the destruction of family life giving the parents and children separate interests, causing the young people to suppose that the chief end of life is to have a good time, and the father and mother to look forward to mere ease and display as the supremely great things to be achieved.

The love of the things of this world leads swiftly to extravagance. The mounting cost of living grows not out of lessened production, but largely out of the fact that we have made our luxuries of yesterday necessities of today. Extravagance leads to the nonpayment of debts, to embezzlement, to downright dishonesty.

Religious indifference and a spirit of criticism are not wholly unrelated. They seem at first to be violently opposed, but they are not. It is when people's religion becomes self-seeking, when their aim and end in life is personal enjoyment that they come to test even the services of God's house as if they were intended to minister to their pleasure. The service is good or not good for them in proportion as the music gives them enjoyment or the sermon pleases their vanity, or fails to rouse them from their lethargy with some call to duty. It is when people are interested and hard at work that they have no time for criticism. It is when they sit back in apathy that they have time to be critical and fault-finding.

These are among the sins of our time. To many people they seem so gentle and amiable, such rather pleasant and altogether negligible sins that they have no inclination to be disturbed concerning them, but the voice of the prophet must always be a voice to his own day and generation, and the sins against which he preaches should be the sins of his own time. These sins are not harmless ones. They are benumbing, deadly sins; they freeze the life out of consecration, they chill joy out of the heart of religion.

To show the people their sins would be a still more ungracious task if it ended there. But the minister cannot stop with that message. There is forgiveness of sins. There is grace to restore the penitent, and to bring back those who have lost their first love. There is forgiveness, restoration and peace.

Through the Heart of China

Another Stage in the Mission Study Tour of the Orient.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT

OUR departure from Pekin was by the Pekin-Hankow railroad, which for many years was the only rail connection between the north and the south of China. It cuts down from the capital through some of the most important inland districts of the country, and reaches the Yangtse-Kiang River at Hankow, which with its neighboring cities on the river constitutes the most notable of the inland commercial centers.

China's greatest physical need is railroads. A vast territory like the Eighteen Provinces, to say nothing of the outlying districts—Manchuria, Mongolia and Tibet—can only come to self-realization through the service of communication which railroads can render. In earlier times China's only means of transportation were the heavy, sunken roads, and the streams, of which the Yangtse is the chief. The leaders of the new era in China realize that only by the advent of the railroad can the nation be unified and enriched.

Fruit Sellers at a Chinese Station

IMPORTANCE OF RAILROADS.

Dr. Sun-Yat-Sen, the first provisional president of the new republic, resigned his office partly because he felt that he could be of greater value to the nation as the promoter of its railroad system. For the past three years he has devoted himself to this important work. His office in Shanghai has been the center of railroad promotion, intended to reach all the provinces. A new route has recently been completed, connecting Nanking with Teintsin. Thus two main lines of road run north and south through the national domain. Northward from Pekin the line to the Great Wall is being slowly pushed, and for several years past visitors going north from Nankow have had to ride on the construction trains. Southward from the Yangtse a line is being constructed to Canton and Hong Kong, and along the same river there is a line from Nanking to Shanghai. These, with the North China Railroad, from Pekin through Teintsin to Shan-hai-kwan and Mukden, complete the list of the main lines in China. It is easy to see that an enormous future is before the railroad business in the "celestial" land.

"TRAIN DE LUXE."

The Pekin-Hankow route operates a daily service, but as yet there is only one train a week that goes through without change and offers the advantages of sleepers and dining cars. This is called the "train de luxe," and leaves Pekin on Mondays at 10 p. m., reaching Hankow on Wednesday morning. As early as our arrival at Yokohama, many weeks before, we secured our reservations on this train for the dates we wished. We were assured there would be no mistake. Again at Kobe we made inquiry and received the same assurance. Yet on arrival at Pekin the agent of the Wagenlits or sleeping car company, the great rival of the Cook's Tours in the East, said that no reservations had been booked. It was the one instance in all our journey in which a failure of the sort happened. However, as we still had considerable time, he promised us the necessary space.

But our experience with the "train de luxe" revealed something of the distance Chinese railroads must go before they reach the standards of Japanese and Indian, not to speak of European and American management. We reached the station just outside the gate of the Tartar city at least an hour before train time. But the luggage, which was supposed to have left the hotel some time before we did, could not be found. After searching for it in vain for some time, and deciding that the porters must have taken it to some other place, or left it at the hotel, Mr. Ogilvie, of the American Presbyterian Mission in Pekin, who had kindly offered his services in getting us located on the train, found it in an obscure corner guarded by a sleepy-eyed porter who evidently thought it a matter of small moment whether we started that week or some other.

COMFORTS (?) OF TRAVEL.

Then came the process of weighing the luggage and determining the tariff, which our friend undertook to expedite for us, while I went to look after the reservations and get our party located. I found that no reservations had been made, or at least no official in charge knew of any. It was useless to protest. One would only waste time. The only thing to do was to get aboard the train and take possession of whatever was available. For a time this seemed a hopeless task. The confusion was indescribable. The crowd trying to get on that train seemed to include all the strangers in the city and most of the natives. The would-be passengers were rushing back and forth along the narrow corridors of the coaches, attempting, like ourselves, to find the reserved compartments which they supposed they had secured.

By what good fortune, apart from Mr. Ogilvie's efforts, we ever secured sufficient accommodations on that train I think I shall never know. To get the members of the party safely bestowed was an achievement. But to get the small baggage in before the train started was nothing less than a triumph. The last suit-case came through a window as the car moved out, and as for the clamorous porters, who were much more concerned to get their tips than to bestow their burdens with any discrimination, they may be searching up and down that track yet for the coins I tossed them in the last desperate moment, or quarreling over the division of the spoils.

Until far past midnight we heard the sounds of the conflict. People with sleeping apartments engaged and paid for, wandered up and down the corridors of that train, alternately trying to break into some of the compartments held desperately against intrusion, and railing in round terms at the helpless looking trainmen, who seemed amazed that anyone should care whether he had a berth or stood out on the platform. One particularly picturesque American had arrived at the last moment, quite the worse for wear, and carrying a heavy load of intoxicants and expletives. He had just about sufficient intelligence left to find his section, and discover that it was occupied by two ladies, who failing to find their allotted quarters, took the only space they could secure and refused to be dislodged until the conductor found for them their own or some other compartment. This of course he was wholly unable to do, and they held the fort, much to the disgust and wrath of the late comer, whose lurid and vituperative conversation continued to punctuate the noise of the train till a late—or early—hour. In the morning I passed him curled up in a small compartment usually occupied by the guard at the end of the coach, noisily sleeping off his potations and his wrath.

RAILROAD DEVELOPMENT CERTAIN.

Aside from the fact that there seemed to be no particular system about the assignment of space, that the coaches were very old and very dirty, and that the service was very poor, the "train de luxe" was fine! But one must remember that all railroad equipment in China is in its early stages, and that only at certain seasons in the year has foreign passenger traffic been an item of importance. The steps now being taken to push out railroad lines in all directions, and to improve the character of the service are sure to bring radical changes within a short period. One may soon expect as excellent a train equipment in China as in Japan or India, where American and English methods respectively prevail.

The schedule of our train gave us one full day of panoramic sight-seeing between the two nights. We were passing through the heart of China, and were able to see something of the great interior. What most astonishes the visitor is the amount of unoccupied land. Unlike Japan, where the soil is almost all under cultivation, there are wide stretches between the Chinese towns, where there seems to be neither population nor the cultivation of any sort of crop. And, as yet, there appears to be little or no effort at forestation of vacant tracts such as one marks with pleasure in Japan. Then again there will be continuous areas of splendid farm lands, from which great harvests are taken. But agriculture is in its infancy as yet, in spite of the age of the land. The most primitive methods are still employed by the farmers. They live in villages, most of which are walled, and go out to their work in the fields. One of the familiar sights in China in the winter season is the gathering of wood and weeds for fuel. So poor are many of the people that every stalk and shrub is cut down and bound in bundles to be carried home on the backs of the men, women and children. These reeds and twigs are fed with careful economy into the fires over which the food is prepared.

QUEUE NOT WHOLLY ABOLISHED.

The towns at which the train stopped were nearly all of them walled. On the station platforms were quartered a great crowd of people, to whom the coming of the weekly "train de luxe" was an event. Among them were sure to be many venders of fruit, cakes, nuts and other edibles. The train always halted a long time at these stations, and there was plenty of time to walk about and look at the people. We noticed the reappearance of the queues in the interior of the country. In Pekin they have mostly disappeared. The same thing is true in the south. But in middle China, where the revolutionary ideas have not become so familiar, the old customs of footbinding and the wearing of the queue still prevail. In the heat of the revolutionary movement a few years ago, it was a favorite practice in Pekin and Teintsin to compel men to cut off their braids. Particularly among the students the youth who dared show himself with the obnoxious "pigtail" was certain to be shorn. The movement has been steady and as modern ideas penetrate the interior, the queue disappears.

The Chinese roads are a curiosity. They cut through the yellow soil almost like trenches. The carts, mostly two-wheeled, are very heavy and in the windy season the dust ground up by these vehicles is blown away, while in the rainy times, the ruts become rushing streams that gradually cut their way deeper into the earth until in many places the road has sunk from four to six feet below the surface of the ground, and a horse and cart can almost pass along unseen.

A common sight is a graveyard, sometimes a great collection of graves in semi-military order, recalling a battle, and sometimes a small local group quartered about a shrine or the more ambitious sepulchre of some chief or official.

In many places attempts have been made to provide irrigation. A ditch or canal furnishes water for the district, and when the land levels do not permit the free distribution of the water, the people scoop it up into little channels, using buckets, or sometimes leather scoops reminding one of the shadoof workers among the tribe.

"CHINESE SORROW."

In the late afternoon of that Tuesday we crossed the Yellow River by a very long steel bridge. The river is well called "China's Sorrow," for its riotous changes of course further to the east, near its mouth, have overlaid wide tracts with devastation. The entire region was of yellow clay and mud. The waters, wide but shallow, were a reddish-yellow. On the southern side of the river was a mud village, built like a cliff town, in the side and on the top of a yellow hill of clay. The people swarmed out of the place and lined the way on either side of the train, in all stages of unkempt array. It was at the end of the long curving bridge that we met the north-bound train from Hankow, bearing many travellers to Pekin, though the natural current of tourist travel is southward.

On our train were several missionaries, a number of students, Chinese and foreign, and many travellers from the west. The line is owned by a French company, and the Chinese stewards, porters and servants all speak French. This is unusual, for the desire to learn English is very widespread in the larger cities of China, and it is not often that one meets a native educated in any foreign language who does not speak English.

GRAVE OF CONFUCIUS.

Several of our train companions got down at the station where one takes the road to the old Chinese city where Confucius is buried. It lies to the east of the railroad line at some distance, but is a place of great sanctity and is visited by multitudes of Chinese and an increasing number of foreigners. It is impressive to contemplate the influence which this teacher, the contemporary of Solon, Chroesus, Buddha and Cyrus, has had upon his people. And it is always the hope of the Christian observer of Chinese life that the best elements of Confucian morality may serve as stepping stones to the firmer ground of Christian faith.

On Wednesday morning, after two nights and a day upon the train, we came into the station at Hankow on the Yangtsze Kiang. Here the usual crowd was gathered, swollen somewhat by the numbers of porters who hoped to get a chance to carry our luggage. Gradually out of the confusion we emerged with our belongings swung on the backs and suspended from the shoulder yokes of a small procession of celestials. We had several blocks to walk to our hotel. We could have taken the jinrikishas, whose drivers greeted us with the usual insistence, and in some instances threatened to carry off bodily some of the ladies. But after the long train journey it seemed good to walk, though we had to pass through streets lined with native spectators, two or three deep, and were accompanied by an unsolicited guard of honor of all ages and both sexes.

HANKOW AN UP-TO-DATE CITY.

The hotel we found very comfortable, and its surroundings pleasant. Hankow is composed of two very different sections. One is a native city, whose streets are narrow, dark and dirty, and whose smells are infamous. The other part is European, clean, modern and delightful, with broad streets, handsome shops and many fine residences. The principal street is the Bund, a broad avenue lying along the river front, whose lower end is taken up, on one side only, of course, with banking houses and shipping offices, and whose upper section is occupied by the consular residences of the European and American representatives. Here one sees a constant stream of people, riding or walking, especially in the late afternoon of a pleasant day. And on the river are ships and boats of every sort, from the little junks that ply along the river to the warships of the nations of the West. We saw many things of interest during the two days of our stay in Hankow, but none that gave us such a thrill of pride and satisfaction as the waving folds of "Old Glory" on the American consulate, and on the mast of an American gunboat on the river.

LORD CHANCELLOR FAVORS SUFFRAGE.

Viscount Haldane, the first Lord High Chancellor of England to visit America, declared on his arrival that he was in favor of equal suffrage.

"I am in favor of the female force in life," Lord Haldane said. "I have no doubt that in England women will at length get measures in their favor. At present the subject is divided, and there is little possibility of the passage of such a measure at this time. No, I don't think there is a possibility of a government measure in the near future. In the cabinet we are divided, some favoring suffrage and some opposing, and the opposition is divided as well."

Lord Haldane said that the women think less about the vote in this country than they do in England. He is not in sympathy with militancy. Miss Elizabeth Haldane, his sister, said also that she was not a militant.

"But," she added, "I am inclined to be in favor of their idea."

She was sorry that Mr. Asquith had been misused by militants while on the golf links.

Why Does the Jew Remain?

Does He Still Have a Message for the World?

BY W. J. LHAMON.

ISRAEL ABRAHAMS, Lecturer in Talmudic Literature in Cambridge University, has given us a little book on "Judaism" that is of more than passing value. He tells us that, "There are more people living today as Jews than there were at any previous moment in the world's history." He argues their present value and their probable future on the basis of their numbers and their excellence. "If," he says, "there are ten millions of men, women, and children who live, and live not ignobly by Judaism, can it be contended that Judaism is obsolete?"

CHANGING, YET ALWAYS THE SAME.

We know the ancient Jews pretty well. We know the Jews of the Old Testament and of the New, and we know how different these two ancient bodies were. Between the time of the Babylonian captivity and the advent of Jesus a great change had come over them. They were the same, yet not the same. Moses himself, could he have risen in the days of Jesus, would not have known the Jews as the people to whom he had ministered in the wilderness. The presentation of Professor Abrahams shows them still the same yet not the same they were in the New Testament times. They are not a nation, they are a community among communities. Scattered everywhere and everywhere persecuted at one time or another, they retain their identity, their ancient robustness and ancient secret of getting to the front. "When Frederic the Great asked what should make him believe in God, he received in answer, 'The survival of the Jews.'"

They are the same rigid monotheists that they were in the days of Herod the Great, and they are the same persistent protestants that they have ever been. They never would be like other people, and today they are as little like them as than can possibly be. "Israel is the protestant people," says Professor Abrahams. "Every religious or moral innovator has been a protestant. Socrates, Jesus, Luther, Maimonides, Spinoza; all of them, besides their contributions—very unequal contributions—to the positive store of truth, assumed also the negative attitude of protesters."

USEFULNESS OF THE JEW.

It is especially on the basis of his monotheism and his protestantism that Mr. Abrahams argues the right of the Jew to survive and his continued usefulness in the world. "The handful of protestants who, in Elijah's day, refused to bow to Baal and to kiss him, were the real saviors of their generation. And though the world today is in need of no such salvation, still the Jew remains the finest exemplification of the truth that God fulfils himself in many ways, lest one good custom should corrupt the world."

The modern Jew treats his ancient Bible rather cavalierly, we fear. The story of Esther he scarcely holds as historical. The last situations in it he considers vindictive and unwholesome. And the feast of Purim, based on it, is now retained chiefly as a children's feast, and a feast of charity. "But the whole book breathes so nationalistic a spirit, so uncompromising a belief that the enemy of Israel was the enemy of God, that it has become difficult for the modern Jew to retain any affection for it." Professor Abrahams is not sure whether Abraham and Moses were "historical persons or figments of tradition." "Whatever criticism may be doing with Abraham, it is coming more and more to see that behind the eighth-century prophets there must have towered the figure of a, if not the traditional, Moses; behind the prophets a, if not the, law."

It is not affirmed that the religion of Israel passed through the stages of totemism, animism, and polydemonism, and that it was indebted to Canaanite, Kenite, Babylonian, Persian, Greek and other foreign influences, but it is conceded that it may have done so, and that it may therefore be a syncretism of all these and other influences. "Like the Bourbon the Jew forgets nothing; but unlike the Bourbon the Jew is always learning." "God, in the early literature a tribal nonmoral deity, was in the later literature a righteous ruler who with Amos and Hosea loved and demanded righteousness in man.

THE JEW AND SACRED LITERATURE.

"Judaism took over as one indivisible body of sacred teachings both the earlier and the later literature in which these varying conceptions were enshrined; the law was accepted as the guiding rule of life, the ritual of ceremony and sacrifice was treasured as a holy memory, and a memory not contradictory of the prophetic exaltation of inward religion but as consistent with that exaltation, as interpreting it, as another aspect of Micah's enunciation of the demands of God: 'What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?'"

Dr. Abrahams tells us that the ancient Jews were not logical. They did not pick and choose. With childlike naivete they held to the past, they absorbed it all, and they made no attempt to reconcile its contradictions. Hence their religion was a syncretism on which Phariseeism was engrafted.

FEASTS UNDER THE NEW ORDER.

From the days of the destruction of the temple Judaism changed by necessity. Their centralized, sacrificial worship ceased. They could no longer go up to the celebration of the great feasts once and twice and thrice a year. They could no longer be a nation. They were compelled to adjust themselves to a new order. Mr. Abrahams thinks that the three great festivals of the Jews, namely, Passover, Pentecost and Tabernacles, were originally nature feasts, "among the oldest rites of men," taken over from "pre-Israelite cults." That they became pilgrim feasts during the national period. That at the destruction of the temple they ceased to be pilgrim feasts, and sacrificial ones, and that they are preserved and reinterpreted as beautiful memorials. In the Jewish liturgy, he says, "the three feasts have special designations. They are called respectively, The Season of our Freedom, The Season of the Giving of the Law, and The Season of Our Joy."

These descriptions, we are told, are not biblical, and they are not found in the synagogue liturgy till in the early part of the middle ages. "The Passover practically celebrates the formation of the Jewish people, and it is the festival of liberty." "It does not matter that we no longer believe in the miraculous incidents of the Exodus story. They are mere trappings which can be dispensed with." In a similar way the liberal Jews, rejecting the story of the giving of the law on Mount Sinai, join with the orthodox Jews in celebrating Pentecost as the memorial of "the definite union of religion with morality." Tabernacles is an ancient nature festival, giving expression to the joy of the harvest. These festivals have now nothing national left to them, so complete has been their reinterpretation ideally and symbolically.

THE EXPERIMENT OF ZIONISM.

One must agree with Mr. Abrahams that "this is surely a remarkable development," but also agree with him in his statement that "the process is in active incubation in America as well as in Europe, but it cannot be claimed that the eggs are hatched yet."

Zionism is a relatively recent movement looking toward the restoration of nationalism among the Jews. The effort has not succeeded, and the feasts are likely to live not by the restoration of political nationality, but by reason of the new meaning put into them as indicated above.

Evidently the modern Jew has traveled far from his ancient customs and scriptures. No people was ever more nobly stubborn, but they have had the problem of adjustment to conditions even more stubborn than themselves. Stubborn circumstance compelled them to drop their centralized, sacrificial worship. It compelled them to scatter, and abandon their nationality. It has compelled them to reinterpret their feasts and their scriptures. It has compelled them to see God as the God of all nations, and they no longer speak of him as "The God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob."

THE MODERN JEW.

How shall we understand the age-long abiding of this strange people? Have they still a message to the world, and is that why they stay? Or have they delivered their message? Have they given their best to the world? And are they ready to melt into the greater group, the brotherhood of a world in process of redemption? Is it not pride of race that holds them now, and the habit of separateness? And will not these inferior forces give way under the disintegrating rationalism indicated above? Their message of monotheism—Christianity has received it, and improved it, and is bearing it on to the world with a speed and power never dreamed of by the Jews. Their message of monogamy—that too has been accepted by Christianity, and rendered more secure in her hands than ever it was in the hands of Moses and David. Their message of atonement—that has become priceless with Christians, and by them has been winnowed of sacramentalism, and sweetened by the love and blood and prayers of Israel's greatest Son, and is being proclaimed to the world by fifty times as many millions as the Jews can boast.

Why do they linger?

Another Poorhouse Story.

BY WILLIAM LA FAVOR.

"You! My soul! Pete Cady, you ain't bringing your old father to this place!"

The Superintendent of the Poor Farm shielded with curved palm the flaring flame of the lantern he held in the other hand. Its yellow glare blocked out in the midnight blackness a bright prism of dancing specks of sleet. The rays of light fell obliquely across the slouching form of a man standing on the door steps. From his drooping felt hat little streams of rain drizzled. In the roadway beyond, an old farm horse and a shaky democrat wagon were visible. In the body of the wagon a gray army blanket covered a rigid form lying on a bed of straw.

It was late in November and a slow, persistent rain had fallen all day. Fretful gusts of wind had swished the branches of a ragged Norway pine across the window panes of the sitting room. At milking time the wind had dropped, the air had grown colder, and the rain had turned to sleet.

Bob Mason had loafed the day out in the sitting room in his own ell of the house. He could not go on with fall ploughing in that bleak drizzle, and nothing indoors demanded his immediate care. He might have lettered with black ink a white head board for a pauper's grave, but it wasn't cheerful work on such a day as that. His idling the time away was unusual and most ill-advised, but the truth was that his soul had turned sick of his job. He had struck his limit. The inmates of the poorhouse were depressing even when he could spend the day at work in the fields, but to be housed with them all day—to listen to Crazy Moll's shrill laughter, and to Idiot Steve's stammering; to face the apathetic stare of decrepit old fathers and mothers of graceless children—it was grating on his nerves. The poorhouse smell was in itself enough to sicken a man. Compacted of many dreary odors blended into a clinging reek, it reminded him of cooking turnips and old woolen socks, of stale human flesh and of yellow soap. Through it all came the persistent tang of the disinfectant he used in the floor wash.

He would make a getaway. He was dead tired of it, and so was Em'ly. Em'ly wasn't strong enough to cook for sixty people. They had expected to use pauper help, but it was too inefficient to put up with. They had done the best they could. Now that the appropriation for surplus was cut down and that for salaried help cut out entirely, it was no use. The County Commissioner told him the paupers must work. But the few able were not willing, and the many willing weren't able.

Bob Mason had gone to bed early, resolved that tomorrow he would drive into town and resign. The boys had promised to make him sheriff, and in that county the promise of "The Boys" was as good as an election. He fell asleep, in the sweet consciousness that he would soon be shut of the whole miserable business.

At midnight he was awakened by a thumping on the front door and a voice calling his name, "Bob Mason, Bob Mason! Git up and let me in!"

Bob shuffled sleepily into his carpet slippers, drew on his trousers, and grasped the lantern that always stood lighted on the hall table. Renewed pounding at the door did not hasten his step. Whoever it was, he should wait. The rush of dank night air when he opened the door almost put out his light. He sheltered the flame with the curved palm of his hand as he peered into the sullen face of the man on the doorstep.

"You! Good gracious, Pete Cady, you ain't bringing your old dad to this place!"

"Just had to do it, Bob," the man whined. "Paralyzed, you know." He jerked his head towards the form in the democrat wagon. "Nobody to take care of him. Irene, she ain't strong, and anyway she said she hadn't got no call to. And I can't stay in the house all day." The voice rose to a treble and trailed down again into its accustomed whine.

"You know me, Bob. We used to live neighbors up to Stony Brook. Ain't you recollectin'?"

"Yes, Pete Cady! I'm recollectin' all right, you old hound dawg. I'm recollectin' who slaved and saved and paid for the farm and deeded it to you on condition that you cared for him in his old age. The farm is mortgaged and spent for drink and fast horses, and worse. Don't need no introducin'. You drove your old dad sixteen miles in this sleet on this tophet of a night so as no neighbor would meet up with you."

A low moan came from the blanketed form in the democrat wagon. Mason crept cautiously down the icy steps and slipped his hand under the blanket.

"The old man is soaked to the skin, and what of him ain't paralyzed is about froze. If he don't die of this night's work it'll be a wonder."

He threw back the stiffening blanket and slipped his strong arms under the rigid form. He shuffled carefully up the steps with it into the hallway.

"Here, you Pete, carry the lantern and lead on, down the hall to No. 38—the open door on the left." Bob panted as he spoke.

Pete pushed the door back with his foot and held the lantern high, but he did not enter the room. It was scarcely big enough for two, anyway. There was a broken backed chair in it, and an iron bed covered with faded tick filled with straw. It was a poor bed, but it was dry.

Other doors up and down the hall opened stealthily. Disheveled heads peered out. No one forbade them, and the inmates crowded into the passageway and clustered about the door of No. 38. The last trumpet will rouse no more grotesque crew. The maimed, the halt, the blind, and those of feeble wit gaped in stupid yet not unkindly curiosity at the man by the door and the form stretched on the straw tick. Two or three lame, but intelligent old men offered to help. One of them had seen the day when his credit was good for many thousands. But Mason sent these old fellows back and directed two half-witted lads to take off the old man's clothing while he went for bed covering. The boys were rough and slow at it, but Pete Cady stood watching them without offering to help. He was thinking of the sixteen miles he must drive home through the sleet.

Mason returned bringing a warm old double gown of his own, a blanket shawl, a pillow and two quilts. The half-witted lads spread the covers over the old man with rude yet kindly intentions. Pity and anger were streaming up through their slow minds, making of them something finer than the man's only son, who waited with sagging shoulders at the doorway.

Em'ly Mason bustled in with a cup of steaming fluid. She raised the old man's head tenderly and held a spoon to the blue lips. They responded gratefully and she fed him the hot drink by spoonfuls. The old man's eyes opened. In a dazed yet questioning way they wandered about the unaccustomed place, resting finally on the woman's pitying face. Em'ly noted how big and beautiful they seemed in contrast with the sunken cheeks.

"It's Em'ly Mason, Mr. Cady, your old neighbor," she reassured him. "Feeling better now? Do you like it here?" Em'ly had a mechanical habit of asking that rather risky question. She had to say something to the old folks.

The great eyes filled with tears "It's more peaceful," he whispered.

Em'ly laid gentle fingers on the eyes and brushed away the tears. She drew the quilt up over his shoulders and tucked him in. She took up the lantern and closed the door.

"More peaceful, he says." Mason repeated the words to the man who still slouched in the hallway.

"Oh now"—whimpered Pete—"if you knew all about it you wouldn't put the blame onto me. He said hisself he'd be better off here. He asked to, so of course, I just brought him along to where he'd be well taken care of."

"Well taken care of? Who do you think is going to well-take care of him?"

"Ain't that what you are paid for?"

"You'd think so, wouldn't you, Pete Cady, seeing all these ladies and gentlemen about in this here hallway? They is sixty of them. I'll bet you can count half of 'em right now. And besides there's a quarter section for me to work, and stock to 'well-take care' of too."

"Well—how about your wife?"

"Em'ly? She cooks for sixty people. She ain't got no time to do much nursing. No sir. Your father needs hospital care, and if there is a way in Gawd's world to make you send him there, I'll see you do it!"

"Go slow, Bob Mason," Cady snarled, "You want to be sheriff pretty soon now, and you'll be wantin' my influence."

"You go to grass with your infloonce! You couldn't infloonce your own vote if another man showed it a bottle! Get out and work agin me. It would just tickle me to death and help me no end to have you do it. Now I'll exercise a little infloonce on you, you houn' dawg. Wish't I had my boots on! Make your getaway, Pete Cady!"

Cady wilted. "I ain't meaning no harm, neighbor. Think of them sixteen miles back home I've got to drive. Ain't there a chanct for me to sleep here?"

"There's just about as much chance fer you to sleep here as there is fur your poor old dad to drive you home! Jest about."

"What kind of a man are you to turn me out on a night like this? Ain't this a County building? Don't I pay taxes? I guess I stay if I want to."

Bob drew himself up to his full six feet of height.

"These here folks"—his arms swept about in a rude gathering-in gesture—"these here sixty folks is paupers, outcasts, poorer than poverty, but there ain't one of them but is more of a man than you be! I wouldn't disgrace them by lettin' you sleep on the floor, and I wouldn't have disinfectant enough to clean it up if I did. Git!"

He went to the front door and flung it wide.

"Happy to say it's rainin' like all-git-out. You go home and read a piece called King Lear by William Shakespeare deceased. When you git to a gal called Regan, she's yer sister."

Pete Cady slunk through the door, and Mason slammed it after him. The key crunched in the lock. He turned about to the huddling forms that crowded the gloomy passageway.

"Good-night, my friends, good-night."

With stumbling, stumping, shuffling tread the crowd scuttled away.

Bob Mason stood there very straight, watching till the last one disappeared. A deep belated respect for them welled up in his rough heart.

"Nobody wants ye," he said, "Then good gracious—I want ye! I'm off the ticket for sheriff."

A Missionary Pathfinder Fallen

A Story of the Work of R. Ray Eldred.

BY STEPHEN J. COREY.

EDITOR'S NOTE: Last week the news was flashed across the sea that R. Ray Eldred, Congo missionary, had been accidentally drowned, on September 3. No further particulars of Mr. Eldred's death came with the cablegram, and it will be several weeks before a letter giving complete details will arrive. In the meantime, Disciples everywhere will be interested in learning something of the heroic career of this aggressive evangelist and missionary. The news that has come of his death is made doubly sad by the fact that Mrs. Eldred was laid to rest beside the Congo less than a year ago.

WEN the history of Congo missions is written, among the names that will be accorded high honor will be that of R. Ray Eldred, whose career has just been tragically ended. Mr. Eldred labored on the Congo for only eleven years, but these were years of pioneer "boring-in," of foundation-laying, in the difficult Upper Congo region.

R. Ray Eldred, with his wife, went to Bolenge in 1902. He was one of the pioneers who with Dr. and Mrs. Dye, Dr. and Mrs. Layton, and E. E. Faris helped to shape the beginnings of the work at Bolenge. His service has been largely that of a pioneer and the last four or five years have been occupied in the opening up and establishing of the station at Longa on the Bosira at the mouth of the Momboyo River.

MR. ELDRED'S VARIED TALENTS.

Mr. Eldred combined mechanical skill with evangelistic zeal and his industrial work along with the preaching has been a factor in opening up new fields. He was a man who combined a strong physique with great resourcefulness. His leadership among the native people of the forest was remarkable. Ray Eldred never spared himself in the accomplishment of the great task to which he had set his hand. Time and again he has endangered his life for his people.

Longa has been a very difficult field because of the radical opposition of the Catholics and also because the immediate settlements of native people were greatly demoralized by European traders and a very raw type of heathenism. After patient toil, Mr. Eldred had built up a strong center at Longa, with a church membership of three or four hundred. The work was getting to be well established and excellently rounded out in its proportions. Beside his preaching he conducted a day school in Lokundu, a school in French and kept many of the native men busy in his industrial department. Mr. Eldred had just finished a substantial new brick home, the bricks of which were burned at the station, and the lumber sawn from the forest.

UNTIRING AS AN EVANGELIST.

Mr. Eldred was an untiring evangelist and nothing delighted him more than long itinerations into the back country preaching the gospel. It was from these far villages that the majority of the converts at Longa had come. At the time of his death a long itinerate of some ten weeks through the forest had been planned with H. C. Hobgood. No doubt the sad accident which resulted in his death occurred on this long journey. His last letter from the field recounted some of the plans he had in mind. In that letter he wrote as follows:

"In about a week or starting the 23d of July, Mr. Hobgood and I are to start our itinerating. We are to go from here to Lotumbe overland, and will likely stay at Lotumbe about two days or long enough to get ready for a longer journey up country. We will then start out from Lotumbe, to visit the country above Lotumbe, coming out on the Momboyo River about fifty miles above Iyete and Bosau, where you and I were. Then we are to go on up the Momboyo River some fifty miles farther to where we have a promising work. Then we are to turn down river overland as far as Waka, and come on to Lotumbe by canoe. This journey in all will take us over some six or seven hundred miles of land and two hundred by river, and will occupy some two and a half months. I will have to keep you posted about this trip, as it is or will be very likely the longest of its kind ever made by a Foreign Christian Missionary Society worker, with perhaps the exception of Mrs. Rijnhart's, in Tibet. You know something of the roads out here and we will see worse ones on this trip. We are to take the stereopticon, and I shall make use of it too. I will have my medicines along to do all the good I can with them. This is not to be a forced march, for we want to reach the people, and we want also to keep well. Do not worry about us, for the Father, who has always been with us, will be with us all of the way."

POPULAR AMONG ACQUAINTANCES.

As we recall, Eldred was a good swimmer and had several times before plunged into the water to save some of his black workers whose canoes had been capsized. It is possible that his death came about in some such manner in one of the swift forest streams that he and Hobgood would necessarily have to cross.

Eldred was very popular in America, especially among Transylvania students and alumni, for he was a graduate of that school. He was the invincible center on the Transylvania University football team while in college.

While the writer was visiting the mission in Africa last year, Eldred was his companion during much of the time, and especially during two itinerates through the jungles, one on foot and one in dug-out canoes, up the Bolingo River. Eldred was a royal companion in such journeys, one of the most self-forgetful and kind-hearted men in the world, strong in body, quick in sympathy and tender of heart. Nothing was more touching than to see him gather about him the people of a strange village who had never heard concerning Christ and tell them for the first time the sweet story of the Saviour's love.

HIS FEARLESS EXPLOITS.

Eldred in the early days at Longa met with much opposition from the native Catholics and the heathen people. On one occasion he went at night in a canoe to a distant heathen village and rescued single handed one of the black mission girls who had been stolen from the compound by a group of savages. At another time he rescued a slave in a distant village who was held for use in a cannibal feast. These fearless exploits gave him the name among the natives of "The White Man With the Strong Arm." He was respected everywhere. No man was more loved by his converts than he. Less than a year ago the hearts of the Christians at Longa were broken by the loss

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

RECENT WHITE SLAVE LEGISLATION.

THIS week's papers tell of the sentences pronounced against Maury I. Diggs and Drew Caminetti, two prominent young men of California, in the United States District Court, for violating the Mann White Slave Act. Their offense consisted in taking two high school girls from Sacramento to Reno, Nevada, for immoral purposes. Two years in the Federal Penitentiary, and a fine of $2,000, was the sentence against Maury Diggs, and eighteen months in the same prison, and a fine of $1,500, was the penalty imposed on his friend and companion, Drew Caminetti. A dramatic touch in the case, was that Caminetti's father, Anthony Caminetti, was United States Commissioner General of Immigration, and that it is our Bureau of Immigration that has the oversight of our federal white slave legislation.

In view of the wide publicity given this trial, and the general interest it has excited, this Department has been asked to tell something of recent federal legislation for the protection of young women from a life of commercialized vice.

FIRST STEPS TOWARD REFORM.

The laws that are working such profound changes in the attitude of society toward these unfortunate women are less than a decade old. They received their impulse from an International Conference in Paris, France, in 1902, at which representatives from the leading European powers and the United States were present, to devise ways and means for the suppression of the white slave traffc. In June, 1904, an international treaty was signed between the great countries of Europe, for the regulation of the business of transporting girls from one country to another for purposes of prostitution. This is said to have been the first treaty relating to social morality ever consummated between the civilized governments of the world.

Our country, after a thorough investigation, became a party to the treaty in 1908. The enforcement of its provisions was put in the hands of the police in Europe; in the United States, the police are not under federal control, so it was put in the hands of our national bureau of immigration.

UNITED STATES PASSES LAW.

But though our government was the last of the great powers to sign the treaty it was not idle in instituting warfare on the evil. In February, 1907, Congress passed this statute:

"That any person who shall keep, maintain, support, or harbor any alien woman for immoral purposes within three years after her arrival in this country, shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction be imprisoned not more than five years, and pay a fine of not more than $5,000; and any alien girl or woman found in a house of prostitution, or practicing prostitution at any time within three years after she shall have entered the United States, shall be deported to the country from whence she came."

At the same time, in 1907, a special committee was formed under the immigration bureau, to investigate the importation and harboring of women for immoral purposes. This committee worked for more than two years, and made a more systematic and comprehensive study of conditions in the underworld than ever had been made before. Their report was submitted to the congress of 1910, and its revelations have made a profound impression on the whole country. They had a great number of agents, working in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, Chicago, Denver, Salt Lake City, Butte, Seattle, Portland, and San Francisco. These agents sometimes did their work at great personal peril; Mr. Dillingham, chairman of the committee, says some of the information embodied in its report, was secured at the risk of their lives.

Mr. Dillingham stated that his report was guarded and conservative, because the subject was especially liable to sensational exploitation. The demand for the report was so great, that the printed copies were exhausted soon after its issue; its careful and cautious statements are so shocking, that they have had much to do in producing widespread revolt against the dreadful evil that has existed so long in our midst.

COMMERCIAL PROFIT THE MOTIVE.

It says that the whole object of the white slave traffic is commercial profit, and the earnings of the professional prostitutes support a vicious class of men and women in idleness and luxury. The women who are bought and sold are always young, and do not realize the conditions into which they are betrayed. Sometimes, their earnings go directly to the man, who is often the first lover of the girl and her betrayer. Sometimes, he sells her outright to the keeper of a disorderly house. She is required to have gaudy house clothes, and other things which she is told she must have, and is charged exorbitant prices for them—so she is kept constantly in debt to the woman who keeps her. In addition to this, some of her earnings go to the police, for so-called "protection." General Bingham stated to the committee that during his first year as police commissioner of New York City he might have accepted bribes from the red light districts amounting to $600,000, or even a million. Among the affidavits filed in the report is one, in which it is stated that one French girl was sold for $500, another for $1,000, another for $1,400.

LATER LEGISLATION.

The submission of this report to congress three years ago was followed by legislation even more stringent than that of 1907. The statute quoted above was amended by striking out the three year limit, and the term of imprisonment was increased from five to ten years. At the recommendation of President Taft, an appropriation of fifty thousand dollars was made for the employment of special inspectors, to bring those responsible for the traffic to conviction under the federal law.

All of this is only for the protection of foreign girls, imported into this country for immoral purposes. The federal government can only legislate for them, and for the transportation of women from one state to another, under our interstate laws—all other legislation must be done by the state legislatures. The Mann White Slave Act, which was passed by congress at this time, imposed a fine and a penalty of imprisonment, for transporting women from one state to another for purposes of prostitution; it was under the provisions of this law that the young California men received the punishment they so richly deserved, and by it, Jack Johnson, the black prize fighter was tried and convicted but escaped punishment by fleeing to a foreign country.

CHANGED VIEWS TOWARD FALLEN WOMEN.

This federal legislation and many other agencies are giving us a different point of view toward these forlorn and forsaken women. In the thought and the literature of the past, the fallen women was the Siren, the Circe, who led helpless men astray and held them in bondage; but now we are learning a new point of view and both the law and public opinion are beginning to believe that it is the men who beguile and betray these poor girls who are worthy of punishment. And this heart of compassion for these prisoners of sin is no new thing! It is as old as the days of Him who same to seek and to save the lost and who said to one of these erring women, Go and sin no more, and to another, Thy sins, which are many, are forgiven thee. I. W. H.

JANE ADDAMS ON STYLES.

"Burning questions of the day are eugenic marriage, woman's suffrage and the fashions. I favor strict eugenic laws and woman's suffrage. The styles today are more sensible than ever."

Jane Addams of Hull House, Chicago, thus epitomized her ideas on these three subjects last week, in an interview at the Valencia farm of the Kingsley House Settlement, in Pittsburg, where the annual conference of national federation of settlements was held.

"I do not believe, with so many people, that women are being degraded by the fashions," said Miss Addams. "The less clothing we can wear with modesty the better. It is better for health and allows more freedom of movement.

"Of course, there are extremes. In Chicago our police women take care of these."

A MISSIONARY PATHFINDER FALLEN.

of Mrs. Eldred, their good angel of mercy. Now grief will be doubly heavy upon their hearts because their great white teacher has gone, whom they loved so much. It is difficult to know how the work will be carried on without Mr. Eldred. However, the Lord has a way, and although the workers fall he carries on his task. Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Johnston, who have recently arrived on the Congo, were to be Eldred's companions at Longa. Since his wife's death he has been toiling there alone, refusing to follow the request of the Foreign Society to come to Bolenge and wait for reinforcements. In his answer to the cablegram, asking him to do this, he replied: "How can I leave my people? I am their teacher and the one on whom they depend for the Word of Truth."

Mr. Eldred leaves three little orphan sons, who are being tenderly cared for by Mrs. M. D. Adams in the home for missionary children at Hiram, Ohio.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

THE CATHOLIC NAME.

BLESSINGS on our fathers for their wisdom in choosing to call the churches of their Christian union movement by no name save the generic Scriptural title, churches of Christ! The controversy in the Protestant Episcopal Church over their name waxes more vehement as the time of their General Convention approaches. The sentiment seems about equally divided between the high church party which wants the name changed to American Catholic and the low church party which is satisfied to have it remain as it is.

In an extended pre-convention utterance "The Living Church," published in Milwaukee, the organ of the high church party, admits frankly that the real issue is not whether a particular name shall be chosen but whether the name Protestant shall be abandoned. It says:

> No religious body in Christendom is so misunderstood by the world at large, so seldom appreciated by its own members, as is the Protestant Episcopal Church. Gradually we are discovering that this is largely due to its name. The term implies a voluntary, post-Reformation body. And the standards of the Church and her books of Church defense treat her as much antedating the Reformation and as being a section of the historic Church, founded by Christ Himself. This is not merely the position of Catholic Churchmen; it is the position of the Church itself and of all educated Churchmen.

Disciples naturally have a sympathetic feeling for the high church party in their desire to abandon a denominational name. But we cannot avoid reminding them that if they simply exchange the name Protestant for the name Catholic they still move in the realm of denominational nomenclature. Catholic is not the catholic name. Church of Christ is the catholic name.

If Episcopalians wish by their title to assert their catholicity, their nationality and their assumed uniqueness as compared with the various Protestant denominations, the logic of such a purpose should lead them to adopt the title, The American Church of Christ.

But how much better is the logic as well as the spirit of the Disciples of Christ! They too wish to occupy a catholic position. They too refuse to be or belong to a denomination.

They do not wish to be called the Church of Christ, nor the American Church of Christ, nor yet the American Catholic Church.

They are simply and modestly churches of Christ, each one a vital part of the one Church of Christ which embraces many churches, wearing—sad to say—many divisive names, and including these dear Episcopalian brethren and their churches too.

There is no denomination—Disciples of Christ or any other—no "section" of the Church, to which Disciples belong and for which they must find a name. They acknowledge no ecclesiasticism to which their churches are subordinate save the whole Church of Christ, and they labor and pray for the time to come when there may be unity within the Church so that their congregational subordination may find normal organic expression.

ADAM AND EVE.

WE were most reluctant to believe the charges against Governor Sulzer, but the evidence has grown almost hopelessly strong. If he is guilty, he is not only a wicked man but a hypocrite, for just at the time when he was most hopelessly involved in speculations on the stock exchange with money not his own, he was standing before the public as an official opposed on reasons of conscience to the stock exchange and the very methods he was then employing for what he hoped would be his own financial advantage. If he is guilty he is trebly guilty—guilty of dishonesty, guilty of falsehood, guilty of hypocrisy. Not yet will we pronounce him so, but wait for the decision of the courts.

But there is one point in this sad matter which we wish to mention, the attempt of Mrs. Sulzer to save her husband by her own confession that she was the guilty person. So far as any evidence appears up to this date, her confession also was a falsehood, inspired in the hope of saving her husband.

Men have been known to "perjure themselves like gentlemen," and women from the dawn of history have lied in order to save men who did not deserve the sacrifice. It is no new thing, but the cowardly habit of men permitting women to do this sort of thing ought to begin to slacken up. It had its rebuke quite early in the history of the human race and it did not do any good. For a guilty man to permit his wife to come out in print with a confession that his sin was hers and then have the newspapers print it with stories of her nervous prostration makes good copy for the newspaper, but the man who permits the thing to be done, knowing all the while that he himself is a guilty man, must have a craven soul. Adam was not wholly a liar, and Mrs. Sulzer may by extravagance or other fault have been a participant in her husband's sin. There has been a fairly even division of sin between the sexes from the time the world started, but it begins to be time for the employment of a somewhat more chivalrous method. Let Adam come out in the open and accord to Eve what little protection she can find among the foliage of the figs.

EUGENE FIELD.

EUGENE FIELD'S grave in a Chicago cemetery has gone for fifteen years without a monument. A movement to secure $10,000 by popular subscriptions to erect a suitable memorial is now on foot, and from many obscure quarters quaint and tender memorabilia are coming to light. A dealer in autograph letters issued a catalogue last week which shows a little note characteristic of the Poet of Childhood. It was written to a Mrs. Stedman in Chicago January 1, 1888. Its simple message is this:

> It has occurred to me that perhaps your little girl might like to go to the circus. Accordingly I take the liberty of inclosing two tickets good for any afternoon or evening of this week.

It was not an important act but it meant the keenest pleasure to a little girl for that afternoon. And this simple note struck off out of the heart may now be purchased for $35. Eugene Field was loved while he lived because he was constantly gladdening childhood by simple deeds and simple human verse. His debtors—children, and grownups with child-like hearts—may pay a small part of their debt by building the modest monument now proposed.

SMALL COLLEGES AND SMALL EXPENSES.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD, of Williams College, has made a study of changes in the average annual expense of study at Williams. In the three years, 1885-1887, the average was $652; in the triennium, 1910-1912, it had risen to $927. This is an increase of over forty-two per cent. President Garfield shows that this is simply in keeping with the general increase in the cost of living during these years. It must be noted also that the cost of a course in Williams is not necessarily so high as the figures for the average indicate. It is possible to live on far less than $927 a year there.

Yet the question arises in the presence of such figures as these, What is the boy to do who must work his way through college? He cannot, under the best conditions, earn a very large fraction of the annual cost of a college course in such a college as Williams. The burden of debt is too great. The price is prohibitive.

Never was the need of the academy and college where poor boys and girls can study greater than it is today. The standards and work and culture of the Eastern colleges are high and if they were available for the poor boy it would be a precious privilege. They are simply beyond his reach. The children of the rich must be trained there. Meantime the ambitious, industrious boys and girls from the homes of the poor are eager to study. The state institutions and the humbler colleges are doing invaluable work in making it possible for them to receive thorough training for life. The Disciples of Christ have founded many small colleges. As never before they must support these colleges for the children of those who cannot meet the financial demands of the more expensive institutions. Give the poor boy and girl a chance to earn a college education!

THE QUESTION IN ANOTHER FORM.

DR. Peter Ainslie writes an editorial for the October Christian Union Quarterly (which, incidentally, is by far the best issue of this publication yet put out) in reply to this question: Is not baptism the greatest barrier to union? He answers emphatically no, and points out that Baptists and Disciples, although alike in their practice of immersion, are no more closely together in fellowship than Baptists and Congregationalists, or Disciples and Presbyterians. He further shows that each of these communions has suffered a schism within its own body within the past half century. Agreement on baptism was not sufficient to keep Baptists together, nor Disciples together.

"The greatest hindrance to unity today," adds Dr. Ainslie, "is ungodliness in the Church in the form of bigotry, sectarianism, pride, meanness and self-righteousness."

This is a good answer to the question, and a true answer. If there were a passion for unity, a conscience on unity, in the souls of Christian people, there would be a tidal wave of desire that would sweep away those questions which now seem to afford us an excuse for keeping up our divisions. As to baptism, however, many would like to have the question put in a somewhat different form. It is this: Does not the insistence upon RE-baptism as a condition of fellowship in churches of Disciples stand in the way of THEIR practicing Christian union? This is a very vital and urgent question in the souls of those who believe that Christian unity is not merely some far-off divine event but an imperative duty here and now. They cannot feel otherwise than that insistence on the re-baptism of one who is already a member of the Church of Christ is the direct contradiction of Christian unity.

CHAPLAINS FOR THE NAVY.

WE invite our readers to co-operate heartily with the Federal Council to increase the number of chaplains in the United States navy and to dignify that office. The number of our battleships and cruisers has increased vastly and the number of chaplains remains stationery. Not only so, but Protestant churches have not been sufficiently active in the matter of securing appointments for the best possible men. Wherever young men are confined in a state prison a chaplain is employed, even though the number of prisoners be but from 200 to 500, but the crew of a modern battleship may consist of 800 to 1,200, beside which there may be on board from 1,000 to 3,000 bluejackets. These are all young men, largely recruited from the country, sailing to distant lands and liable to land at any foul port in the Orient, with temptation awaiting them on every hand, with money to spend and with no spiritual oversight. Every ship in the United States navy ought to have a chaplain and he ought to be a good man and a great man and held in high honor.

IT OUGHT TO BE TRUE.

THERE is one expert on the Book of Revelation whose conceptions we could wish should make good. This is Rev. Jasper S. Hughes. The appearance of an article from his pen in the Biblical World for September suggests the possibility that his interpretation is at least meeting a degree of hospitality among scholars of the first rank.

The Christian Century frankly confesses its inability to pronounce judgment for or against any reasonable thinker's interpretation of this book. Since the editor passed out of the susceptible stage when certain parts of the Bible were accepted as dealing with magical wonders, he has been taught that there was an apocalyptic nomenclature, so to speak, which had grown up in Palestine before the time of Christ, in which writers on religion were wont at times to express their ideas. This form of literature naturally was carried over into the Christian Church. It is traceable in the teaching of Jesus himself, but the last book of the New Testament is its supreme illustration. Assuming this point of view to be valid we supposed that the only way in which any degree of sense could be made out of the Revelation was to orient oneself in this apocalyptic literature.

But Mr. Hughes thinks this historical orientation is not necessary. He finds the key to the Revelation in the events closely following the ascension of our Lord and recorded for us in ordinary prose form in the book of Acts, especially the earlier chapters. Revelation, as we understand him, is a cryptic drama, telling over again, but in symbolic characters, the great events that had already taken place,—the choosing of a successor to Judas, the descent of the Spirit, the preaching of Peter, the call of Saul of Tarsus, etc.,—rather than a prophetic projection of the future history of the world.

Toward all the soothsaying, clairvoyant interpretations which make of the book a foreteller of specific historical events—the rise of the papacy, the appearance of Napoleon, the digging of the Panama Canal—Mr. Hughes is accustomed, and rightly, to show uncontrollable impatience.

Whether his views will bear scholarly analysis or not we must not say, but we close as we began, by saying that we could wish they might make good. Mr. Hughes finds such lofty idealism in the book, such modern idealism, that one cannot help hoping it is really in the book and not read into it by the idealistic mind of its interpreter.

But whether found in the book or brought to it, it is good doctrine and deserves to be heard.

FAMILIAR!

THE following paragraph is taken from an article on Christian Unity in the Constructive Quarterly written by an Episcopalian bishop:

> We must draw a line of demarcation between faith and opinion, between principle and prejudice, between what is apostolic or primitive and what has been added since primitive times. When we put in their true perspective man-made definitions and interpretations of fundamental truth, there will be more of the manifestation of the spirit of unity.

Sounds as if we had heard that before somewhere!

A NEW DAY OF RELIGION.

NOTHING more cheering has come to us than the comments of the daily press on the recent utterances of Sir Oliver Lodge on "Immortality." So far as we have noticed not one of them discusses at any length the technical aspects of Sir Oliver's argument. All of them that give it a serious thought deal with it as an evidence of the return of the human mind to the contemplation of things spiritual. The London Times led off with a strong leader and the British and American papers have not been slow to follow. As typical of the secular newspaper point of view we reprint herewith an editorial from the Chicago Evening Post, which embodies a quotation from the leader of the London Times.

"Leave to the metaphysicians the philosophies of Sir Oliver Lodge's theory of 'continuity of the individuality after death.' But take from it the lesson of simple religion which the London Times draws in these few words:

" 'The whole discourse is a protest against arrogance. In recent years science has been asserting its claims against a dogmatic theology. Perhaps some overassertion was necessary, but overasserting there certainly was. The public woke to find that they had only exchanged one priesthood for another. The laws of science were more sacrosanct than Holy Writ. Nothing which could not be weighed or measured was allowed any validity.'

"It is a true picture of the era that has come, not so much

'since Darwin' as since the day of the great material inventions.

"But another day is coming. The meaning which the Times so keenly places upon this declaration of immortal faith by the official chief of English science may be read in other tendencies the world over.

"Religion is the basis of what we call the progressive movement. Righteousness and brotherly love are the inspiring motives of this new effort to put the needs and the souls of men into the field of political effort. No man who has his hand on the pulse of 'progressivism' can miss the throb of purely religious faith that is beating so steadily, so surely, yet so quietly, within it.

"A revitalization of religion is due. The sway of materialism, splendid as it has been, has held long enough for the inevitable swing to other things. For so the world moves.

"Speaking with high authority for science—or human knowledge—Sir Oliver Lodge tells us all that science is not sufficient. He yields back the scepter to the old faith that has lived ever since the Spirit first moved upon the face of the waters. The abdication is a profound and touching prophecy of what the fresh-coming years next hold in store for humanity's advance."

SAVE AMERICA.

FROM various quarters it is reported that Roman Catholic priests and politicians are protesting against using the hymn, "America," in public schools, and in general patriotic services. The reasons they allege are that it is a sectarian hymn, written by a New England parson.

It was, indeed, written by a New England parson, but is a thoroughly non-sectarian hymn, in every way beautiful and worthy of the place it has won in the affections of the people. The reasons for opposing it are the very reasons for which the movement ought to be strenuously resisted. It represents the relentless hostility of a bigoted hierarchy against the spirit of Christian liberty which that hymn embodies.

The question what hymns are to be sung in our public schools should be decided by the friends and not by the enemies of these schools. The question what hymns are appropriate for America should be decided by those who love American institutions.

This paper stands for no spirit of bigoted hostility to the Roman Catholic Church, but we earnestly resent the machination and hostility to American institutions which underlie movements of this character. In whatever city the proposal is made to drive the singing of "America" out of the schools, it ought to be opposed and the hymn defended. It is not true that "The Star Spangled Banner" is a better hymn, or in any proper sense our national hymn. "The Star Spangled Banner" is an interesting poem, with some remarkably fine lines, and it commemorates the experience of a certain man who happened to be taken on a British ship one night during the battle and was glad to see the American flag in the morning. It is a hymn that cannot be understood without a series of historical footnotes, and it cannot be sung by any save professional singers. It is a fine, stirring piece to be rendered by a band, or sung as a solo, in which the audience joins in the chorus. "The Star Spangled Banner" and "My Country, 'Tis of Thee" belong in two wholly separate classes and neither one can ever be a substitute for the other. But the deeper reason for opposing and resenting this movement is that it proceeds from a bigoted spirit of sectarianism, thoroughly hostile to our most cherished American institutions. Save America!

THE WEAK SPOT IN THE ARMOR.

THE arrest of Mr. Jerome for gambling was a shrewd move on the part of the lawyers of Harry Thaw. Nobody supposes it was anything else, or that Mr. Jerome's little game had any direct relation to his mission across the Canadian border, but it illustrates a principle, which we can never afford to forget, namely, that the man who goes out in quest of the good, or opposition of the evil, should have clean hands. Mr. Jerome was dealing with shrewd men who knew his personal habits and weaknesses and were certain to find, if they could find, the unguarded point in his defense. It was no time for him to take any chances. He was on the eve of a desperate battle and his public humiliation was brought about by a trivial, yet serious indiscretion.

Ministers and other Christian people may well ponder this lesson in all that it means. Many a great cause has been seriously hindered and some great enterprises have been permanently weakened because the enemy found the weak spot in the armor of the champion of right. David and Solomon and the good King Uzziah are brilliant examples of what has happened so often in human history, that we must not let it pass without considering ourselves lest we also be tempted.

BEAUTIFUL GATES AND UGLY INFIRMITIES.

IT is characteristic of all life that the lame man, who was healed at the name of Jesus as spoken by Peter and John, should have been lying near the beautiful gate of the temple; for beauty and ugliness are always thus side by side. The one is attractive and pleasant, the other is repulsive and distasteful. But the beauty of the marble must not be missed because of the lame man who crouches beside it; and the poor beggar must not be overlooked because our eyes are fixed on the gate that is called beautiful. It is God's kindness that has placed them side by side, in order that those who are ready to help lame men may not miss the ministry of beauty, and in order that those who love the grace and loveliness of life may not become so absorbed in it that they forget the lame men not far away.

The Land of Beginning Again

By Louise Fletcher Tarkington.

I wish that there were some wonderful place
  Called the Land of Beginning Again,
Where all our mistakes and all our heartaches
  And all of our poor, selfish grief
Could be dropped, like a shabby old coat, at the door,
  And never put on again.

I wish we could come on it all unaware.
  Like the hunter who finds a lost trail;
And I wish that the one whom our blindness had done
  The greatest injustice of all
Could be at the gates, like an old friend that waits
  For the comrades he's gladdest to hail.

We should find all the things we intended to do,
  But forgot and remembered—too late,
Little praises unspoken, little promises broken,
  And all of the thousand and one
Little duties neglected that might have perfected
  The day for one less fortunate.

It wouldn't be possible not to be kind
  In the Land of Beginning Again;
And the ones we misjudged and the ones whom we grudged
  Their moments of victory here
Would find in the grasp of our loving handclasp
  More than penitent lips could explain.

For what had been hardest we'd know had been best,
  And what had seemed loss would be gain;
For there isn't a thing that will not take wing
  When we've faced it and laughed it away;
And I think that the laughter is most what we're after
  In the Land of Beginning Again!

So I wish that there were some wonderful place
  Called the Land of Beginning Again,
Where all our mistakes and all our heartaches
  And all of our poor, selfish grief
Could be dropped, like a shabby old coat, at the door,
  And never put on again.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

DR CHILTON'S reference, recently reported in your columns, to the Constructive Quarterly as one of the signs of the times, has put me under great obligations to him. I immediately purchased a copy of the journal and have read all the articles with great interest. You have already noted, Mr. Editor, in an editorial, the excellent article on the plea of the Disciples written by President F. D. Kershner. I, too, found much satisfaction in reading his words. But I think the article that most informed and moved me was that by Robert E. Speer on "Foreign Missions a Constructive Interpretation of Christian Principles." "My thesis," he says at the outset, "is that in our search for the essential and constructive principles of Christianity we can get more help from foreign missions than from any other source."

Again and again in reading this essay, I would sit back with the book face downward on my knee and reflect upon his great interpretations. The missionary enterprise is the revelation of essential Christianity. It is in the actual proclamation of the gospel that we learn what the gospel is. The Kingdom of God cannot be understood by study in a seminary detached from life, nor can our problems be solved by mere discussion. "Larger knowledge comes from larger life." "The bounds of knowledge are pushed out by action, and no action illustrates or reinterprets more luminously the true character of Christianity and its bearing on the most pressing problems of the modern world than the spontaneous action of the Christian spirit in foreign missions."

SENTIMENTS like these opened up the article, and afterward there followed an elaboration of the thesis in many fields. I must not allow my reflections just now to lead me into a review of the closely woven argument.

What I do wish to call particular attention to is Dr. Speer's treatment of the great task of Christian unity as it emerges into bold relief through missionary activity. He believes foreign missions are making a great constructive contribution to Christian unity at home. The ideal and goal of all missionary effort is the creation of indigenous national Churches in all lands, "deadened by no throttling laws of uniformity, free and varied as the spirit of man, but still unified, corporate, animated by one organic life, fulfilling one great mission, and inspiring and answering the national life and destiny of the people."

But, the author abruptly reminds us, "if that is the right ideal for Japan or India, it is the right ideal for Scotland or the United States. It is the ideal toward which the people of Canada are striving. The very ideal of missions involves union and suggests the road to us at home."

Our common employment in a great task like foreign missions draws us together, says Dr. Speer. Common aims and honest effort to realize those aims are making us one abroad. They can make us one at home.

LET me quote a paragraph the substance of which will reappear, I prophesy, in hundreds of sermons:

> The simple existence of the missionary spirit is evidence of a vital unity in those who are animated by it. They may be traveling different roads, but their spirit is from a common source. "We love because He first loved us." All our human love has a single origin. The deeper and richer this love becomes, the nearer and fuller our fellowship with the Source, the closer, whether we know it or not, do our lives come, each to his brother's. And this essential unity is found not in a common source alone, but also in a common end. For it is a common end which all the varying missionary impulses are seeking, the end of the world Kingdom of Christ, of the realized Family of God. We may differ in our definitions of the thing. We shall find when we come to it that the thing itself differs from all our definitions. But it is the thing, however we define it, which we are all seeking. That is a bond which no unconsciousness or denial on our part can dissolve. And more than this, the elevation of this end as supreme unifies men. Whenever men believe enough in a cause to die for that cause, the sacrament of their consecration discloses a unity deeper than all their disagreement. When churches or men say one to the other, "Come and let us die for that for which Christ died," or, when they are not near enough to say it one to the other, but are sufficiently near to Christ each to say it to Him, then in the death to which they go they pass no more divided, but as one.

WHILE reading this article I kept wishing I had been able to write it myself. Since reading it, however, I would be satisfied had it been written by any Disciple of Christ. It is the kind of thing Disciples should be trained in advance of others to say. We are coming to be a great missionary people, a greater missionary people than many of us realize. When the results of Mr. Abram E. Cory's million dollar campaign and the present two million dollar campaign are given out, I believe there will be amazement and rejoicing.

But on the constructive side of missions I cannot think we Disciples have done our full duty. We have made but slight, if any, contribution to missionary idealism or statesmanship. Our leaders have been absorbed in the task of winning us, the people, to support the work and have had no opportunity to produce a literature interpretative and formative of missionary ideals.

The books written by our missionaries have in the main been thrilling stories of missionary experiences. Such works are precious beyond computation. Mrs. Rijnhart, Mrs. Dye, Mrs. Garst and many others have done great service to their cause by these wonderful life stories. But they have limited themselves by choice to the personal point of view.

NO officer of our Foreign Society has ever been commissioned to make a leisurely and statesmanlike study of missions at first hand on the foreign field. Mr. Rains made a hurried trip around the world in the study of very local conditions at the mission stations. Mr. S. J. Corey went last year into the upper Congo country, but had to return after a few days because the routine work of his secretaryship needed him. It is some years since President McLean visited the mission stations, and both the vision and the task have changed much since.

Dr. McLean's writings have been the most inspirational and informing missionary books produced by Disciple hands. But his "Epochs of Modern Missions," is a tracing of missionary history, not a constructive interpretation. Mr. Speer's article has made me feel that we have not gotten as much from men like A. McLean and Stephen J. Corey as they are capable of giving us.

I am jealous for our leadership, for our stewardship, in this matter of Christian unity. I rejoice that Mr. Speer sees so clearly as he does, but we Disciples should have seen clearly and spoken convincingly before any other voice was heard. I am not criticizing our leaders, I am criticizing ourselves that we have compelled our leaders to make it their sole task to enlist us in the enterprise of winning the world to Christ and have therefore kept them from sitting in the councils of missionary statesmen and speaking there with authority such a message as Mr. Speer has put into this article I have just laid down.

IT has been pointed out by others that in the Edinburgh Conference in 1910, whose significance lay in its embodiment of the very two ideals for which Disciples stand—missions and unity, not once was the voice of a Disciple heard. The Disciples had a great message to speak to such a conference. Had it been spoken in the spirit of President Kershner's paper in this Constructive Quarterly it would surely have made an impression. But our leaders had been compelled always to face the domestic and local aspect of the missionary enterprise and were slow to enter the discussions of the farther-reaching problems.

Our policy should now be enlarged. In these ripe years of his wisdom, President McLean should be assured that his brethren wish him to make a constructive contribution to missionary thought. Mr. S. J. Corey, of equal age and scholarship with Robert E. Speer and John R. Mott, should be freed from the routine of serving tables in the office that he may study at first hand the missionary problems and grow into a commanding position among missionary leaders. The presence of a man of his spirit and insight in the inner councils of the great cause would do for Disciples and their plea what ten missionaries at work on the field could not do.

Of Human Interest

A Favorite Wilson Story.

A friend of mine was in Canada with a fishing party, and one member of the party was imprudent enough to sample some whisky that was called "Squirrel" whisky because it made those who drank it inclined to climb a tree. This gentleman imbibed too much of this dangerous liquid, and the consequence was that when he went to the train to go with the rest of the company he took a train bound south instead of a train bound north. Wishing to recover him, his companions telegraphed the conductor of the southbound train: "Send short man, named Johnson, back for the northbound train. He is intoxicated." Presently they got a reply from the conductor: "Further particulars needed. There are thirteen men on the train who don't know either their name or their destination."

One of Bryan's Favorites.

A man got into a cab at the Richmond railway station and said: "Drive me to a haberdasher's."

"Yaas, suh," said the driver, whipped up his horse, and drove a block; then, leaning over to address his passenger, said: "'Scuse me, boss, but whar d'you say you wanter go?"

"To a haberdasher's."

"Yaas, suh; yaas, suh." After another block there was the same performance: " 'Scuse me, boss, but whar d'you say you wanter go?"

"To a harberdasher's," was the impatient reply.

Then came the final appeal:

"Now, look a-here, boss; I be'n drivin' in dis town twenty year, an' I ain't never give nobody away yit. Now you jes tell dis nigger whar 'tis you wanter go."

Vice President Marshall's Best Story.

Right after election a visitor called at my office in Indianapolis and requested to see me. He was venerable, dignified, and very earnest. His once broad shoulders had a decided stoop, and his long, bushy hair had grown silver and indicated the nature of a man who, like the typical Hoosier, is a law unto himself.

I had never seen him before. He let me know that at once. I asked him to be seated. We shook hands, and we sat down.

"I came in to see you, Mr. Marshall, because you are the first living vice-president that I ever saw in my life, and I wanted to shake hands with you on that account."

We talked at length about the crops, the industries of that part of the country; how times had changed in the last thirty years and everything of moment except politics. Therefore I was surprised that when he arose to leave he began:

"Mr. Marshall, you have been mighty affable and clever to me, and I ain't going away leaving you think I voted fer you, fer I didn't."

"Oh, well," I suggested, "you need not worry about that, for, you see, I did not need your vote. We won't quarrel about that."

I could see that he was still uncomfortable, and thought perhaps his conscience was hurting him a little, so I tried to propitiate him by saying: "Well, we can be friends just the same. We are all good American citizens, irrespective of our political views."

But I was soon to discover that his discomfort was not occasioned by any sense of regret. It had altogether a different meaning.

"When I heard you and Woodrow was elected, I sez to myself, sez I: 'I hope Tommy and Woodrow will do what is right now that they are elected'; but sence I cum over here and seen you and talked with you, I don't believe you will."—Collier's Weekly.

Famous Novelist on Marriage.

Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, the clergyman-novelist, received the other day a letter from an admirer of his stirring stories. The admirer, a young man, said he was in love, and he asked Dr. Brady's advice on the question of matrimony.

The letter may have been only a device for getting an autograph, but Dr. Brady, at any rate, sent the young man this novel and yet valuable matrimonial thought:

"Marriage is a success, other things being equal, when the woman provides adequately for the inner man, and the man provides adequately for the outer woman."

Minister Egan's Parable.

In company with other American ambassadors and ministers, Minister Maurice Francis Egan, who represents us at Denmark, sent in his formal resignation to President Wilson on March fourth. Mr. Egan accompanied the resignation with a note that said his attitude in the matter of resigning reminded him of a woman he heard about once, who through financial misfortune came to be in distressed circumstances, and for a livelihood had to rely on a few hens she owned. She was of good birth and breeding and very proud, but was finally forced to go out and peddle eggs.

She took some eggs in a basket and walked along the streets, saying:

"Eggs, tupence! Eggs, tupence! I hope to Heavens nobody hears me! Eggs, tupence!"

Had Not Read Up-to-Date News.

Sir Ernest Shackleton said of a piece of geographical ignorance:

"It was incredible. It reminded me of a little waiting maid.

"As she brought me my tea and toast one morning I said to her:

" 'What a rainy morning, Mary! It's almost like the flood.'

" 'The flood, sir?' said the little maid. She looked at me with a puzzled smile.

" 'Yes,' said I. 'The flood—Noah, you know—the Ark—Mount Ararat.'

"She shook her head and murmured apologetically:

" 'I ain't had no time to read the papers lately, sir.' "

Meissonier Didn't Paint by the Yard.

A theatrical manager once asked Meissonier to paint a drop scene.

"Have you ever seen any of my pictures?" asked the painter.

"No; but that's not the question. You are famous, and it's your name I want."

"What is the size of the curtain?" said the painter, who saw humorous possibilities in the situation.

"Forty feet by sixty."

"Let me think a moment," said Meissonier, "I wish to work out a couple of little sums in my head."

The manager waited.

Then thus Meissonier: "My pictures sell at an average price of over £700 per square yard. Your curtain will work out at something a little under £200,000. I should be delighted to undertake the work on these pecuniary conditions were it not for a second consideration. When working at my highest speed I require six months to complete a canvas one foot square. Thus you may expect to have your drop scene in 100 years, more or less. Do you accept my conditions?"

The manager had vanished.

A Hopeless Administration.

One morning a man called on Secretary Lane, of the Department of the Interior, to ask for the job of Indian commissioner for a friend.

"Is he efficient?" asked Mr. Lane.

"Oh, he's a Democrat, all right," replied the man. "Don't know anybody who has done more for the party in our district."

"Caring for the Indian bureau is highly specialized work," suggested the secretary. "What I'm looking for is a ten-thousand-a-year man who is willing to take the five thousand a year of the commissionership."

"Shucks," said the man, "I know fifty men at home who would take the job!"

Mr. Lane shook his head and the man waxed indignant. "It's easy to see," he exclaimed, "that Democrats need expect no patronage from this administration."

From Near and Far

Judge Ben Lindsay, whose record as judge of the Juvenile Court is being investigated and who is fighting the agitation for his recall, has received a warm letter of encouragement from former President Roosevelt, which reads in part: "The most potent ally of the bad man is the foolish good man who permits himself to be used as a tool in breaking down the only man of whom the bad man is afraid—that is, the good man who is not a weakling, who knows how to hit, and who does hit. The forces of evil always heartily approve of that innocuous virtue which is wholly unable to do anything efficient against wickedness. You are being assailed because you have shown common sense in addition to the highest type of courage and a lofty disinterestedness. Every decent man and woman in the United States should be heartily with you in this struggle."

Railroad officials throughout the country have flooded the postal department at Washington with protests against the extension of the parcel post system, asserting they are not sufficiently recompensed for the carrying of articles now included under the parcel post regulations.

The report of a British royal commission says that the problems incident to the living of the white and the black races in the same country are as acute in South Africa as they are in the United States.

In an increase in timber sales this year and in a decrease in receipts from timber trespass as compared with last year, national forest officers see a growing use of the forests and respect for the federal forest policy.

The Larger Christian World

A Department of Interdenominational Acquaintance.

Dr. Aked Discusses Mrs. Pankhurst.

Dr. Charles F. Aked, formerly John D. Rockefeller's pastor, but now of San Francisco, used to open his church in London to the Pankhursts, and made speeches defending them. But he does not approve, be it recorded to his credit, the violent methods adopted by them in their fight for the rights of women. The coming visit of Mrs. Pankhurst and daughter, Sylvia, to America, has inspired an article from the pen of Dr. Aked, in which the San Francisco preacher gives a sympathetic picture of the conditions in England which drove the English women to their "militancy." He writes:

"It is the custom in England to ask questions in political meetings. The process is known as 'heckling.' After Campbell-Bannerman's advice, the women began to attend public meetings, and they asked questions. Their interruptions angered men; they were thrown out of the meetings with violence; they were mauled by blackguards. They continued to go to meetings and to interrupt. The violence grew. Filthy scoundrels offered themselves as 'stewards,' for the opportunity it gave them of committing indecent assaults upon women and girls in the act of carrying them and bundling them out of meetings.

"The women were prosecuted; not the men. They were charged with all sorts of fancy offenses, such as assaulting policemen, etc. Had they paid the small fines imposed the world would have heard no more of it. But they refused to pay the fines, and they went to jail. Here they were treated as the worst of criminals are treated."

Protestant Episcopal Missions Grow.

The Protestant Episcopal Church is unable to send out all who are offering to go to foreign mission fields. The missionary society's resources, it is reported, are not adequate. It is explained that the systematic study of missions which has been in progress in recent years has had the effect in this Church and others of leading increasing numbers of young people to offer themselves for the work abroad.

Dr. John H. Vincent as Prophet.

Bishop John H. Vincent of the Methodist Church, recently made the prediction that the future church would make political economy and sociology as fundamental in its program as religion. In other words, he believes that the Christian of the future will wish to know somewhat thoroughly the conditions that produce widows and orphans and the evils that spot men and women with contagion. The Congregationalist remarks that "If his prophecy proves as substantial as that which led him to found the Chautauquas, while he may be stoned today, he will be honored tomorrow."

Ten Britishers "Most Missed."

The Baptist Standard is taking some pride in the prize list of the "ten men in Great Britain who would be most missed." Sir Robertson Nicoll, editor of the British Weekly, offered a prize for the best such list. The following men received the largest number of votes: King George, David Lloyd George, Premier Asquith, Sir Edward Grey, A. J. Balfour, Dr. Clifford, Viscount Kitchener, Earl Roberts, Dr. Meyer, Andrew Carnegie and Dr. G. Campbell Morgan. The paper mentioned above notes that "three of these men are Baptists and three are preachers."

A Sixty-seven Years' Pastorate.

So far as we know, the Baptists now hold the record for long pastorates. The London Weekly makes a remarkable statement concerning a Baptist minister who has to his credit a most remarkable achievement in service.

"The Rev. J. C. Jones, M. A., closed his sixty-seven years' pastorate at Spalding Baptist Church on Sunday, July 6, and on Monday attained his ninetieth birthday. Mr. Jones is a man of many records. He has not been ill for seventy years; he has been a guardian of the poor for over fifty years; his married life extends over sixty-three years; and he is the oldest graduate of Glasgow University. He took farewell of his congregation last Sunday, preaching both morning and evening, and administering the sacrament at the close of the evening's service. Mr. Jones celebrated his ninetieth birthday by presiding over a meeting of the Spalding Board of Guardians, when he was the recipient of many congratulations, including a message sent by Mr. John Burns, president of the local Government Board. Addressing the Board, Mr. Jones said he heartily wished that each member might have a very happy life, and he added that he could give an infallible recipe for it, whether their lives were long or short."

Founder Defends Christian Endeavor.

An article recently appeared in The Advance in which a contributor referred to the Christian Endeavor Society as something of a back number. Dr. Francis E. Clark, originator of the Endeavor movement writes a letter to The Advance in which he approves many statements made in the article, but takes exception to some of them. For instance, the contributor declared that "the Christian Endeavor Society has been over-institutionalized, and has been made too much a separate thing, independent of school and church." This statement Dr. Clark takes issue with. "That may be true in some individual churches," he remarks, "but it is not the idea of Christian Endeavor today any more than it was thirty years ago. The society is still a part of the church; not of the Sunday-school, of course, because that is in a similar relation to the church, but it is today, as ever, in the church and of the church and for the church. A pledge of loyalty to the church is in every Christian Endeavor pledge now as at the beginning; and while the work of the society has expanded, and unions have multiplied in every land beneath the sun, while more work is done for prisoners, for the sick in hospitals, for the shut-ins, for the masses upon the street corners by the local unions, the individual society sustains the same relation to the church that it has sustained from the beginning."

Dr. Clark expresses an opinion on a much discussed question—the relation of the present prosperous organized adult class movement to the Christian Endeavor Society. He writes: "The Organized Sunday-school Class, which it was thought a few years ago would supplant in many churches the Christian Endeavor Society, has not been found to fill its place. The class is necessarily a small section of the young people. It is often a purely social affair, outside of the hour spent in Bible study on Sunday. It has never attempted to do for the young people of the church along a score of lines of church activity what the Christian Endeavor Society has done and is doing."

Increasing Church Attendance.

John Balcom Shaw, Presbyterian preacher, late of Chicago, now of Los Angeles, does not believe in sensational methods as a necessary condition in increasing attendance upon church services.

"We never do anything of a sensational character," he remarked to a recent visitor at his study in Chicago. "We have, of course, our deacons at the door to receive the people. We try to create an atmosphere of good-will and fellowship. We give a sincere welcome when we see people enter the door. But we not only shake hands at the door with the people coming and going, but we create a genuinely cordial atmosphere. We have a dignified service. The gospel is preached in its simplicity; and after the close of every service, I conduct a congregational Bible class directly in front of the pulpit, in which the most practical questions are asked and answered. How do we get the people to join the church? We go after them. We secure their names in a multitude of ways. Then we visit them. Do you see this envelope here?" taking up a large one resting on his desk and taking out numerous slips of paper. "These contain the names of hundreds of new people we wish to bring into the membership of the church. We visit them. We visit them again. We keep right after them, one way and another; and the people like it. Recently, when I was in Sioux City for a few days, I wrote forty letters to different people to whom I made a plea to join us at our next communion."

Personal touch, Dr. Shaw believes, is the thing that wins men.

Christian Gospel and Social Gospel.

"The Brotherhood of the Kingdom," is a group of ministers and church workers devoted to emphasizing the social gospel of Christianity. In August they held an annual meeting of importance at Marlborough, New York. The most vital discussion, in the opinion of The Continent, was over the question whether the brotherhood should identify itself with socialism. On this theme the speakers were Professor Rauschenbusch of Rochester and Dr. W. H. Gardner of Newark. The conclusion was that there should be no active alliance between a political party working for an economic program and a spiritual organization like the Brotherhood of the Kingdom, devoted to promoting Christianity. A significant point brought out in the conference was that so far the preaching of the social gospel has not tended to produce an individual conviction of sin. But it was insisted that this will appear in full strength as the social movement gradually develops a theology, which, according to the admission of this brotherhood, it has not yet done. So far the Brotherhood of the Kingdom has established four local chapters—in New York City, Boston, Rochester and Los Angeles.

Disciples Table Talk

Russian Mission in Chicago Prospers.

Basil S. Keusseff, missionary in the Russo-Bulgarian Mission, Chicago, is reaping real results in spite of great difficulties. He reports that the open air meetings being held on Sunday afternoons in the heart of the Russian colony are successful, with audiences of from 200 to 400. He states that opposition is met with from the liquor interests, Jewish fanaticism, anarchism and priestcraft. This work is of vital importance, and Chicago Christianity should not only be proud of it, but support it with substance. The mission is carried on under the auspices of the Chicago Christian Missionary Society.

Successful Ten Years at Liberty, Mo.

R. Graham Frank recently celebrated the tenth anniversary of his coming to the work at Liberty, Mo. On September 14, he took as a text the same scripture he used for his first sermon ten years ago—Philippians 3:7-8. In his report, given on this occasion, are listed the following items: Number of persons added to membership, 405; net gain in membership, 248; money raised for missions and education, $11,568.18; raised for local expenses, $31,112.01; raised for new building, $28,000; raised for parsonage, $1,194.84; total money raised, $71,875.03. During this year $1,432.62 was raised for missions. The church supports Dr. Paul Wakefield, medical missionary in China. Mr Frank has preached 1,150 sermons and addresses during this period, in Liberty and elsewhere. In meetings outside Liberty, 301 have been added to the church through his preaching. Although Mr. Frank has had calls to fifteen other pulpits and to two college presidencies he has deemed the field at Liberty one of highest opportunity.

Christian University Opens.

Christian University, Fort Worth, Texas, opened its halls for the session of 1913-14 on Sept. 18. In the opening session, an address was delivered by Judge Ocie Speer, on the theme, "The Other, or the Invisible Man." Judge Speer was introduced by Mayor J. J. Jarvis, one of the founders of the university, for whom Jarvis Hall is named. Dr. F. D. Kershner, president of the university, related the unusual progress made by the institution during the last three years. In 1910 he said the total enrollment was only 364. In 1911 it increased to 528 and in 1912 it reached 583, whereas the 1913 enrollment amounted to more than 600. John D. Slater, pastor of East End Christian Church, Dallas, delivered the convocation sermon Sept. 21.

Massillon Pastor Discusses Conversion.

H. Erwin Stafford, pastor of First Church, Massillon, O., is preaching a series of sermons on the general theme, "New Testament Conversions and Present Day Thought." The topics treated on Sunday evenings for six Sundays are: "Conversion as a System of Thought," "The Conversion of Saul, or Christianity Winning the Scholar," "The Conversion of the Ethiopian, or Christianity Overcoming Power," "Conversion of Cornelius, or Christianity Conquering the Sword," "Conversion of Simon Magus, or Christianity Meeting the Money Power," "Conversion Wanting in a King, or Christianity and the Politician." Homecoming Day was observed by the Massillon Church, September 21, a special sermon being preached by the pastor on "The Church and the Home."

L. C. McPherson Reports Work.

Lowell C. McPherson, who has served as missionary in New England for two years, but who has engaged to labor in the maritime provinces of Canada for a year, sends the following report of work done in New England: In the two years I preached 660 times, conducted 250 prayer-meetings, made more than 2,000 calls, saw 600 accessions. A total of $4,200 was raised on the field, three Bible schools and one church were organized, two churches were saved and one resurrected. Many troubles were settled, two new church houses were built, three properties were bought, and one church is planning to build. I have been engaged by the American Christian Missionary Society and the New England Christian Missionary Society assisted by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. Am now directed by the American Christian Missionary Society and the Maritime Christian Missionary Society and Prince Edward Island Christian Missionary Society. The work in the Provinces began well. Many persons were unable to get into the town hall at Bradalbane, Prince Edward Island, where Mr. McPherson preached Sept. 14.

Church Club Entertains Business Club.

The Crisis Club of First Church, Sioux City had the Rotary Club, an organization of a hundred and thirty business men, as the guests of the church Sunday evening, September 14. A capacity house heard Mr. John O. Knutson on "Rotary Ideals and Christianity;" Dr. Frank J. Murphy on "The Treatment of the Beaten Man;" Lieutenant-Governor William Harding of Iowa, on "The Ethics of Our Callings;" and Prof. M. G. Clark of the city schools, on "Remedying Conditions on the Jericho Road;" Robert Hunt, vice-president of the Rotary Club, presided. J. R. Perkins, the pastor of the church, gave the address of welcome.

"An Evening in Russia."

The above was the announcement of an interesting and unique service held at the Russian mission, New York City, Sept. 20. An audience of about 125 Russians and five American Christians gathered. The audience being practically all Russian, not a dozen of them being able to speak or understand the English tongue, the service was conducted in the Russian language. Many of the Russian Disciples have been won for Christ in this country and know but very little, if anything about the "Gospel Christian" in Russia. This program was arranged especially to give some definite information about their brethren in the home land. The stereopticon and phonograph were used to make as real as possible the facts presented. The following program was given: Opening hymn by the congregation; Scripture lesson and prayer; Hymn, "All Hail," by the choir of the Christian Church, St. Petersburg, Russia; Address by Z. T. Sweeney on the "Christian Movement in Russia;" Hymn, "From the Valley of the Shadow of Death," by the choir of the Russian Christian Church, St. Petersburg; A Message from Kief, by Arsenic Tomich; A Message from Sevastapole, by Michal Chulkoff; Address by Ivan S. Prokhanoff, "Substance or Christianity;" Pictures of Russian Christian Movement; Sermon by Ivan S. Prokhanoff, "Whip of Humanity;" Hymn, "God be With You 'Till We Meet Again," Russian Choir. The sermon and address of Mr. Prokhanoff and hymns given by the choir of the Russian Christian Church at St. Petersburg were given by the aid of the phonograph. The greetings from Kief and Sevastapole were by Disciples lately arriving from these cities. Jos. Keevil is the able superintendent of City Missions for New York City.

Jefferson City, Mo., Church Prospers.

A. R. Liverett, pastor of the First Christian Church, at Jefferson City, Mo., spent several weeks this summer in chautauqua work, under the direction of the Mid-West Chautauqua Association. The fact that he is considering a proposition to work for them again next season is evidence that his services were satisfactory. The church work at Jefferson City was never in better condition than now. The congregation is happy that the church has come through the hot summer with all current bills paid to date. The church is contemplating a short meeting this fall.

Church Extension Gains.

To September 23, 195 churches have sent for church extension, $3,596.05. Last year for the same period, 244 churches sent $3,812.80. The average offering of the churches this year is $18.44. The average offering last year was $15.62. It will be noted that the average offering is better this year than last. Up to September 23, the society has received this year $67,211.84. This is a gain of $12,577.60 over the same period last year. Our Board earnestly solicits the churches to continue the offering through October until all the churches are heard from. October and November receipts will be published with the annual report. Remittances should be sent to Board of Church Extension, 603 New England Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Supply Work in Chicago Field.

There are several churches within reaching distance of Chicago suitable for supply by ministers pursuing work in the Disciples' Divinity House. Some of these churches prefer resident ministers who could still spend the necessary time at the university. Others would be content with Sunday supply. These opportunities are available if advantage is taken of them at once. Those who are interested may correspond with Herbert L. Willett, Dean of the Disciples' Divinity House, the University of Chicago, or with Rev. O. F. Jordan, secretary of the Second District of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, 831 Washington Street, Evanston, Ill.

Death of Prominent California Disciple.

James C. Gentry, one of the organizers of First Church, Berkeley, Cal., died Sept. 12, in that city. He was 78 years of age. Mr. Gentry was prominent in the temperance movement in Berkeley and until his illness took an active interest in the affairs of the First Church. He came across the plains in a prairie schooner in 1856, settling on a farm in Sonoma county. In 1888 he came to Berkeley to reside and has made his home here since.

Comity in the Southwest.

F. F. Grim, corresponding secretary of New Mexico, tells of speaking at a union meeting in a New Mexico town. After the sermon the Presbyterian pastor immersed the local Salvation Army captain, the leading worker in the M. E. Church, South, and a convert for the M. E. Church.

Church "Not Losing Out."

C. J. Tannar, pastor of Central Church, Detroit, Mich., preached September 21, on the "Kingdom of God," and in discussing the present status of the Church, said: "Some will tell you that the old ship of Zion is sailing an angry sea, with slight hope of outriding the gale. They point to the divided condition of Christ's followers, the great chasm between Catholics and Protestants, the large number of divisions in the Protestant fold, the many and conflicting religious fads and vagaries springing up all over the land today. The fact is that there never was a day since the apostles when a union of all God's people for all practical purposes was so nearly an accomplished fact and when so many people and leaders in all communions were praying and working for a complete union. As to coping with the gigantic sins of the cities, they are not yet ready to run up the white flag. It is a fact that over one-half of the territory of the United States is now 'dry.' Justice, the liquor men's publication of Newark N. J., sees the great significance of the enactment of the Webb-Kenyon Bill, prohibiting the shipment of liquor into 'dry' territory, to be the exhibition of the power of the Anti-Saloon league."

On "The Madness for Greatness."

L. G. Batman, pastor of First Church, Youngstown, Ohio, recently preached on the madness for greatness, especially in city life. After considering various phases of this theme, Mr. Batman concluded: "There has been something of a halt in later years with reference to city greatness. People are coming to learn that there is more to city life than mere greatness of the city as measured by acres under roof and stories necessary to house workers. Cities are here not to look at, not to boast of with statistics, but for the welfare of mankind which is great in just such measure as it enjoys health, happiness, general prosperity and assurance of small danger from disaster." "City greatness is not to be measured by the greatness of its buildings and interests but rather by the greatness of the people it grows, greatness in character and understanding and appreciation of responsibilities through the discharge of them in right relations to one another."

Men's Class to Erect Tabernacle.

"Wanted—One hundred carpenters; experience unnecessary; no pay, but lots of fun; call Saturday at the Irvington Christian Church." This was the "want ad" that appeared recently in an Irvington, Ind., paper. The Men's Bible Class of the Irvington Church intends to erect a temporary tabernacle to be used pending the completion of the new Sunday-school building. The temporary structure will contain a large room for the men's class, and a smaller room for the young men's class. The women of the church have been invited to watch the work, but it is understood that they will respond to their welcome by providing a good lunch for the workmen.

TEACH CHRIST

To Your Adult and Young People's Classes

Better than any other course of study---Old Testament, New Testament, Historical, Literary---is the simple study of the Life of the Master

Why You Should Use Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus"

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There are few question marks in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's Life of Jesus. A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study this Fall.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

The Balance of Power at the Pivotal Periods of Life.*

AT THE GREAT DIVIDE.

A fraction of an inch determines whether the waters of the spring at the top of the mountain will flow to the Atlantic or the Pacific. The foot-fall of a single individual changes the center of gravity of the earth. A smile or a frown will sometimes determine a destiny. Direction is determined by interrogation points and periods. Balances may be so delicately poised that the weight of a hair will turn the scale. Life itself is a succession of pivotal periods in which seeming trifles determine the course of years. What the fall of an apple was to Newton the utterance of a word or a sentence has been to many a youth, determining his vocation, his success or his failure. We are again and again brought to a point where a mere incident tips the scale and fixes our future.

AFTER THE WILDERNESS, WHAT?

Two great pivotal periods in the development of a great nation are vitally interesting. They had occupied about fifty days in the first period from Suez to Sinai. While this is but a nine days' trip on the back of a camel, to this great company of refugees it meant a two months' march. Under the shadows of the Mount that had burned with fire and had been the scene of Divine action and utterance one year was occupied. From Sinai to Kadesh was one hundred and sixty-five miles approximately. From the middle of May to the end of July the scores of thousands were traversing "the great and terrible wilderness of Paran," including the desolate desert of Zin. They emerged from the bitter trials of the desert where they had encountered unexpected enemies, the trials and the awful weariness which must accompany such circumstances. At last they are at the very threshold of the Promised Land. According to Rollins and Williams, Kadesh is a beautiful plain ten miles by six, especially suitable for an extended sojourn of the children of Israel. At the west, the mountains of Azazimat act as a natural barrier. To the northeast is a mountain rampart whose feet are laved by a spring of abundant water. Robinson and other English commentators find Kadesh in Arabah. Its location is not a matter of great importance. The moral and spiritual lessons are the things the Bible seeks to present.

THE OPEN DOOR.

Deuteronomy 1:19 describes Paran as "the great and terrible wilderness." They endured its privations because they had ever in view the Land of Promise. Kadesh was right at the boundary line between the land of Palestine and the country at the south. A period of rest and refreshment should have prepared them for the conquest of Canaan. Their leader reminded them, "Behold the Lord thy God hath set the land before thee. Go up and possess it as the Lord God of thy fathers hath said unto thee. Fear not, neither be discouraged." The message had hope and comfort. They failed to follow it. They were at the pivotal period of their pilgrimage career. God had bared his mighty arm more than once in manifestation of his power. He had contributed to their necessities that none should lack, indicating his sympathy and his love. He had delivered them in the time of battle and rained bread from heaven for their food. They had abundant reason to prosecute their course steadily and with vigor, trusting in the Lord to give victory to their cause. But they took counsel with their fears. They declined the instruction of Moses urging them to go up and possess the land and referred the matter to a delegation called "Spies." They insisted upon the appointment of a company for exploration and inquiry. The scales were already beginning to tip the wrong way. The door of opportunity was slowly but surely closing.

*Note.—International Sunday School Lesson for Oct. 19, 1913. Scripture, Numbers 13.

A CONCILIATORY POLICY.

In matters of principle a conciliatory policy rarely succeeds. Yield never so little to a wrong decision and sooner or later there will be a complete surrender. Their demand for thorough investigation found acceptance with Moses' judgment. Though it was a regrettable procedure, he would yield that much rather than risk a revolution. Deut. 1:23. "And the saying pleased me well: and I took twelve men of you." Here was mistake number one. The second was equally disastrous. By his instructions Moses emphasized possible dangers. They were to investigate and find whether the men of the land to be conquered were stronger than they and whether their cities were unassailable, as well as how large the number of the enemy was and what sort of a country it was for agricultural purposes. The directions are full of suggestions of peril. It predisposed them to discover danger.

A TOUR OF INSPECTION.

Joshua at the head of one company of spies went as far north as Damascus, covering about two hundred miles, and carefully investigated in the spirit of the general. Another company was under the leadership of Caleb. They went only to Hebron and the adjoining territory. We are not to condemn prudent foresight. Certainly not. The Christian life must be intelligent. It must properly anticipate difficulties of the way. But the trouble here was that they were refusing to take up the work of conquest positively and immediately. God had given them his pledge to give them the land. It was not a matter of special concern whether the numbers were few or many, whether the cities were called or not, nor any other features, excepting that this was the land which God had positively assured them should be theirs. Their business was to ignore conditions in view of the command of God and go in and possess the land.

THE VERDICT.

The report was a threefold report. There was positive unanimity on certain points. Dangers there were. Walled cities there were and many of them. The inhabitants were men of great stature. The land itself was, indeed, "a land flowing with milk and honey." It had abundance of fruit. It had largest opportunities for those who were to occupy it. Then there was the majority report which bitterly opposed attempted occupation. Numbers 13:26-29. There was the minority report which agreed in the main as to the possibilities of the land itself, but which disagreed as to the programme. Numbers 13:30 and 14:24. The majority and the minority stood ten to two. Opposition to conquest was overwhelmingly strong. Disheartened and even terrified by the report of the majority, the rank and file of fighting men entered upon a tirade against Moses and deplored their present situation. They even suggested the wisdom of a return to Egypt and proposed to make a new captain who should lead them back.

PRAYER AND PROGRAMME.

Moses and Aaron were thoroughly overwhelmed by such an attitude. They betook themselves immediately to prayer in order to programme. While they were praying Caleb and Joshua were planning out a campaign and appealed to the people to enter upon it. They were met by rebellion and revolt far reaching. Their lives were imperilled by the counsel they gave. The dangers confronting them swallowed up all other considerations. The eschol cluster had no attractions. It is always so when we dwell on the difficulties and despise the delights of life.

THE CONTROLLING FACTOR.

In all great movements of history the controlling factor has been the Eternal God. He suffers a revolt to go only so far, then he takes a hand in the situation. Now he appeared in the Tabernacle in ineffable glory before the people. The effect was immediate, controlling and commanding. Such a manifestation they had not seen since the splendors of Sinai. The revolt was at once subdued. A pestilence broke out among the people and the ten spies who stood out against Moses were among the first to fall. It is a dangerous thing to antagonize the distinctly announced purpose of God.

THE REJECTED CROWN.

Jehovah proposed to Moses the complete annihilation of the host and promised to fulfil his old time covenant declaration to Abraham in a new way. He would make of the family of Moses a great nation. It was a most alluring offer. Moses had suffered enough through the obstinacy and the selfishness and the disobedience of the people he had been seeking to lead. Why endure their taunts and complaints any longer? Why not have done with the whole matter and let Jehovah blot them out? But his heart yearned for these people. The most wayward child often holds the affection of the parent to the largest extent. His great soul yearned for these people who were so near the Land of Promise but who had closed the path to immediate success. He declined the crown which was offered him. He was filled with the redemptive passion. This explained his attitude. It is the only passion which will enable us to keep our poise in the face of great aggravation. His cry in behalf of the people was heard. It was too late, however, to avert the disaster and defeat the attempt of the people to take the land without God. Stung by the serious rebuke they had received there was a complete reaction, and with more bravado than bravery they undertook to force the door which their own unbelief had already closed. They were doomed to thirty and eight years' wandering and none of those who had participated in the rebellion which shut them out of the Promised Land were ever permitted to see it.

THE BALANCE OF POWER.

At the pivotal periods of life the balance of power is all determining. The one factor never to be omitted in our estimate of duty and danger, of delight and difficulty, is God Himself. What has he commanded and what has he promised? Knowing that, we have only to obey and leave results with him. Doubt of His Holy Word is the most deadly, damning thing. Listen to the counsel of men who pray and who make their programmes parallel the promises of God. Refuse every offer of honor that is to be received at the expense of the people. The noblest element of character is genuine unselfishness. The one and only thing that can prohibit spiritual progress is unbelief in one form or another. The desire to "return to Egypt" marks us as forgetful, ungrateful and obstinate. A single act of disobedience will destroy the benefit and blessing of a long period of life. Do not compel God to break the silence in sentence of condemnation. Exclusion from Canaan was no arbitrary act of justice, but a self-imposed sentence for unbelief and disobedience. None will ever be excluded from heaven merely by Divine decree, except as the Divine decree expresses personal apostasy. Stay with the Pillar of Cloud and victory is sure. Look Egyptward and you are already defeated. The "grasshopper" estimate of personal worth and ability is not modesty. It is not commendable humility, it is contemptible pusillanimity. Measure the enemy then look Godward and advance.

RELIGION THE FUNDAMENTAL THING.

"The really fundamental thing in a man's life is his choice of a religion. Two religions are to-day struggling for the mastery. There is the religion of Mammon, whose dominant purpose is selfishness, and whose creed is indifference to moral considerations, except so far as they may be regarded as instruments of individual advancement. There is the religion of God, whose purpose is service, and whose creed is loyalty to something larger than yourselves."—President Hadley, of Yale.

It is at your own will whether we see in the despised stream the refuse of the street, or, looking deep enough, the image of the sky.—Ruskin.

THE POWER AND RESOURCES IN THE COMMONPLACE.

Exodus 4:2.

Moses doubted his ability to be leader of the people. He was not eloquent. He would have to stand before a mighty king and defy him. Truly an extraordinary man was needed for such responsibilities and one with unusual equipment. In his hand he held a simple shepherd's rod. When God told him to use it, it became an instrument of power. He did not have to search outside his own family for a persuasive speaker. He took a group of slaves and made them into a great people, ready for war and conquest.

There are unused resources in every church and community. If churches are in need of a revival, they can have it by the use of what they have at hand. The helpnessness of the they have at hand.

There are resources of song which ought to be used to strengthen moral and religious sentiments. There are few churches in which the singing might not be greatly improved. In many the singing is disheartening to the preacher; he is made to feel that he has before him a hopeless company of people, at the best, a congregation without enthusiasm for the great spiritual tasks. It would be hard to find a community in the United States that does not have in it enough singers to give inspiration and power to a religious service. They are not musicians from the schools. Their talents are undeveloped, it may be. They cannot sing grand opera and only a fool would expect them to or criticise them for falling below the standards of professional singers. They are the ones who do the common work of the world. They should be encouraged to sing for their benefit and for the benefit of the church.

In almost every Sunday-school there is a distressing shortage of teachers. The superintendent is at his wits' end nearly every Sunday because classes are without teachers. The material is at hand for the making of teachers. If we cannot have brilliant men and women, we can have those whose good sense commends them to all and who have plenty of ability to appreciate the truths of religion. The trouble with us is that we are looking for sensations, we ask for freaks rather than for men and women of plain intelligence.

It is commonplace for disciples of Jesus to meet each other and to talk with each other. There is power in the common social life, power enough to make the church and school effective or to destroy them. The teaching of the school may go for nothing because of the associations outside the class room. The most eloquent and passionate plea for upright living has a poor chance against daily sneers. Of course the saint can endure the sneers of his companions. He pities the wretches whose ideals are low. But the average man is not a saint. He is in great need of the stimulus that comes from common conversation in which truth and purity and justice are upheld. There are too many church members whose conversation does not measure up to the requirements of their profession. It is not solemn exhortations that will meet the situation; it is an honest stating of facts in the spirit of Jesus.

Common honesty is a force which it is easy to underestimate. "Well," the doctor explained, "he hasn't the slightest sense of responsibility; and I notice that when people have no sense of responsibility, you call them either criminals or geniuses." "I don't," said Dr. Lavender dryly, "I call 'em poor critters, either way." The honest man has a sense of responsibility and he does not put forward his genius or his exceptional privileges as an excuse for not meeting his responsibilities. His work will stand the test. The most critical eye will find it faultless. If he is a steward, he tries to give a good account of his stewardship. If power is granted to him, he does not become arrogant and abuse those who gave him power, as monarchs and men of wealth have been in the habit of doing. He looks well to his duty and gives his undivided attention to performing it well.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday Schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday School literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the Church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the Society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, The Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

The Bethany System of Sunday School Literature

What the Leaders Think:

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers. I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

The Symmetry of Life

Life has more than one great interest. There is no one idea great enough to monopolize any human mind. God does not mean that any man shall be content with one relation, no matter how good. Life has its varied interests, and while they are not easily harmonized they are not hopelessly contradictory, but lie like the different faces and dimensions of a cube. The city of normal life lieth four-square. He makes a mistake who assumes that because the soul is of chief importance it is of sole importance, and he is equally mistaken and the error has a thousandfold worse results, who assumes that we are debtors to the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof.

The first of life's boundaries with which we have to reckon is the boundary of its physical side. We have our animal, our fleshly nature, our need of food and clothes and shelter. God meant that this should not be disregarded. God quarrels with no man for proper care of his body. We are temples of the Holy Ghost. If there were no other reason why boys should abhor tobacco and men should abstain from drink, the fact that these are detrimental to bodily health and opposed to the bodily comfort of others should be enough. Bad cooking is ungodliness. Bad sanitation is sin. Whatever destroys bodily health is an evil and should be opposed. Men should seek "mens sana in corpore sano."

"The spirit must be tended,
And the flesh be borne in mind,
Else they are each to other
Blind leaders of the blind."

Life has its intellectual boundary. We are mind as well as body. The library is greater than the gymnasium. No man has a right to let his body grow at the expense of the mind. Most pitiful are the claims of those who would debase our morals by so-called exhibitions of physical strength and skill, which set at naught all higher interests. Every man owes it to his mind to accord to it at least as much thought and care as the body requires. And when we ask for that we ask for much, for we feed our body three times a day, and give it eight hours to rest and clothe and protect it and lavish upon it, its appearance, its desires, its weaknesses, much time and thought. Grocery stores and dry goods stores and drug stores are monuments to testify to our regard for our bodies. Let the mind have not less attention.

It is the brain that has pulled the body into its erect condition. The soul of man is like the needle of the compass, and the lodestone which attracts it is not at the pole yonder at the northern horizon. It is straight up in the zenith where God lives. But for this fact of divine magnetism, no one of us would walk erect. We should be totally what we are partially, animals. We stand with our faces upturned toward heaven, because our souls are from God. The serpent crawls, the wolf goes on all fours, because it is a necessity of its physical nature. But man walks erect because it is a necessity of his spiritual life.

Then there is the social boundary of life. That is why the city is chosen as the type of the good time coming. We have our social needs and instincts. We need each other's sympathy and counsel and prayer and help. How many people go through life lonely and sad! How many people never learn the power of love and hope that comes from these human social ties! We cannot afford to cut ourselves off from each other. We need each other's help all the way. No day passes in which we are not helped by some one's greeting, or hand-grasp, or sympathy, or counsel. The city may have all the personal dimensions, bodily health and mental power and love of the beautiful, but if it have not this it profiteth nothing. It is shapeless. It is not even triangular, for the other sides do not meet. No man liveth unto himself. No man knows what he misses when he tries so to live. We are in the world to live together.

But there is still another dimension. "The length and the breadth and the height thereof are equal." The city has height. No life is symmetrical that has but its boundaries upon the ground.

"The length and the breadth and the height thereof are equal." Every other dimension increases with the height. He who grows in grace, grows also in knowledge. The second commandment which Jesus gave he taught was commensurate with, or like, the first. Love to God and man are alike. Divine goodness and human goodness are alike. God wants a vigorous, whole-hearted, robust, all around manhood and womanhood, a symmetrical life. For this the Gospel pleads.

It is not easy to live symmetrical lives. There is much that tempts us to cultivate one part of our nature at the expense of some other part. Some good men have even supposed that this is what God wants, the complete neglect of every other part of life for the sake of the soul. But what God wants and the Bible pleads for is the well-rounded life. that is true and strong and high.

The First President's Address

Message of President of the First General Convention of Churches of Christ.

BY JUDGE FREDERICK A. HENRY.

IN the name of the Founder of our holy faith I greet the assembled messengers of his disciples throughout the earth, with his familiar salutation, "Peace be unto you."

Under this divine benediction, it is fitting that the conclusion of a century of peace between the two great English-speaking nations should thus be heralded by an American army of invasion trooping in unity under the banner of the Prince of Peace into this land of Our Lady of the Snows. We lift up our voices in supplication and thanksgiving unto the Lord of hosts, for that "he maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire." O Lord our God, speed thou the day when war shall be no more.

To you, men and brethren of Toronto, we who thus enter your borders confess our inability to resist the warmth of your reception and our readiness therefore to surrender at discretion. Since you also carry the standard of the cross, let us unite our forces for the world campaign of Christian conquest. IN HOC SIGNO VINCES. For this cause we would tarry briefly here to renew our spirits and to mature our plans. Christ is our leader, and Peace our watchword.

NO NEW AUTHORITY.

Peace, I repeat, is our watchword. There can be no misunderstanding of our purposes nor any misgivings about our jurisdiction; for we remind ourselves at the threshold of this conference that we have not met to seize the reins of power. With no new authority as law givers, but only as humble heralds, we assemble here, in Christian concord, to consult with one another about the coming of the kingdom. Our hearts acknowledge no sovereign but Jesus the Messiah of promise, no authority but his Holy Word, no bond of union but the unity and loving fellowship of his church.

Better were it by far that we separate now than that we organize here a new ecclesiasticism. Our credentials invest us with no power to bind either the churches or those who abide in their fellowship. Whatever this General Convention shall vote, as touching others than those participating, will be not compulsory but advisory, and under the blessing of God a counsel of wisdom commended in love to all the churches. Let no divisive spirit of jealous resentment or self-will hinder the general acceptance of such counsels. Let all the people welcome the opportunity, now for the first time effectively accorded, for united expression and unified effort in furtherance of the Kingdom. And may peace reign within our borders.

PURPOSE OF ASSEMBLIES.

Besides the fellowship afforded by our congresses and conventions, such assemblies have but two justifying objects, namely, to forward Christian missions and to promote efficiency in Christian service. Any mode of convocation or organization of these meetings that will, all things considered, best accomplish these objects, must be deemed to have the sanction of the head of the church. If such mode shall cease to be useful it will then no longer be used. If a convention of chosen representatives shall prove to be obstructive of Christian union and of efficient co-operation in spreading the Kingdom, it must then be abandoned. If from conventions of all persons who may choose to participate it shall finally appear that the wisest counsels emerge for unifying and extending Christ's Kingdom, that mode will ultimately and inevitably prevail.

Meanwhile, for the sake of efficiency in his service, we are about to make trial of the representative convention plan. To make our deliberations orderly and our actions and utterances consonant with the wisdom and will of our congregations generally, it seems desirable that their freely chosen and properly accredited messengers shall thus annually meet and consult together, rather than that promiscuous mass meetings should continue each year to speak and act for the whole body of our brethren. If we are to have conventions at all, it is hard to see how we shall be any more or any less distinguished or segregated from the rest of Christendom by the one mode of assemblage than by the other. Surely not through having delegates, shall disciples with a little 'd' be transformed into Disciples with a big 'D.' Disciples of Christ will be neither more nor less such, whether the conventions which they hold be mass meetings or delegate assemblies. It is the fact of Disciples' convening at all, not the mode of their doing so, that discriminates this convention and its predecessors from any miscellaneous concourse of religious people.

THE IMPORTANT QUESTION.

How vastly more important than the question of the big or little 'd' is the question whether we are truly disciples of Christ at all. He made conformity to his word the test of true discipleship, when he said, "If ye abide in my word, then are ye truly my disciples."

But here again we may err. It is well indeed to be able to cite chapter and verse of the Word for every doctrine of faith and every requirement of practice. Yet to abide in his word means far more than scriptural literalism in Christian teaching and conduct. Let us not forget that the letter killeth. Christ himself amplified the thought by laying down a further test of discipleship, which he emphasized as "a new commandment," adding, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." We cannot be truly his disciples except we abide in his word; neither shall we by all men be known as such if we have not love one to another. The only hope moreover of making disciples of all men is by making all mankind to know that those who abide in his word have love one to another. Only thus shall we escape being branded forever with the great 'D,' or succeed in winning all men to unite as true disciples of our common Lord.

AN ANCIENT DIVISION.

It was just an absurd quibble over a little letter that split the Christian church in the fourth century, when the Nonousians contended with the Nonoicusians about a philosophical abstraction. The difference between them was represented by an iota, the smallest letter of the Greek alphabet. The love of Christ and of one another was clearly not in men who could rend his body in fatal contest whether he was of the "same" or only of "like" substance with the Father. Surely we will not in the twentieth century imitate their incredible folly, by making a bone of contention and an occasion of schism out of fanciful tendencies toward "delegate ecclesiasticism" and "Disciple denominationalism."

NO ROOM FOR DISSENSION.

There is no room nor any recompense of reward for dissension about these matters, and it is an offence to Christ to wrangle over them. Indeed what room is there in his church to quarrel at all, or in his presence to boast of righteousness? It was for such presumptuous conduct that Paul had continually to reprove the churches to which he ministered. It is for such conduct that our religious press—and not one of our papers is immaculate—is distinguished for its bad eminence above the journalism of any sect in Christendom. And our turbulent periodicals but reflect in this regard the attitude of too many of their readers. In all respects but this, the ministry of our editors and publishers is efficient, devoted, and uplifting. In this one particular our press brings upon us only condemnation not reproach.

What we sorely need in daily fellowship as well as in religious journalism is a kindly tolerance in matters of mere opinion, a loving leadership in the essentials of faith. In place of contentiousness, vainglory, ungraciousness, satire, anathema, let us practice unfailing amity, humility, courtesy, charity, fraternity. Even for unfaith and doctrinal error, the remedy is love and not rancor. The Apostle to the Gentiles adjured the saints at Rome, "Him that is weak in the faith, receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations." O the sacrilege of Christians bickering about their faith. O hideous mockery to contend over the body of Christ. Can they, who, while acknowledging that Jesus is the Christ and manifestly seeking to follow him, are yet faulty in doctrine, be bullied or cudgelled into oneness of faith? Only brotherly love and true Christian fellowship, in heart and voice and conduct, can ever lead such erring ones from weakness into the light. If there ever was a time for war between brethren or even between parties in the church, now surely is the time for peace. "Let us therefore follow after the things that make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another."

PEACE OUR WATCHWORD.

Here, then, to avoid like condemnation, I forbear. And now, with Peace for our watchword, "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before," let us like Paul, "press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

As we must not be brawlers, so also should we not become boasters. However temptingly this occasion invites us to compare the statistics of sectarian growth and to glory in the numerical increase of the religious people represented in this convention, let us beware of thus ministering to our partisan pride. For while it would be absurd to deny that we have, unfortunately, a denominational consciousness, it is manifestly self-stultifying for disciples of Christ to cultivate it. Therefore I shall not pause to indulge any exultation about either our prosperity as a peculiar people, or the significance of this first delegate convention as promotive of our relative influence in the counsels of Christendom. Rather must we count these things but loss if they detract from perfect devotion of mind and heart to our divine leader and his commandment to evangelize the world.

Only by making Christ the central and sole pillar of our faith, and his gospel its self-sufficient instrument, can his church attain both unity and universality. Our counsels to-day are therefore not merely for a return to the pattern and acts of the apostles, but for a continuance yet further back to Christ himself, "the author and finisher of our faith;" not merely for a renewal of the apostolic constitution of the church, but for the restoration of its primitive missionary fervor and vocation; not merely for the reunion of Christ's church, but for its united devotion to the doing of his will in carrying the gospel to all nations.

A SEPARATE ORGANISM.

Our restoration movement arose over a century ago and has survived unto this day, in constant if not consistent protest against sectarianism. It has become, in spite of ourselves, a separate organism, a life apart. Have we ever soberly considered that in attaining the object of its existence that organism must die? To find the life of union in our Lord, the life of the Disciples of Christ, as they are distinguished to-day, must perish. "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; but whosoever shall lose his life for my sake and the gospel's, the same shall save it."

How, then, doth it become us to boast of our numbers or to exult in our prosperity? Rather should we humble ourselves that in a hundred years we have failed to win the world with our plea; that in a century of unrivalled world-progress we have done so little to turn all peoples to Christ; that after five score years we can not even live at peace with ourselves. Plain duty demands that, without either brawling or boasting but with peace and humility, we "seek first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness," and by example and precept persuade the world "how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity."

A NEW CONSECRATION.

If we lacked other reason for living according to our own testimony and forsaking mere lip-service against dismemberment of the body of Christ, the very spirit of the times summons us to renewed consecration to the ideal of a reunited church. Never since the great Reformation has there arisen among all the heirs of freedom in the gospel so hopeful an attitude towards Christian union as prevails everywhere to-ray. The minds of Christian people of all communions are turning, almost with one accord, towards this goal of our own aspiration. On every hand appears a real yearning and striving for that consummation devoutly to be wished. The warring of sects has nearly ceased. Polemic denominationalism is practically dead.

We are not yet and never shall be able to formulate a union creed. Against that we now as always protest. But the Christian world is growing nearer to an actual union in Christ. Humanly speaking we shall never altogether agree in opinion, nor even as to what should be accounted mere opinion. Neither will we submit to constraint therein. Against that also we now as always protest. But for the upbuilding of the church universal, all Christendom must and does acknowledge that "Other foundations can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Reared on the rock of Peter's confession, "Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God," the church can build elsewhere but on shifting sand. There, at least, we are all at one.

UNION GROWING NEARER.

Shall we not, therefore, reverently accept, as God's own providence, this renewal of zeal for Christian union, and, with each soul loyal to conscience in his own life and worship, join heartily in actual union of God's people everywhere for the preaching of Christ to the whole creation? In his own good time, true Christian union will be realized. But like the choicest blessings, it will come, I dare say, in the form and fashion we least expect. Not through contentiousness and disputations concerning essentials of faith and pratice; not through intolerance and mutual disfellowship among those who acknowledge Jesus as Christ; not even through friendly conferences to draft articles of union; but as the bud that blossoms when no man perceives it, so will the reunion of all the saints of God, upon his Word alone, burst forth into full flower. They who labor upon the mission field to teach the world of Christ by the testimony of his gospel will be the first to behold its beauteous blooming.

FRUITAGE OF MISSIONS.

Christian union will result as a reflex from our united devotion to Christian missions. From heathen lands it will come back like bread cast upon the waters, as the fruitage of our obedience to the great commission. There, at least, Christians must search the scriptures in order to open them to the gentiles. There no ecclesiastical tradition exists; no human formulary of Christian dogma can be appealed to. The intelligent Mohammedan, Hindoo, or Buddhist, demands a "Thus saith the Lord," for the doctrine he accepts. To prevail with strangers to our faith, missionaries must bear testimony to "one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all." While Christian union remains a pious aspiration with us at home, it becomes a supreme necessity for those on the mission grounds of the East. There division presents a visible barrier to success.

A MELTING POT.

Missionaries may go forth as sectarians, but it is as Christians only that they persevere. Such they find the compelling logic not only of the facts which confront them from without, but also of their own inward pondering of the sacred text. The surest way to master a subject is to teach it. Every school-teacher will recognize this as sound pedagogical doctrine. One must really know what one would make others understand. One must first grasp the truth in order to impart it. Hence the foreign field is the melting-pot of denominationalism Remove the pressure exerted by sectarians at home, and the missionaries will promptly achieve Christian union abroad.

The salvation of the church in our own lands from permanent disunion, lies thus in uniting in the common work of spreading the gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth. I abate nothing from our Restoration principles in affirming that on the foreign field those principles will vindicate themselves. I fear not to send the gospel of Jesus by anyone who is consecrated in the faith of his messialship. I will support any board, any movement, any campaign, that will send such messengers unto the heathen. I will do this because I am firmly persuaded that not only will such apostles be guided into the fullness of truth, but that we here shall thereby be brought ever nearer together unto Christian union. Through obedience to the great commission the church at home has as much to gain as the heathen abroad. Only so can the primitive purity and early ardor of the church be restored.

NOT ORGANIZATION BUT EVANGELISM.

What indeed is apostolic Christianity? Literally, it is missionary Christianity, the heraldry of the gospel of Christ. Paul voiced its essence to the Corinthians in his own apostolic platform, "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." That was his inspired method of solving the "envying, and strife, and divisions," which he discerned among them. So now there is nothing that we may securely know save Jesus Christ and him crucified. There is no program that his church may safely follow save to make disciples of all nations. "He that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man." Do we judge one another? Ah, let us cease envying, strife, and divisions, and fasten our rapt gaze on Jesus Christ alone. Now our attention wanders from Christ himself in our preoccupation of lesser things.

The reformation which we profess has been aptly called "a movement which primarily advocated Christian union as essential to the conversion of the world, but may ultimately advocate the conversion of the world through the preaching of the Gospel of Christ as the essential of restoring Christian Union." In other words, our central throne must be not union, not apostolism, but Christ. The prime concern of the church must be not self-organization but world- evangelism.

GROWTH OF TRUE BROTHERHOOD.

Religious group-consciousness, whether in others or in ourselves, can by no means be instantly abolished. But it can and must be subordinated to the stronger consciousness of ultimate underlying Christian unity. The Jewish Christians in the earliest age of the church found it hard to realize that gentiles could enter the sanctuary through other portals than that of Judaism. The fellowship of Jew and gentile was no less difficult then than now. Only by supreme effort was outright schism averted. By merging all else in loyalty to their common Leader, they found unfailing fellowship in spreading his Word afar. So now by summoning one and all to unswerving personal devotion to him and to the doing of his will in the Christianizing of the whole world, those who acknowledge him will find their group-consciousness abating before the growing sense of a deeper all-embracing unity of Christian brotherhood. No one who has ever engaged whole-heartedly in any union or federated Christian enterprise, whether its scope embraced a parish, a city, a nation, or the whole world, has failed to realize the essential oneness of Christ's church today. "All ye are brethren," said Jesus to the multitude and to his disciples. Every human soul is of that brotherhood whereof one

Along the Yangtse River

A Visit to Boone College With a Trip on a Chinese Ferry.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

ON visiting the office of the Wagenlits company at Hankow to ascertain if our reservations were made for the river trip to Nanking, I learned that our boat, the "Tuckwo," was at the dock, and though it would not sail till the evening of the following day, we were at liberty to go on board and take possession of our staterooms at once. As this was much pleasanter than remaining at the hotel, we made the transfer, and started all our excursions thenceforth from the steamer.

One of our first calls was on Bishop Roots of the American Episcopalian mission. He is one of the leading men in China, the chairman of the Chinese Continuation Committee of the Edinburgh Conference. The mission property of which he is superintendent in Hankow is extensive, including schools, dispensary, hospital, a beautiful church, and several out stations. Then in the region about he has charge of the large work of his denomination. He is a genial, enthusiastic, aggressive Christian administrator. As soon as he learned of our wish to see something of the missionary work of the place he gave directions to one of his assistants to show us about the city, and then asked us to come back at a later time and go with him across the river to Boone College, one of the important educational institutions of his church in China. As we were leaving he pointed to a map of Hankow that hung on the wall, a large part of which was darkened.

"That dark portion," he said, "represents the section of the city that was burned by the rebels two years ago, in the outbreaking of the revolution."

Then indicating a row of cannon shells that stood on the mantel, he said, "These, and many others, were picked up here on the mission property after the firing was over." Such experiences our own missionaries had in those disturbed days, and the risks that were run by men who counted not their lives dear, were very great.

Chinese River Boats.

OUR REPRESENTATIVES ABROAD.

Another pleasant visit was at the American consulate, with Mr. J. Paul Jameson, the vice consul, then in charge. It is not always that one is impressed favorably with the personality and opinions of our official representatives abroad. Especially is it noticeable that with outstanding exceptions the political interpreters of our national interests in the non-Christian lands feel or affect an indifference toward missionary and reform efforts that amounts to hostility. The missionaries frequently feel this keenly, and are sensitive to the fact that a force which would mean much to them if thrown on the right side, is cast into the other scale. It is true that some missionaries have pursued tactics which invited criticism. But these instances are rare and decreasing.

In contrast with this type of indifferent or cynical official is the attitude of Consul General Wilder of Shanghai, who has been a tower of strength to the Christian forces in China. And one is encouraged to believe that such men will increase in numbers in the diplomatic service as the responsibilities of the government in the wise appointment of its representatives abroad come to be more impressively felt at Washington.

Mr. Jameson showed us the latest-arrived American papers, and the still later abstracts of home news relayed by cable and wireless. He spoke with enthusiasm of his work, and of the prospects of China. Contrary to the common attitude of consular officials regarding the native population with which they deal, he expressed a high opinion of the Chinese, and lamented that American business men did so little to secure friendly and permanent trade relations with the native merchants.

"Do you know," said he, "who are the people who are getting the trade of China more than any others? The Germans."

"Why is that?" I said. "It is a simple matter," he replied. "The German merchants send their young men out here as clerks to learn the language, spend their lives in the work, and deal with the Chinese upon their own plane of business. The Americans and most other people come with the idea of short stay, trust to interpreters, and never get the real interest and confidence of the people."

"Why," said he, "you can count on the fingers of one hand the commodities, like Singer Sewing Machines and Standard Oil, that are really widely known and used in China. And yet there is market here for a multitude of our products, a market that would mean almost incalculable opportunity both for profit and for real service to China. The merchant who wants to do a permanent business in this land must come with the intention of spending his life, as the missionaries do, and the men who do this, secure the trade."

One afternoon we called again at Bishop Roots' home to claim his promise to take us across to Wuchang, on the opposite side of the river to visit the college. We found him in conversation with an English missionary, a Mr. Taylor, of the China Inland Mission, who was just returning to his field after a furlough at home. I asked him about his district, and he said it was up in the interior, and he was in haste to resume his work. I said to him, "Is it far from here to your mission?"

"About fifteen hundred miles," he replied.

"And how do you get there?" I asked.

"Oh, I take a boat up the Yangtse as far as it goes, and then take a smaller boat to the limit of its traffic, and then go by coolie chair and on foot the rest of the way."

"How long will it take you to reach home from here?" I said.

"About three months," was his reply.

That is what it means to live in the "interior" of China. And yet we had thought ourselves far inland at Hankow, which this missionary, eager to get back to his work, seemed to regard as one of the first and easy stations on his way home from London.

ON A CHINESE CRAFT.

Our party, led by Bishop Roots and Mr. Taylor, made its way down along the crowded river bank, to the ferry landing through the crowds of coolies carrying merchandise of every sort on and off the river steamers. Each group of four or six chanted or groaned the invariable, monotonous refrain which enables them to keep step, and seems to help them in their labor. These antiphonal chants are the accompaniment of every piece of work in the Orient. Usually one man leads off with two or three words of the refrain, and all the rest join in the response. And so they go on with their burdens hour after hour, always keeping time in this droning chorus.

The ferry boat was a little steamer, holding perhaps fifty people. It was already quite full, apparently, and we hesitated to attempt transit on such a craft, as much because of the character as the numbers of those on board, for they were certainly a dirty looking lot. But the bishop pushed in among them in the most familiar manner, and when he saw us hesitate, he called out, "Come on, it's all right. These are all good, friendly people." We had no doubt of their friendliness. In fact our first instinct was not to be too friendly with a crowd that looked so little accustomed to soap and water. But the bishop and Mr. Taylor took it all as a natural and not unpleasant part of the day's work, and we were soon started.

Our fares were some trifling amount, perhaps two or three cents of our money In paying the bishop took a silver (Mexican) dollar, worth fifty cents to the money changer, who is the necessary factor in all the small mercantile transactions of the country. He gave back the change not in the silver and copper of ordinary small money, but in cash pieces, of which there seemed to be about a hundred for every cent of the dollar. At any rate he paid the fare of the entire party, and had left an overcoat pocket full of the small coins, and more left over. One never realizes how far money can go till he converts it into Chinese cash pieces.

Patients Waiting for Treatment.

A VISIT TO BOONE COLLEGE.

We landed a little distance below Wuchang, and walked up the steep bank and across a part of the town outside the walls, where the houses were mostly small, and some of the open spaces were used by bleachers and makers of cotton prints, mostly the familiar blue patterns so much loved by the Chinese. As we went on the houses grew more numerous and the streets narrower, and presently we passed through one of the city gates, and turned to the left beside the wall. After a walk of ten minutes, through a crowded street, where every sort of commodity was on display, we reached the Boone College compound, and after showing us about for a short time, the Bishop left us to go about his work. He had given us a most interesting account of the mission work in that region, not only that of his own denomination, but as well that of the Baptists, Presbyterians and other bodies in one or another of the three cities which lie so close to each other on the two sides of the Yangtse at this point.

Our time did not permit us to see all the work even of the Episcopal church. At the upper end of Wuchang there is a large girls' school under the same church direction. But we spent an hour or more looking over the grounds and buildings of Boone College, and found the time far too short to see the entire plant. Professors Miller and Wilson, in whose hands the Bishop left us, showed us into the large library hall, in the upper assembly room of which a student mock trial was being held. We were told something of the merits of the case, and discovered that the boys, of whom there must have been three hundred present, entered into the argument and the fun of the procedure with a spirit worthy of American students.

Equally American were the ball ground, the tennis courts, and the gymnasium. Prof. Wilson, a young man whose home was in West Virginia, told us that when the school was opened years ago, the people viewed it with suspicion, and various inducements had to be offered the young men of the district to secure their attendance. Now the school is crowded, and every student pays regular tuition fees. Like all the mission colleges, it makes much of Bible instruction and Christian culture. We were taken through the dormitories, the dining hall, and the chapel. And finally were carried off to tea by Prof. and Mrs. McWillie, in whose pleasant home we saw many curious and interesting articles of Chinese make, for utility and decoration.

As the darkness was coming down we had to hurry back to the river bank, where we found a sailing boat, whose proprietor, a small boy of twelve or fifteen took us in charge, and partly with sail and partly with oar ferried us across the broad river downward toward the lights of Hankow, and finally after a half hour journey through the charming quiet of the evening, we reached the landing of the "Tuck-wo," our floating home.

That night toward midnight the boat started on its way down the river toward Nanking and Shanghai. The following forenoon was a time of rare interest. The weather was perfect. Along the shore were towns and villages, or open farm spaces and forest growths. On the face of the broad river were all sorts of craft—junks with two or three sails made of alternate strips of brown and white canvas, fishing craft at anchor in mid current, and ferry boats, plying back and forth across the stream.

Landing Stage at Hankow.

THE WORK AT KUKIANG.

About noon we drew up to the floating dock at Kukiang. As we had several hours to wait for the loading, we started out at once to see the place. It is one of the important cities along the river, and we soon were on the way to its mission hospital, of which Dr. Mary Stone is the superintendent. Years ago when I was teaching in the Bible chair work at Ann Arbor, Mich., two young Chinese girls came into the class in the Life of Christ and continued in the work all the year. They were taking the medical course, under the direction of the Methodist Woman's Missionary Board, and were preparing to go back to China as missionaries to their own people. Their names were Mary Stone (a translation of the Chinese name), and Ida Kahn. In later years I have heard more than once of the splendid work these consecrated women are doing and welcomed the opportunity which the delay of the boat afforded for a visit to the hospital.

We walked for nearly three-quarters of an hour, first along the broad river front, then through the gates, and along winding, narrow, but for the most part reasonably clean streets. Then out of the walls again, and up a hill to the hospital. There we were warmly welcomed by Dr. Stone, and to our surprise and satisfaction, we found that Dr. Kahn, who manages a similar work in the capital of the province, a hundred miles away, was in Kukiang on a visit. It was a great pleasure to meet these women, with some of their helpers, in the midst of a community which regards Dr. Stone as the final authority on all matters. We visited the different wards of the admirably equipped hospital, and learned from Dr. Stone something of the vast amount of surgical work she has to perform in a year, much of it consisting of major operations.

In the girls' training school near by, of which Miss Hughes is the principal, an assembly was called, and under the mingled colors of the Stars and Stripes and the new flag of the Republic of China, songs were sung and addresses made in honor of our visit. If the women of the Methodist Church had no other work to show for their contributions to foreign missions, the labors and success of Mary Stone and Ida Kahn would be ample reward.

The Living God

Our Need for the Deepening of the Spiritual Life.

BY TRUMAN E. WINTER.

THE need of the day is to make God a reality to men; He is a traditional God, the God of the great, historic past, and possibly the God of our fathers and mothers, but not our own God. Like Samuel when he slept in the tabernacle, we know not the voice of God; like Samuel, we need always some one to interpret God's voice to us, for our experience has not been such as to acquaint us with him and his voice.

To many of us Christians, God is the unknown quantity in the equation of life. Nor are we seeking earnestly to find him. He is to most of us scarcely more than a name. Richard Burton has said:

Make him a name, a something vague enskied,
You win cool heads, perchance, to cool assent;
Make him a babe, unwitting, open-eyed,
All mother hearts enclasp the innocent;
Make him a man, careworn and crucified,
And straight, men love him, knowing what is meant."

Most of us think of God as a being far away; far away in time and far away in space. We think of him as the one of whom we read in the Bible; one who lived and labored in the long ago; who raised up nations, overthrew empires, and shaped the history of the ancient world as it is now read by us. But strange to say, we do not think of him as living today in any very important sense; we do not think of him as walking and talking with men today; we do not think of him as one whose power is felt in the great onward moving processes that are making history today. We do not think of him as raising up new nations, overthrowing old empires or kingdoms, and shaping from day to day the destiny of the whole world.

But why not? Is God dead? Is he not the living God? Is he not as much the God of today as he was the God of Abraham's day? It seems so to me. Sometimes there are men and women here and there even in our own time who, like Jacob at Bethel, have some unusually rich personal experience and out of it awake to cry, "Surely God is in this place and I knew it not; this is none other than the House of God and this is the Gate of Heaven." To such an one the world is never the same again; it has become full of new meaning; it has become the dwelling-place of God. The God of the past it is true, the God of his fathers, the God of the Bible, the God whom Jesus addressed as "Father;" but now he has become to him a personal reality; he has become a reality in his every-day life because he has thus found him in personal experience.

GOD NOT AN ABSTRACTION.

If our religion is to be a vital religion, we must find a place in our lives for the living God; not some vague, abstract being; not some being of tradition; not some being in whom our fathers believed; not some being who used to live, labor, and achieve in the world among men, but the living God of the living, moving present; a being who means everything to us in the daily life; who, as Tennyson says, is "nearer than hands and feet, closer than breathing."

Truman E. Winter.

God was not a tradition to Jesus; nor was he a merely historical being; to him, he was present in communion, in toil, in temptation and trial; in hours of defeat, and in hours of victory, in life, and in death, God was the most real of all realities to Jesus Christ. If we are to be followers of Christ,—his disciples,—he is to be the same to us also.

Do not misunderstand me; I am not pleading for any vague, impersonal mysticism; I am not urging upon you visions and dreams; as George Crowly says in his beautiful hymn:

"I ask no dream, no prophet ecstasies,
No sudden rending of the veil of clay,
No angel visitant, no opening skies;
But take the dimness of my soul away."

It is this dimness of soul that we need to rid ourselves of, in order that we may see God; that we may come to know him personally in our daily experiences; that we may know his voice, his power, and his hand in leading; that we may know his comfort and peace in the midst of all the toil and turmoil of the world.

God must be my God; Christ must be my Christ; the life of God and the life of Christ must be my own life through my own personal experience. Rudolph Eucken, perhaps the most significant living German philosopher and theologian, writing just along this line in his book entitled "Life's Basis and Life's Ideal," says:

SPIRITUAL LIFE THE REALITY.

"If a man does not in some way succeed in appropriating the spiritual life, if it is not actively present as a whole within him and animating him, then his relation to the spiritual life remains forever an external one; and his life cannot acquire a complete spontaniety in him, can never become a genuine life of his own." No truer words were ever written. He means that unless by personal experience one comes to know God and Christ, and to live in conscious communion with, and responsive obedience to them, he will live a sort of second-hand religious life; live upon tradition, upon the faith and experience of others and not his own. And that is just what the great majority of church members today are doing; they have no rich, vital, personal experience of God in their hearts or of Christ in their lives. Their religion is traditional, conventional, institutional, or doctrinal, as the case may be, but not vital.

Job, before the period of his heavy affliction, had just such a religion; in the time of his trials, therefore, he found it entirely insufficient; he could not find God in his every-day life; he had not really known Him in personal experience; he had accepted him traditionally; he had accepted him philosophically, according to the theology of the Oriental Wise Men; but he had not really found God in his own individual life-experience, and this he confesses in the sorrowful cry:

"Oh, that I knew where I might find him!
Behold I go forward
But he is not there;
And backward,
But I cannot perceive him:
On the left-hand when he doth work,
But I cannot behold him;
He hideth himself on the right hand,
That I cannot see him!"

But when, at last, he has suffered and sought, he finds God very near, even within his own heart, and life. And then he exclaims, out of the fullness of his heart, as he looks back over the dark, and sorrowful period of his life when religion was only a tradition to him, "I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee." And not until we too pass out of this traditionalistic, this conventional, this institutional, this doctrinal stage of religious experience will we be able to cry out, "Now mine eye seeth thee."

Like unto ships far off at sea,
Outward or homeward bound, are we.
Before, behind, and all around,
Floats and swings the horizon's bound,
Seems at its distant rims to rise
And climb the crystal wall of the skies,
And then again to turn and sink
As if we could slide from its outer brink.
Ah! it is not the sea,
It is not the sea that sinks and shelves,
But ourselves
That rock and rise
With endless and uneasy motion,
Now touching the very skies,
Now sinking into the depth of the ocean.
Ah! if our souls but poise and swing
Like the compass in its brazen ring
Ever level and ever true
To the toil and the task we have to do,
We shall sail securely and safely reach
The Fortunate Isles, on whose shining beach
The sights we see, and the sounds we hear,
Will be those of joy and not of fear.

—Longfellow.

SOMETHING BEYOND.

When mortal mind, aghast at too great thought,
Comes suddenly to rest, a lesson's taught
And limits placed beyond which naught avails.
The very great and very small assails
The all too puny brain of mortal man
And stops his chance of vision of God's plan.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

LOVE IS FIRST.

It takes great love to stir a human heart
To live beyond the others and apart.
A love that is not shallow, is not small,
Is not for one, or two, but for them all.
Love that can wound love, for its higher need;
Love that can leave love though the heart may bleed;
Love that can lose love, family, and friend;
Yet steadfastly live, loving, to the end.
A love that asks no answer, that can live
Moved by one burning, deathless force—to give.
Love, strength and courage—courage, strength and love;
The heroes of all times are built thereof.

Charlotte Perkins Gilman.

A NEW EMPHASIS ON THE SEVENTH COMMANDMENT.

IT is hopeful to note how our great secular papers are adopting the new point of view about the social evil. Harper's Weekly, which under the editorship of Norman Hapgood, is rapidly making a new plan for itself, publishes an editorial, telling of the efforts that are being made in Atlanta, Seattle, Portland and Los Angeles, to abolish, instead of to restrict, the red-light district. The acknowledgment of the influence of the women voters of the three great Pacific states in the movement to suppress commercialized prostitution is of special interest to all believers in woman suffrage. Mr. Hapgood says:

"Atlanta is one Southern city of considerable size which has declared that prostitution is not a necessary evil. The campaign for the closing of the houses of prostitution was the outcome of the Men and Religion Movement. It began in June, 1912, with a series of powerful and convincing bulletins, published as advertisements in the daily papers, prepared by Marion Jackson, a talented young lawyer of the city, John J. Egan, Chairman of the Executive Committee, financing the work.

"The facts were first disclosed by an investigation in which every woman of the under-world was interviewed. The usual objections to the suppression of the houses of prostitution—that women would be scattered elsewhere, the streets would be infested, and the hotels degenerate into houses of assignation—were discounted by the established fact that these supposed results of suppression were already abundantly evident beforehand.

"Four months after the publication of these bulletins began, Chief of Police Beavers closed the houses, the women were cared for, many of them gladly leaving their old life and one of them giving $2,500 toward the establishment of a Martha's Home, where fallen women are taught how to support themselves honestly. State laws and municipal ordinances were found to be sufficient, once public sentiment was aroused, to the support of a courageous official, and it is asserted that the evils supposed to be increased by suppression have actually decreased, with due diligence on the part of the police.

"The women voters of the three Pacific states have definitely made up their minds to suppress commercialized prostitution. Such large cities as Seattle, Portland, and Los Angeles, have abolished all houses of prostitution, while street-walking has become a perilous profession, and the unsavory hotel a doorway to the police court. San Francisco still has its Barbary Coast, but, under the new California statutes, it remains only because San Francisco is a law unto itself. There have been numerous prosecutions of rich and powerful men for the crime of 'contributing to the delinquency of a minor child.' The recall of the Seattle mayor who believed in a 'wide-open town' was a lasting lesson."

THE NEW WOMAN IN CHINA.

It is certainly true that the educated women of China are making a name and a place for themselves and are working hard to better the condition of young women as a whole. A visitor to that country today will find Chinese women as the heads of hospitals and in some cases also conducting nurses' training schools. They are principals of large government or private schools for girls, and many of them are doing excellent work. A few young women have graduated from American colleges, but the majority of principals and teachers are the products of mission or government schools. The very wealthy, of course, have private tutors, and some of the women most zealous in founding schools for girls have been from princely families.

The ladies in their homes are also working for reforms, and thousands signed petitions sent to England protesting against the opium trade which that country forces on China. They are forming anti-cigarette leagues and holding meetings at which some of them preside and speak with great intelligence and dignity. They are zealous in the anti-foot-binding societies, and take an active part in church and philanthropic work if they are Christians. Nor should one forget to speak of the women in the church who go about as teachers of the Bible or on errands of mercy to the poor and suffering. Some of these are ladies of fine families and great learning, while others are poor country women, whose chief qualifications are a tender heart and sympathetic mind rather than literary attainments.—Popular Science Monthly.

FOR THE MOTHERS' PENSION.

"Speaking of the mothers' pension, it really comes down to this question," summed up the lawyer—"private charity or public aid. Suppose we add the gains and losses of public aid to mothers, and weigh them against each other," he suggested. "In my opinion," continued the lawyer, "public aid to mothers includes the following gains:

"1. The children are not pauperized. They gain an independent home in place of one which is dependent on alms.

"2. The mother gains in self respect.

"3. The citizens gain in social recognition of the mother's service and the children's need. The mother works for them, and they repay her.

"4. The state gains in economy and wise investment by preventing waywardness, delinquency and crime.

"The gain is to the child, the mother, the citizen and the state. The loss seems to be to charity agents alone. We have for years taxed all the people of this country to build up the country's weak industries. Why not tax all the people to build up weak families? The families make the state more than industry does, more than anything does."

Kansas City's chief probation officer is quoted:

"We have helped in Kansas City fifty-three widows with about two hundred children. In the last year and a half but one case turned out unsatisfactorily, and in this the allowance was discontinued. It is the opinion of people here who have to do with the poor and needy that the widow's allowance is one of the best laws on our statute books, and if there is a failure it is only that we do not reach out and cover more individuals because of our limited funds. We consider that we are investing our money and that we will have big returns."

THE MOTHER.

No ordinary work done by a man is either as hard or as responsible as the work of a woman who is bringing up a family of small children; for upon her time and strength demands are made not only every hour of the day but often every hour of the night. She may have to get up night after night to take care of a sick child, and yet must day by day continue to do all her household duties as well, and if the family means are scant, she must usually enjoy even her rare holidays taking her whole brood of children with her. The birth pangs make all men the debtors of all women.—Theodore Roosevelt.

PIONEERS IN SUFFRAGE.

A traveler in Finland, where women have been accorded political equality in a large degree for a number of years, gives this interesting picture of the typical Finnish woman:

"There is no more striking thing in Finland than to sit in the Esplanade for an hour and watch the passing by of Finnish mothers. The Finnish woman is good looking but not beautiful, plain but not ugly; intellectual but not top heavy. She walks with a peculiar deliberate step, jabbing her heel into the sidewalk in a way that spells 'determination' in any language. She swings her arms with the precision of one who means business. She is a veritable reproduction of the popular conception of Portia in the Merchant of Venice. She is feminine but not effete, strong but not masculine. It is easy to imagine that if one toyed with the affections of a Finnish dame, there would be no hysterics, no scalding tears; the offender would more likely be hit over the head with an axe.

"Such women breed strong men—Finnish men. And it is some twenty of these women who have been elected to and now have seats in the Finnish Parliament. They were given the elective franchise in 1906 and immediately made use of it in Finnish fashion. The majority of the employees of the banks are women and they appear side by side with the men in most of the walks of life. It was a woman who founded the first temperance society in Finland thirty years ago. Yesterday, at Tolo park, I attended a great gathering of thousands of Social Democrats at a demonstration and picnic. The acres of people were being addressed by a woman, of course."

RETURNING HOME.

IT takes some time to settle down to the year's work after vacation, but by this second week in October the gains in strength and knowledge made through rest and diversion ought to be pretty well organized into purposes for the new year's work.

Most of us have been enjoying, in one form or another, a summer vacation. This period of summer rest has come to be a marked feature of our modern life. It is no longer a few favored individuals who take vacations; almost the whole community gets its outing, and Saturday half holidays as a relief for people who labor with their hands come to be the rule rather than the exception. Church life and business life alike have adjusted themselves to this situation, and we are learning to prepare for more strenuous endeavor in a briefer period of activity.

The life of Jesus was a life of frequent vacations. The proportion of his rest time to work time was far greater than that of the minister of today. If the period of Jesus' ministry was three years, we are able to account for less than one-third of it as spent in preaching and healing. Were it not for two feasts we could easily encompass his whole ministry in one year and still leave certain definite periods of rest. People did not live in feverish haste in Jesus' day, and his ministry was conducted with a certain leisureliness shot through with intensity of moral resistance. When He worked, He worked with vigor. There were long days of activity, preceded or followed by nights of meditation and prayer; but there were periods of rest as definitely marked and as faithfully observed. The devil is said to take no vacations, but Jesus took several of them.

The first vacation of which we have knowledge is that in which Jesus laid aside His physical toil at Nazareth and went for a period to Judea, and this is the brief record of His home-coming. "He returned in the power of the spirit unto Galilee" and took up the duties that were waiting for Him.

Jesus made the most of His vacation for spiritual needs. He listened to the preaching of John the Baptist, and His days of solitude in the wilderness were days of religious quiet and devotion. We know the story of the temptation. We are not to suppose, however, that the devil was His constant companion in the wilderness. Jesus had other thoughts than those of mere resistance of evil. Largely those days must have been periods of high consecration to duty. There must have been hours of calm enjoyment and of spiritual vision. The spirit led him into the wilderness not merely to fight a battle, but to gain poise and spiritual calm for the work he had to do.

Then followed the home coming. He came in the spirit, and he came with power because of his possession of the Spirit. It is often true of us that we need a vacation to recover from our vacation. Too often our spiritual opportunities are dissipated with nerve straining recreation and with an excess of pleasure which exhausts rather than inspires and brings us back to our work weary and disspirited.

Sometimes men have returned to the Lord's work in a discontented or disheartened manner, destitute of inspiration and hope. Jonah returned to Ninevah after his outing, and preached the Lord's message just as it was given him, but with a bitter and resentful spirit in which was impatience toward God and hatred toward the people to whom he preached. It is to be feared that he was not the last preacher to take up his task in like manner. Not so did Jesus return to Galilee; not so should we return.

Jesus came back to an enlarged ministry. He retained all the habits of his youth that made for righteousness, but He came to find His new opportunity and to make the most of it.

There are young people who go away to school, who come back again and find their old places occupied by others and no new place waiting for them; their old groups of companions are gone, and they wander lonely and disspirited where formerly they were at home. Jesus made the most of his old habits, and immediately formed new associations that had in them the power of righteousness. He went to the synagogue on the Sabbath day "as his custom was," but He found new responsibilities there. He did not shrink from the invitation that came to him to assume the duties of a teacher. He took the book of the prophets and stood up to read, and he found the larger mission of his soul in the work that waited for Him when he came back to Galilee. How many people fail at just this point of finding the opportunity of service in their former place and never seeking the larger service which waits their return.

May our return, like that of our Lord, be in the "power of the Spirit," and may this autumn's work be for us and the churches the best we have ever known.

PENURIOUSNESS AND IDEALISM.

AN eastern daily newspaper calls attention to what seems to be an unwarranted closeness in appropriations by Congress along certain lines in consideration of th lavish expenditures in othere directions. The editorial says:

> If, as reported, the Congress of the United States has declined to make appropriations for official delegates to international conferences to which the government as such is invited, then the sooner the fact is generally known and condemned the better for the nation's reputation. As one contemplates the reckless extravagance shown in domestic appropriations for parochial and selfish ends, and then learns that the national bureau of education is now going about with hat in hand to beg from private donors funds with which to send its representative to Europe to a world conference of educators, his respect for the wisdom and disinterestedness of Congress is likely to fall in precise ratio with his feelings of indignation.
> We are not contending that upon the national government shall devolve responsibility for entertainment of international congresses when they come to this country, or that all delegates to similar meetings abroad who go from the United States should have their bills paid by the United States. The hospitality and generosity of private citizens and of members of the professions or callings represented thus far have enabled Americans, whether acting as hosts or as delegates, to make a fairly creditable record for hospitality on the one hand and for free spending on the other. What we feel sure of is that the time has come when the government as such should be represented at international conferences of all kinds, and that generous pecuniary provision for such representation should be made. A penurious policy belies the real feeling and intention of the people. It makes collective action inferior to individual and group action.
> There is not a single department at Washington but what should have for contingent expenses money enough to send regular or special employees wherever there is a call for international action that has for its aim real instruction or inspiration of humanity and betterment of the race. Congress, we think, should avoid being penurious where ideas and ideals are concerned. If for no higher reason than because it makes more glaring the wastes that go with erection of postoffices and custom houses, dredging of rivers and harbors, and a host of similar enterprises that symbolize a popular demand for a hand in the public treasury, idealism should not be starved out.

SEX HYGIENE A WARNING.

WITHIN the last year there has been a peerfect epidemic of sex consciousness, one aspect of which has been a vociferous demand for the teaching of sex hygiene to children. There is real need of something in this direction, but we wish to utter a reiterated warning. Whatever else there is in this movement, one thing has been evident in many of the discussions, the attempt to secure instruction on sex hygiene in public schools constitutes one more effort of parents to shirk their God-giveen responsibility. No well-meaning maiden lady giving blushing lessons out of a text book, no imported lecturer with exaggerated ideas of sex consciousness can be any proper substitute for fathers and mothers, and these may do great harm. We have no doubt of the good intentions of most of the people who are behind this movement, but we have grave doubts of the practical wisdom of many of them. If a father or mother refuses to do his or her own duty and turns it over to school teachers and paid lecturers, it were better that a millstone were hanged about the parent's neck. Moreover, we have more than a doubt concerning the wisdom of too much instruction on this question at the present time. This is not the best time in the world's history to pass judgment on matters of this character. As someone has remarked, "Just now it is sex o'clock in literature." There is a morbid sex consciousness. God has His way of teaching through the reticencies of life as certain as through the screaming stark-nakedness which sometimes parades itself in the disguise of purity.

It is not by thinking purity that the mind becomes pure. There is real danger in brushing the bloom off the cheek of modesty.

This is no defense of prudery, nor of ignorance, but it is what we believe to be a timely warning.

FELICITATIONS AND BOASTING.

THE fine art of making sincere and felicitous addresses of welcome and greeting before large religious gatherings, was illustrated by sharp contrast at Toronto on the opening of the General Convention last week. "His Worship, the Mayor," as they refer to the head of their municipality, made as gracious and beautiful a proffer of the hospitality of his city as could be imagined. Rev. Dr. John Neil, the distinguished Presbyterian pastor in Toronto, spoke a message of singular insight and sincerity, extending a welcome from the evangelical churches of the city. Dr. Neil complimented the Disciples on some of the principles which they embodied.

On behalf of the Disciples, it was felt by the whole great audience, the response was as singularly infelicitous as the other addresses were gracious. The speaker selected for this delicate function was apparently totally unaware of the graces which the occasion required. "We thank you for this royal welcome," he began, "but we expected it. Just see who we are!" Interpreting this as a piece of humor the audience responded goodnaturedly with applause. This seemed to stimulate the speaker to elaborate just "who we are," and his address quickly became boisterous and boastful. The other communions were referred to in a patronizing air as having done something, of course, for unity, but we, having worked at it a long time have much to teach them. Cardinal Gibbons was referred to with a coarse epithet which we refuse to put before our readers' eyes, and some dignitary of the Church, possibly the Cardinal—some words were lost by the speaker turning his back to the audience to bow to the welcomers who had preceded him—was referred to as having been made the "goat" for something or other.

The whole convention would have gone home with hanging heads had not the gracious and elevated address of President Henry followed.

We could not help recalling the effective words in which Rev. Carey E. Morgan carried the greetings of the Disciples to the Presbyterian Assembly in Atlanta last spring. Mr. Morgan related us historically to the Presbyterians and then with a delicious blending of fact and humor added:

> In our organization of the local congregation, in our procedure at the Lord's table, in our order of worship, in our thought of the quiet and orderly movement of the Holy Spirit in conversion, in our emphasis of the truth of the gospel in its relation to salvation, we get much from the apostles by way of our Presbyterian ancestors. No doubt you think that you had something else from the apostles that we did not appropriate, and you may be right, but if so, it was an oversight on our part!

Mr. Morgan's address could be profitably studied as a model in the gentle art of being felicitous and clever without sacrificing sincerity or dignity.

The Toronto Convention

WITH a gratifying attendance, when it is remembered how far Toronto is from the center of the Disciple populations, with splendid reports of progress, inspiring addresses, a spirit of fraternity and conciliation on all occasions when issues upon which differences are evident, are discussed, the Toronto Convention is making for itself a worthy place in the annals of such gatherings.

The sessions are held in a hall that was built for convention purposes, which means that all are comfortably seated within easy reach of the speakers, while no magnificent distances in the rear are available for the crowds, as in some other convention halls of recent years, for the visiting among friends and the consequent distracting noises. All disturbing features are reduced to the minimum. There is room enough for all who attend. Every attention is given to the hosts gathered in this great city of the Dominion.

The great pipe organ in Massey Hall is used at the evening sessions; two pianos and a cornet are used during the day, while Prof. Hackleman and a large chorus are leading in the song service. Possibly the best collection of hymns that has been selected for any of our conventions is being sung. At any rate it has fewer numbers that are open to criticism. The devotional services have never been more largely attended than at this convention.

The convention opened Tuesday afternoon with Judge F. A. Henry, of Cleveland, Ohio, in the chair. The session was given up to the reading of the report of the Committee of Fifteen, which, after a brief discussion, was adopted without opposition. A series of resolutions proposed by Rev. Chalmers McPherson, of Texas, was referred to a committee of six, who reported at a meeting Wednesday afternoon. There was considerable opposition developed at this meeting, to the action of the Tuesday session, but after a few speeches on both sides, the report of the committee of six, which had revised the McPherson resolutions, was adopted.

The session of Tuesday night was opened with an address of welcome by Mayor Hocken, of Toronto, whose grace and tact won the hearts of all. Rev. John Neil of the Westminster Presbyterian Church spoke for the ministers of the city, emphasizing a few items in the teaching of the Disciples as worthy the emulation of any religious body. Rev. Amos Tovell, president of the Board of Co-operation in Ontario, was particularly happy in his references to the relations between the Disciples and their fellow Christians. Rev. Wallace Tharp of Pittsburgh voiced the appreciation of the convention for the courtesies that had been extended.

The address of the evening, by Judge Henry, was filled with sound common sense utterances concerning the policies and aims of the Disciples. It was a plea for a fraternal and co-operative spirit among ourselves, a unity of forces and actions which alone can compel the attention of the spiritual and intellectual forces of the age, to the work we are trying to do.

At the close of the address the presidents of our various missionary and benevolent boards were introduced.

Wednesday was given up to the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. The devotional exercises were led by Mrs. N. E. Atkinson, who has been a member of the organization from the beginning. The address of Mrs. Atwater, the president, was truly notable. We have heard this gifted woman on many occasions, but never to a greater advantage than at this session. Her references to those who have fallen asleep during the year were touching and beautiful.

Miss Allena Grafton read an excellent paper on training of young women for missionary service. Miss Mattie Burgess, missionary from India, spoke of the need of workers for that field. Dr. F. E. Lumley, of the College of Missions, read a masterly paper on "Home Mission Expansion and the Social Gospel."

In the afternoon, Mrs. Longdon gave a report of the young people's department, which showed encouraging growth. Rev. R. H. Miller, of Buffalo, read a carefully prepared paper on the need of more workers for our many fields. Dr. H. C. Hurd gave an inspiring report of the work being done by the College of Missions, tracing its growth from the meagre beginnings of a few years ago. Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Santmier were introduced, and related some experiences in their work among the North American Indians. Mrs. Bertha F. Lohr told of her work among the women and children of India. Dr. Dye gave a great address at the session of the Temperance Boards, on the subject of "Intemperance and Missions." The day closed with a great address by Prof. C. T. Paul, of the College of Missions, on the subject, "Christ's Call and the World's Need."

The Brotherhood banquet was largely attended. Great addresses were made by Oliver W. Stewart and Rev. J. Campbell White, secretary of the Layman's Missionary Movement.

CHINA'S AMERICAN ADVISERS.

THE United States has no lack of representatives in China at this important time in that nation's history, and it is fortunate for both countries that men disinterested and eminently capable have been found for the task. Three universities are now represented there, with Professor Reinsch of the University of Wisconsin, representing this government as minister to China, Professor Goodnow of Columbia University, acting as special adviser to the Chinese government during the framing of their constitution, and with Professor H. C. Adams of the University of Michigan, as expert adviser on taxation. The recent turn of events in China, will doubtless add difficulties to their tasks, but the disinterestedness of their mission will make it possible for them to co-operate with the officials. Professor Adams, whose authoritative knowledge of the subject of taxation has given weight to his opinions at Washington, will doubtless exercise a powerful influence at the Chinese capital, since his experience has led him beyond the theoretical to the practical aspects of taxation. Even under the Manchus, China had an opportunity to test the worth of American advisers, Professor J. W. Jenks, then of Cornell University being enlisted in the solution of their economic and monetary problems. China still has the national reverence for the scholar and when the fact is remembered that more of the Chinese progressives have studied under American teachers in law, history and economics than in the universities of any other country, it is only natural that they should look to America for the combination of academic training and republican principles.

COMPLETING ONE'S TASK.

A WRITER in The Craftsman, speaking about amateur gardeners of the city's back yards seems to find that the real test of your garden lover is whether he continues during the whole season to tend his little plot, or whether his enthusiasm wanes with the heyday of June. In fact the man who still is to be seen in his back yard after the last vegetable is gathered is the man who really loves to garden. He is busy pulling up the old vines and bushes, burning them and preparing things for the winter's rest. For him a garden is for all the year round. He lives to finish the thing up perfectly.

The writer furthermore finds that half the restlessness of today follows from never finishing any task thoroughly, never seeing one thing through to the end. It is not so much the work we do that burdens as the sense of work left half done. This lover of gardens sees that the inexorableness of the natural seasons is part of their beauty and power. The hour has come to do this thing definitely or to begin something else. There can be no trailing things along. The time for this crop, that flower is over, for the present, and the next harvest calls us. Growing things have this intelligent advantage over the dulness of roofed-in occupations. "No low descending sun" waits for the lamps to be filled. Darkness comes and they must be filled; and then morning appears promptly at the expected instant. Sleeping then is over, or should be, and the hours unroll the round of duty. He who knows how to match his own steady deeds to the march of the sun finds the peace and rest of rounded and ordered accomplishment.

MY TASK.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE.

NOT mine to mount to courts where seraphs sing,
Or glad archangels soar on outstretched wings;
Not mine in union with celestial choirs
To sound heaven's trump or strike the gentler wires;
Not mine to stand enrolled at crystal gates,
Where Michael thunders or where Uriel waits;
But lesser worlds a Father's kindness know;
Be mine some simple service here below—
To weep with those who weep, their joys to share,
Their pain to solace or their burdens bear;
Some widow in her agony to meet;
Some exile in his new-found home to greet;
To serve some child of thine and so serve thee,
Lo, here am I! To such a work send me!

The Remorse of David

THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

DID some one call me king,—David the king?
The lips spake false that spake thus for my ear.
King over men, but of his lust the slave!
Ill fares the throne on such foundation built.
Who ruleth self hath naught wherefrom to fear;
Who holdeth not the reins to appetite,
Hath naught to guide save his wild, lustful will,
A charioteer to fiery steeds attached.
Death yawns for such, though life seems long to bless.

O fatal night, in which the thought was born
Bearing in turn the deed that bound my soul
To this deep hell! No fires with this compare,—
The pangs of conscience wronged, the will of God defied.
I know not now the peace that reigned within
When I, a lad on these Judean hills,
Led tender flocks by gently flowing streams,
Through pastures green, all innocent of wrong.

Sweet hours of youth, come ye but once again
To still this spirit groaning in its chains,
Where it, alas! must bide for evermore,—
Except one come, in strength of purity,
And break these galling bonds, and set me free.

My harp, once as my Love, hangs idle now;
For music bideth not in souls depraved.
She dwelleth but on high, where God abides,—
And if she comes to earth, she visits men
In holiness secure. O wretched fate,
To be bereft of that we once adored
As never womankind! Forget the past,
Beloved Music, be thou still my friend,
As when of old in grassy fields you walked with me,
And doubted not my heart was true.
You pointed out the stars and bade me sing
Their matchless harmonies; nor did I halt,
But, tuning harp to voice, I sang to Him,
And felt the heav'ns descend and lift me far
Beyond Judean hills to Jahweh's throne.

Alas, my power is gone, my harp is still,
And evermore shall be; for who would deign
To touch those magic strings with hands defied!

Again the voices call, "King David,—King!"
No more a king, but slave, a self-bound slave!
Who calls? Let him come in, but call not, "King!"

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.

IT is something of a hazard, I well know, to undertake a review and estimate of a book, and especially a work of fiction, immediately upon completing the reading of it. A novel builds up a world of its own. Its characters and situations displace the real world in one's mind and one feels for the time being that they are real and that the real world is an illusion. After reading a novel I always have the difficult experience of checking up the world of the book with the world of fact, and it takes me some time to do it. Often books of fiction mislead us as to the fact world and work us up into a frenzy of condemnation against certain classes of people—perhaps the rich, or the ruling classes, or socalled "society," or the clergy, or Church people—which is quite unjust and fanatical.

Nothing but time and sincere mental effort will discover to us whether the facts justify the novelist's point of view. I have just this evening finished reading "The Inside of the Cup" and, as I understand your desire, Mr. Editor, in inviting me to write this weekly reflection, you prefer that I should set down my immediate impressions rather than wait for a more seasoned judgment. Of course this is much easier to do. One doesn't stake all his reputation as a literary "critic" (which thing I am decidedly not) upon his words written in the heat of interest and with the veil of the novelist's illusion still upon his eyes. And, after all, the first impressions made by a book may have in them a certain value in estimating the book that the more deliberate conclusions do not have.

THIS book has gripped me tremendously. I am slow to get into the "band wagon" of that crowd that devours the new books, and I am somewhat behind the times in this instance. The reviews began to appear several months ago. The store windows in the big cities have been stacked high with the fast selling earlier editions. I attended a meeting of social reform workers some weeks ago and when one speaker was deploring the lethargy of the Church in fighting the saloon some one broke in with this: Get the church people to read "The Inside of the Cup," and several said Amen! When I would stop at a railroad newsstand before boarding a train to buy a magazine or paper I was always being stared at by "V. V.'s Eyes" and myself staring into "The Inside of the Cup."

With suggestions like these constantly working upon me I got the book and read it. I supposed of course it would prove to be a thrilling romance. But I found that its plot was quite commonplace. I could make as good a plot myself. It dealt with sermons and services and a minister and his church board and his leading "society" women and his most affluent parishioner and most abundant supporter.

It dealt with such questions as: Why are there so few of the ablest young men entering the ministry? Why is it that a minister can preach and preach and be complimented and complimented and yet change things so little? What is the nature of this revolution that is going on in the world of religious thought? What is the function of the church in the modern world? Has the Church outlived its usefulness? Have the people wearied of religion? Is there a sure enough gospel in modern theology, or is it mere negation? Is the Church seriously in earnest? Is its wealthy member a menace to the Church?

WHEN I found out that questions like these were the pith and substance of the book my soul thrilled to think that the book was being read so widely and that there was some vehicle at last found to carry these problems that have been assumed to be the monopoly of preachers and teachers and religious journals right down into the minds of the "secular" public. Mr. Winston Churchill's other stories have made for him a clientele that will read this book because it is his, who would quite likely shy at such earnest discussions did they come across them elsewhere.

Quite apart from the merits of the story, that comforts me. It is so hard these days to get past the thousand competing interests in the lives of people with a message from the Church or about the Church. But as in Hamlet "the play's the thing," so in our time the novel's the thing that, if it is well done, may touch and waken the conscience of those who have forgotten that they have a conscience.

I NOTICE, Mr. Editor, in your uniquely interesting department, "The Larger Christian World," that certain Episcopalian clergymen are taking steps to expose the fallacies of the book. There may be, there no doubt are, many inaccuracies as to details in the statements Mr. Churchill puts into the mouths of his characters.

But—and this is my point—no cavilling at inaccuracies of detail can blind us to the fact that the book is a tremendous challenge to the Church. The setting of the book is Episcopalian, but that is simply because the scene had to be made concrete. It is not a tirade against that communion more than others. It concerns us all.

Waiving all details as to whether John Hodder's new-found theology is seasoned and adequate; whether a man could in actual life have passed through a disillusionment with respect to the old doctrines and into an appropriation of new views, held passionately, in three or four weeks; whether any considerable number of our churches are dominated by a single man whose personality is the incarnation of blind selfishness, unspirituality and social cruelty, as was Eldon Parr; whether Alison Parr's views on marriage are good or bad; and all such questions which smarting church pride will seize upon in self-defense—the big question which candid people, upon reading the book, will face is this: Is the Church as a whole doing its Master's work with a sincerity and passion and intelligence at all adequate to the needs of modern life?

IF not, then I for one rise in my humble place to defend Mr. Churchill and to thank him for concentrating the whole Church condition into the situation of a single congregation so that thus we might see in clean cut figures the factors in the religious struggle that is now going on.

Complacent wealth is one of these factors, wealth that has been ill-gotten, wealth that satisfies the soul of its possessor by erecting public buildings and underwriting the church's current expense budget, wealth that sits unblushing and unagitated when the minister denounces sin in general and feels no incongruity in the most intimate personal friendship with the preacher.

An outworn theology is another factor, an irrelevant theology, a theology that assumes to be all-important but that is not important at all to the great deep interests of human souls or human society. Was it Fairbairn or Sabatier who said that Jesus' main task when on earth was to save the people from the theologians! But that is literally true. And there is no greater task for Christ's modern prophet than to bring the Church's thought out from the musty nomenclature of a legalistic theological system into the realm of life's actual reali-

THE Church has become an end in itself. It is perfectly amazing when one thinks of the vast expenditure and waste in merely "keeping the church up." Our denominational order stimulates that waste. We are put to it to keep up "our" church in our community. The question as to whether the community needs "our" church, and whether "our" church is justifying its existence in the community by the service it renders to the people of the community, this question has not been seriously asked.

But it is being seriously asked. And the great questions with which this book bristles are being urgently asked and seriously faced by multitudes of men and women within the church who feel that the church must make good, and by multitudes outside who have come to realize that social progress is a fatuous dream without the Christian motive and the Church to embody it.

I find my mind returning again and again to a sentence in one of Professor Coe's earlier books. In response to those who condemn the Church for its awkward and often futile attempts to adjust itself to modern problems, he says, "The Church is just now staggering under the new found consciousness of what it means to be Christian."

"The Inside of the Cup" is all contained in that sentence.

Mark Twain's Little Joke.

Mark Twain in his lecturing days reached a small eastern town one afternoon and went before dinner to a barber's to be shaved.

"You are a stranger in town, sir?" the barber asked.

"Yes, I am a stranger here," was the reply.

"We're having a good lecture here tonight, sir," said the barber, "a 'Mark Twain' lecture. Are you going to it?"

"Yes, I think I will," said Mr. Clemens.

"Have you got your ticket yet?" the barber asked.

"No, not yet," said the other.

"Then, sir, you'll have to stand."

"Dear me!" Mr. Clemens exclaimed. "It seems as if I always do have to stand when I hear that man Twain lecture."

Buffalo Bill Tells Story.

Col. W. F. Cody otherwise known as "Buffalo Bill," is responsible for the following:

"At one time, for a few months, I was at the head of a theatrical combination that did business in the middle west. During a tour of one night stands in Ohio and Kentucky business was bad. We finally disbanded in one of the Ohio towns, where only one performance was given. This was a matinee and the audience was conspicuous by its absence. As I was hurrying out of the office, when the performance was about half over, I nearly stumbled over a small girl who was crying bitterly. I stopped and bending down, asked:

"'Why, what's the matter, little girl?'

"'I wants me money back!' screamed the child, between her sobs.

"'Why, don't you like the show?' I asked. 'You've seen only the first act, you know.'

"'I don't care nothin' 'bout the show,' howled the child. 'I'm 'fraid to set in that gallery all alone!'

How "Lucky" Baldwin Was Converted.

The September American Magazine contains the first of a new series of articles entitled, "Those Who Have Come Back." This series shows how men and women who are failures at forty have taken a new hold on life and are to-day reputable and successful. The first story in the series is about Christopher J. Balf, who is known as "Lucky" Baldwin. "Lucky" Baldwin was born on the East Side in New York City, and, up to the time he was thirty-seven years old, was an all-round "sport" and "good-for-nothing." He was then converted in the Jerry McAuley Mission and, after several years, organized a mission in Chicago which he now runs. Following is one of the stories in the article, descriptive of Baldwin's earlier days:

"It was about this time that he got one night into a Bible class conducted by Dr. A. F. Schauffler for the benefit of Bible school teachers, and heard him read a portion of a chapter from the Bible. The idea of what this process was suddenly rent the mind of the groping man like an explosion. He dashed out of the place and ran most of the way to the mission, arriving there so excited and breathless that he could hardly tell what ailed him.

"'Dere was a guy,' he labored, 'lampin' somep'n out of a book, 'bout two guys beatin' it along de street, and dey come to a guy panhandlin' on de curb. Dey piped him off, and one of 'em says, "Pal, I aint got a jitney (nickel), but beat it." And (crescendo of breathless surprise from Lucky!) de guy beats it! What do you tink o' dat now? What was dat he was lampin'?'

"No one could comprehend what the fellow was driving at, until a cool-minded Scotchman, looking with a sort of mild disgust on Lucky's near-hysteria, proclaimed oracularly: 'Hoot, mon! I ken what ye're speerin' at. It'll be the third o' Acts, ye ignorant loon ye! The story o' Peter and John healin' the lame man at the beautiful gate o' the Temple.'

"They got him a Bible and found him the place. Unable to read a word, knowing only his letters, and them uncertainly, Lucky shut himself up in his room for seven days, crawling out only when hunger drove him. At the end of that time he had taught himself to read by spelling out painfully over and over again the letters of that scene which had so marvelously gripped his imagination."

Mellen Tells "Pat" Story.

Charles S. Mellen, the well-known railroad man, praised, at a dinner in Boston, the pioneers of our American railroads.

"These men were unselfish," he said. "They worked solely for the people's good. They risked their fortunes and their lives without seeming to notice it. They resembled, in fact, Pat Collins.

"Pat was on the roof of an old eight-story building, beginning the work of demolition. His position on the roof was very dangerous. As he threw down slates and hubbish he was in continual peril of falling down himself.

"But his sole care seemed to be the people below, who insisted on standing in the street and looking up at him on his precarious perch. He shouted to these people again and again to stand back. Finally, exasperated, he roared:

"'Bedad, if I drop on the heads of some of yez, I bet ye'll wish then ye'd kept out of the road!'"—Chicago Record-Herald.

Lincoln's Principle in Law.

When Lincoln became a lawyer all clients knew that they would win if the case was a fair one; and, if not, that it was a waste of time to take it to him.

After listening some time with his eyes on the ceiling one day to a would-be client's statement he swung suddenly round in his chair and exclaimed:

"Well, you have a pretty good case in technical law, but a pretty bad one in equity and justice. You'll have to get some other fellow to win this case for you. I couldn't do it. All the time, while standing talking to that jury, I'd be thinking 'Lincoln, you're a liar,' and I believe I should forget myself and say it out loud."

After giving considerable time to a case in which he had received from a woman a retainer of $200 he returned the money, saying: "Madam, you have not a peg to hang your case on." "But you earned that money," said she. "No, no," replied Lincoln, "that would not be right. I can't take pay for doing my duty."

A Story of Dr. MacLeod.

Some who have attended councils and associations can appreciate this story of the late Rev. Dr. Norman Macleod, of Edinburgh. Going into a room in which was a cage containing a large owl, he surveyed it for a long time. The owl sat unmoved, placid and erect. His mien was dignified, his horns impressive, his eyes cold and observant, his countenance sagacious and critical. At length Norman broke silence, "Man ye wad mak a splendid moderawtor!"

Woodrow Wilson's Wit.

Woodrow Wilson has an extremely quick wit, it is said. A man, in the course of an animated conversation, noticing that Mr. Wilson's eye-glasses were perched perilously near the tip of his nose, remarked: "Your glasses, governor, are almost on your mouth."

"That's all right," was the quick response. "I want to see what I am talking about."

From Near and Far

In the August "World's Work" Everett T. Tomlison compiles from the figures of the Census Bureau the average salaries of ministers outside the large cities. For the various denominations they are as follows: Unitarian, $1,221; Protestant Episcopal, $994; Universalists, $987; Presbyterian (North), $977; Reformed Church, $923; Congregational, $880; Presbyterian (South), $857; Lutheran, $744; Methodist Episcopal, $741; Northern Baptist, $683; Methodist Episcopal, South, $681; United Brethren, $547; Disciples, $526; Southern Baptists, $334.

Shade trees as a means of making city streets less torrid and more bearable during the hot months will be planted by the street tree committee of the Fairmount Park commission, which has supervision over 127,301 street trees in Philadelphia. The commission will first plant trees in the residential sections and on the widest streets. Efforts will then be extended to other streets. Trees already planted will be pruned and those condemned as unsightly or dangerous will be destroyed.

Prevention of accidents will be the subject of sermons from every pulpit in Chicago Sunday, Oct. 26, if the plans of the public safety commission are carried out. The date was set at a late meeting of the commission and designated as "Safety First Sunday" and all preachers in the city will be asked to co-operate.

Officials of the National Women's Suffrage Association have announced that the next annual convention of the association would be held in Washington during the week of Dec. 1. Many noted men and women have accepted invitations to address the delegates, who will be gathered from all sections of the country.

The Roman Catholic Church has beatified Bernadette Soubirous, the French peasant girl to whom it is claimed the Virgin Mary appeared fifty-five years ago in the miracle-working grotto at Lourdes.

Girls in rural schools in Missouri are being organized into pick-and-shovel clubs to help along the good-roads movement.

"If the Church Were In Earnest."

The Churchman strikes twelve in its recent declarations regarding church earnestness. All fellowships will stand for such statements as the following:

"If a church were dead in earnest would it not carry on a consistent campaign for the increase of the ministry and set an ideal in our seminaries that would galvanize all of them into life? If a church were dead in earnest would she allow those who serve her faithfully to work for a pittance too small for a laborer's wage? Would such a church do what few secular organizations or brotherhoods are guilty of—let the men who give their lives for a pitiable salary die in poverty and want?"

Bramwell Booth as Father's Successor.

Gen. Bramwell Booth, who succeeded his father as head of the Salvation Army, is coming to this country to help raise $1,000,000 for the two memorial training schools for Army workers, reports an exchange. One of these schools will be located in Chicago and the other in New York. These schools are to enlarge the practical side of the work done by the Salvation Army in training experts in department work. The Army has 120 industrial homes that do a business which costs $2,000,000 a year. They collect waste paper, sort it and sell it to manufacturers, and gather up old furniture by purchase or gift, repairing it and putting it in second-hand stores for sale, thus giving employment to men and women who need it. Workers are trained also in the care of incoming foreigners by experts in immigration work, and others are taught to care for children from the slums when they are on Army farms, or to work in the prisons. It is to broaden the scope of this work that General Booth plans a whirlwind campaign in Chicago and New York, lasting one week. One thousand men and women, friends of the Army, are to undertake to complete the $1,000,000 during that time.

Christian Advocate on the Ministry.

Comparing the number of candidates for the ministry in earlier times and today, the Christian Advocate notes the following facts:

At the beginning of the nineteenth century, more than one-fifth of the graduates went into the ministry. At the beginning of the twentieth century the proportion had dwindled to about one-sixteenth. One hundred years ago about six per cent of the graduates took up education as a profession. At the present time nearly twenty-seven per cent are doing this. Less than six per cent of the college graduates a hundred years ago went into business, now nearly nineteen per cent are doing so. It will be seen that so far as the relative position of the ministry to education and business is concerned there has been a total reversal of the proportions which obtained a century ago.

The Christian Advocate thinks that these conditions might be modified by the Church bringing out more distinctly than has been done the larger possibilities of the ministry. In his recent address at the opening of the Western Theological Seminary, Dr. James H. Snowden discussed "The Attractions of the Ministry." The following quotations from the address are of interest:

"The ministry has the attraction of being work of the highest worth. If it is not a useful work its doom should be upon it and no manly man should enter it. But it contributes to the highest welfare of men at every point, physical, mental and spiritual. The Christian pulpit is the vitalizing influence that lifts all life to a higher level.

"The ministry has the attraction of a fair living and a fine social position. Though many salaries are small and even cruelly so, yet the average minister is guaranteed an income that compares favorably with the average income of his people. He is a scholar and gentleman, a man of culture and refinement, who is invited into all social circles and is treated with universal respect and deference. The friendships of the minister are a rich reward and joy.

"The ministry has the attraction of being an intellectual pursuit and is teaching by public speech and persuasion, and the man who has any intellectual avidity and oratorical instinct will immensely enjoy the work.

"Higher attractions of the ministry are its work of saving individual men and redeeming society."

Jews Fight Petty Litigation.

To decrease the amount of petty litigation among the Jews in the Ghettos of the great cities the Hebrew benevolent societies are trying an arbitration scheme. This tendency to "go to law," they consider, inculcates a lack of respect for the courts and creates local feuds in the communities concerned. To meet this deplorable situation the United Hebrew Societies of Baltimore have organized a Jewish court of arbitration. A committee of seven administer the affairs of the court and the court hears disputes and cases of every kind impartially and patiently, and judgments are rendered promptly and inexpensively. The arbitration proceedings are purely voluntary, but every effort is being made to arouse a sentiment in favor of settling disputes in this voluntary court.

Methodism and the Church of England.

When the suggestion was made, in the recent British Wesleyan Conference, that an investigation be made as to the possibility of a return of the Methodist Church to the bosom of the Mother Church, a resolution advocating such investigation was rejected because its introduction was regarded as "untimely and likely to cause complications," and not because the Conference was "averse" to such a suggestion.

An editorial writer in the Methodist Recorder (London), in defending the rejection of this resolution, has this to say of the causes that brought to pass the separation of Wesley and his followers from the English Church, and the reason for the present insistence on the continued separateness of the two bodies:

"It is natural to begin by inquiring, 'To what is the loyalty of a Wesleyan due?' Surely it is the tradition passed to us from John Wesley, as we realize it today. As it happens our President has, in his recent Conference manifesto, told us that the first characteristic of Methodism is 'fervent, definite, aggressive evangelism.' We could hardly ask for a modern pronouncement which accords better with the facts of our origin and early progress. The phrase describes—if we are careful to allow that both learning and logic play their part in sound evangelism—the course taken by Wesley, which occasioned his gradual divergence from the Church of England. It was because he felt that such 'fervent, definite, aggressive evangelism' was essential to the well-being of the Body of Christ upon earth, and necessary to the welfare of the nation, and because he could not find scope for it or sympathy with it within the organization of the Anglican Church, that he reluctantly suffered the breach between him and that church to widen. To that original purpose we hold as a community, and every suggestion of union or alliance from any quarter has to be viewed first in relation thereto. Will it aid the cause of 'fervent, definite, aggressive evangelism'?"

Thomas Nelson Page on The Pilgrims.

On the occasion of the recent unveiling of the mounment to our Mayflower ancestors, last month, at Southampton, England, Thomas Nelson Page, the new minister to England, said some complimentary things concerning the Pilgrims. As our national hymn, "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," has been attacked recently—especially by Roman Catholics—on the ground of the provincialism of the "Pilgrim" idea, these words of our able ambassador are of the greater interest.

In describing the Pilgrim Fathers as "God-led" Mr. Page said: "They made the Deity a partner in their enterprise. In this fact you strike the true note of their greatness; for to men who know that God guides them, misfortunes become invitations to renewed effort. To them there is no such thing as discouragement. Untoward events are merely ordered acts of discipline, and every failure becomes a step towards ultimate success. When success is thus made inevitable, when men thus link themselves to destiny, they take on heroic stature; and if they happen to fall in with historic conditions, they clothe themselves with immortality."

"You wonder at the turkey trot, the tango and the slit skirt, and I say it is because the mothers of this country are not interested in training their children," asserted Vice President Marshall recently before the recent southern Methodist camp meeting at Great Falls. Nearly 3,000 persons gathered to hear him expound his "philosophy of life," and he deplored the times and the customs with vehemence. "If I were a higher critic," he continued, "there is only one commandment I would change, and for the sake of justice I would reverse that to read: 'The sins of the children shall be visited on their parents.' I do not believe that criminals are such from birth, but that children become criminals from being herded with criminals." The Vice President then set forth the argument that the tendency of the age is to draw away from the austere, old-fashioned religion and pleaded for a closer adherence to the teachings of Thomas Jefferson and Jesus Christ, whom he constantly compared.

Disciples Table Talk

Opening in the Chicago Field.

Clarence G. Baker, of Douglas Park Church, Chicago, closed his pastorate there on September 28, to enter Chicago University to complete his work for the master's degree. The year has been a good one considering the shifting nature of the population of this neighborhood in which American families are being replaced by Bohemians and Jews, over one-fourth of the membership having moved to other places in the city. During the year the church has made its payment to the church extension fund, reducing the building indebtedness to $3,200. A steam heating plant and a baptistry have been installed and paid for, $1,500 raised for current expenses and $300 for missions and benevolence. The church membership has been increased by twenty-seven new members (all adults but four) five non-resident members have returned and fifteen members have been lost by death or removal, leaving the membership seventeen stronger than a year ago. The church is in good condition for the next year's work, but the field will not be an easy one. For some one who is willing to serve for the good he can do here is an opportunity. Correspondence regarding this field may be addressed to O. F. Jordan, Evanston, secretary of the Chicago Missionary Society.

A Healthy Growth.

Because the church at Junction City, Kans., is too small to accommodate the congregation it has been necessary to teach three of the Sunday-school classes out of doors this summer. The Sunday-school membership has grown in a few years from thirty-five to over 200 and each Sunday morning finds from seventy-five to one hundred young people in groups about their teachers in the church yard. Plans are under consideration for the erection of a church large enough to accommodate all of the classes comfortably.

Reciprocity in Church Attendance.

That denominational lines are breaking down in the churches is evidenced by the fact that in many of the larger churches a large per cent of the persons attending services are members of churches of other creeds than that of the church they attend. On a recent Sunday, enrollment of the attendance at Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., showed that of 1,100 present, more than 400 were members of denominations other than the Christian, and 100 were visitors in the city.

"In the congregation were about as many Methodists as Presbyterians and nearly as many of other denominations as either Methodists or Presbyterians," said George H. Combs, pastor of the church. "I believe, too, this may be taken as a fair example of enrollment of congregations in other churches of the city."

A Pioneer Church.

In October, fifty-eight years ago a little band of fourteen organized First Church at Sacramento, Cal. Twenty years passed by without them owning a building of their own, meeting in the various homes of the congregations, but no Sunday passed without the observance of the Lord's Supper. In 1877 the first building was erected, which was removed to another location and remodeled in 1896 This was destroyed by fire in 1910. On account of the shifting of population a new site was selected for the present building, which was dedicated about two years ago. The property is valued at $40,000 and while not pretentious it has a practical equipment which adequately meets its needs. The church has a membership of 450 and a Sunday-school enrollment of 400, with plans for great progress for the coming season. The present pastor, J. J. Evans, has ministered to this congregation for more than two years.

Youngstown Pastor In Shop Work.

L. G. Batman, Youngstown, O., pastor, is essentially a man's man. As speaker for the Y. M. C. A. of Youngstown, Mr. Batman has for some time been giving practical talks before about 500 employes of one of the rubber companies of the city. He states that his purpose in this work is to create in these men a respect for religion, not simply to secure their membership in the church. That the service Mr. Batman is rendering is appreciated is indicated by a recent resolution from the board of directors of the company, expressing gratitude for his service among their employes.

Drury College, Mo., Prospers.

In view of the drouth that spread over South Missouri and western Kansas the past summer, Drury College, located at Springfield, Mo., has had a remarkably auspicious opening. Drury is up to her usual enrolment, and Dean W. J. Lhamon, of the Bible School of Drury, reports the best classes in the history of his work there. It is claimed that Drury is now the strongest college in Missouri both in point of student body and financial backing. The college offers a rare opening for Bible study to the young people of the Southland.

Church Anticipates Increase Campaigns.

Before the present successful increase campaign was started, one of the St. Louis churches, the Hamilton Avenue, had a campaign of its own well developed. L. W. McCreary, pastor of this church, began with the official board of his congregation, and enlisted each member of the board for one night's work each week in increasing the attendance at church services and the usefulness of those already in attendance. His purpose in this was two-fold: First, to get delinquents back into line; second, to enlist new workers. The appeal has been more directly an effort to secure men, and the effort has been successful. During the month of August a contest was engaged in by the men's and women's classes, and the men came out victorious. Mr. McCreary declares that he has learned, however, that it is not so necessary a thing to enlist new members for the church as to develop those that are already members. He believes in assimilation, rather than addition.

J. J. Tisdall as Teller of Stories.

As a specialist in the art of story-telling, J. J. Tisdall, pastor at Wilson Avenue, Columbus, O., is acquiring a reputation. For several years he has been making a special study of this art. As president of the School Extension Society in Columbus, he is now reducing the art to practice. The purpose of this society is to broaden the usefulness of the public schools, making them centres of all sorts of beneficial activity. Last year Mr. Tisdall began telling stories, particularly of Biblical and historical characters, to a class of about 50, assembled in one of the Columbus parks. This movement has grown rapidly. One evening last July, an audience of 850 people gathered in the park and remained from 6:45 to 8 o'clock, listening to the instructive stories told by Mr. Tisdall. The story-telling method has been found successful in Mr. Tisdall's men's class. A fine class of ninety men witnesses to the truth that "men are but children of a larger growth," and that the story is the most effective medium of teaching, even with adults.

Indianapolis Churches Building.

The chief line of activity that is absorbing the attention of Indianapolis churches this year is the building and improvement of church homes. The Downey Avenue congregation built in one day, by donated labor, temporary quarters for its Men's Bible Class, and have the canvass almost completed for funds to erect a new Sunday-school building, to which an auditorium may be added later. The Englewood church has just completed and rededicated its enlarged building, amply equipped for Sunday-school work. The Olive Branch Church is excavating a basement for a new building, later to be enlarged into a more commodious structure. The Third Church is completing its building, having been for three years meeting in the basement. Central Church completed last spring its well-equipped Sunday-school annex. North Park, Hillside, West Park and Second churches all have new buildings, completed within the past four years. Centenary is using a new Sunday-school department room, and is gathering funds for a new auditorium. Seventh Church is planning to remodel and enlarge next year.

Ind. Dr. Proud of "Preacher" Family.

Dr. J. Hall, Secretary of the American Temperance Board of the Christian Church, is happy in the fact that his children are enlisting in religious work. His son, H. Maxwell Hall, has been preaching for several years, being now at Uniontown, Pa.; his daughter married a minister; and his younger son is now in medical school receiving an education for service as a medical missionary. Dr. Hall is, of course, happy in the success that is now coming to the anti-saloon cause, for which he has for several decades been fighting.

Good Outlook for New England.

Lowell C. McPherson who is evangelist for New England and the Maritime Provinces, is beginning his third year's work under the direction of the American Christian Missionary Society. During the past two years Mr. McPherson has brought about excellent results by his thorough, consecrated work. Three churches and one Sunday-school were organized, two churches built, three bought and two sold, and $4,200 raised on the field.

Evangelist for Indiana Sixth District.

The needs of the many rural churches of the Sixth District, Indiana, is the most important matter for consideration at the present time, it is thought, and the state organization has planned to send an evangelist into the district, which includes Wayne, Randolph, Delaware, Blackford, Joy and Henry counties. Robert Sellers, recently resigned at Elwood, Ind., will probably be sent into this field as evangelist.

Markle, Ind., Will Entertain Convention.

The church at Markle, Ind., invites the Disciples of that district including the counties of Allen, Adams, Huntington, Wabash, Whitley, Grant and Wells, to the annual convention, Nov. 6-7. Several prominent speakers will be present. Claris Yeuell ministers to the Markle work.

Vermont Avenue, Washington, Grows.

With audiences taxing the capacity of the building, a great Endeavor Society leading the city's societies in many respects, a Sunday-school with average attendance of more than 300; with two living link missionaries; with a complete printing plant to its credit; Vermont Avenue Church, Washington, D. C., is living up to the high standards set by F. D. Power, its former pastor. Earle Wilfley, present pastor, has received high honor as president of the Maryland, Delaware and District of Columbia Missionary Society, as trustee of Bethany College, and as trustee of the World's United Society of Christian Endeavor. Mr. Wilfley manifests rare talents in work with young people.

Butler College Under Semester Plan.

With the change to the semester plan, Butler College, Irvington, Ind., is looking forward to greater achievements than ever according to Carl Van Winkle, Butler's representative to the Toronto Convention. More ministerial students have reported for work than at any previous time in Butler's history. A number are working this fall for the B. D. degree. The addition to the faculty of C. E. Underwood, late of Eureka College, has aroused marked enthusiasm, especially because of the fact that Dr. Underwood is a former Butler man.

Keuka College Adds to Faculty.

Keuka College, Keuka Park, N. Y., has opened the new year with increased enthusiasm, partly because of increased enrolment, partly because of the addition of new members to the faculty. Among the new instructors added is Prof. R. J. Olds, who was a member of the Eureka College Faculty the year President Serena, of Keuka, graduated. Prof. Olds and President Serena are both happy in this renewal of former close friendship.

The Board of Ministerial Relief closed its best year in the history of its work, although the final figures are not yet in. The following churches have contributed recently: Palestine, Tex., $25, making $50 for the year; Union Avenue, St. Louis, Mo., $25, totaling $161 for the year; Englewood, Chicago, $50; Harrodsburg, Ky., $50; LaPorte, Ind.; $20. Personal gifts have been received from the following: R. S. Latimer, $25; John E. Mitchell, $50; G. D. Jackson, $50; Miss Mary Chiles, Miss Cynthia Allen and C. C. Chapman $100 each. Many smaller contributions have also been received.

Jackson Avenue Church, Kansas City, Mo., held its annual rally day on September 28, with a record-breaking attendance of 1,210. S. W. Perkins is the minister and C. F Fowler, the superintendent of the Sunday-school and much of the credit of the day is due to his earnest work.

Home-coming day was celebrated at Fullerton, Cal., on September 28. The minister, Bruce Brown, will be active in the coming evangelistic campaign planned by the Long Beach Convention at its recent meeting.

A contest is announced for the fourth quarter between the schools at Champaign, Paris, Litchfield and Jacksonville, Ill. Great care has been taken in listing points to prevent the too usual buying up of the victory.

Ralph V. Callaway, who has just begun his new pastorate at Clinton, Ill., reports a well organized church and graded Sunday-school, and two additions to the membership. Rally Day was celebrated October 5.

The church at El Paso, Ill., is trying to secure C. S. Medbury, of Des Moines, for a three weeks' series of meetings during October. El Paso was the first church ministered to by Mr. Medbury.

C. Kirtley Gillum, of Hannibal, Mo., has been appointed superintendent of the churches of Callaway County, Mo. Mr. Gillum is a graduate of Christian College at Canton, Mo.

Barton O. Aylesworth, pastor at Chandlerville, Ill., formerly president of Drake University, was mentioned by the Progressives at Springfield as candidate for superintendent of public instruction in the state.

The congregation at Ocean Park, Cal., report a parsonage erected for their pastor, William Havener, between sun-up and sundown, on Sept. 16.

EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

Tipton, Ind., G. I. Hoover, pastor; Hamilton and Stewart, evangelists.

THE FIRST PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

is Lord, even Christ. Let us at least not disavow brotherhood with such as acknowledge him. Rather let us together extend the fraternal hand to those who know him not. If we would but cease to look upon Christian union as a theory, and start instead to practice it as a fact, the church would soon be one and inseparable. If we would but join forces to plant churches where none exist; to preach Christ to those who now hear no preaching; to carry the gospel where it is yet unknown; to reach and succor those submerged in city slums or massed in heathen wretchedness; to touch the sympathies of those embittered by economic strife, or sodden in hopeless poverty, we should soon hear no more of sects and find that all our co-laborers were Christians, in whom men would discern the very spirit of Christ.

In my home city of Cleveland, a local organization, styled The Federated Churches, wields a commanding influence upon the community. It has fused and welded together, as nothing else could, the social, civic, and religious interests of the churchmen in that city. Through its various committees, on religious work, church comity, education, social betterment, and civic reform—all working under an executive committee composed of the officers and committee chairmen—it has done far more for effective union of the churches, for unified direction of religious sentiment and effort, and for united realization of Christian ideals, in every phase of city life, than could possibly have been accomplished by its constituency in any other way. Unable to wait for the more perfect union of all Christians, The Federated Churches of Cleveland, by practicing union have already approached measurably nearer to that ideal. Emphasis this year is laid on personal evangelism—an effort to reach the whole community, through persistent, tactful exertion of the silent influences of Christian comradeship, in systematic home visitation. By this means it is hoped to avert and finally to abolish certain pernicious types of platform evangelism.

Harmony and efficiency have resulted from that local experience; and so of all the great inter-denominational, non-sectarian religious enterprises. Nothing but good has come from the actual union of Christians without distinction of party in the Sunday-school Associations, local and international, the Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations, the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, the Student Volunteers, the Laymen's Missionary Movement, the Missionary Secretaries' Association, and many similar undertakings, the last but not the least of which is the united missionary campaign now in full swing.

And here I pause to voice this earnest exhortation: that no one of us fail to have an active part in that stupendous undertaking. To men of ambition, men of vision, men of achievement, there is no more captivating and enthralling theme than that of world-wide missions. The task of preaching the gospel to the whole creation, at home and abroad, in this generation, seems so feasible and the facts and figures are so convincing, that the projects presents an irresistible appeal to the Christian business man. It is all only a matter of giving. Ourselves, our sons and daughters, and our money, being given, the work is potentially accomplished. Resources enough are already available if we will but apply them.

Unfortunately we have not yet learned the grammar of giving. We do not know the first principles of how to give. Is there one here to whom it would be a real hardship, an actual privation, to give one dollar in ten of his income to this cause? Scarcely one in ten of those present, I dare say, in fact gives one tenth that much. We have always been a great real stronger on doctrine than on donation. How we stifle our consciences with that ancient platitude about "giving ourselves, together with all that we have, to the Lord." It is time we learned the fallacy and hypocrisy of that excuse. What we need is from ourselves to separate unto the Lord more of what we have. Until, as individuals, we, who are not ourselves in receipt of alms, shall scorn to give for humanity less than one-tenth of what we receive; and until, as churches, they that are self-supporting shall become ashamed to expend more upon themselves than upon others, the Master will have vainly urged, "Freely ye have received; freely give."

Among the things to be considered by this convention is the subject of a better system in our giving. Many forms of Christian philanthropy claim our participation. A just apportionment among them would prevent much confusion and waste. Accord careful consideration, therefore, to the budget committee's report. The utility and importance of the annual every-member canvass by each church of its own membership, for definite separate pledges to current expenses and to united benevolences, cannot be over-estimated and must not be overlooked.

And finally, brethren, lest I weary you with much speaking, let me close with this supreme exhortation: that we pray; that we pray unceasingly; and that the manner of our prayer be even such as the Master taught his disciples:—that it be to our Father in heaven; that the name of our Lord be hallowed; that his kingdom come; that his will be done, as in heaven so on earth; that he give us bread today; that he pardon our offenses even as we ourselves forgive others; that he keep us from temptation and from the Evil One; that in our hearts and with our lips we acknowledge his eternal kingship and accord unto him all glory and honor forever.

Delegate Convention Organized

Basic Documents in Opening Proceedings at Toronto.

With practically no opposition the delegate convention plan was adopted at Toronto on Tuesday of last week. The proceedings began with a report from the Committee of Fifteen submitted by W. F. Richardson, chairman. This report as presented follows:

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF FIFTEEN.

To the General Convention of Churches of Christ, Meeting in Toronto, September 20, 1913:

At a mass meeting of Disciples of Christ held in Louisville, Ky., on Saturday, Oct. 19, 1912, in connection with the annual conventions of our Missionary and Benevolent organizations, a report was presented by the Committee on the Reconstruction and Unification of our Missionary and Philanthropic Interests. This report, which was the result of several years' careful consultation and consideration, recommended the organization of a General Convention of Churches of Christ, and submitted a constitution for its organization and government. This report and the constitution were adopted by the meeting.

In accordance with a recommendation of the above committee in its report, a Committee of Fifteen was constituted for the carrying out of this primary organization. The committee was constituted as follows:

First: One to be appointed by each of the following societies: The American Christian Missionary Society, the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, the Board of Church Extension, the Board of Ministerial Relief, the National Benevolent Association of the Christian Church, the National State Secretaries' Association.

Second: Eight others, not officially connected with any of our societies, nominated by a committee of five, appointed by the chairman of this meeting and elected by a majority vote of the members present and voting.

The chairman of the mass meeting, President F. D. Kerschner, appointed as the committee of five to choose the eight unofficial members of this committee: Peter Ainslie, J. B. Briney, Carey E. Morgan, Minor Lee Bates, Charles S Medbury These brethren brought their report before the meeting, which was adopted, and the committee constituted as follows: The eight unofficial members: W. N. Briney, J. H. MacNeill, E. B. Bagby, W. H. Book, W. C. Morro, P. H. Welsheimer, R. A. Doan and E. A. Gongwer. The seven members representing the various societies and boards were: I. N. McCash, S. J. Corey, Mrs. Ida W. Harrison, J. H. Mohorter, A. B. Philputt, W. A. Baldwin and W. F. Richardson. These all accepted their appointment, and at their first meeting, elected W. F. Richardson as chairman of the committee, and J. H. Mohorter, secretary.

The duty of this committee as defined in the report adopted by the meeting, was as follows: "The Committee thus provided shall name and constitute the officers and committees necessary for the holding of the first convention, and it shall provide for the defraying of the expenses of the same"

Your committee has endeavored by meetings of the whole, or of parts of the committee, and by extensive correspondence, to carry out the will of the brethren as expressed in their appointment, and the convention here assembled is the result. In order to prepare more adequately for this gathering, sub-committees were appointed as follows: Credentials—W. C. Morro, A. B. Philputt and Mrs Effie Cunningham; Program—W. F. Richardson, E. A. Gongwer, S. J. Corey, J. H. Mohorter and I. N. McCash; Arrangements and Finance—A. McLean, R. M. Hopkins, J. H. Mohorter, Mrs. Ida W. Harrison and W. N. Briney; Transportation—I. N. McCash.

These committees have worked faithfully, and in perfect harmony with the committees of the various societies, and to their diligent services is due much of the credit for this convention.

The committee selected the following officers to serve this convention: President, Hon. F. A. Henry, Cleveland, Ohio; Vice-presidents, Carey E. Morgan, Nashville, Tenn., F. D. Kerschner, Ft. Worth, Tex., Mrs. Florence M. Black, Louisville, Ky.; Recording Secretary, Edgar D. Jones, Bloomington, Ill.; Cor. Secretary, Mrs. Effie Cunningham, Indianapolis, Ind.; Treasurer, A. R. Teachout, Cleveland, Ohio.

Additional members of the executive committee: C. M. Chilton, St. Joseph, Mo.; Mrs. Maud D. Ferris, Taylorville, Ill.; George Darsie, Terre Haute, Ind.; Mrs. T. W. Grafton, Indianapolis, Ind.; C. J. Tanner, Detroit, Mich.; Lee W. Grant, St. Louis, Mo.; Mrs. J. E. McDaniel, Indianapolis, Ind.; Harry D. Smith, Hopkinsville, Ky.

In all its action, the committee has sought to be guided by the will of God, and to carry out the expressed wishes of their brethren who appointed them. They trust that under the blessing of Almighty God, this movement for the closer co-operation of the Churches of Christ may redound to His glory and to the larger and more rapid progress of the kingdom of God.

The action of the committee in all the matters here submitted for your approval, has been practically unanimous, and in all its counsels, the spirit of Christian fraternity has prevailed.

Trusting that the brethren and sisters thus chosen for your service may be acceptable to you, and asking your kindly consideration of our action in your behalf, this report is respectfully submitted.

Following the report above submitted the convention elected Judge F. A. Henry as its president and affirmed the constitution adopted last year at Louisville. The constitution reads as follows:

A GENEROUS GIFT.

The National Benevolent Association has just received a gift of $144,000 from the city of Omaha. This is the biggest gift yet made to the National Benevolent Association. In addition to this the city of Omaha and vicinity assures the association of over $14,000 for continued support.

This gift is in the form of an institution known as the Child Saving Institute of Omaha. The property is valued at $100,000 and has $40,000 endowment. The building was completed two years ago at a cost of $78,000. This together with the land it occupies is valued at $100,000. This is exclusive of the equipment which is inventoried at $10,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars of the endowment is to be in the form of cash, to come from an estate which is now being settled, and to be entirely closed within three years. The remaining $15,000 is in good city real estate.

The plant is located in the western part of the city at the outer edge of the best residence section and is reached by two car lines. The building is three stories besides elevated basement. It is bungalow in style, made of dark red sand pressed brick, trimmed in Bedford stone. It contains thirty-nine spacious rooms and has a maximum capacity for ninety children. The plan throughout carries an atmosphere of quality. The entire wood-work including chests, drawers, etc., is solid oak. The gas fixtures, rimmings, furnishings, and tiled roof have an esthetic air and speak of wealth.

The plant is expensively and superbly equipped. The nursery is furnished with the latest scientific adjuncts for the care of babies. This equipment includes an incubator, sun parlors and roof garden. The institute has an operating room, lighted, and equipped with sterilizers and instruments after the best hospital thought.

If we were building this plan out of our own treasury economy would demand a plainer building, but since it is a gift its splendid quality adds to our joy. The home has been in operation for more than twenty years and has established itself in the affections and pockets of the people of Omaha.

It came to the knowledge of the writer that the management was desirous of affiliating the Institute with some permanent organization that would secure economical and permanent management. After acquainting the board of managers with the plan and purpose of the Benevolent Association, a conference was arranged with Brother Mohorter and the board. The board of managers, which is composed of our best business men, investigated the management of our homes at Cleveland, St. Louis and Dallas with gratifying results. The tender was then made to the Benevolent Association.

Brother Mohorter spent the last week of September with us in which time we visited the present supporters of the Institute and were assured in every instance the present support would continue. In this manner we were assured of over fourteen thousand which is ample to care for the home.

The property, endowment, and management pass upon a gentleman's agreement which is: First, the name is to remain Child Saving Institute with such prefixes and suffixes as we may choose to indentify. Second, the general character of the work is to be after the kind now done. Neither of these conditions impose any restriction. The present name is an asset and the work now done is identical in kind with our own. Our brethren in Nebraska and Iowa are jubilant and have already pledged their support.

Brother Mohorter is to return to Omaha after the Toronto Convention and perfect the re-organization. The management is to pass Nov. 1.

We extend to the entire brotherhood the invitation, when passing through this gate city, to visit this the newest and most handsome, though not the biggest child of the benevolent family.

Clouds on a Crimsoned Dawn.*

DAWN OF A NEW DAY.

Thirty and eight years of desolate night! It was a long time to expiate the sin of rebellion and unbelief. A period of profitless wandering! A race without a goal! A battle without victory! A march without progress! Work without wages! A tread-mill tramp without ascent! Yes, but it is a true picture of the fruit of sin. Thousands are living it. No worthy purpose, no high pursuit, no permanent achievement, merely eating and drinking, sleeping and waking, and then dying. But that is not living. That is simply existing. It is merely passing the time till the call comes to judgment. It is pitiful that so large a number of people live just within reach of the land of privilege and promise that never enter. The passing of time without progress is tragedy. After years had elapsed once more the Israelites are at Kadesh, but they are not one foot nearer the Land of Promise than they were that morning thirty-eight years ago when the pillar of cloud declared the presence of God and the doors of Canaan stood ajar. Happy are those who can say at each setting of the sun, "I am one day nearer home."

CALL TO THE CRAG AT KADESH.

In the fortieth year since the first passover the dispersed clan heard, as it were, a voice in the night, crying, "The morning cometh, and the streamers of promise are crimsoning the eastern horizon. Awake, O Israel! God's new day is on! Israel's day of conquest is come! The sky is aglow with hope! Come to Kadesh and hear what Jehovah will declare and direct." Fathers and mothers have told their children of the promise. From the desert valleys, from the mountain-side pastures, from the vales and the rocky wildernesses the tribes gather in answer to the serious summons. But oh, what a change! How few of the vast throng that once before had stood on the borders of the Holy Land are here now. A generation has passed from the scenes of struggle and toil, even as Jehovah had declared. It is a sad fact that many a community has to wait for a series of funerals before a progressive program can be adopted and forward movements begun.

SHADOWS AT DAWN.

The morning sky so rich in color and call was soon clouded. "And Miriam died there." Numbers 20:1. Mountains and valleys, plains, lakes, rivers and springs, what are all these without the ties and sanctities of human life? The hamlet, the farm, the village, what gives each its significance? Birth, life and death. The place is hallowed, why? Mother died there. Father died there. That sanctifies it. "Miriam died there." Perhaps ten years older than her distinguished brother Moses, she had been singularly gifted with the spirit of poesy and prophecy. She had saved her brother from death in infancy and had sung the praises of God in celebration of the Red Sea deliverance. Once only did she turn her face from God, when she yielded to jealous impulse, and then she was humbled and repentant, and was restored to Divine favor. So the glad morning has its cloud. It does not seem permitted for any of us to pass from morn to set of sun without some shadow. We need the discipline. We need the softening effect and influence which comes from trial. We easily forget and must hear the call again and often, "Set thine house in order, for thou shalt die and not live."

THE WANT SHADOW.

Scarcely had the bereavement shadow passed when another came. Verse 2. "There was no water there." We have no record of any failing of water on the previous assembling of the people at Kadesh, but now the insufficiency of it brings great suffering. No want is more quickly felt and none sooner disastrous than the want of water. Life cannot be long sustained without it. This was what led Jesus to declare of himself: "I am the water of Life," absolutely necessary to the life that thrills with a heaven-born happiness, the life which realizes Divine purpose, the life which contributes and commands, the life which is really living. In that vast company were still some who had known of a similar experience of suffering years before. They must have remembered Marah and Elim, the place of great sufficiency, and Rephedim where God miraculously provided for their necessities.

THE COMPLAINT AND CONSPIRACY SHADOW.

"They assembled against Moses and Aaron," verse 2. The right and value of an assembly is determined by its purpose. They gathered together not to right wrong, not to receive instruction, not to pray, but to complain. We hear the same old slanders and note the same old ingratitude which characterized their fathers in the times of emergency. Their complaints are permeated with the same old hypocrisy. They accused Moses of bringing them into trouble when in reality they knew well he had been acting under Divine guidance. Their complaint was unreasonable, exasperating, threatening and imperilling. As though to emphasize the heinousness of Moses' crime they speak of themselves as the peculiarly favored of the Lord. "Why hast thou brought the assembly of the Lord into this wilderness?" It was the language of pious cant which made their accusation and complaint all the more iniquitous. They rehearsed their disappointment in not finding a place of seed-sowing and harvest, of figs, vines and pomegranates, but they make no mention of the sins which prevented their entering upon the possession where all these things were to be enjoyed. How far public assemblies should be permitted for purposes of creating disaffection it is hard to say. In our land free speech has run riot. Disturbers of the peace are everywhere speaking to get an audience that will listen to untruthful tirade, thus arousing class hatred and crime. Habitual grumblers are the despair of both state and church.

PRAYER OR DESPAIR.

"And Moses and Aaron went from the presence of the assembly unto the door of the tent of meeting and fell on their faces." Why did they go? Almost every commentator assumes that they went in the spirit of true prayer. But did they? Is it not possible that we have right here a hint as to the meaning of verse twelve: "Because ye believed not in me to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel ye shall not bring this assembly into the land which I have given them." Nothing could be more distinctly stated than that unbelief was the cause of the failure of Moses and Aaron to continue their leadership until the Land of Promise was reached. The full meaning of verse twelve is to be found in the prayerless prostration of disconsolate and despairing Moses and Aaron at the tent of meeting. Their lives had possibly been threatened and at any rate, Moses was completely overwhelmed and in consternation at the attitude of this people at this time. He was advanced in years, suffering from a fresh bereavement and was unprepared to meet such an emergency as this. He had been previously empowered and he might have been expected to speak confidently to the people assuring them that God would provide. Like Elijah under the juniper tree he was distrustful and despairing. He did not feel confident that God would meet the emergency as he had done at Rephedim. He had gone to the door of the tent of meeting it is true, but not as a hopeful, confident child of God, believing that immediate relief would come. He fell on his face in fear and doubt and this was the reason for the severe penalty which followed.

"The glory of Jehovah appeared to them," verse 6. God is wonderfully patient with weak human nature. Real need awakens Divine sympathy. As really as God answers the prayer of faith so also he rebukes doubt by making his glory to appear even when the heart wavers. The lack of faith in Moses and Aaron found its most emphatic rebuke in the Divine manifestation and the instruction which followed. In the expression of such glory, of course faith was reawakened and Moses was thus reinforced by the assurance that God was with him and encouraged to take the rod and stand again in the presence of the people. Moses is now instructed to take the rod and to go and speak to the rock in the presence of the children of Israel, with the promise that their needs would be met in the abundant flow of water.

WRONG USES OF AUTHORITY.

Misuse of power accounts for the weakness of many people. Wrong use of authority is sufficient reason why it should be cautiously given. Moses accepted the trust, but not in the spirit of contrition and humility. Verses 10-11. One of the first perils of authority is that it will produce an assumptive and presumptive attitude. Men become quickly and easily assertive especially when under provocation. Moses had abundant ground for severity in dealing with the situation, but he had no right to put himself and Aaron in the place of God and assume that the work was to be accomplished by them. This is assumed in his words, "Hear now, ye rebels; shall we bring you water out of this rock?" Again authority is misused when it is employed impetuously and impulsively. "And Moses lifted up his hand and smote the rock twice with his rod." It was done as though in petulance and passion. That is not the spirit that honors God. He might even have called them rebels if it had been in the spirit of love, for such they were. Authority is misused when accuracy of direction is disregarded. God instructed him to speak to the rock and did not instruct him to smite it. He magnified himself. He asserted his own will.

GRACE GREATER THAN GUARANTEE.

The promises of God are always exceeded in their fulfillment. "And water came forth abundantly" and the congregation drank and their cattle." Grace is God's unmerited favor. Its wonder is to be found in its overflow. Divine manifestations of love can never be defined in advance. From unexpected and unforeseen sources deliverance comes, abundance comes, satisfying sufficiency comes. A rock is about the last natural object from which we should expect water to flow, yet from this forbidding, unyielding, waterless substance God sent forth a copious supply in the hour of Israel's emergency. The want of man is rarely relieved in just the ways he expects. To the prayerful and trustful soul life is a series of surprises along the lines of Providence. From circumstances and conditions hard as the flinty rock God can cause to issue a sufficiency for every need.

THE CRIME OF DISTRUST.

Unbelief disqualifies for leadership. No man is fitted to direct his fellow men who has not that power of vision which is God-given. Only he can see the way sufficiently to guide others who is given the power of spiritual sight and insight. A bad temper is almost invariably accompanied by an untamed tongue. One cannot but sympathize with Moses in his bitter disappointment after waiting eighty years to guide this people to the Land of Promise. It is sad that he should have been lacking in that mighty faith and self mastery which would have qualified him to lead Israel across the Jordan. There was mercy in the sentence imposed. He was saved the hardship and the trial incident to the occupancy of the Land of Promise. God deals not harshly but graciously with all of his children. If Moses had reason for faith, calm and courage, how much more have we with the multiplied evidences of Divine goodness and the unlimited power of God to provide for every necessity of his children. Remember Marah, Elim and Rephedim but do not forget Meribah. Let us honor the Lord in the eyes of the world by the exercise of unquestioning faith and unhesitating obedience.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

The means of Christian growth cannot all be supplied by the church. The customs and traditions of the church are of inestimable value. We must regard them as important means of education. But we shall be lacking in essential traits of character if we call what is in the church Christian and what is out of the church worldly. Much of what has been classed as worldly and hostile to Christianity we must call Christian.

LITERATURE OF POWER.

What are we reading? Is our reading a form of dissipation or does it stimulate us and aid in the organization of our lives? It is possible for the religious man to combine recreation and study. He has or can have books that take his mind away from the cares of business and from the disappointments of life, not by putting his moral nature to sleep, but by giving him vision and faith. The supreme book of this sort for the Christian is the Bible. It introduces us to men and women who have fought the fight of faith and won. It has been thought to be a book for the cloister and its virtues have been assigned to the sheltered life. The system of interpretation that removes the Bible from common experience is vicious. The Bible is the book for the man who lives in the world and shuns none of its conflicts. Cowards have run away from hard fighting and then have tried to cover up their cowardice by perverting the sacred scriptures. Jesus lived a good part of his life in the open country. He was with the people in the villages, not with the priests in the temple. Paul was a scholar but he did not spend his ministry in searching libraries for the writings of forgotten religious teachers. He went about the streets of cities and encountered opinions that were living.

THE PUBLIC ASSEMBLY.

The public assemblies of Christians are places of worship and instruction. Their usefulness is not summed up in the word of the preacher and in the song of the choir. The fact that we come together is the important fact. Why do we thus meet? In one pew sits the man who, in our opinion, has been crooked in his business, he has robbed the defienseless, he has deceived those who trusted him. How shall we treat him in the house of God? Here is one whose besetting sin has lately overtaken and disgraced him. What feelings do we have as we hear him singing the hymns of the church? Another is present whose opinions are reactionary or revolutionary. We are compelled to think of him as we join in the worship. We need to meet these persons in the assembly of Christians. They are in the world and we have to take some attitude toward them. Of course we are bound to condemn the evil in their conduct and the errors in their thinking, but in what spirit shall we condemn? Shall we stand above them and shout down our disapproval? Then we shall be Pharisees. If we worship with them, we shall feel that we too are sinners and that we ought to stand with them and confess our faults before we denounce them. Then we shall know better the human heart.

SOCIAL SERVICE.

Social service is nothing new. We may have new conceptions of it. Honesty is a social virtue and honesty is old. We are seeing that it has a larger meaning than once we gave to it. It has long been considered a social service to tell the truth. We are learning that it is just as bad to deceive a stranger as it is a friend and that lying in the interest of a sect or a party is lying and nothing else. Some of the young people in our schools need to learn that mob violence is destruction of social order even when the mob is composed of students. The Christian is ever looking for larger applications of the truth of his religion. He ceases to be a Christian the moment he becomes satisfied with the church's understanding of the gospel and with the manner in which the gospel has been lived. (Mid-week Service, October 15. Acts 2:41; 17: 11, 12.)

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

A Low Price, Now Still Lower!

USERS of the Bethany Graded Lessons have always marvelled at the low price at which such superb literature was sold.

But this price has just been reduced to a still lower figure. In the Beginners, Primary and Junior grades the reduction amounts to 20 per cent. The price of the Bethany Lessons is now as low as, and in some items lower than, the materials of other publishers.

The reason of this is plain. The Bethany Graded Lessons are produced by the co-operation of the Disciples Publication Society with the Presbyterian Board of Publication, the Methodist Book Concern, and the Congregational Publishing Society. The immense quantities used by these great religious bodies and others make it possible to produce the very best literature ever offered the Sunday School world, and to reduce the price at the very time when some publishers are compelled not only to raise their prices but to cut down the size of many of their publications.

The practice of Christian unity in the preparation and publication of the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature is economical as well as Christian.

FORWARD WITH CHRIST!

Not "Back to Christ" our battle cry,
But "Forward!" with Him leading on,
Till on the heights our feet shall stand,

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday Schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday School literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the Church is now being ushered.

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the Society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, The Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

"We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teacher's text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy."

The Tertium Quid

It was Pythagoras who gave the world the expression "tertium quid." Here is his famous sentence: "Sunt bipes homo et avis et tertium quid." That is, "There are three kinds of two-legged animals—man, the bird and a third something." It was a very small list, only three kinds of things that walk on two legs, but hundreds that walk on four or more! Pythagoras himself must have been impressed with its contrast with the quadrupeds and the things that creep and crawl. But small as it is, few of the hearers of Pythagoras were able to feel certain that he had not made the list of two-legged animals too large. Who or what was the tertium quid?

Jamblichus affirmed that by the third something Pythagoras intended a humorous allusion to himself; but nobody knows that this is true, and even if we knew it we could not feel sure that Pythagoras was justified in making of himself a class entirely distinct from either men or the birds.

What right has a philosopher to make of himself a class, and to be neither man nor bird?

Yet the problems of life revolve around the tertium quid. It is he who keeps the course of true love from running smoothly; it is he who is the villain in life's drama; it is he who has to be eliminated before the end of the chapter in order that the hero and the heroine may find the full meaning of life in each other. But when the curtain has rung down and the hero and the heroine are happy in each other's love, again arises the tertium quid. At first it may be the high cost of living, or the strain put upon them by the effort to adjust the high ethereal quality of love to the practical demands of a world in which business must be done and three meals a day prepared. But the supremely important third somewhat makes his advent into the cradle. Then love that supposed itself to be complete with two adjusts itself to a complete realignment in the presence of the tertium quid. Man, woman, child—behold the triune family, complete in the tertium quid!

This law somehow relates itself to the whole process of life and art. It expresses itself in the composition of music with its theme, its variations, and its dacapo. It sets itself forth in the progress of a well-ordered sermon in which we await first the statement of the theme, then its exposition, amplification, and the setting forth of balanced and perhaps antithetic considerations; and finally the gathering of the lessons into a sort of climactic unity in which the truth is made to apply itself to the spiritual life of the hearer.

We may phrase it as we like; and the principle has been phrased anew by the greatest of living philosophers, Rudolph Eucken, in his analysis of human life. He sets forth this threefold scheme as that to which the normal spiritual life of man adjusts itself:

(1) The stage of nature in which life is lived under the authority of sense, expediency, and convention. This is the normal condition of the child life, conforming to the parents' religion, adopting the standards of conduct and social usage which belong to the environment, finding growth and normal development in harmony with external conditions.

(2) The negative stage in which the individual breaks with the merely natural life and comes into touch with the life of absolute spirit. This is the time when the child emerges from childhood, thinks and plans for himself, becomes a problem to father and mother, undertakes new and often trying experiments in the effort to express the force and meaning of a new life struggling into birth. This is the time when life loses itself in great enthusiasms of love, or business, or education, or politics, or possibly even religion. It is the time when the passions of altruism and quixotic dreams fill the imagination and all of life is forgotten save the one great thing that now seems supremely well worth living for.

(3) Finally, there is the reconstructive stage in which the whole of life is reckoned with, in which egoism and altruism find their balance.

Some people never go beyond the first stage. They live, perhaps, not wholly unlovable lives. They stay in the environment in which they are placed, reflecting the color of that on which they repose. They never meet any great issues, never face any great crises, but simply live. Perhaps they do not break many of the Ten Commandments. We cannot call them positively wicked, yet we know that theirs are incomplete lives.

Other lives get beyond this and enter into the conflict, but never go beyond it. They lose themselves, perhaps, in the overmastering power of temptation, perhaps in the maelstrom of business, perhaps in the follies and trivialities of society, but by whatever process they meet life's great antagonism and are mastered by it. They are lost out of the list of the triumphant. They become as those who are conformed to the world and in whom there is no triumph of heroic righteousness.

There is a third class. It is of those who, recognizing the full meaning of each of the two preceding, still discover the full significance of life in the third and crowning principle.

Internationalism and the Church

Thrilling Address Delivered Before the American Christian Missionary Society at Toronto.

BY J. A. MACDONALD.

EDITOR'S NOTE—By common consent the address of Dr. J. A. Macdonald, editor of the Toronto Globe, was the most thrilling utterance of the great convention. He began to speak at 9:30 p. m., following two extended and gripping address by Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, of Cleveland, O., on Church Extension, and Rev. Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind., on the opportunity in Russia. Dr. Sweeney had started his hearers thinking of things international and when Dr. Macdonald began to speak the wearied audience took a new lease on its energy and responded with unflagging attention until the close. The demand for the publication of this address was so great that we asked Dr. Macdonald's permission to publish it in full, a favor which he willingly granted. That the address is great is evident in the reading of it, but its full greatness only those who heard it can appreciate.

THIS great convention has its own marks of distinction. One is this: the meetings are held in Canada but the great body of the members are from the United States. On your way to this convention you crossed the international boundary, many of you for the first time. For the first time in your lives you are under another flag than your own. The very thought of it touches your imagination. In the days to come it will widen your horizons. The internationalism of this convention will help you in all other great relations to think internationally. For this reason I would have you think tonight about the Fact of Internationalism and the Responsibilities of the Church in view of the International Situation.

THE FACT OF INTERNATIONALISM.

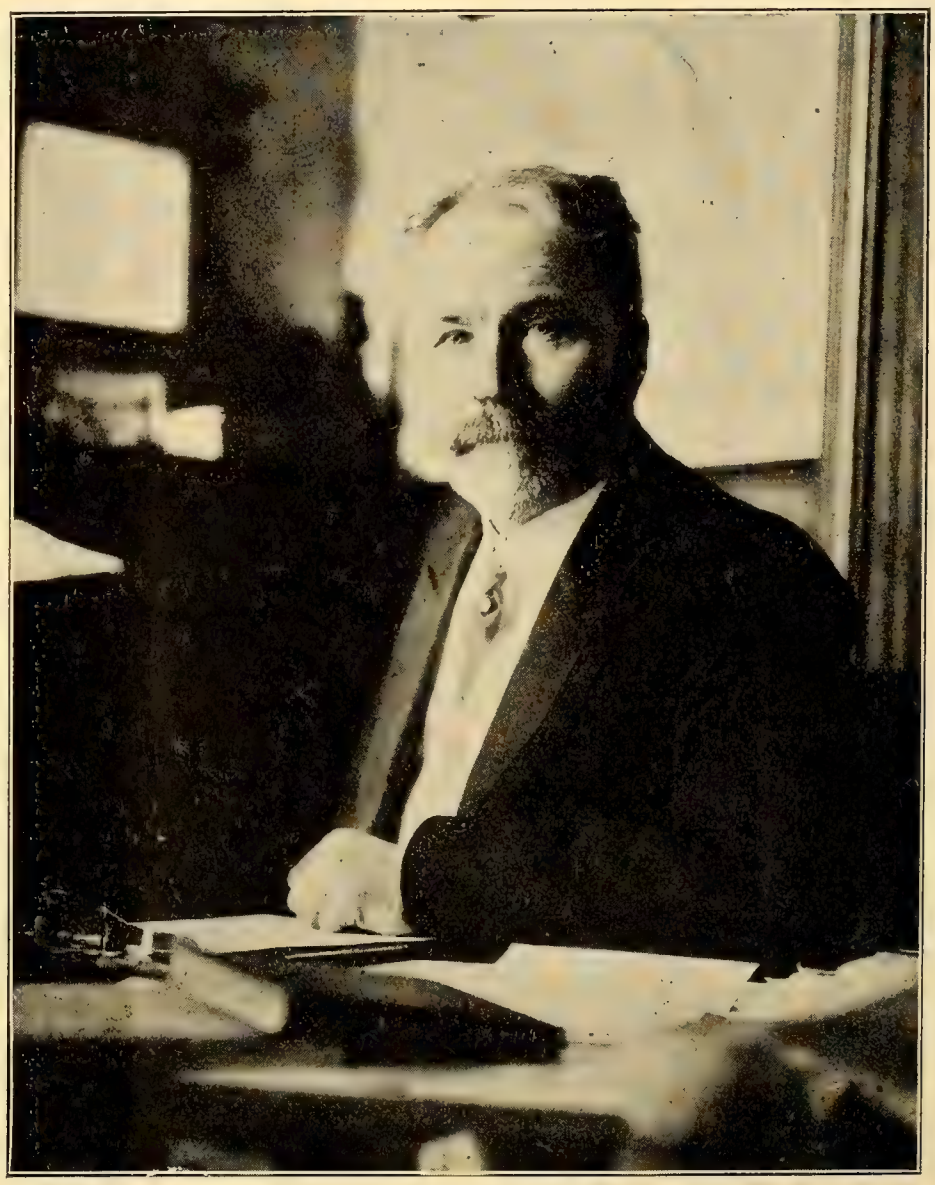
No nation ever again can live to itself or die to itself. It was once the dream of several great American statesmen that the United States would live in comfortable isolation, free from all alliances and antagonisms of Europe and the world. That dream was vain. Statesmen in Canada still protest that this dominion shall not be drawn into the mad vortex of European politics. But the world is too small. Whether we wish it or not America must stand up and be counted among the continents. It is now and must forever remain a factor in world affairs. More and more the United States and Canada must take account of the world situation.

This very occasion illustrates the fact of internationalism in America. Churches in the United States and churches in Canada here meet and mingle in one great brotherhood. The dividing line between the two countries is by no means imaginary. It is the most real and divisive fact on this continent. For four thousand miles from ocean to ocean it divides flag from flag and sovereignty from sovereignty. But the two peoples are not so divided. The people cross and recross. Their interests and ideals and purposes are interwoven. From the Rio Grande to Hudson's Bay, from Cape Breton to California, there is being created a vast international community of interests, of opportunities and of obligations, which makes America unique among the continents: one in its life, one in its responsibility, and one in its message to the world.

AMERICA'S UNIQUE SITUATION.

The most unique fact in the situation on this continent, unique and meaningful, is this fact of two sovereigns but one civilization; two flags but one people; two governments but one unbroken frontier line from Mexico to the Arctic set unalterably for the defence of our common North American inheritance.

This North American situation is indeed without parallel in all the world. You came, many of you, or you will return home, by way of Niagara, that there you may look upon America's greatest exhibit, that wonder of the world. But Niagara Falls is not the most wonderful thing America has to show. On the Zambesi River Africa could show a higher waterfall. In Mexico I saw a vast horseshoe 1,470 feet high, down which there once tumbled more than a dozen Niagaras. No, America's wonder is not Niagara. And America's greatest achievement is not any of the things about which we make our loudest boast. But in one thing this continent is without a peer, without a parallel: four thousand miles of international boundary; river and lake and prairie and mountain, with never a fortress, never a battleship, never an armed sentinel on guard. That achievement of these hundred years is unmatched anywhere else in all the world. Think what that means—that boundary made secure only by the intercivilization and the Christian internationalism of these two countries—think what that means, and often as you may cross the line and pass the officials the wonder of it, the world significance of it, will never lose its power.



Dr. J. A. Macdonald, Editor Toronto Globe.

TWO NATIONS: ONE PEOPLE.

Years ago in this city that great historian and literary man, whose name gives lustre to this whole continent, the late Goldwin Smith, was in the habit of saying that the time had come for wiping out this international dividing line. Other men have said, sometimes on one side, sometimes on the other, that this or that trade policy would work for political union on this continent. They think only on the surface who so speak. Tariff or no tariff, reciprocity or no reciprocity, free trade or no free trade, the United States and Canada are two national units. Two in their distinctive forms of government they shall remain. But our English-speaking peoples are one people, one in the thousand years of their historic background, one in their inbred passion for liberty, one in the genius of their law, one in the wealth of their literature, one in the foundations of their faith, one in the eternal purpose of the God of nations. What God has joined together let not the petty politics of man put asunder.

Does someone ask, "Why not unite the two governments in one parliament or congress of the continent?" Sir, there are wider horizons and more splendid visions even than those of America. In the defence of American civilization and in the mission of America to the world, these two nations are more impregnable and more impressive under their two flags than they would be under one.

THE TRUE INTERNATIONAL DOCTRINE.

The true doctrine of international relations on this continent was propounded to me by ex-Secretary of State Knox when he said:

"Instead of desiring the political union of these two nations, it is to the advantage of the United States that Canada remain outside the American Republic and within the Empire of Great Britain. The power of America to-day is the power of the United States and the power of Canada plus the power of Britain. Were Canada to separate from the British Empire and become either an independent commonwealth or a group of states in the American Republic, there would be for North America no plus the power of Britain."

To the people of Canada, that "plus the power of Britain" counts. It counts not only in matters of security from attack by sea, but much more does it count in national dignity, in national aspiration and in national prestige. To be the half-way house of an empire that sweeps round the world, challenges all that is best in this young dominion of the north.

AMERICA PLUS BRITAIN.

But sir, that "plus the power of Britain" counts for the United States as well. It counts every time thoughtful Americans reflect on what may some day be involved in the assertion of the Monroe Doctrine. It did count, and count for much, in one memorable crisis on Manila Bay in 1898. Not once merely or twice in the story of the Pacific has it been made plain that blood is thicker than water. Today California stands on the Pacific for English-speaking standards of life and ideals of civilization, and back of California stands the Republic; so also stands British Columbia, and back of it stands the Dominion. And in days to come, days which some of us may live to see, it may mean everything for the American Republic as well as for the Canadian Dominion, that under the Southern Cross, Australia and New Zealand, at the far gates of the Pacific, rise up in their youthful might, flying also the Red, White and Blue. The United States, Canada, New Zealand, Australia, the English-speaking quartet on the Pacific, "plus the power of Britain."

But while America and Britain and the British Dominions seem much to one another in their mutual defence, they have a message of immense importance to all the world. Is not this their message, that what has been done on this continent, and what is being done among the English-speaking peoples, may also be done on all continents and among all peoples in the great family of nations.

THE WIDER SWEEP.

Internationalism takes a wider sweep than the Anglo-Saxon fraternity. America itself is bound by ties of blood and interest to the great Republic of France and the great Empire of Germany. The early history of the United States in colonial days, and most emphatically in the great days of the Revolution, binds the Republic of France in bonds of sympathy and gratitude. The reflex of American Independence on the history of France multiplied those binding cords and made them enduring through the years. Such names as "Louisiana" and "Lafayette" awaken memories that the United States will not willingly let die. Canada on her side boasts that one-third of her population today, while they give loyal allegiance to the flag of Britain, pride themselves in the blood and traditions and language of the fair land of France. Germany, too, out of all her states has given of her best to build up the commerce, the industry, the educational institutions and the religious life of America, and both the United States and Canada are bound to the German fatherland by the Teuton blood that in America's veins mixes peacefully with the Saxon and the Celt.

RISING TIDE OF INTERNATIONALISM.

So, too, Britain itself is bound by all the vital ties whether of kinship or of association, or of inextricable financial interests with Germany, with France, with Italy, and, indeed, with all Europe. And not America and Europe alone, but the Orient as well, is being swept by the rising tide of internationalism into one great intercivilized and intersocialized fraternity of nations.

What does all this mean? It means that the people of each nation in their abundant life are outgrowing their local governments. The authority of the government stops at the shore, but the people cross and recross the seas, cover the continents with their networks of transportation and trade, weaving and interweaving a wide web of life and of sentiment and of sympathy and of ideals and of commercial relations and of financial interests; until out of all these there shall emerge international ideas, international customs, international policies, international conventions, international courts of justice and a body of international public opinion, which shall become law for all the nations.

"Till the war drum throbs no longer and the battle flags are furled
In the Parliament of man, the federation of the world."

THE FUNCTION OF THE CHURCH.

In this great world-wide movement of internationalism does the Christian church play any worthy part or know any high obligation? Sir, the Church stands in the forefront. Its very genius is international. By its original commission, by its program and its purposes and by the immeasurable range of its evangel, it is above all other institutions splendidly international. The glad tidings of Bethlehem were not for Jews alone, but "for all nations." The marching orders from Olivet, "Go ye into all the world," take no account of political divisions or local patriotism or national flags. Of necessity the state and its government are confined within the bounds of their own domain, but for the Church, "the field is the world." Into that world field the Church goes, not with any national flag or any political program, but with a pregnant idea and with the irrepressible emotion of a new life.

This is indeed the glory of the Church, this the secret of its world power; that with its pregnant idea, with its mastering emotion and with its regenerative life the Church goes to every nation and tribe and tongue, Jew to the Jew, Greek to the Greek, Oriental in the Far East, Monarchist in England, Republican in America, that it may win each for Christ, lift each to its highest self, and out of all build up that one everlasting kingdom of truth and peace and liberty into which the nations of the world shall come, bringing their glory and honor with them.

It is the duty of the Christian Church in all nations to apply without flinching the principles and the motives of Christ, not only to the hearts and consciences of individuals, but with equal directness and emphasis to that public opinion which creates national programs and controls and directs international policies of peace and of war.

THE CHURCH AND WAR.

A leading member of the British House of Commons made this declaration: "The Christian Church, if it would rise to the height of its responsibility and be really true to the message and the legacy of the Prince of Peace, has it in its hands to settle the problem of war." The voice of American statesmanship would endorse that declaration. Emphasis would be given to it from Germany. Had the churches of Britain and the churches of Germany and the churches of America—those three great Protestant world powers—had they been true to themselves and true to their supreme gospel of the kingdom during the past half century, Europe today would not be an armed camp, and the world situation east and west would not be a mockery of Christian civilization and a blasphemy against the gospel of Peace on Earth and Good Will to Men.

It is the duty of the Church to instruct public opinion as to the sinfulness of war, its wanton waste of the people's wealth, its crushing burdens on the poor, its poisoning of the nation's life and its irreparable demoralization of the manhood of the country.

It is the duty of the Church in America to repudiate impious allegations like that of the Harvard lecturer who declared that war is God's way of removing the weaklings and of securing for the nation the survival of the fittest. In all ages and through the history of all war nations the Church has witnessed through war the general reversal of the laws of evolution, the survival of the unfit, and the awful penalty of war's biological reaction.

CITIZENS OF THE WORLD.

It is the inescapable duty of the Church to train the children, as Sir Francis Vane so urgently pleads, "to become citizens of the world." That British-soldier hero of the South African war makes appeal that "the natural democracy of childhood" should be taught this indisputable truth brought home to him amid the ghastly scenes of war, "that the high color of chivalry and nobility in which war has been painted for them is really only a lie and a disguise."

And with the enormous and growing financial burdens of armed peace only a little less disastrous than actual war, it is the duty of the Church to expose and to denounce the selfishness and crime of vested interests and war syndicates, which promote war-scares that they may wax fat on the money taken from education and social reform and expended on their armour plate and dreadnoughts and implements of slaughter.

MISSIONS AND WAR.

It will make for the power of the Church and for the peace of the world if the Church recognizes and responds to the international significance of its own missionary effort. The burden of armaments will not be relieved nor the menace of war taken away until the weaker nations—weak because divided, ignorant and in bonds—are made strong, compact and free. China, for instance, creates the storm center in the Far East because China has no national unity, and, as a prize to the strong is exposed to the cupidity and aggression of the exploiting powers. Make China a national unit, with a national ideal and a well-regulated national life, and the possibility of partition is gone and the war cloud lifted forever. For more than sixty years the missionaries of the churches of Britain and of America have been sowing the seed all over the Chinese Empire. Unexpected to themselves perhaps, that seed is now yielding the abundant harvest of new ideas, not in religion alone, but in politics as well. The Christian slogan of the new China is: All China for Christ; all Christian Chinese a united Church of China, and all China itself a united Chinese Republic. In promoting the redemption and transformation of mighty China the Christian Church widens the bounds of internationalism, solves the problem of the Pacific, and brings us within sight of permanent peace.

THE PROPHECY OF PEACE.

And in these last days, when, among the nations, in the Temple of Peace at The Hague, as among the tribes of Israel in the House of the Lord at Jerusalem, there is being set up the court of international law and international justice, it is the duty of the Christian Church the world over, with Isaiah's arbitration manifesto in its hand, to call to all nations and to their governments with them:

"Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord; and He will teach us His ways and we will walk in His paths; and He shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

O house of Britain, magnifying law and order through your thousand years of struggle and blood! O house of Germany holding high the flaming torch of science and truth! O house of America, first and greatest among the republics of freedom!—three heritors of a common blood, a common faith and a common mission! Come ye, and let us walk in the way of the Lord!

ONE Thousand New Workers and Two and a Half Million Dollars for Home Missions, Foreign Missions and Christian Benevolence —this was the goal set up by the general societies of the Disciples as announced by Mr. Abram E. Cory who, with a "team" of helpers, had just completed the raising of one million dollars in pledges for foreign missions.

In a united session of the American, Foreign, Women's, Benevolent, Ministerial Relief and Church Extension Societies Mr. Cory told of the wonderful work God had wrought in the hearts of Christian business men and women the country over by the appeal of the campaign for the foreign mission million. He declared that the time had come for all our interests to make a united appeal and to enlist not our rich men alone, but the entire body of our membership in the all-around support of our unselfish enterprises.

Mr. Cory's address laid the foundations of the enterprise firmly in the providence of God. It was no device of men, he said. Men's devices have been shattered in every new stage of the development of the plan as the will of God was gradually unfolded. Mr. Cory himself confesses with penitence that his own faith at the beginning of the foreign mission task just completed was able to take in only a two hundred thousand dollar aim. He was compelled by events which he specified in detail to enlarge his own mind by a series of expansions until the million dollar mark was reached. So this new task, uniting all the societies, comes at the providential moment. And even this, the human leader affirms, is "not culminative"—it is only a footprint in God's leadership marking progress toward other and greater movements which He will develop. The main part of Mr. Cory's address follows:

MR. A. E. CORY'S ADDRESS.

IN preparing for this hour it is impossible to outline all of the steps that were necessary to prepare for it. In preparation we know that it was necessary that the African mission should raise that call which put the "Oregon" on the bosom of the mighty Congo. It was necessary that the opening of the Panama Canal should call forth the desire for $1,000,000 for our American work by 1915. It was necessary that the women should go like a conquering host across this country in their Jubilee Year. To make this movement possible it needed the clarion call of the unselfish ministry for our aged ministers and for the orphans and the needy. It needed the completion of the one million dollars in the Church Extension Fund. And finally it needed the vision which our God laid on the mission in China. First, through them, he called for $200,000 for China alone; and then step by step, in spite of the unbelief of the leaders, the vision for a million dollars was given. From nearly a hundred communities and from nearly a thousand people this fund of a million dollars has been assured for larger work in the fields beyond.

GOD WAS NOT CONTENT.

Those of us who had part in securing that fund saw only the million dollars as a goal. We were ready to stop there, and rest, but God was not content. He used one of his business men to challenge his church not to be satisfied with the raising of one million, but to go forward. Mr. W. F. Holt, of Redlands, Calif., conceived the raising of another million dollars and the forming of a Million Dollar Club that should band together the permanent givers for this world-wide cause. Mr. Holt's first aim was another million dollars, but God's aim was greater. Step by step we have gone forward with prayer. The number of societies enlisted has been increased from one to six. The original proposition saw only the Foreign Christian Missionary Society—today six societies are seeking to band together the givers for God.

Not only the needy fields beyond are calling today, but with heart-searching demand comes the call from those who are falling or have fallen in the ranks. The death of Mrs. Eldred came but a few months ago, and now comes the sad news that that stalwart man of God, Ray Eldred, has perished beneath the waters of the Congo!

STRICKEN MISSIONARIES.

James Ware, stricken with a fatal disease, has just turned his face homeward to China from America, and today he is spending the last hours beckoning for other workers. Mrs. Frank Garrett, of China, came home to America expecting treatment for an affection that seemed not very serious, but finds that in the next few weeks she must cross into that spirit land. Her note is not one of regret or of sorrow, but it is a victorious call; a call that the church shall hasten and give to those who know not Christ the assurance she has as she hovers on the margin of the spirit world. She says:

When I think of the perfect joy with which I can enter into my Father's plans for me and the perfect assurance I feel that all is well, I am appalled as I have never been before to think of the millions for whom you are working, who have not one bright hope to help them through in dark hours. People just don't know what it means until they come to test the things that are real. Tell them so, as you have opportunity, for my sake, and they may be the more willing to sacrifice a little more to help those who must go down into the valley of the shadow alone!*

DEMAND FOR FLESH AND BLOOD.

Time forbids to mention other challenges such as these. They are many. The question is: What is the demand of the hour to our churches? It is the call for flesh and blood. This call for flesh and blood is a call away from the world. It is a challenge for the saving of the Church. It is a call for the equipped. It is a call for the picked man and woman.

Recently a Christian woman taught me the real meaning of preparation. I was invited into a home to discuss with a mother the going of her daughter to China. When I went into the presence of that mother I felt I was in the presence of one of God's holy ones. The mother discussed with all calmness the going of her daughter, and then I asked to see the girl. She came in, beautiful in her young womanhood—a graduate of one of the greatest colleges in America. After some consideration of the question I asked her her age. She replied that she was 23. And then I turned to the mother and asked, "How long have you had it in your mind that your daughter should be given to China." Looking me full in the face she said, "Mr. Cory, for nearly twenty-four years. From the time this child was, she was dedicated to this holy service." I went out from that presence feeling as if I had been in the presence of the Master himself.

These thousand workers must come from those who had been dedicated from the very beginning to this service. Because of this call other thousands yet unborn shall be dedicated, nurtured and trained.

THE CALL FOR MONEY.

The call for men and women lays upon the church the call for money. We are not to go out asking that a certain sum of money shall be given—we are going out asking that workers shall be supported. The theme is not to be money, except as it shall relate itself to the work of our God and the work of his Christ. This call for a thousand workers for the world's task is to be one of the most potent factors in breaking up our provincialism as a people. It is sending us to the unified task that God is calling us to in the world's life.

As we look at the call for a thousand workers and an additional sum to all of our missionary contributions of $2,400,000, the skeptic necessarily says, "Aren't you wild?" "Isn't the aim too high?" The question is often asked, "What is it to be spent for?" Oh, what a wonderful answer! In America the millions that shall crowd our shores in the next five years from other lands, some who come without any conception of God, and all with very incomplete ideas of him—demand that we shall have an adequate part in solving the immigrant problem. It is not enough to naturalize, it is essential that we shall Christianize. The oriental problems which we seek to solve by exclusion acts and alien land laws can only be solved by reaching the Oriental in his own home, and then when he does come to us we must Christianize him. The negro problem is still important in the United States. It is demanding that the negro shall be educated, Christianized and fitted for self-support.

HOME MISSION CALLS.

I believe that the great, wide tracts of new communities in the west and northwest, practically wholly unchurched, are demanding that we shall have an adequate share in the churching of them. I believe that this Canada that must soon support on its fertile plains 100,000,000 of people challenges us to have our part in making Canada Christian indeed. The time has come when to the business man we can make no appeal to go into the over-churched community merely for the sake of a representation, but his business sagacity calls upon us to reach the man that is unreached, whether he be in Africa or in an American city. These great, unreached communities call for churches, and adequate funds must be supplied to build them, or we fail.

The tenderest appeal of this whole task is the support of the heroes who blazed the trail and made this task possible, and with it is the call for religion pure and undefiled, to care for the fatherless and the widows.

Another great home task and culminative to the work of missions and the work of our colleges is the College of Missions with its statesmanlike program for graduate preparation for these 1,000 workers that we confidently believe will be enlisted.

A VARIED FOREIGN TASK.

And then from this varied home task we turn to just as varied a foreign task. The movements in Russia and in Germany and in Poland towards a New Testament Christianity demand action now. The world runs liquid, as a great missionary leader has said, and in this hour we can mold it for our God and for his Christ, if we will. Japan, with its agnostic tendencies! India, wanting to bring its contribution of mystical religion to our Christ! Africa, with outstretched hands, calling for a multitude of workers! The battle shaping itself so definitely in Mohammedan and Catholic lands that are now emphasizing one God—the one denying our Christ, the other with false attitudes towards him. Then that call from that land which seemed forever old, but has become so wonderfully new—China—saying, "Now will you give us the gospel?"

When we look at this movement with its many features, with its many demands, with its wonderful opportunities, and then read this call for a thousand workers for the home and foreign lands, and $2,400,000, I bow my head in shame and say it is all too little. Oh, Christ! when we have boasted of our faith because we have undertaken what we think

Inaugurating the New Order

How the Representative Convention Cam e Into Existence at Toronto.

IN last week's issue The Christian Century reported the passage of the plans for the delegate convention and printed also a copy of the constitution adopted at Louisville and affirmed at Toronto. Our readers will wish to know the story as well as the outcome of that first day of the convention.

Rev. W. F. Richardson, of Kansas City, chairman of the Committee of Fifteen, presided. To this committee the Louisville Convention had committed the responsibility of arranging for the organization of the Toronto Convention on a delegate basis.

Rev. Charles S. Medbury, of Des Moines, led the devotions, reading from the Philippian letter where Paul charged the church to think on things that are true, honest, just, pure, lovely and of good report. And with great aptness of expression, he charged his fellow-Christians of this convention to be careful of their thinking. Then he led in prayer, which included the King and the President and all rulers.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF FIFTEEN.

Mr. Richardson then read the report of his committee as published in last week's issue and nominated Judge F. A. Henry for president. Judge Henry was unanimously elected and came forward taking the gavel. He announced that no distinction between delegates and visitors would be made, but that all could vote as had been the custom in previous conventions, unless their vote was challenged, in which event he would have to rule according to the constitution. He added, confidently, that he hoped no vote would be challenged.

The constitution as already published was then adopted. Previous to the taking of the vote Rev. W. H. Book, of Columbus, Ind., asked the president what was meant by the words "Churches of Christ" in the title "General Convention of Churches of Christ." Presbyterian churches and Methodist churches are churches of Christ—does it mean that they have rights to representation in this convention? It was an opportunity for Judge Henry to say, "Yes, it is the very genius of the Disciples that not only in their local churches but in their general organizations any member of a church of Christ is welcome." But considering the "trembly" feeling of the convention at that moment it was probably much more discreet for the president to say, "When such an occurrence happens on the floor of the house, I shall deal with it. But I do not intend to bother now with academic questions."

EXPLANATORY RESOLUTIONS.

After the constitution was nicely adopted Rev. Chalmers McPherson, of Texas, offered a series of resolutions explaining that the new convention disavowed any intention of exercising any authority over local churches or over any now existing missionary societies.

Rev. George A. Miller, of Washington, D. C., called attention to the fact that the passage of these resolutions meant the nullifying of the purposes for which the convention was brought into being, namely, to co-ordinate and unify our societies under a body adequately representative of the churches. Dr. J. H. Garrison supported Mr. Miller and moved that the resolutions be referred to a committee to consider certain words and phrases to which Mr. Miller had referred. The committee appointed was as follows: Dr. Garrison, Dr. Ainslie, Pres. Kershner, Z. T. Sweeney, Chalmers McPherson, Dr. McLean.

Thereupon, the General Convention, having organized itself, adjourned to meet at the call of the president to hear the report of this committee.

GHOST NOT YET DOWNED.

Everybody thought the ghost of the delegate convention discussion had been downed, but when on Wednesday afternoon President Henry called the Convention in special session, it appeared again. The opposition evidently had gotten its heads together and came up with substitute resolutions which were quickly laid upon the table, and with some good speeches that were not so easily disposed of. W. K. Azbill, of Cleveland, made a strong argument and got in a long speech without interruption before the three minute ruling was made by the president, and he seemed to be making real dents in the armor of the dominant side. Other speakers followed, and while the indulgent Chair gave greater license to the opponents than the proponents of the new order, the vote was passed overwhelmingly in favor of the following explanatory resolution:

"Whereas fears have been expressed by some that the convention organized on the basis of the representatives of local churches co-operating through said convention may be a step toward a species of ecclesiasticism contrary to the history, spirit and aims of our movement, now therefore be it resolved by the representatives of the churches in convention assembled that no such purpose is contemplated, nor would it be possible under the constitution we have adopted.

"Resolved further that we positively disclaim any desire or intention that this convention should ever exercise any control over the freedom or autonomy of the local church and that this constitution claims no authority greater than or different from that which has always been recognized in our convention, which is not mandatory, but purely advisory, whether it be in relation to congregations or any missionary, educational, philanthropic or other organization."

FARCICAL OPPOSITION.

The Christian Century does not in this place express a judgment as to the ingenuousness of this resolution. We are now reporting only the facts as they occurred. On the following day a meeting was called of those opposed to the organization of the delegate convention. Perhaps 300 persons were present, five-sixths of them being declared ineligible to vote on any question because they were not "opposed." Z. T. Sweeney declared that he had labored in the committee for four hours to pull the last fang and tooth of the new scheme and it was now as "harmless as a last year's bird's nest." W. H. Book counselled that the new plan be given a fair trial. The meeting was a farce. It lacked both leaders and followers. It adjourned without action.

The General Convention met again on Monday afternoon, Oct. 6. Committees were appointed and the date and place of the next Convention—Atlanta, next October—were fixed upon.

Russia Annexed to Mission Task

Dr. Z. T. Sweeney Reports His Visit to the Czar's Empire and Wins Convention With His Address.

THE sentiment awakened by the presence at the Louisville convention last year of two delegates representing the evangelical Christians of Russia came to a practical issue at Toronto. Rev. Z. T. Sweeney, of Columbus, Ind., who had recently returned from a visit to Russia made a telling speech describing the character of these brethren, their origin and their persecutions. Dr. Sweeney was at his best. He was not simply making a speech, but seemed bent on getting something substantial done. A great screen hung above his head on which an assistant threw pictures of General Pashkoff, the founder of the movement in Russia, the general's palace which is now used as a government museum, Rev. I. S. Prokanoff, the present leader of the evangelical Christians, and other pictures. Of Mr. Prokanoff Dr. Sweeney said:

"When he began to preach the primitive faith he was a highly esteemed professor in one of the imperial universities. When confronted with the alternative of giving up his preaching or resigning his professorship, he gladly relinquished his position in the university that he might "keep the faith." He is today regarded by professors and students as one of the best authorities on Russian literature in the Empire. Mr. Prokanoff is not yet forty years old, and is one of the finest specimens of physical, intellectual and spiritual manhood it has ever been my pleasure to see. He is a tireless worker, ever at work. I remarked to him one day that he should take more exercise, and suggested that he walk. He quietly remarked, "I have not time to walk unless it is on the Lord's business." I replied, "It is very fortunate that you have so much vigor." His answer was, "It is God's mercy." He reminds me more of Isaac Errett than any man in my acquaintance. He is a great organizer and has a supreme faith that God is a partner in his plans."

The enormous possibilities before the Russian people were depicted in eloquent words, and a summary of the points of the address was given as follows:

"The Gospel Christians are as emphatic and insistent upon New Testament Christians as the Christians of the United States.

"They have a very large measure of sympathy among the most influential and powerful people in the Empire. This is due primarily to the great influence and popularity of General Pashkoff, who laid the foundations of the work.

"This sympathy has been fostered and nourished by the wise and diplomatic conduct of the present leader, Ivan S. Prokhanoff. By his prudence and caution he has convinced those in authority that no menace to the government will come through the prosperity of the "Gospel Christians.' The Emperor with his own hand has given recognition to them that he has given to no other dissenting body.

"The Gospel Christians have a fine organization—better than anything we have in this country—and they work in perfect harmony. There was not a hint of clash between rival leaders or factions.

"All they need is a little of the 'sinews of war,' that could be so easily supplied out of our abundance. One hundred thousand dollars put into Russia in the next ten years would develop a half-million Evangelical Christians in less than a quarter of a century."

At a later session Dr. Sweeney spoke again and the audience fell in so heartily with the suggestion to do something for Russia that it was indicated another one hundred thousand dollars would be added to the $2,400,000 which the "Men and Millions Movement" is undertaking to raise, making an even two and a half millions.

The Christian Century heartily believes in this Russian mission as a thing of far-reaching possibilities.

THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL AT TORONTO.

That the Sunday school has passed from the emotional stage of its renaissance, and has entered definitely upon a constructive period was plainly evident in the Sunday school sessions at Toronto. There was nothing of the old time hip-hip-hurrah features in the convention, and yet there was a real enthusiasm throughout all the Sunday school sessions. It was the quiet enthusiasm that characterizes a well-managed engine rather than that of a jack-in-the-box.

The work at the convention of Robert M. Hopkins, national Sunday school secretary, Myron C. Settle and Garry L. Cook, state secretaries, W. C. Pearce, international adult Bible class secretary, and others was characterized by a constructive motive. Mr. Hopkins, in his annual report, laid the emphasis, not on parades, contests, large classes, etc., but on more efficient methods of teaching and study. Mr. Pearce began his banquet speech with the following words, "What shall it profit the Sunday school if it gain the whole world in its membership, and lose its own soul?" And he closed with the same thoughtful question. He spoke upon the necessity of right teaching, right living, on the part of the Sunday school's membership. In the "Demonstration Sunday School," held on Sunday morning, Mr. Pearce served as teacher, and put into practice in his original way the principles he advocates in institute and convention.

Austin Hunter spoke in an interesting way of the opportunity of the Sunday school among new Americans. As Mr. Hunter is definitely engaged in mission work, especially among the Russians, in Chicago, he knew what he was talking about and consequently held the interest of all who heard him.

The work of Miss Hazel Lewis, elementary superintendent, Miss Maus, Mr. Stevenson, Mr. Hutchinson and Scott Cook was practical and helpful.

EARLY MORNING PRAYER.

At 9 o'clock each morning in the banquet room of the King Edward Hotel, a prayer-meeting was held. A new leader guided the devotion each morning, but A. McLean was the inspiring conductor of the whole series. Suggestions for each day's supplications were printed in the official program. From these devotions there radiated a refining and uplifting influence throughout the entire convention.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR PROGRESS.

Any one who imagines the Christian Endeavor movement is "done for" should have been present at the Endeavor Session on Sunday evening. The bright, enthusiastic speeches made by members from the floor during the prayer meeting led by H. A. Denton carried one back to the good days when the movement was at high tide. Indeed, if one is to believe the statements of Claude E. Hill, national Christian Endeavor superintendent for the Disciples, and the outright evidential facts from Dr. Clark, one might think that the "best days of all" are just ahead.

Mr. Hill, in his annual report, laid emphasis on the fact that Christian Endeavor stands for the fundamental things—loyalty to church, daily devotional Bible reading, prayer, and spiritual living. He declared his faith in the future of the movement, and expressed his hope that very soon an Endeavor secretary would be put into the field for his entire time.

When Dr. Clark, Christian Endeavor's founder, came forward, introduced by Mr. Hill, no one had to tell the audience what to do. Handkerchiefs came forth, and the inevitable Chautauqua salute was given the honored society president. Dr. Clark at once got the good will of the Disciples present by declaring that that fellowship, more than any other, had received the Endeavor idea with open heart.

It was a matter for regret that A. B. Philputt, who was to give an address on Endeavor night, was called to his home in Indianapolis just before the hour of meeting.

BROTHERHOOD BANQUET.

Four hundred men packed themselves in a banquet hall to hear Oliver W. Stewart tell why men should hold the saloon a moral enemy and an outlaw, to hear Mr. J. Campbell White tell of the great awakening among men on behalf of missions, and to hear the presidential address by Judge Haymaker, of Wichita, Kan. The last named made a splendid contribution to the body of conviction upon which the Brotherhood rests. Mr. White deeply stirred the masculine enthusiasms for Christion world conquest and Mr. Stewart carried his audience off its feet with his invincible argument and convulsing humor.

MR. A. E. CORY'S ADDRESS.

is a great task, are we not faithless after all? But in spite of the fact that it's all too little, how faithless we are! How frequently we are asking the question, "Haven't you got all the money that there is?" "Are there others to give?"

Only three gifts have been made to this movement. We have not tried to solicit. One person has offered the magnificent gift of $100,000 as a starter—one-twentieth of this task! Another person has set aside a portion of an estate—that means at least $75,000 for Christ's work. And then comes this man, Mr. Holt, of Redlands, Calif., who realizes the objections that are often made to the spending of money for promotion, and says he is going to give $500 a month for the expenses of this movement, which will care for the organizing expenses. I believe that other men will join him, and not one dollar of the burden of this expense will come from the societies. What a remarkable seal God has put upon this movement before it is started—practically one-tenth of all that we are seeking for has been given by three people! And think of the great unnumbered multitudes of this fellowship of nearly a million and a half, who have not had an opportunity, who will respond gladly.

THE UNITED APPEAL.

Six societies, yes, and for the first time friends, in the history of our people the essential unity of our people is to be demonstrated. It is not by the resolutions of conventions—as worthy as they may be—but by the joining in a common task. I believe that at no time nor in any hour since the Declaration and Address has the essential unity of our work been more clearly demonstrated than at this time when these six great missionary organizations are going out with but one word written upon their banner, "The Unity of the Work in Christ."

At first when we got together it was our idea that there should be certain representatives from each society upon the team, but gradually as we went forward the representation of societies disappeared, and we have decided to make the call for the work. When the call is made it will be for the work in China, for the work in India, for the work in America, and not for the work of any society. It is for the united work of the Church that this Men and Millions Movement is calling.

At the Communion Service

Reverent Throng Hears, Worships, Gives.

AS usual the largest attendance at any session of the annual convention was on Sunday afternoon at the communion service. Massey Hall, seating 4,000 people, was never packed full during the convention, but it came near being so when the disciples met together to break bread. R. W. Stevenson, pastor of St. Clarens Ave. Church, Toronto, presided at the table. He was assisted by elders and deacons of local churches. The emblems were distributed with celerity and dignity. Over 3,000 individual communion cups were used.

For the first time in recent years a place was given for an address preceding the breaking of bread. Edgar DeWitt Jones, of Bloomington, Ill., spoke on "Ministering to the Minister," his words leading up to an offering for ministerial relief. Mr. Jones began with this discrimination: Our Lord came not to be ministered unto but to minister; nevertheless he was ministered unto. "Kind hands wrought for him, stout hearts supported him, hospitable homes oft sheltered him, and Mary's shattered vase was a token of the love she bore him. Humanly speaking the ministrations Jesus received made possible his ministry and without them his ministry could not have been." He continued:

THE DREADED "DEAD LINE."

"A church that fails to minister to the ministry will soon be without a ministry to minister to the church. The story of the aged or disabled minister's plight is more than a twice told tale. Press and platform have given the story a thousand several tongues to tell in pitiless detail of the awful 'dead line,' that dreaded spectre of the minister's soul and the gaunt, lean wolf of disability that haunts continually the frontiers of his dreams by day or night. The story is only too well known, too harrowing and too true.

"Some sensitive souls of our thin grey line of heroes when compelled to listen to the necessary array of facts and figures have gone into Gethsemane and bled inwardly the while. Our younger preachers have listened to the story of the old minister's tragedy with a great fear coming upon them and a nameless dread like a sinister storm cloud overshadowing them. And other young men, not of the ministry, but to whom the church must look for ministerial recruits, have heard or read the story with sheer amazement and a rising flush of shame and indignation suffusing their cheeks.

"That this tragedy of the old or disabled minister has cheapened Christ's church in the eyes of many and supplied poison to tip the arrows of the enemies of our Lord is a matter of common knowledge. It is not, however, this story itself that so discourages and saddens—it is the fact that familiar as this story is, it has moved so few to right the wrongs it discloses."

Mr. Jones advocated the plan of ministerial pensions as a superior plan to that of ministerial relief. He cited the new sense of responsibility for their salaried employes now being manifested by industrial corporations. The Protestant Episcopal, the Methodist Episcopal and the Presbyterian denominations, he continued, are now engaged in collecting $10,000,000 each to serve as an endowment fund for pensioning superannuated ministers. He said:

"The difference between ministerial pensions and ministerial relief is the difference between formation and reformation; is the difference between the proverbial 'ounce of prevention' and the 'pound of cure.' To care for our ministry at the 'fag end' when our veterans are world weary and laid aside, is good, but to assure them at the beginning of their labors that a grateful brotherhood will provide for their old age or disabilities is incomparably wiser. When men continue to fall off a precipice over which they must necessarily journey, two remedial measures are possible. One is to have an ambulance at the bottom to carry the maimed and dying to a hospital; the other is to build a wall at the top. As a brotherhood we have not yet begun to build a wall at the top and we have sometimes seemed inexcusably slow with the ambulance at the bottom.

"In our own planning for a more generous provision for our ministry with the pension plan as the ultimate solution, we do well to remember that ministerial pensions among Episcopalians and Presbyterians had their origin in ministerial relief. Beginning as a first aid to the injured, their boards have become conservers of the ministry from the zest of youth's heydey to stressful middle age and life's twilight period of sunset and evening star.

"As it has been with these communions and others that have carried the provision for their aged ministers from the realm of pity into that of justice, so will it be with our communion if we are not disobedient to the heavenly vision. Our Board of Ministerial Relief is the necessary first stage toward the pension plan and our achieving of the latter goal depends upon our full fidelity to the former. It becomes, therefore, our imperative duty first to care for every veteran, every widow, every orphan who is in need."

A SPECIAL ELDRED FUND.

Dr. Royal J. Dye, missionary to Africa, followed Mr. Jones. He recited the salient facts in the missionary history of his colaborer on the Upper Congo, R. Ray Eldred, news of whose drowning was received in this country but a few days before the convention. Mr. Eldred left three boys fatherless and motherless. They are now at the home for the children of missionaries at Hiram, O. Again and again it had been declared that these were "our" boys now, that we must see to it that they are given an education and supported to the time of their maturity. It was announced by Secretary Warren that one delegate had indicated his intention to put $1,000 into the collection plate that afternoon as a special gift to the Eldred children. When the offering for the afternoon was counted it was found to be $3,571.10, of which amount $2,349.05 goes specifically to the Eldred fund.

The largest previous convention offering was made in the Centennial Convention at Pittsburgh, and amounted to $2,-619. At Louisville last year the offering was $9.53. This is not only a signal beginning of the new year in the amount, but is especially significant in its emphatic uniting of ministerial and missionary service.

DISCIPLES IN ENGLAND.

IN Great Britain there are two groups of churches related to the movement started by the Campbells in the interest of Christian unity. The larger body reports 202 churches, 15,256 members, and an increase during the past year of 478. This company has no regular ministry, and allows only members in good standing to have part in the communion service and the financial support of the churches.

The smaller body, in co-operation with the churches of the Disciples in America, has just held its annual conference at Birkenhead, opposite Liverpool. Their churches number seventeen, they have a total membership of 1,798 and a Sunday-school enrollment of 1,680, with an increase in church members of 108 during the year.

In his presidential address, Rev. E. H. Spring of Gloucester, speaking to the theme, "An Appeal for Reality," said:

> The worship of the Authorized Version of the Bible must cease. In its place must come an honourable and frank acknowledgement, so far as the Old Testament was concerned, that there was no demand by it for a hard and literal acceptance of its teachings as binding on the age, but that it was for use as the best and purest understanding of the men who wrote and edited the books and sent them forth for the spiritual enlightenment of the times in which they lived. Whether this or that writer wrote a particular book, whether a sentence in the Gospels was that of Jesus or the writer, whether a certain miracle was performed or not, were really matters of comparative indifference, so long as they recognized that in the Bible they had enshrined in living power the clearest progressive revelation of the nature and character of the eternal God and His thoughts and purposes towards men.

A strong plea was made for the establishment of a college, or an alliance with some existing foundation, by which young men could be prepared for the ministry of the Disciples, without the necessity of going to America for the purpose, as they rarely returned to ministerial work in England.

Rev. Lester W. Morgan, of Hornsey, London, the Secretary, presented the annual reports. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Coop and their son attended the Toronto Convention of the Disciples as the official representatives of the Christian Association of England.

DR. JAMES ORR.

THE death of Dr. James Orr of Glasgow occurred a few days ago. He was Professor of Apologetics and Theology in the United Free Church college, a position he held from the date of the union of the Free Church of Scotland and the United Presbyterian Church, in 1901. He was in his seventieth year.

Dr. Orr was a stout defender of the older orthodoxy of Scotland. He contended valiantly for the bold supernaturalism of the last generation. His books on "The Virgin Birth" and "The Resurrection," which first appeared serially in "The Expositor," yielded nothing to the constructive discussions of the last decade.

Perhaps the book by which he was best known on this side was his "Problem of the Old Testament," which remains the best popular exposition of the conservative view of the older scriptures. This book was written in the spirit of candor and fairness which characterized all his work, and that very spirit compelled him to make concessions to critical views which rendered the volume far from satisfactory to the aggressive opponents of the critical conclusions.

While carefully pointing out what he regarded as the extremes into which certain critics had been betrayed, he perhaps unconsciously revealed his conviction that the fundamental positions of the critical school were valid. And even on details he often went far toward the frontier, as when he remarked that "few persons would now be disposed to take literally the account of the making of Eve out of the rib from Adam's side, while he slept."

No doubt his most valuable work was his "Christian View of God and the World," written many years ago.

In the great work of uniting the two bodies of Scotch Presbyterians he had a conspicuous and honorable part. His loss will be keenly felt by colleagues and students alike.

AN ARCHAEOLOGIST.

PROFESSOR William M. Ramsay, the eminent authority on New Testament archeology, has just closed a visit to some of the educational institutions of this city, his principal theme being the travels and labors of the Apostle Paul.

He is about seventy years of age, somewhat below the average stature, quite gray, and speaks from notes in a somewhat hesitating manner.

In an address at the University of Chicago, he outlined the growth of his New Testament interests from the time when as a student of the humanities he was ploughed in an examination at Oxford to the present time, when he is recognized as one of the foremost authorities on the Book of Acts and the Epistles of Paul.

It was by way of excavation work and the study of the antiquities of Asia Minor, and especially the vicinity of Iconium, that he receded from the radical views of the extreme school of New Testament criticism, which placed the Book of Acts in the latter half of the second century, to the position of defender, alone with Harnack, of the historicity and accuracy of the book, and its origin in the apostolic age.

Sir William Ramsay is well known as the author of the South Galacian theory of Paul's travels, which is now generally accepted, and has changed most of the maps of the apostle's journeys. His works on "St. Paul the Traveler and the Roman Citizen," "The Bishopries of Phrygia," "The Letters to the Seven Churches," and other Pauline themes are standard.

PRESIDENT HARPER'S FAITH.

A FEW days ago a friend asked if it was really true that in his last hours, President Harper modified his religious views. The question revived the memory of the story started by the minister of a well-known north side church in this city, a man widely known as an evangelist, and now the pastor of a church in London. It was to the effect that in the presence of death the famous educator sent for a ministerial friend and renounced his critical views of the Bible, saying that he had turned again to the faith of his childhood.

When this story was told soon after Dr. Harper's death, his friends took steps to have it corrected. A letter was written to the minister who stood sponsor for the statement, calling his attention to its utter falsity and injustice. He made no response either to this or a later and more vigorous protest. And to this day the story reappears from time to time.

The truth is that no man of this generation has possessed a more serene and undisturbed Christian faith than Dr. Harper. It was based on both experience and study. It grew in depth and serenity. It would have been as impossible for him to return to the faith of his childhood as to go back again to the science, art or music with which he had been satisfied in childhood. He came by question and investigation to a faith that was unquestioning and complete. No man who had the least acquaintance with him or regard for truth could intimate either the slackening of his scholarly interests to the very end, or any modification of the deep and tested foundations of his belief.

THE FOREIGN COUNT BUSINESS.

HERE is something which happened in the city of Chicago in the autumn of the year 1913, and that is not very long ago.

A reputable attorney went to the office of a large corporation which does business not only in America but in foreign lands and asked for information concerning their representative in Germany, who was alleged to have died, leaving $50,000 to a young German count, now resident in America, who had been his intimate friend on the other side of the water.

The information was very easily obtained, and it took less than half a day to learn all the essential facts. The German representative of this American corporation was not dead, but quite capable of responding to a cable message in which he said that he had never met the young man in question, but found that he had been for a short time employed as a clerk in one of the branch houses in Germany, but had been dismissed for cause and had gone to America.

This clever, educated young German, capable of earning $50 to $75 a month as a book-keeper and leaving Germany partly because he had lost his job there and partly because he was due for military service and wanted to escape it, had come to this country and being of good address and after considering how he could dispose of himself to the best advantage, he laid siege to the heart of an American girl, who had some money and told her a very plausible story, including that of his intimate friendship for this prominent American business man who had recently died in Germany, leaving him $50,000.

There is only one thing unusual in this story, and that is that the girl's father was sensible enough to pay a good lawyer $50 to look the matter up before giving his consent.

As we before remarked, this happened in the city of Chicago, in the year of our Lord 1913, and in the latter half of the month of September, and that was not so very long ago. If this incident teaches any lesson, American daughters and their parents are welcome to it.

Impressions of the Toronto Convention

WITH the Toronto Convention the work of the Disciples passed into a new and significant phase. It was the first truly international gathering of our churches. It was the first one held on British soil. It was the first one at which the delegate plan assumed definite proportions.

For the delegate basis of convention organization took on reality. It should have been realized years ago. The Disciples long since passed the chaotic age of mass meetings, but had not quite the courage to lay aside the garments and behavior of early youth. Now the step has been taken, and it is a certainty that no retreat to the outgrown order will ever be taken.

Another long step forward was made in the closer articulation of the various boards of missions and philanthropy, and the adoption of a budget plan for the offerings from the churches. By this means it is believed that much of the friction and lost motion of the older independent method will be avoided. It will be an economy in administration, a release of part of the secretarial force to new tasks, and a relief to the churches.

The impression made by the convention upon the people of Toronto, and other attendants outside of our own circles, was distinctly favorable. With the exception of one or two regrettable episodes, the convention proceedings were such as to confirm in any unprejudiced mind the conviction that the Disciples are an active, vigorous people, not too mature to be enthusiastic, yet sufficiently seasoned by experience to possess the dignity and poise of a great and serious purpose.

For the most part the addresses were of a high order. Some of them were classic. Those of several of the younger men revealed rare depths of religious feeling, and a high degree of power in utterance. With few exceptions the messages were carefully prepared, and though few were read, they would not have suffered from the use of the manuscript, so admirable was their form.

The visitors summoned to bear special testimony on particular themes were chosen with discretion, and well fulfilled their tasks. Such men as J. Campbell White, Francis E. Clark, Pres. Stewart, Dr. Meade, Dr. Nicholson and Dr. Macdonald left lasting impressions on the minds of all who heard them, lifted to high levels the themes assigned to them, and definitely widened the bounds of our Christian fellowship.

The importance of Christian education was stressed as at no previous convention of the Disciples. Not only were the vital values of this section of our work presented in open convention, and the deficiencies of our present response to the demand made clear, but in the gatherings of college alumni, and in the inter-sessional meetings of the educational leaders new enterprises were outlined and new campaigns foretokened that ought to put hope in the heart of every believer in our future. After many days of seemingly unrewarded effort, our educators begin to see the signals of promised help in the prosecution of their task.

The reports and addresses presented at the sessions of our three great societies, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, and the American Christian Missionary Society, were inspiring. Mrs. Atwater and A. McLean, the presidents of the two former, are choice spirits, the pride and the joy of all Disciples, and President Miller, on whom the choice of the Home Society fell for the past year, upheld worthily the traditions of that office.

Yet there is one thing lacking in the annual programs of our three most important boards. They present to us a large volume of facts relating to their work, but they do not give us at any point a unified and telling interpretation of their work as a whole. It is otherwise with the less conspicuous boards. The interest of church extension was presented in a message of rare insight and effectiveness that laid the entire field of the society, with its dominating purpose, clearly before us. The Board of Ministerial Relief made a strong impression by the earnestness and scope of its representative. The Temperance Board gave the brotherhood banquet the rare treat of a powerful and entertaining discussion of its basic ideals. And so of the Commission on Unity, the Sunday School Board and Christian Endeavor.

But nowhere in the program of the Woman's Board was there an address which interpreted, not merely the labors of our own women, but the vast enterprise of Christian womanhood in behalf of the Kingdom of God. Nowhere in the sessions of the Foreign Society was there a broad and leaderlike survey of the world-thrilling adventure of Continental Missions. Nor was there presented at any moment in the deeply interesting proceedings of the Home Board a vision of American frontiers, waiting to be pushed out by advancing lines of evangelism.

We are all deeply interested in the survey of our own missionary fields and forces. But somewhere in our conventions we need to be taken up to great heights of outlook, where, rising from details to distances, from incident to interpretation, from particulars to principles, we may have flung before us a panorama of the work of God in our generation, and have disclosed to us our place therein.

Perhaps we came nearest to this feeling of exaltation in the session devoted to the Men and Millions Movement. Here, as in the morning prayer meetings and at the communion service, we were lifted to new levels of vision, and saw our task in clear perspective. And here, too, we felt near at hand the presence of the Leader and Brother of us all, whose voice calls to new consecration and new achievement.

HERBERT L. WILLETT.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I HAVE just returned home from the convention at Toronto and my heart and mind are so full of the experience and my reflections upon it that I find it impossible to write on any other theme. I imagine, Mr. Editor, that you will devote so much of this issue of The Christian Century to the report of the convention, and will have so many things to say yourself in comment upon it that you would prefer your department contributors to choose other subjects. But if I am, on this page, simply to "think out loud," as you once described your idea of my function, I can write of nothing else, for at the end of this particular day I can think of nothing else.

How strong is the bond that holds the followers of Christ together! How rich is the life we share in common in the Church of God! I think over the relationships I enjoy in other spheres of this varied life of ours—in business, in clubs and lodges, in reform movements, in scholarly pursuits—but in not one is there the intimacy, the tenderness, the brotherly loyalty, the sense of reality, that obtains in the fellowship called "the communion of saints."

THERE have been moments in my life, I confess, when vagrant promptings come to me to shake myself free of any vital connections with the brotherhood in which I was born, and to go on about my vocation without concern for the struggle going on within the brotherhood to adjust itself efficiently to its great task. There have been moments when the struggle presented itself to me in its aspect of coarseness, its virulence, its pettiness, its bigotry, its selfishness. It would be whispered in my soul that the Disciples were no better than others, that their plea for unity was a piece of unconscious hypocrisy, that they were a stiff, dogmatic sect, and that instead of helping the cause of Christian unity they would themselves be one of the last sects to be converted to it.

But I have never been able to entertain these promptings more than an instant. There would always come an uprush of feeling, as from innumerable springs, drowning out such suggestions as disloyal to the friendships and the ideals which are more dear to me than my own self.

I could not lose my interest in and profound affection for A. McLean, J. H. Garrison, B. B. Tyler, E. L. Powell, H. L. Willett, Z. T. Sweeney, W. F. Richardson, Peter Ainslie, J. H. Fillmore—and where could I stop if I should start to set down the names of my junior brethren?—if I would. They are true brothers to me, and fathers, bound to me by a tie that is stronger than death. I read their words; I watch their movements through the years; I note with deep solicitude each time I meet them what marks time is leaving on their faces and in their bearings. They belong to me; they are part and parcel of my personality; my life would be hollow and bitter were I to shut them out from my soul.

And as for the Disciples as a people, this one thing is sure, that whether or not they are altogether on the right track now, they were started on the right track a century ago by Thomas Campbell, and there's nobody else in Christendom on the track on which he started them then!

MY thoughts this evening have engaged themselves in the task of defining what I regard as the most important aspect of the Toronto convention. No doubt most people will say that the displacement of the individual unit in the constitution of our conventions by the congregational unit was the most important feature. I cannot agree that this was a matter of outstanding significance. On the whole, I think I am in favor of the change—at any rate, I voted for it—but I do not regard it as of so great importance as either its violent opponents or its ardent champions seem to consider it.

Besides, my thoughts are thrown into confusion by the "explanatory resolutions" adopted by the new organization. I confess I do not see what real work there is left for the "General Convention" to do now that it has disavowed any intention of controlling the affairs of the existing missionary and benevolent societies.

I would much have preferred the tabling of these resolutions, so that the churches, through their Convention, might have been left free to do whatever they might wish to do, and what they inevitably will do, without precipitating again an absurd discussion over "ecclesiasticism."

WHAT impressed me most at the convention was the ever recurring mystical note in the addresses. There was no diminution of the militant note—it rang out in the reports of victories already won and in the triumphs which by faith we saw yet ahead. We are still a people of unexhausted energy. But we are becoming increasingly a mystical people.

The speakers to whom we listened most gratefully were they who interpreted the invisible to us. I think I can discern in the speech of our younger leaders the influence of the great devotional writers. Amiel's journal has been absorbed by many of them and the devotional literature of the modern Church has woven itself into their thinking.

No single feature of the program at Toronto stands out in my after-vision of the Convention like the series of five addresses arranged by the Foreign Society on the general theme of "Fellowship with Christ."

PRES. F. D. Kershner is known to us as a teacher of theology and a writer of polemical articles. But he revealed a rare spiritual experience, mystical, almost pietistic, in his address on fellowship with Christ in Service.

Rev. George A. Campbell has long been to those who know him a fertile source of suggestion in the things of the spiritual life. He knows his own soul. He feels life vividly as a spiritual reality, and he richly illuminated the fact of our fellowship with Christ in Life.

Prof. W. C. Bower teaches religious education in a college and directs it in the Sunday School department of a great church. With deep discernment he unfolded the mystery of Suffering as finding its ultimate explanation in our fellowship with the Crucified.

Rev. J. H. Goldner—of whom the convention president once said in private conversation that he at first wondered if his new pastor was big enough man for the church but now, after more than ten years' intimate acquaintance, wonders if Euclid Avenue Church is big enough for the pastor!—disclosed the secret of his deep, strong hold upon his great church by his illuminating study of the disciple's fellowship with his Lord in Prayer.

And Rev. Carey E. Morgan, an apostle of graciousness and spirituality preached on Sunday morning to a great throng in Massey Hall on fellowship with Christ in Victory. One who was present and who uses words with a full knowledge of their meaning said it was a "blessed service."

SUCH themes! Such men! No tumult and shouting here. No boisterous boasting, no logic chopping, no proposition proving, no pedantic text weaving. But the illumination of the one great Fact of Christian experience, the Fact of our life hid with Christ in God!

Such a note—such a full chord—struck with increasing fullness and resounding through and through our brotherhood's thought and life brings to my soul infinitely more satisfaction than anything else I got from the convention.

I thought I discerned in the address of Dr. Scoville, the evangelist, a truer, saner striking of this note than I had heard in him before. He had upon him the hush of recent bereavement and of much physical suffering. He spoke with self-control and there was more spiritual substance and character in what he said, and less of forced and irrelevant illustration. Would that our evangelists might all learn to walk the mystic path of deeper reality!

Dr. Medbury, on the closing night, said, among many other lucid interpretations of the convention, that we were becoming "less logical—at any rate less legalistic—and more religious."

That is my conviction, too. And I shall carry with me through the year, and long after the discussion about "delegates" is forgotten, the grateful fact, registered with unmistakable precision at Toronto, that my brethren are literally leaving behind them the abstract generalizations commonly called "first principles," and are going on unto perfection in the concrete life of spiritual fellowship with Christ the Lord.

HUGH MACDONALD.

The City and the Convention

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

EDITOR'S NOTE.—Each day during the Toronto convention Charles Clayton Morrison, editor of The Christian Century, contributed a signed editorial to The Globe interpreting to the general public the proceedings of the previous day. The invitation from the management of The Globe gave him entire freedom to inform the Canadian public of the purposes and character of the Disciples of Christ, a privilege of which he took grateful advantage. The Toronto newspapers gave less actual space to the report of the convention than did the Courier-Journal of Louisville last year, but the work of their reporters, while entirely independent of Mr. Morrison's daily article, were more accurate and relevant than has oftentimes been the case. From all parts of the country Mr. Morrison is receiving letters from Globe subscribers expressing their appreciation of the fairness of his accounts. This makes a strenuous week's work seem amply worth while. The following is the final article on the convention as it appeared in The Globe.

THE convention of the Disciples of Christ closed in a meeting of tremendous and intense power last evening. After the delegates had expressed to the local committees, whose members were seated on the platform, their appreciation of the extraordinarily effective arrangements that had been made for the comfort and success of the convention, Rev. Charles S. Medbury, D. D., of Des Moines, Ia., whose church, adjoining Drake University, contains close to 2,500 members, delivered an address. Dr. Medbury is used to such an audience as he faced last evening, his own house of worship being about the same size as Massey Hall, and he regularly preaches to from 2,000 to 3,500 persons. He is a man of extraordinary sympathy, imaginative sympathy. He feels a situation, and interprets it with the most delicate insight. This he did in his summary and after-look at the great convention.

The day was a full day—and it was almost a full convention that followed the program at all the sessions. I think I have never known the delegates so generally to remain through the closing hours as these delegates have done. There were probably 1,000 persons present in the afternoon when the final business session of the newly-organized "General Convention of Churches of Christ" was held. Judge Henry was again in his place as President. A few newspaper men and some chairmen of committees were on the platform. Down on the floor, near the front, sat the Secretaries and Presidents of many societies of the church—not one of them on the platform. It was a token of the new order. The societies are now subordinate to a larger entity. The churches themselves have at last found an instrument by which their will may be expressed, and the societies, with their officers, gladly acknowledge their position as servants of the general convention.

THIS relationship was prettily illustrated in an episode of the afternoon. A committee presented a report to apportion among all the societies the bulk missionary offerings of the churches that chose to make their missionary offerings on the budget plan instead of having a special day for taking an offering for each particular interest. One of the Secretaries, whose good counsel is held in the highest esteem, made a speech opposing the new plan, and suggesting that it was revolutionary. After the plan had been adopted by a unanimous vote, the Secretary made a gracious speech deferring to the convention and declaring that he and his society would work with the same vigor as under the old plan, when each society knew no rule save to do that which seemed right in its own eyes.

The choice of Drake University's President, Hill M. Bell, LL. D., as President of the General Convention for next year, was very happy. Dr. Bell, like Judge Henry, is a layman, quiet, efficient and genuine as an oak tree. He is one of those rare men who do great things, but whose presence in the doing you are not aware of. He will be an admirable presiding officer at Atlanta, and in the year betime his counsels will greatly aid in the constructive tasks now lying just ahead of the Executive Committee.

I FEEL that I can satisfactorily bring my humble but happy part in this convention to a close in no better way than by telling our Toronto hostess some things that are in the hearts of her convention guests with respect to the courteous treatment accorded us. From the moment of our entrance to this city we have been made to feel welcome. Your Mayor's gracious address and that of one of your most distinguished pastors have been backed up and made good in many substantial ways. It is generally remarked that no more satisfactory auditorium for a convention such as ours has been put at our disposal in any city where we have been in recent years. The trouble with most auditoriums seating so many is that they are barnlike, uncouth and noisy. The chairs are usually unattached to the floor and the aisle space is uncarpeted. The unavoidable movements of a large concourse of people in such a building leaves little chance for quiet, meditation or deliberation. But your Massey Hall has not only capacity, but character, and it suited our convention exactly.

Our resolutions committee spoke particularly of the hospitality extended by your homes, by the pastors of your churches who invited delegates to preach in their pulpits Sunday, and by your newspapers for the good spirit and liberal space with which the proceedings have been reported. They voiced the feelings of every delegate, too, when they acknowledged the courtesy of the street railway company in extending free transportation to all delegates. That was a brand new experience. I confess that at first I felt as if I owned the whole street car system, and now I fear that I shall begrudge the five-cent piece the conductor will ask when I step on the street car in Chicago. But I cannot imagine a more delicate and literal way to give your guests "the freedom of the city" than to put the public conveyances freely at their disposal. It keeps us repeatedly reminded of the graciousness of our welcome and prompts us to repeated appreciation.

WE Americans have been much impressed with the religious life of Toronto. Your Sunday was both a Sabbath and a Lord's Day indeed! How we in the States yearn for such regard for the day of rest and worship! There is a deplorable slackening of respect for the sacred Day in our great American cities. But your people go to church and they worship with true spontaneity of devotion. I have talked with twenty preachers who filled your pulpits on Sunday and nearly everyone has said, "But you should have heard the people sing!" That was what greatly impressed me at Rev. Mr. Brown's Sherbourne Street Methodist Church, where I was on Sunday night. The vast congregation praised God with veritable pæans. Your beautiful churches and your splendid ministry have been an inspiration to us.

The great union movement, including your Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist Churches, has been a subject of much interest to us. We have prayed for its successful consummation. We rejoice to know of the substantial progress already made and we see in our vision more than this particular merger. We think we see in this a harbinger of a greater unity yet to come—perhaps a national Church, not hierarchical but democratic, not established but voluntary, a Church at one with itself so that it may bring all its energy in a united impact upon the secular social order.

Some such end as this is precisely what we Disciples have been working toward for a century. We believe the Church should be one. We believe that there is already a mystical unity underlying our divisions. But this unity, we feel, must become manifest—"that the world may believe."

Our convention just closed has been held in the interest, not of ourselves as a separate communion or denomination, but in the interest of the ideal of unity which holds us together. Without this striving after unity, this desire to practice unity, we might just as well lose our identity now in any of the Christian denominations about us.

And if our critics have had just cause in the past to say that we were a hard, sectarian denomination like all the rest, this convention has disclosed that, at least for the main body of our people, the day of the catholic mind and the larger, freer fellowship with all Christians has dawned.

IT has been a progressive convention. We have gone forward. The great messages have been sounded by progressive men. Many young men, trained in our modern universities, have been the interpreters of a new day.

It has been a liberal convention. The controversies of a year and two years ago over heresies were not mentioned. The feeling is fixed that there is room among Disciples for all who love our common Lord in sincerity, regardless of doctrinal opinions.

It has been a practical convention. Great tasks have captivated our imagination, and our wills are gripping them. Missions and social service—these fields afford the ground of unity more sure and real than any doctrinal basis.

It has been a convention of the open heart. An offering of close to $4,000 at the communion service on Sunday for ministerial relief but suggests faintly the new temper of our people in matters of self-sacrifice. Two millions in addition to our regular missionary collections—that is one of the slogans of the new movement just launched.

It has been a religious convention. Not all religious conventions are religious. Church people sometimes become absorbed in their discussions and forget to pray. Not so here. The Disciples are becoming a great spiritual people. They are learning to tap the deep springs of God's power and release His help. They are breeding a race of spiritual teachers and prophets, whose message is got, not from the text-book on logic, nor from the letter of Scripture, but from direct communion with God.

Is it anti-climax?—no, I think it is climax—to say that it has been a convention of friendship. The old friends—we have met them and renewed our love with theirs. And new friends all of us have made never to forget. Our souls have been enriched, our life set forward, our own affections enlarged by the wider fellowship into which the new friendships of these days' making have initiated us.

We are glad we have been in Toronto. We shall remember Toronto always for her beauty, her piety and her courtesy. And we shall remember also The Globe, and all my genial fellow-craftsmen who produce it, for the high character of its report of our convention.

Observations and Reflections

—Many of the delegates took time to visit the fine buildings of the University of Toronto, with its surrounding colleges, an institution which is setting a fine example of academic and religious unity.

—It was the first truly international convention the Disciples have held, as it was held on British soil. Perhaps the time may come when the convention may be held with the Disciples of England.

—The most popular feature of the entertainment offered by the city of Toronto was the free use of the electric cars by all who wore the convention badges. That was a unique and greatly appreciated courtesy.

—It was reported with astonishment by those who attended the Bloor St. Presbyterian Church on Sunday morning, that Dr. Z. T. Sweeney, the visiting preacher, wore a gown! Tell it not in Gath!

—President Henry is an official to be proud of. His appearance is commanding. His voice is powerful, such as one likes to hear in a place like Convention Hall. His decisions were prompt, just and convincing.

—The resolution offered by O. F. Jordan, excluding all miscellaneous notices from the program, and requiring their insertion in a daily bulletin, was timely and welcome. A score of trivial matters obtrude themselves at the end of every session, and detract from the effect of the gatherings.

—The "Rump Parliament" (the name is historic and not invidious) which gathered in the Y .M. C. A. to protest against the delegate convention, consisted of twenty-six people, as indicated by the votes. Two hundred or more of the other mind attended, but took no part in the proceedings.

—The Campbell Institute (described by an amiable contemporary as "discredited and disbanded") held a luncheon at Eaton's attended by about seventy-five. The news of the demise of the organization will be received with amused surprise by the members. It is conjectured that, like the news of the death of a celebrated humorist, as commented on by himself, "it is greatly exaggerated."

—It was a prophecy in which Dr. Garrison and The Christian Century united that the Toronto Convention would be the best thus far in the history of the Disciples, and the facts admirably validated the prediction.

—The attendance was a surprise even to those most confident. A registration of twenty-five hundred still left uncounted very many who attended without registering, so that probably a total of three thousand would not be far in error.

—Toronto is a city of churches and of church-going people. The number and beauty of the places of worship is one of the striking features of the place, several of them occupying entire blocks in important portions of the city. The people are interested in church life. At the morning services the churches are comfortably filled, and in the evening they are crowded.

—The Protestant pulpits of the city were freely and hospitably opened to the Disciples, and those of our ministers who preached found a cordial welcome for themselves and their messages. Many of the people of the city attended the sessions of the convention and applauded the friendly references made to Canada and Toronto.

—The weather was ideal, perhaps a shade too warm to please those who anticipated a cool climate. But the beautiful autumn tints and the genial sunshine made a charming atmosphere for out-of-door enjoyment of convention week.

—The convention hall is the best, with one or two exceptions, in which we have ever met, and was well filled at all the sessions. The audiences reached their climax on Thursday evening, when Dr. J. A. Macdonald, of the Toronto Globe, delivered his great address on "Peace," and at the communion service on Sunday.

—The spirit of the convention was admirable. The protests uttered on the floor of the convention against the delegate idea were dignified and earnest, and were met by explanations which appeared to satisfy nearly all the protestants. The vote in favor of the new order was overwhelming. And the meeting called by the more urgent of the opponents to take action, after free discussion of the question, declined to register any opinion. .

—Dr. H. L. Willett was invited to fill two pulpits on Sunday, and spoke morning and evening. At each service the house was packed to the limit, many delegates being present hoping to hear an interpretation of the mission conditions as Dr. Willett found them on his recent mission study tour in the Orient. Instead the themes were Scripture texts both times.

—It was unfortunate that the splendid address of Edgar DeWitt Jones was dislodged from its place in a previous session, and placed just before the communion service on Sunday afternoon. We believe that the offering at the communion service should be devoted to the care of the aged ministers and their families. But it is not the time for a convention address. The communion service should not be made either a form or a spectacle. In days past it has suffered from both abuses. We hope to see our conventions return to a simple service, sole in its purpose and theme.

—A delegate at the convention passed on a remark from a leading business man of Toronto that would tend to puff up the delegates were they not of a democratic temperament. This man is reported to have declared that of all the conventions held in Toronto during many years, this gathering of Disciples has to its credit the brightest, most alert, up-to-date men and women.

—Reuben Butschart, chairman of the Publicity Committee for the Convention, and for many years a resident of Toronto, remarked that the convention had proved to be unique in its influence toward bridging the gulf that has always severed to a greater or less extent the two English-speaking peoples. The people of Toronto, he said, were rapidly learning to look upon the people of the United States as indeed brothers and sisters of theirs, and no event has tended to help this feeling forward more than this great Disciples Convention.

Of Human Interest

Whitcomb Riley Was "Just Picked."

After a year of diligent investigation and research the editors in charge of the work of compiling the first absolutely complete collection of the works of James Whitcomb Riley, in both prose and poetry, have announced that they have recovered what they believe to be all of the famous poet's compositions still in existence.

The work on the complete collection was begun with but little hope of success, as Riley's works were scattered far and wide over the land. The files of defunct newspapers to which the poet had at different times contributed were carefully searched; his correspondence was examined; his friends were canvassed for any information they might have, and at length some two hundred poems which have never before been published were found. In addition, a large number of prose compositions were brought to light—works of the poet of whose existence he alone knew.

James Whitcomb Riley has succeeded as a poet in spite of the predictions of many of the greatest literary critics that his works were not the kind that would live. Eastern men of letters were slow in accepting his dialect verse, and it was only after he had recited before them that they began to realize the wonderful possibilities of dialect poetry as a medium of interpreting the true feelings and the simple philosophy of the homely people from whom the poet drew his inspiration.

Time and again Riley has been asked how he himself accounted for his success. Invariably he would reply, in a most typical manner: "I guess there had to be someone to do that sort of thing and the good Lord just picked me."

Senator Stone Quotes Hymn.

"Whereas the individual gifts and finer graces of the politician are necessarily lost sight of in the publicity of parties and platforms, patronage and pledges, which can be said to bear no relation to romance or art, the gifts of the gods are never lost; even when the genius of all politicians is reduced to the one great common denominator of speech-making the time will come when a flash of the divine fire blazes up through debate and bills before the House or lights the laugh in the solemn Senate. Sometimes the flash is one of incomparable wit, often it is impromptu doggerel, frequently it is the quick quotation, remembered from one day in church long ago." So declares a writer in the Washington column of recent paper.

Thus, it continues, during the debate on the tariff in the last administration the bill went to its final reading and passage in a very solemn atmosphere, for it marked the division in the Republican ranks, with the foreboding of Republican disaster the next fall. There had been a serious and impassioned speech from Senator Beveridge and a vigorous reply from Senator Aldrich, when Senator Stone of Missouri rose at his desk with slow dignity.

"Mr. President," he said, "I feel that I am duly impressed with the solemnity of the occasion. I have listened with deep interest to the sad and somewhat tearful and pathetic funereal orations which have just been delivered. It is customary, Mr. President, after the sermon to sing a song. I commend to my brethren on the other side an old song that I heard when I was a boy. The first verse, a little paraphrased, ran something like this:

'Hark, from the tomb a doleful sound,
My ears attend the cry:
Dear brethren, all come view the ground
Where we shall shortly lie!' "

His "Domestic" Trouble.

Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt ridiculed in Chicago the old anti-suffrage cry of domesticity—that woman's place is the home.

"The trouble is," said Mrs. Catt, "that many women cannot be domestic; they have no homes. The word 'domestic,' therefore, should not be used as is too often the case in a loose way."

The suffrage leader smiled.

"Yes," she continued, "some people give this word as elastic a meaning as the witness gave it in a Georgia court. Asked why he was not present to testify in a certain case the man said he had had a 'domestic trouble' just about that time.

" 'What was the domestic trouble, pray?' asked the examining attorney.

" 'Well, to tell the truth, boss,' said the witness, 'I was in the penitentiary for stealin' a cow.' "

A Sure Sign!

Secretary Josephus Daniels, discussing an argument against his navy policy, laughed and said, at a luncheon in Washington:

"My opponent is stinging in a polite way. He is like the bishop.

"A bishop, at a certain congress, spoke, and at the close of his address the audience began to disperse.

"A gentleman who was down on the program for an address touched the bishop's sleeve and murmured:

" 'I need not speak. I hardly think they expect me.'

" 'Oh, to be sure they do!' cried the bishop. 'To be sure they do! Don't you see, they are all going?' "

Associate Justice Hughes' Story.

A man came into the executive chamber one day when the room was quite full of people, without any introduction. There being for the moment a wait, he approached the desk and sat down by me, writes the Associate Justice in Collier's.

He said, "I want to lodge a complaint against the conduct of Auburn Prison."

"When did you get out?" I asked.

He said, "Yesterday."

"How long had you been in?"

"Two years."

"What for?"

"Aiding an escape."

"Were you guilty?"

"Yes."

"What were you doing before that?"

"Well, I was out for a couple of years."

"Had you been in before?"

"Yes."

"What was that for?"

"Burglary."

"Were you guilty?"

"Yes."

"How long had you been in?"

"Ten years."

"Have you spent twelve years out of the last fourteen in a State prison?"

"Yes."

"You got out yesterday, and came here at once to lodge a complaint?"

"Yes."

"What is it?"

Then he went on and unfolded his particular complaint. When he got through and left me I called for the gentleman who in an affable but firm way is supposed to protect the executive, and said, "How does it happen that a man who has just got out of State prison can walk right into the Executive Chamber and without any introduction come and sit with me, when there is a roomful of people without appointments demanding an opportunity?"

"What!" he said. "That man a convict? I thought he was an Assemblyman."

From Near and Far

The National Council for Industrial Safety has decided to make Chicago its headquarters. This was the action of its last convention. The council may change its name and broaden its work so as to include all forms of public safety. The primary purpose of the recent congress of the council was to deal with safety in relation to railroads and factories. It is purposed to have a safety museum established in Chicago. There are twenty-two such museums in different parts of the United States. The owners of six hundred foreign-language papers represented in Chicago contributed $2,400 toward the public safety movement. It was probably prompted by the fact that ninety-seven per cent of the accident victims in the cities are foreigners.

Representative Kirkpatrick, of Iowa, has introduced a bill prohibiting gambling in any form among government employees and all army and navy men. The penalty will be dismissal from the service of the government of anyone found guilty of the practice. Buying and selling futures are included among the forms of gambling prohibited. The incentive to this bill was the recent disclosures of gambling among the men of the navy yard and in other departments of government service.

The Philippine government has set aside a fund of $750,000 to be loaned to sugar planters to assist them in making and marketing their crop for the current year. This money is to be loaned through the bank of the Philippine Islands on the crop now being harvested.

The board of education of New York City finally has decided that teachers may marry and still retain their positions, but they must not bear children. Any woman who stays away from school for that purpose is guilty of neglect of duty and subject to dismissal.

George Hough Perry, publicity manager of the Pan-American Pacific Exposition, who was in Chicago recently, said that the contractors are ahead of the schedule time, and the fair will open February 20, 1915, with "$50,000,000 inside the gates."

Toronto boasts the tallest building in the British Empire; it is the new Canadian Pacific Railway office building, and is fifteen stories high.

The will of the late George Wyman, of South Bend, Ind., distributes $150,000 among over a hundred employes.

The Work of the Societies

Substantial Gleanings from the Reports Offered at Toronto.

THE WOMAN'S SOCIETY.

The past year nearly $400,000 was raised and 518 missionaries and workers employed. The "Missionary Tidings" has a circulation of 38,802, an increase of 1,181. Missouri stands first in the number of members, Ohio second. North Carolina had a 20 per cent. increase in membership. The District of Columbia has as many societies as there are churches. New York has more. Every society in Louisiana observed C. W. B. M. Day. There are 20,000 boys and girls enrolled in the Young People's Department.

For the College of Missions, Indianapolis, Dr. H. C. Hurd reported twenty-seven regular and fifty-eight elective students, representing eighteen colleges and universities, with eleven others from India, the Belgian Congo, Mexico and Japan. During the past year seven volunteers have received appointment, and four have been sent to the mission field. The college offers sixty courses. It is one of five such institutions in the United States, and is destined to a large and influential place. Professors Hurd, Paul and Lumley made a profound impression by their addresses.

The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Anna R. Atwater; vice-president, Mrs. Ida W. Harrison; secretaries, Mrs. Effie L. Cunningham and Mrs. J. E. McDaniel; treasurer, Miss Mary J. Judson; secretary of Young People's Work, Mrs. Ella K. Payne; and resident members, Mrs. W. S. Moffett, Mrs. D. Farris, Mrs. N. E. Atkinson, Mrs. J. M. Dungan and Mrs. T. C. Howe.

THE FOREIGN SOCIETY.

The missionaries report 2,958 baptisms, a gain of over 20 per cent., or an average of twenty-five baptisms for each family and single missionary we have on the fields. The same proportionate number of converts in America would have meant the adding of over 200,000 to the membership of our churches last year. The Philippine Mission reports 798 baptisms and the African Mission 1,305. This last field records the remarkable gain of over 60 per cent. China reports twice as many baptisms as in any one year before, one hundred of these being reported from the University of Nanking alone.

The medical missionaries have been very busy and report the treatment of 160,716 patients; 17,141 pupils are reported in the Sunday-schools. In the 106 schools and colleges of the Society 5,772 pupils have been in attendance, 283 of whom are studying for the ministry. This is one out of every fifty of our membership in mission fields. It is an interesting fact that the contributions and school and hospital fees in our mission fields amounted to $58,685, a far larger sum than the administration expenses of the Society here at home.

Fourteen new missionaries have been appointed during the year. This is the largest number of new workers ever sent out in any one year in the history of the work. Their names follow: Miss Lulu Snyder, China; Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Shaw, China; Miss Edith Apperson, Africa; Mrs. C. P. Hedges, Africa; Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Johnston, Africa; Dr. W. A. Frymire, Africa; A. G. Saunders, Philippine Islands; W. H. Scott, India; Mr. and Mrs. W. L. Burner, Cuba; Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Moody, India.

A new secretary for the western portion of the country, Mr. Bert Wilson, has been engaged, with headquarters at Kansas City.

The steady increase in the receipts of the Society for thirty-eight years is an index of the growth of the missionary sentiment. There has been an increase every year but five. Every year for the past twelve has witnessed an advance in the income except one. The receipts have almost doubled in ten years. Thirty-two new living links have been enrolled this year, more churches and Sunday Schools have given this year than ever before. The income from personal contributions is encouraging. Annuity gifts have also increased. Receipts from bequests are more than last year. The total receipts for the year were $434,000, a gain of $33,455 over the preceding year.

BOARD OF CHURCH EXTENSION.

The new receipts during the year including interest amount to $119,570.18. The churches sent $4,000 less than last year, but this is due to the fact that the board could not get the results of the last Sunday of September since the books closed on Tuesday, the 30th.

Our permanent Church Extension Fund amounts to $1,060,164 divided as follows:

General Fund	$525,164
Annuity Fund	$385,000
Name Funds	$150,000
Total	$1,060,164

Since the beginning the Board has helped to erect 1,625 churches in 44 states, Canada and Hawaii. 1,017 of these have paid their loans in full.

From October 1, 1912, to September 30, 1913, ninety-four churches received loans to assist them in completing their building. These loans aggregate $195,650. These ninety-four churches raised $391,300. Add to this the amount loaned, $195,650, and you have $586,950, the amount of church property called into existence this year by the help of the Church Extension Board.

During the year 102 loans have been promised aggregating $231,040. These are the obligations before the Board that must be paid as these mission churches complete their buildings.

The Church Extension money is loaned to be returned in five equal annual instalments. As fast as the money comes back it goes out to build other churches. Seventy-four churches have paid their loans in full this year, making 1,017 that have paid in full since the beginning. There has been returned on loans since the beginning $1,504,000, which added to the $1,060,164 makes $2,564,164 that the Church Extension Board has handled in loans to struggling missions to whom nobody else would lend money. In handling all this money there has been a slight loss of $1,926, which has been more than made up by excess of interest above expenses.

The Board seeks to answer the demands. There are 127 Home Missionary Societies, District, State and National; forty per cent of the churches organized by these societies must be helped in the erection of their buildings by the Church Extension Board.

After coming into the Convention a man and his wife agreed to settle up their business within the next few years and put $100,000 into the Church Extension Fund on the Annuity plan. Their income at six per cent will be $6,000 a year. They state that they intend to go out into the mission fields and use this money to live on and to help mission churches to grow strong. They will move from point to point helping churches in this manner. Their $100,000 will be building churches and with the income they will be helping mission churches to grow strong.

THE AMERICAN SOCIETY.

Report was given by Dr. I. N. MaCash, whose resignation as secretary takes effect at this time.

The total receipts for eleven months are $168,552.51. The month of September will probably push this amount to over $190,000.

The portion of this amount returned to various state boards is $47,665.45, which leaves a net sum of $118,897 for the direct use of the American Society. For a number of years it appears that the receipts have made no substantial increase.

No successor was appointed to Dr. McCash's secretaryship. A committee of three was appointed to confer with the American board and to determine jointly with the board on a secretary. The office is extremely difficult. The task calls for a genius in organization and missionary vision.

Officers of the A. C. M. S. were elected as follows: President, W. H. Sheffer, Tenn.; 1st Vice-President, R. W. Stevenson, Canada; 2nd Vice-President, W. F. Holt, Cal.; 3rd Vice-President, Clyde Darsie, Illinois; Secretary, Grant K. Lewis; Bible School Secretary, R. M. Hopkins; Treasurer, Benjamin Sebastian; Auditor, Stanley Spragens; Recording-Secretary, Walter White, Iowa; Recording Secretary, S. S. Fisher, Minn. Members of Board of Managers, J. D. Ellis, J. W. Hagin, W. E. Ellis, R. A. Doan; Superintendent of Christian Endeavor, Claude E. Hill.

THE BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

While the year that has just closed has surpassed its predecessors in some respects it has come short of them in some others. Financially, this has not been a record-breaking year. In fact, the total amount of new money received was less than that of last year. This falling off is doubtless due to several influences. The air of uncertainty that has pervaded the general business world, augmented by local business disturbances in several sections of the country has made money exceedingly shy. The Association has not been alone in this experience. Many of our churches have just adopted the Budget Plan, cutting off all special offerings, and sufficient time has not yet elapsed to reap the full benefit of the new plan. Then this report is fifteen days short of a year. The amount received from annuities and bequests is much smaller this year than last. For several years we have reported a good sized special fund raised for building purposes. This year we have no building funds to report. The total amount of new money received is $97,406.95. This is a loss from the amount raised last year of $18,606.19. Last year's report, however, contained building funds. The annuity offering last year exceeded that of this by $10,000. If we make allowance for this loss in the annuity department, and the absence of building funds from this year's report, the amount received for current support will run slightly ahead of that of last year.

Disciples Table Talk

Church to Build Roof Garden.

By next summer First Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the oldest down-town churches in the city, will be holding open air services on a roof garden. An addition, 55x75 feet and three stories in height, will be added to the rear of the present edifice. On the top of this will be a pergola where services will be held in the open air. It will have a seating capacity of approximately 500. The building, which will be joined to the church proper, will be used for institutional work and other interests of the church. A foundation will be laid so as to carry five stories, with a view of converting the structure into an office building if the property ever becomes too valuable for church purposes. All the improvements in the building will cost about $40,000.

J. M. Philputt to Remain in New York.

J. M. Philputt, pastor at Central Church, New York City, states that although he had other plans he wished to carry out, he has decided to remain in this field the coming year, at the urgent request of the congregation. This will round out Mr. Philputt's twentieth year of pastoral work in New York City. He served for four years as pastor of the 169th Street Church, of Lenox Avenue for thirteen years, then after a period away from the city, he returned to Central Church in 1911. Mr. Philputt declares that the influx of foreign population has made changed methods necessary, and has rendered the work of the Protestant churches of New York increasingly difficult. Central Church has its purpose set to build, in time, a structure in this section of the metropolis that shall secure the Disciples the recognition they deserve in the East. With the purpose of building up the work, Mr. Philputt asks the names and addresses of Disciples who have come or are coming to live in New York. The address of the church is 142 W. 81st street. Strangers will be met and located. In the coming year D. H. Bradbury, will serve as associate pastor at Central Church.

Church Grows From Mission Circle.

J. H. Jones, superintendent of missions for Third District, Missouri, sends an interesting story of "mustard seed" development. The little church at Alba, Mo., is a "one day" church building, erected in Jasper County on Decoration Day, 1911. A congregation was formed soon afterwards. The building and the congregation were largely the outcome of a band of Christian women who organized themselves into an Alba Mission Circle to raise funds for a new building. They purchased the best lot in the town and a building was erected. The last of the indebtedness was recently met by this Circle and on October 6 the mortgage was burned. D. W. Moore, of Carthage, and J. H. Jones made talks. A. P. Cameron is the pastor of the church.

Town Practices Christian Union.

H. W. Hunter, pastor at Higginsville, Mo., reports a story of an interesting achievement in the practice of Christian unity in his town that will be of especial interest to Disciples. Last spring there was held in Higginsville, a town of 3,000 inhabitants, a union meeting. The four English churches, Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and Christian, with one German church—the Methodist—co-operated. One of the many good things that came from this meeting, Mr. Hunter writes, was the organization of the men of these and other churches into what is termed, "The Men's Christian Union of Higginsville." As the men were the backbone for the meeting and their work proved very successful it was thought that this fine spirit of fellowship should continue.

The essence of this organization is found in the by-laws, as follows: "The object and purpose of this organization is to form a union of men in Higginsville who will stand for high ideals of religous, moral and civic life; who are willing to lend a helping hand in every effort to strengthen the weak, to encourage the strong to grow stronger; to practice, so far as in us lies, the teachings of Jesus Christ in our dealings with fellow men, and to stand for the general principle of general uplift of humanity in our community." To further this ideal the men met every Sunday afternoon in the churches and by lecture or Bible study tried to receive inspiration for their work. The plan was soon put to a practical test. The summer months came, with the usual union effort on the part of the churches for the Sunday night services. The ministers got together and decided that they would turn over the sessions to this union to work as they saw fit. The result was that many interesting sessions were held. Men took part who never did much in regular church work. Talks were given that were an inspiration to the preachers who sat in the pews. Bible studies were conducted that, in the character and amount of research work, were wonderful. In all and above all was that fine spirit of fellowship that seemed to say, "We have common problems; we must meet them on common ground."

A further result of this union will be the formation in this town of an associated charity that will look after all work that comes under that head; also a Humane Committee. The mayor of Higginsville is the president of the organization. The postmaster is the leader of the Bible studies. All sorts and conditions of men take part, for they are learning anew that "God is no respecter of persons."

A Class That Advertises.

Up-to-date methods of publicity and the application of modern business methods to religious work have brought results in at least one instance. The Loyal Sons' Sunday-school class of Union Avenue Church, Moline, Ill., has been developed by advertising into one of the largest classes in any small city of the state. This class has an active membership of 142 and an enrolled membership of almost 200, although the members are limited to ages of from seventeen to twenty-five. E. M. Austin, the teacher of the class, is a progressive business man, proprietor of one of the largest retail hardware and furniture establishments in south-central Illinois. He conceived the idea of applying modern business ideas to his Sunday-school class and has built it up from a membership of seven in four years. Newspaper advertising has figured to some extent in developing the class although circular letters have been used more than anything else. There are more than one hundred kinds of printed matter which have been used by Mr. Austin in soliciting new members and encouraging present members to better attendance. "It is hard work," says Mr. Austin, "that has brought results. I have sent out as many as one hundred letters to prospects and never got an acknowledgment. Then at other times the results have been very satisfactory. As with all advertising, I realize that it has its effect for good, even when there are no appreciable results."

Banner County Holds S. S. Convention.

The Edgar County, Ill., Sunday-school Convention was held in Paris, Ill., October 2, 3. The convention sermon was delivered by H. H. Peters, pastor First Church, Paris. There were 700 delegates present. Geo. W. Miller, who was one of the state officers of the Sunday-school Association for a number of years, has been president of the Edgar County Association for twenty-three years. The report shows that Edgar County is one of the banner counties of the state. First Church, Paris, and First M. E. Church, of that city, have been the banner schools for a number of years with honors about equally divided. The following report indicates a splendid showing: Number schools in county, seventy; number teachers and officers, 907; number scholars enrolled, 7,512; total Sunday-school enrollment, 8,419; average attendance, 4,382.

Cedar Rapids Church Dedicated.

Walter M. White, pastor at Cedar Rapids, Ia., First, is a convert to the idea that the chief work of the church is religious education, and it is in harmony with this idea that the handsome new structure, dedicated October 5, is adapted especially for efficiency in Sunday-school activities. At the request of the congregation, Mr. White himself preached the dedication sermon. No appeal was made for funds, a thanksgiving offering being received from the congregation. The "real joy feature," it is reported, of the morning dedication service was the response of nine persons to the gospel invitation. In the afternoon a congratulatory service was held, in which representatives of other fellowships extended congratulations to the First Church congregation and pastor. The Mayor of Cedar Rapids also extended best wishes, in behalf of the city. At 6:30 p. m. the young people's societies of Cedar Rapids held a union meeting, led by the President of the Local Union. In the evening service six more persons were added to the church, and four were baptized. Mr. White declares that the new church building is doubtless the most unique religious worship building in Iowa or this part of the country. Although outwardly not presenting much the appearance of the usual church building, its Greco-Colonial appearance shows it to be a structure of endurance and stability, and it also possesses a peculiar beauty that is most desirable. The first floor of the construction is Bedford stone, at the front and extending about thirty feet back, the remainder being of pressed paving blocks with Bedford stone casings for the windows and doors. The real beauty of the new church, however, is on the inside. The interior arrangement had been carefully planned and carried out in every detail and there is not a flaw to find in any department. It can well be called a building of features, including perfect systems of ventilating and heating. The beauty spot of the church is the auditorium that has a seating capacity of about one thousand including the balcony that is over the avenue end. The decorations are in light green colors, including walls, ceiling, windows and fixtures. On the first floor is the kindergarten department of the church. This is without doubt one of the most completely equipped and arranged departments for the religious education of children from two to six years of age, to be found anywhere. The department is arranged so that it can be used as one room, or folding doors closed and made into three distinct rooms. Everything in the way of equipment to illustrate the teaching is included, not neglecting the sand table, which can be arranged to illustrate the pilgrimage of the Israelites and practically all the teachings of scripture. Then there are rooms for every class in the Sunday-school. Many of these took charge of the decorating of their respective rooms and the result is an attractively arranged system of educational rooms to accommodate almost any number of pupils that an enormous growth in the Sunday-school may develop.

Since 1881, eight able men have ministered to this church: Robert E. Swartz, June 1, 1881, to May 2, 1885; Barton O. Aylesworth, June 1, 1885, to Februarv 18, 1889; Levi Marshall, March 1, 1889, to May 1, 1896; C. C. Rowlison, Sept. 6, 1896, to August 28, 1898; J. M. Rudy, October 22, 1898, to February 12, 1902; F. J. Stinson, April 20, 1902, to February 12, 1905; G. B. Van Arsdall, March 1, 1905, to February 12, 1910; Walter M. White, June 15, 1910.

Plan Chapel as Eldred Memorial.

Steps looking toward the erection of a chapel at Longa, Africa, as a memorial to Mr. and Mrs. R. Ray Eldred, were taken at a recent meeting of the Christian Endeavor Society of First Church, South Bend, Ind. The meeting was a memorial service for Mr. and Mrs. Eldred, who were supported by the Christian churches of the county and who died while on duty. A memorial day is planned by the church at which Royal J. Dye, Mr. Eldred's associate in the Congo, will be secured to speak. Geo. W. Hemry is pastor of the South Bend church.

Union Spirit at Springfield, Mo.

Springfield, Mo., Church, through its pastor, Geo. L. Peters, proposed to its neighbors to hold union services in July and August, with the result that the Congregational, Second Presbyterian and Methodist churches joined them. Meetings were held in these churches each pastor preaching once a month. The young people also joined both in religious meetings and social gatherings. The fellowship was delightful and many expressions of desire for a wider fraternity resulted. A closer unity of these churches will result, reports Mr. Peters.

A "Social Educational Program."

Mr. J. G. Holladay, superintendent of First Church Sunday-school, Norfolk, Va., is offering his school the following "Social Educational Program:"

1. Educational—Mondays, 7:15-7:45, Advanced Training. Mondays, 7:45-8:30, Elementary Specialization; First Standard of Teacher Training; Secondary Mission Study; Bible-school administration; Boy Problem Class. Mondays, 8:30-9:15, United Mission Study. 2. Social—Domestic Science Class; Sewing Class; Kindergarten Class. 3. Church Services—"The Training of the Twelve," a Series of Sermons on the Teachings of Jesus for Sunday mornings of October and November. "The Apostolic Church," a Series of Sermons on the Acts of Apostles, for Sunday evenings of October and November. "Beacon Lights of Church History," a Series of Wednesday Night Talks, dealing with the landmarks of Christianity. A diploma will be granted for attendance at two Monday Night Classes and the three Church Services each week during October and November.

Three Churches That Are Wise.

Three churches, at least, sent their pastors to the Toronto Convention, and placed themselves on an honor list that all will recognize as being such. These churches are: Central, Springfield, Mo., Geo. L. Peters, pastor; Highland, Kan., Hugh Lomax, pastor; Franklin, Ind., W. J. Wright, pastor. Bloomington, Ill., First, sent Mrs. Edgar D. Jones, the pastor's wife. Are there others to be heard from? The question is, why is it not an established custom for all churches to send their leaders to the national conventions, simply as an investment in increased ministeral efficiency?

Men's Class Builds Tabernacle.

Without changing from work clothes to "church clothes," about seventy-five men and boys of Irvington Christian Church, Indianapolis, at 5 o'clock Sept. 27, held a short praise service in celebration of the completion of the tabernacle of the men's Bible class, on which the finishing touches had just been placed. The entire building was erected in a day and contains two rooms, one for the men's class and the other for the young men, to be used until the new Sunday-school building, now under way, has been completed. The women of the church served lunch to the workmen. The pastor, Charles H. Winders, was one of the most industrious "carpenters" on the job.

Church Installs "Movies."

First Church, Lawrence, Kans., has installed a motion picture machine to be used in the religious educational work of the church. E. T. McFarland, pastor, says regarding this addition to the church's equipment: "I think that the church has to adopt new methods to keep up with the change in time. The motion picture machine has become an instrument for the educational and spiritual uplift of the community. I have studied this problem for a number of years and feel that the church should use the motion pictures as a means of calling attention to the higher things of life."

Paris, Ill., Church Busy.

Several facts account for the fruitful day at Paris, Ill., October 5: The church was reopened after extensive repairs; the four-cornered Sunday-school contest between Paris, Jacksonville, Litchfield and Champaign was launched; and special preparations were made for the union evangelistic campaign to begin October 12, with Evangelists Hart and Magann.

J. M. Rudy, pastor at Quincy, Ill., is preaching a series of sermons on "What Will Primitive Christianity Do for Quincy?" The series includes discussions of the following topics: "What's the Matter With Quincy?" "What Will Primitive Christianity Do for Quincy?" "What Will It Do for the Quincy Church?" "What Will It Do for the Quincy Young Man?" "What Will It Do for Quincy Society?" "What Will It Do for the Quincy Pulpit?" "What Will It Do for Quincy Newspapers?" "What Will It Do for the Quincy Saloonkeeper?"

Two St. Louis Christian ministers have just received calls to Eastern churches. A call to Third Street Church of Philadelphia, has been considered by L. W. McCreary, pastor of the Hamilton Avenue Christian church, for some weeks, but he will probably not accept. St. James Street Church, of Boston, has extended a call to J. H. Mohorter, secretary of the National Benevolent Association. It is not likely that Mr. Mohorter will accept. He served the St. James Street Church six years. From there he went to Pueblo, where he remained four years, coming to St. Louis to take charge of the National Benevolent Association. Both Mr. McCreary and Mr. Mohorter are graduates of Hiram College.

The following are the dates of county conventions in Third District, Mo., J. H. Jones, Springfield, Mo., superintendent: Dade Co., Antioch Church Oct. 10-12; Barton Co., Golden City, Oct. 13-14; Cedar Co., Jerico Springs, Oct. 17-19; Vernon Co., Schell City, Oct. 20-21; St. Clair Co., Ohio, Oct. 22-23; Polk Co., Aldrich, Oct. 24-26; Greene Co., Walnut Grove, Oct. 27, 28; Webster Co., Marshfield, Oct. 29-30; Laclede Co., Lebanon, Oct. 31-Nov. 1; Pulaski Co., Crocker, Nov. 3-4; Phelps Co., Roll,a Nov. 5-6; Dent Co., Salem, Nov. 7-9; Jasper Co., Joplin, Nov. 11-12; Barry Co., Cassville, Nov. 13-14.

During the six and one-half years' pastorate of E. Richard Edwards, resigning pastor of Main Street Church, Kokomo, Ind., four hundred persons have taken membership with the church, a $9,000 debt has been paid, and audiences have increased. Mr. Edwards has not yet decided upon his future field.

The death is reported of J. S. Edwards, retired minister of the Aberdeen, Wash., church. Mr. Edwards was a native of England, but most of his work was done in Illinois and Nebraska. He was eighty years of age at the time of his death.

A plan is being advocated for the merger of five churches in Highland Park, Des Moines, Ia. The denominations represented are, Presbyterian, Methodist, Evangelical, Baptist and Disciples.

The annual address for the Orange Co., Calif., Christian Endeavor Union was delivered by Bruce Brown of Fullerton, at the Anaheim convention, Sunday evening, Oct. 5.

By the will of Randall R. Gordon, a wealthy farmer of Taylorville, Ill., First Church, St. Louis, has received a gift of $30,000. The legacy is one-third of the estate.

October 5 was observed by the Cedar Falls, Ia., church as "Men and Boys Day."

Englewood church, the east side congregation of Indianapolis, Ind., is now occupying its enlarged building, having remodeled and refurnished it at a cost of more than eight thousand dollars. One of the best features of improvement is the adequate provision made for a modern graded Sunday-school. Quarters are provided for each department and also for two large adult classes entirely apart from the church auditorium. The dedication was impressive and conducted by home forces, the pastor, E. E. Moorman, preaching the sermon. A. L. Orcutt teacher of one of the adult classes took charge of the subscriptions necessary to cover the expenses, and it is noteworthy that this was entirely provided for in cash and five-year subscriptions.

The Christian churches of Nicholas county, Ky., have become a "living link" again for the support of a missionary in the foreign field, and James C. Ogden, of that county, is to be their missionary. He and his family are to leave about January 1 for Batang, Tibet, where he has been stationed.

The fourth annual report of W. B. Clemmer, pastor at Rockford, Ill., includes the following items: Added to the church, 22; collected toward building fund, $4,321.19; ground broken for new church building May 17, basement to be ready Nov. 1.

The church at Monticello, Ill., has recently burned the mortgage on the building there. The congregation at Monticello is small, but, under H. J. Hostetler, has made a fine record. Not a cent of indebtedness is left to its debit.

J. H. Whistler, pastor at Tulare, Cal., has been elected president of the Tulare Ministerial Union.

Lies, Superintendent of United Charities in Chicago; "Vital Problems in Practical Religion," by Herbert L. Willett, University of Chicago; "Vital Problems of Civic Government," by Alderman Chas. E. Merriam, Chicago; "Vital Problems of Education," by Chas. R. Henderson, University of Chicago.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

THE PARAMOUNT PUZZLE OF THE UNIVERSE.*

By A. Z. Conrad.

What have we in the narrative of the Mesopotamian prophet? It is a fascinating sacred drama; a pause in a pilgrim program to study the paramount puzzle of the universe, human personality. It is an episode in a national evolution. It is an incident interrupting the progress of a people. It deals with disastrous deterioration. It reveals the catastrophe resulting from cupidity. It portrays that mysterious thing which we call personality. "Personality:" the unanswered question of Philosophy; the horizonless field of Theology; the despair of Science; the enigma of Life. "Personality:" a bundle of contradictions; elusive, yet all determining; illusive, yet substantial; harmony with revolution; virility with vacillation; courage with capitulation; purposeful yet perverse; decision with duplicity; courtesy with cruelty; aspiration with deterioration; the crown and glory of creation yet a possible catastrophe epitomized. There is in personality a constant quantity, hence, the lessons which pertain to it are timeless and unaffected by latitude or longitude.

THE MEASURE OF A MAN.

Not "What," but "Why?" The master motive measures the man. Speed counts less than direction. Push has its value in purpose. Piety registers the merits of prayers. Gifts are glorified by their graciousness. Faith is futile without affection. Conviction is cancelled if it is not consecrated. Animus estimates action. Revelation without righteousness neither lifts nor lights. Liberty is limited to a choice of masters. The prevailing passion purifies or paralyzes. It is God or the Adversary, Christ or Belial. Conflicting emotions are heralds of warning. The decline and fall of an empire has its counterpart in the decline and fall of a soul. Hereditary privilege and religious practice exempt none from temptation. The poison of avarice works slowly but surely. The cup must be rejected or health renounced. Sincerity is the fingerboard that points the way to sanctification. Cherishing the desire for forbidden delight sooner or later undermines the citadel of faith.

THE SEER OF PETHOR.

The year is fourteen hundred and sixty, B. C. It is autumn. Standing upon the banks of the Euphrates in Mesopotamia we note the approach of a royal suite, splendidly appareled. Moving with dignity and authority they enter the streets of Pethor and are soon directed to the object of their commission, the "Seer of Pethor." They represent Balak, the king of the Moabites, who has sent them with a summons to Balaam, the far-famed prophet. The sacred drama proceeds with striking imagery, splendid movement, glorious portrayal and profound teaching. We have in the narrative one of the great character studies in literature. In it we discover how human personality baffles all attempt at analysis and renders impossible accurate valuation. This seer of the ancient land of Abraham inherited certain special privileges. The descendants of Nahor and Laban were related to the Israelites in Jehovah worship. However much idolatry may have modified monotheistic conceptions, Jehovah worship was still practiced and Balaam, the son of Beor, was the priest of Jehovah and had gained a wide reputation both for beatitude and malediction. He must have been peculiarly eminent in the latter to have led a distant king to believe in his ability to annihilate enemies by his word.

RELIGION WITHOUT RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Balak, king of the Moabites, was agitated with great fears because the hosts of Israel were encamped upon the plains of Moab. Swift and complete had been the Israelite conquest of Sihon, king of the Amorites and Og, king of Bashan. Fearing to await an open engagement Balak decided in a subtle way to destroy the power of the enemy. He entertained a false notion, namely, that a God to be serviceable must be manageable. What about his own deities? A religion which is not good for an emergency is worthless. It is a historic fact that no people have ever been satisfied with the god they have worshiped until they have found Jehovah the God of the Christians. It is a testimony to the persistence of belief in the reality of a supernatural interest in human affairs, that Balak now sought the help of the distant Seer.

THE SUMMONS.

In right royal fashion he proceeds to summon the seer and to appoint to him the task before he comes. It seems never to have occurred to Balak that the priest of Jehovah might not be purchasable. He finds no inconsistency in calling for a curse by a devotee of religion, upon a people who have never harmed him. Righteousness and religion were unrelated in his thinking. He believed every man had his price and so he proceeded to send the rewards of divination. In his thought anyone who had to do with the supernatural was a soothsayer. It is not therefore necessary to assume that Balak's estimate of Balaam was correct. He reversed the true order and instead of recognizing that the priest of Jehovah must be governed by his God, he assumed that God was controlled by his priest. The request carried its own condemnation. It was an appeal to curse an innocent people who worshiped Jehovah. Without doubt Balaam knew of the signal events which had attended the emancipation of Israel. He was related to them by the ties of religion. He should promptly have declined.

DALLYING WITH DANGER.

Playing with fire is always perilous. Balaam trifled with conscience when he invited the messengers, who had made known their errand, to stay through the night while he sought further revelation. The offered rewards were great and he realized the impossibility of accepting them without at least appearing to give a consideration to the king's desire. Jehovah gave an emphatic "No" to the suggestion of response to Balak's appeal. It was so clear and convincing that the prophet was compelled to decline. In his answer he trifled with truth. He opened a loophole for further negotiation. He had been flattered by the message of the king: "For I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed and he whom thou cursest is cursed." He desired to reject the invitation and still retain the favor of the king. Jehovah had said to him, "Thou shalt not curse the people for they are blessed," but Balaam said, "The Lord refuses to give me leave to go with you." He does not say why. A second commission more imposing follows. V. 15. "And Balak sent yet again Princes more, and more honorable than they," with this promise, "For I will promote thee unto very great honor. I will do whatsoever thou sayest unto me." In his answer Balaam shows at his best. "If Balak should give me his house full of silver and gold I cannot go beyond the words of the Lord my God to do less or more." That listens well. But wait. He adds, "Now therefore tarry ye here this night that I may know what the Lord will say unto me more." The struggle was on between allegiance and avarice. The poison was working. Conscience was commanding him while desire was devouring. He should have known the finality of the decision of Jehovah. It indicates the breaking down of loyalty to the altars which he served. Right here, in my judgment, we have the key to the whole situation. His prestige and his authority did not save him. He was on the watershed and had it in his power to turn the current either way. He turned it the wrong way.

WORSHIP AND WILFULNESS.

Balak met him at the extreme borders of his dominion. He proposes to co-operate with him and is eager for the immediate application of supernatural powers to annihilate his enemy. Altars and sacrifices are called into requisition at once. There could be no greater perversion of religious truth than to suppose that sacrifices could command and control the will of God. Worship is impossible without obedience. To ignore a definite manifestation of God's will and insist upon some other answer than he has given, indicates a perverseness which will defeat the commands of conscience and the call of God. He was seeking not to know God's way but to have his own way. Still he was not willing to part company with Jehovah. The grip of his religion was strong upon him. He was led to an advantageous point from which he might behold the camp of the invaders. Under the spell of spiritual influence he could not control, he broke forth into prophetic utterance and beautiful pictorial portrayal, weighted with blessing for the people whom he had been called to curse.

CHANGED VIEWPOINT.

Surprised and alarmed Balak concluded that a changed viewpoint might change a blessing into a curse. Today we are told that there is everything in viewpoint; that the different attitude toward truth is determined by point of view. We must hark back to this old time drama to learn the immutability of God, the changelessness of truth, the eternity of truth. The vacillating nature of the prophet becomes increasingly apparent. He is himself willing to hearken to the appeal of the king and once more altars and sacrifices are employed not to know the mind of God but to enforce the will of the prince and to procure the perverse desires of a declining prophet. Once more he is controlled and commanded and in an ecstasy of beatitude paints the future glories of Israel. A third attempt results in a more ardent and far-reaching declaration of the permanent conquests of Israel, and both star and sceptre are employed to indicate the coming glory and dominion, first of the Davidic and then of the Messianic Kingdom. Sequel: Priest and prince separated with mutual contempt. Every reference to Balaam in the New Testament is in the line of reproach and condemnation. The reference in Revelations, ch. 2, indicates that the degeneracy which set in when Balaam declined to rest his case upon distinct revelation, continued until he was utterly lost. He is accredited with the responsibility of the disaster which befell the Israelites through lust and idolatry. Rev. 2:14. The lure of luxury was too much for him. Though compelled to pronounce blessing upon Israel he seems to have taught Balaam how to win his evil purpose by appealing to the sensuous desires of Israel inviting them to the heathen feasts, tempting them with women and wine until many of them were led to immorality and the grossest idolatry, with subsequent punishment. He took up his residence in Midian and was slain with the five kings (Numbers 31:8).

LIFE LESSONS.

The element of finality is important in all decisions of duty.

True religion cannot be used for selfish ends.

Evasions of truth are invariably enervating spiritually.

The difficulties of retreat double the danger of decline.

Intellectual faith must be also affectional or it fails.

Slumbering fires of covetousness will inevitably destroy the ship and cargo.

No schemes of men can circumvent the Divine will.

Sacrifices without surrender are useless.

View-points do not affect Truth-points.

Human maledictions can never destroy Divine beatitude.

It is possible to have just religion enough to lose the rewards of both worlds.

It is one thing to know the Revelation of God and quite another to know the God of revelation.

The "star" and "sceptre" in the vision of the prophet are the supreme fact in the world's history.

When the shout of a king is heard in the camp, false princes and false prophets can neither destroy nor dislodge.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

OUR EXAMPLE.

Oct. 22. 1 Peter 2:21.

The psychologist tells us that imitation plays an important part in the formation of our habits. The ethical teacher emphasizes the necessity of having the right kind of actions to imitate. The man reflects his early surroundings. Our character is in large part formed before we begin to reason about imitation and examples. If our parents are wise and good, we get the right start. If they are foolish and morally weak, we are very apt to find ourselves endowed with a stock of pernicious habits when we come to the age of reason.

The most unfavorable surroundings have in them something that is good. The most frivolous parents have moments of moral sanity. It would be difficult, impossible, to find a human being entirely devoid of good habits. These good habits form the basis for others. The mature person needs good examples and can profit by them greatly.

Loyalty.

The life of Jesus exhibits the highest loyalty. It has in all ages been deemed a virtue to be true to one's country. Patriotism has ever been praised most extravagantly. Loyalty to the family has been the theme of poet and orator from time immemorial. The friend ceases to be a friend when his loyalty is questionable. On the first reading of what Jesus says to his disciples about following him, it might appear that he denies the value of the common loyalties. He demands absolute obedience even at the cost of race pride, family affection, and cherished friendships. But closer examination shows that he is teaching a loyalty that includes all others. If it is necessary to forsake father and mother, the father and mother are asking of their children a loyalty that is narrow. A nation may be wrong and loyalty to it may require that the best citizens teach what a majority call treason. A friend loses his claim upon us when he thinks that for his sake we should smother our convictions.

Suffering

Jesus invites us to live the strenuous life. The songs of the church that best proclaim the gospel are battle hymns. The wars of the Lord are always in progress. The method of warfare changes from age to age, the war never ceases. Wicked men fight to retain their privileges. The disciple of Jesus, if he follow the example of his Master, demands unconditional surrender of the hosts of evil doers. They know that he is against them and they make all the trouble for him that they can. He must endure something for the sake of Christ or deny the faith. The persecutors may be in the church and occupy the seats of power. A man's faith may cause him to be accused of denying the faith. Jesus opposed evil and ignorant men and he accepted the consequences. He did not complain. The disciple cannot have comfort as the first object of his ambition. He must learn to rejoice in doing his work well and faithfully and to count the opposition he arouses as a testimony to his effectiveness.

Humility

The humble man does whatever work comes to his hand. While other persons are discussing their dignity, he is performing a useful act. Peter and John thought it was unbecoming in persons of their standing to wash the feet of a fellow disciple. Jesus did not have to maintain his standing by refraining from a kindly ministry. If one is great enough, he can lift the most humble service to a place of honor. The little fellow needs to be on his guard lest he do the work of an inferior. We have allowed the despots to teach us what nobility is, men who have made human life and virtue secondary to their ambitions. Jesus has told us man is first. From him we must learn what is great and what is small. The great one is he that serves, this we have not fully grasped. The humble man places no obstacles of foolish pride in the way of duty.

Lord, Delay Thy Coming!

By Secretary Bert Wilson

Sharpe Rec'd Dec 13
5622 Kimbark Ave

DELAY thy coming, O Lord, for we are not prepared to stand at the Judgment. Give us time to perform some of the neglected tasks of the Church. Give us a hundred years in China to take thy Word to untold millions who know it not. If thou shouldst appear "in the same manner" tomorrow, the Chinese would perish in darkness.

Come not speedily, O God, for the sake of Tibet. Allow Shelton and Ogden their hearts' desire in taking the Gospel into Lassa. Thou didst pile the mountains so high, that only the strong and brave can cross over into that hermit nation. But we are sending re-inforcements. Give us more time to do thy will!

Our task, O Lord, is unfinished in the Dark Continent. We need three more generations to send the Light. And thou, dear Lord, hast just taken Ray Eldred away from Africa. To us it seemed that Africa needed him more than heaven. But thy will be done! Only stay thy coming until we can send out others to take his place.

And then, Our Father, we must have more time to spread the Word in Japan. We plead for the Philippines, and sad India, and all the other people to whom we have been slow in sending the Gospel of thy Son. Be patient with us through the years. We will with increasing energy try to atone for our past negligence. We cannot bear, O Lord, to come to Judgment with the souls of those who sit in darkness as a testimony against us.

Our Father, give us time to practice our great plea. The plea has been made by a stingy people. We have kept back our money and our children. Give us a chance to give out of our abundance and to dedicate our children as thou didst dedicate thy Son.

Lord God, Author of one great Church in the beginning, give us time to reunite its divided forces. We will rebuild a great united Church, founded upon thy Word alone, if thou wilt give us time.

Give us time, O Lord, to prepare for thy coming. Answer not the prayers of those who plead for thy immediate appearance. Too many of us are unprepared. We cannot bear to stand in Judgment with our task undone. We cannot bear to look upon His face until we have done his will. Much as we would like to be with thee, we dare not come empty handed. Thou knowest, O Lord, our task is hard; the way is long; our feet are slow; our hearts sometimes are stubborn. But give us time. Bring us not speedily to Judgment. Come not upon us unawares. Cause us not to look upon thy face in suddenness. O give us time, and we will spread thy Truth through all the earth. We will obey thy will in every land. We will crown thy Son our King and Lord, and every knee shall bow in humble adoration, for the sake of the unredeemed millions, and for the sake of Jesus Christ, our Lord, Amen.

The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade

A Celebration in Gladness and in Service

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY will be thirty years old next January 1st. It is proposed to hold a celebration worthy of its ripe age, worthy of its great service to the Disciples of Christ, and, above all else, worthy of the vast opportunity for further service to the cause of progressive and constructive Christianity before which it now stands.

In this celebration the way is to be opened for everybody to participate, from those who have but a fraction of a degree of interest in The Century and its ideals to those who are the ardent champions of its cause.

No friend will be left outside. The humblest and the mightiest will be there. The poor and the rich are invited. Laymen and ministers will mingle together. "Conservatives" and "liberals" will share equally the satisfaction of paying honor to the newspaper that has solved the problem of being independent without being un-Christian, of being loyal without losing its message, of being evangelical without becoming reactionary, of being progressive without becoming a mere "free-lance."

It will be a mighty celebration. Its token and symbol will be, not a crown—golden or laurel—for a race well run, but a girdle for a race just begun. Congratulations will be on every lip. Appreciations will form themselves into words to gladden the heart of her whose natal day it is. But mingling with the thousands who say "Well done!" there will be heard the inspiring "Go on!" of those who sense the strategic hour to which the years have brought us.

It will be a joyous festival.

It will also have an earnest and purposeful side.

There will be the vivid realization by the friends of The Christian Century that the paper now deserves a kind of support it has never before been in a position to ask: it now deserves substantial gifts at the hands of its friends in large and smaller sums of money—outright gifts from those who share the ideals it is striving to foster.

Birthday Gifts to The Christian Century!

BIRTHDAY gifts to The Christian Century!—that is what the years have brought her to the point of deserving.

In the utmost frankness, and without the slightest suggestion of apology, The Christian Century opens its columns to let its friends be told just what gifts it most needs and to let a plan be elaborated by which all her friends may work together—as if in one great organization—to make their gifts attain the utmost practical value to her.

Here is the thing upon which all friends of The Century are invited to co-operate:

Let us give her for her birthday twenty thousand new subscribers and twenty thousand dollars to pay for them!

What every newspaper lives on is subscriptions. What The Christian Century now deserves is a great increase in its list of readers. The hour has struck for a concerted forward movement of all its present readers, its editors, its business manager, and its humble servant, the circulation manager, to bring a great host of new readers to know the message of this newspaper, to know it by actually reading it for a full year.

Circular letters cannot tell them.

A sample copy or two or three cannot adequately convey to them the inspiration The Century will bring into their homes and their lives.

Nothing but the continuous reading of the paper for a solid stretch of a year will give it a fair chance to create for itself a place in their affection like that which it now holds in the hearts of its present loyal friends.

We get better results from our circular letters than most newspapers do.

We receive a higher percentage of new subscriptions from sample copies sent out than most papers do.

But it would take years to add twenty thousand new subscribers by the slow methods of circulars and sample copies.

The Christian Century ought to have these twenty thousand new subscribers NOW.

We must all work together and get them for her.

And while we are working together to get the twenty thousand names we must all work together to get twenty thousand dollars to pay for them!

That is not an impossible thing to do if we are willing to do a little team work between now and the first of January. Let us look at our team and see what kind of work we may expect from it.

There are three members of this team, 1) the Disciples Publication Society, 2) the friends who send in the names, and 3) the friends who send in the money.

What will member number one do?

The Disciples Publication Society agrees to make a special rate of one dollar for every gift subscription received in this Anniversary Crusade. The price of the paper is regularly two dollars a year, unless paid in advance, when it is $1.50 a year. As all the subscriptions in this Crusade will be paid in advance this makes a concession of 50 cents on each one, which amounts to a pledge of $10,000 to start the Crusade?

That is pretty good for a start, is it not? And what will member number two do?

The friends who wish to send in names have the easiest time of it. All you need to do is to write the names down on the blank on page 4 of this paper, giving whatever information is asked for there, and send in the blank with just as many names as you think it desirable to put on. It costs you not one cent to do this—no, that is an error. It will cost you the price of a postage stamp to mail your list to the circulation manager! But that is every bit of expense you will incur. It would seem as if the second member of the team will have an easy time of it! Very well. But the goal will not be gained unless this member pulls with all his might.

And now for member number three. This member of the team is to furnish twenty thousand dollars to send The Christian Century to the twenty thousand names sent in by member number two. The time was when it would have been impossible to have included member number three in such a team as this. But now The Christian Century is not the property of any private individuals whatever; it is owned by the whole body of Disciples of Christ and is published on their behalf for the interpretation of their plea for Christian unity to the whole Christian world. No millionaire sustains it. It makes its appeal to the many for an adequate financial basis. Recently a number of our good friends responded to the solicitation for capital, and provided a sufficient sum to enable the paper to hold up its head with a dignity becoming its character while an opportunity was given the hundreds of other friends the country over to finance a Crusade such as this we are announcing. This group of friends provided us with just enough to start and carry on this Crusade for an adequate subscription list. One man put $5,000 at our disposal, another $2,000. Others subscribed in amounts of $1,000, $600, $500, $300, and many in amounts of $100. The money they gave was of vital importance to us. But more important than the money was the revelation that the friends of the cause which The Christian Century represents have a sense of responsibility, a genuine conscience for supporting the type of religious journalism which this paper represents.

These initial supporters but laid the foundation. It remains for all our friends—hundreds of them, the whole country over—to build the superstructure. The superstructure of a newspaper is its subscription list.

There is absolutely no doubt that if our friends will furnish us the twenty thousand names, conscientiously selected according to the instructions in this announcement, and if our friends will pay for sending The Century for one year to this list, this paper will have been put high and dry above financial stress. And not only that, but The Christian Century will attain the sweep and depth of influence for its message for which all its friends have so long prayed.

Will you, loyal reader, whose eye is just now upon these words, have your part with us in this great Crusade?

There is one misconstruction we wish to guard against very carefully. Do not let one single soul imagine that he must accompany his list of names with a gift of money. Our whole purpose will be thwarted if that notion gets into any one's mind. We will not object to receiving a check in the same envelope with the list of names, but, in all sincerity, we do not ask it to be done that way. Those who send names must feel no slightest need of apologizing for not sending money. We wish the lists of names to stand entirely by themselves.

We must make ourselves very plain on this point. They who send to us a conscientiously prepared list of names make a great and substantial contribution to the Crusade thereby. Let us have the names. Let us have them now.

What will we do with the names when we receive them and the money for them?

We will put them on our subscription list and, with the first copy of the paper they receive, we will send a letter explaining to them that they are to receive The Christian Century for one full year as a gift from some other readers of the paper who believe they will enjoy it and who wish them to make such an acquaintance with its spirit and message as only a year's reading can give. We will ask them to accept it with the clear understanding that they are under absolutely no obligation of any sort, and that their names will be dropped from the list at the expiration of the year unless they specifically ask to have the paper continued.

Every sender of names may be assured that the recipients of the paper will be treated with the utmost courtesy and made to feel no obligation whatsoever.

* * *

We wish to start you THINKING about making a gift of money on this Crusade.

But we wish to START YOU WORKING RIGHT NOW at the task of preparing and forwarding your list of names.

And incidentally we would be glad—mighty glad—to have a line from you right out of your heart telling us whether you think The Christian Century deserves success in such a Crusade as this.

Let the Names Roll In!

FOUR thousand of the twenty thousand names will be Disciple ministers not now subscribing. Their names will be compiled in our office from the Disciples' Year Book.

We wish our present readers to provide us with the remaining 16,000 names upon whom these gift subscriptions may be bestowed. We ask you to give earnest thought in making up your lists, selecting those persons who would, in your judgment, like to read the same sort of religious weekly that pleases you.

OUR PRIMARY INTEREST IS TO SECURE THE NAMES OF PERSONS WHO, AFTER READING THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY ONE YEAR, WILL BE LIKELY TO SUBSCRIBE FOR IT ON THEIR OWN ACCOUNT FOR ANOTHER YEAR.

Each person may be of almost any theological attitude. Open-minded "conservatives" find almost as much pleasure in The Christian Century as do open-minded "progressives." The paper appeals to no partisan constituency. It pleads for the "open mind." Let that hint guide you in selecting your names.

Another hint: Your list should include those who possess a degree of intelligent interest in church matters. We find that our subscribers who "stick" are almost always the more intelligent and the more earnest ones. The Century is a dead-in-earnest paper, devoid of claptrap, sensationalism, church gossip, and it makes its appeal to persons intelligent enough to desire the kind of aid it gives. Note however that we say intelligent IN CHURCH MATTERS. Not mere academic culture but Christian culture—this is what we want you to keep in mind in making out your list.

We trust implicitely the good judgment of our readers. You will try to make your selection of names not merely from the standpoint of bestowing a favor upon personal friends, but from the standpoint of securing ultimately a list of permanent subscribers for The Christian Century.

Let the names roll in!

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

"I Am Debtor"

When an idle man affirms that the world owes him a living, and we hasten to deny it and declare that the world owes a living only to him who earns it, our theory contradicts our practice. Practically, we are admitting that the world owes every man a living. It is a dangerous admission and it costs us high.

In the first place we admit that the child that ought not to have been born ought to live now that he is born. Thus we permit life to exist which we believe ought to have been prevented by better morals and more careful marriage laws governing the choice of those who are to assume the responsibility of parenthood.

Again, though our theory holds that the right to a living belongs only to him who earns it, we constantly tax ourselves through church and state for the maintenance of the lame and the lazy. Though we cannot compel them to work we will not permit them to starve.

We admit by our practice that the unworthy must live, and that we owe them a living, so we spend untold millions in jails, hospitals, asylums and Keeley cures. We work for those who not only do not earn a living but have proved for the most part that continued life to them means a continued burden to others. Still further, we will not let a man die who wants to die. If he jumps off the dock we rescue him even though against his will. If he attempts to starve himself we force food between his teeth.

This being our practice, we ought to adjust our theory to it; we ought indeed to place the dam nearer to the springs. We ought to provide ways in which the proportion shall be lessened of those who constitute the burden of society. And we ought, if we can, find on what basis we have adopted a practice so much more liberal than the theory we so stoutly maintain.

Over against the pitiful chorus of the multitude who claim a living from the world the Apostle Paul uttered his strong and confident declaration that he owed something to the world and was prepared to meet his obligations. He might have affirmed that the world owed him a living—either as a teacher or a tent maker. In either capacity he earned it. His is the declaration of the strong, confident, freeborn soul, unwilling to accept a place of helplessness, but gladly offering to be a burden-bearer for others.

To whom do we owe anything and for what? We owe something to those who have done something for us. That, by the very simplest laws of justice, constitutes a portion of our indebtedness. It is not a small company who minister to our wants and increase our wealth in the world. Parents, teachers, protectors and friends constitute only the inner circle of a group that widens upon every intelligent consideration. The conditions of our modern life have become so complicated that all the toilers on land and sea bring the product of their labor to our daily table. There is an old story of a man who told his children that he would serve them a pudding that had cost the work of one hundred men. To their surprise it was only an ordinary pudding, but into it had gone wheat from Minnesota with the toil of farmers, millers, merchants, railroads and teamsters. In it were raisins from California and spices from Arabia. A very ordinary pudding might truthfully claim to be the product of the toil of a thousand men and no small number of women. The clothing upon our backs in its variety of cotton, linen, wool and silk represents toil and products on both sides of the ocean. It is hard for us to consider the most commonplace interests of life without remembering how through them we are related to multitudes of people whose total numbers scores of thousands.

But if any man shall say, "I pay for my food and have a receipt in full for my clothing and that finishes my obligation," such a man would show a very limited idea of the quality of real justice. A sound and permanent political economy can rest on no other basis than the mutual well being of all parties to any transaction. The simplest kind of justice makes me debtor to all whose labor enters into my comfort. Not only so, but one's own personal security in the use of other men's labor requires a recognition of his debt to them.

Yet, Paul's conception of his debt to mankind was not based on the mere laws of political economy. It was founded on the principles of a universal brotherhood and he discovered its meaning in the sacrificial love of Jesus Christ. All the littleness and bigotry of Jewish prejudice, all that isolated mankind from the great interests that lay hold on the high things of human destiny, he cast aside as unworthy of one who had discovered the true meaning of life at the foot of the Cross of Calvary.

We are debtor to those who are to do something for others. We are debtor to those who can never repay the debt. We are like St. Christopher, who, taking up the thankless and dangerous burden, discovered in the helpless but heavy child upon our backs the mighty and saving Christ. We become Christ-bearers in the recognition of our obligation to all men.

Down to Nanking

Continuing the Oriental Travel Sketches.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

EARLY on the Saturday morning of our river trip on the Yangtse, the Chinese cabin steward on the "Tukwo" came to my door and said something which I interpreted as an inquiry if I wanted hot water. I did not, nor was I anxious to be awakened at so early an hour. But in a few minutes he came back and made me understand that someone wished to see me, handing in at the same time the card of Alexander Paul. By that time I became aware that the ship had stopped, and hurrying into garments I went out into the cabin to find that we were tied up at Wuhu, and that Mr. Paul and Miss Kate Gould Miller, our missionaries there, had learned of our presence on the ship and had come down to see us.

From the information gained aboard I supposed we should stop at Wuhu for a very few minutes some time in the night; and had not thought it possible to meet any of the missionary force. All the more satisfactory therefore was the brief visit we enjoyed, in which Mr. Paul outlined somewhat the character of work he is doing, and Miss Miller told us of her schools.

The stay of the boat was very brief, and we had no opportunity to go ashore. Nor did Mr. Paul tell half we wanted to know regarding his work. But from others who knew the facts something was learned later. The city of Wuhu suffered very severely in the floods and the revolutionary outbreaks of the previous year. Some of the mission property was swept away, as the place was near the center of the flood district. Part of the time the reading room was the only part of the mission property that could be kept open. But the Chinese gathered in eagerly, especially to get the war news.

REFORM WORK AT WUHU.

Mr. Paul has been able to secure acquaintance and friendly relations with several influential men in the city. Their efforts in the anti-opium war and other reforms have been effective. Several lectures on law and good government have been given. Once Dr. Macklin came up from Nanking and spoke in the theater to an audience of two thousand. But one of the most effective lines of work to which Mr. Paul has devoted himself has been development of industrial instruction. A small school was started where the boys work half a day and study half a day. Wicker chairs, tables and stools are made, and towels are woven. These are easily disposed of, and some income is thus derived.

But perhaps the most outstanding work done was in the reconstruction of the dike at Wu Li Bri, where the Yangtse flooded the Wu Wei district. Mr. Paul was put in full charge of this work by the officials of the district. Over fifty thousand taels were spent in the repair. Seven thousand men were employed, and the task of securing provisions, and keeping shelters in the stormy time was very great. As a result Mr. Paul is held in high regard by the people of the region.

It is always the tendency of those who observe outward results alone to discount an effort which does not yield immediate returns in conversions, and even the missionaries, who know well that such signs of growth are not always the most reliable, are in danger of yielding to depression of spirit if their labors do not result in conversions that can be counted in missionary reports. Yet this is only part of the account. It is often the case that the most effective labor in a field is the sort which shows least in visible results for years. It is far better to win the confidence of a community by neighborliness, and nourish the seeds of cleanliness, decency and industrial competence, even though conversions come more slowly, than to win the quick adherence of only partially prepared believers at the expense of a more permanent ministry. The sort of missionary work Mr. Paul is doing at Wuhu is sure to have a transforming effect upon the whole city, and that is Christian work of the most satisfactory and substantial sort.

All too soon the signal was given for departure, and we had to bid our friends goodbye. We did not see Miss Edna Dale, another of the staff. Mrs. Paul was expected back from America in a short time. And Dr. and Mrs. Paul Wakefield have been an effective force, especially on the medical side.

The sixty-five miles to Nanking were covered that forenoon, and by mid-day we were approaching the floating dock at the old southern capital. As we came up to the landing stage we were delighted to see Mr. Sarvis waiting to welcome us. It seemed almost like meeting one of our own family. Already, before the boat touched the dock, we had introduced him to most of the people aboard the "Tukwo."

The boat was to stop for two hours, and several of the passengers wished to see something of the place. The city is more than three miles from the river, and while there is a train that runs back and forth, the easiest method of seeing something of Nanking in a short time is to take carriages. To the serious task of getting our friends off on their carriage trip Mr. Sarvis first addressed himself, leaving us to wait for the quieter moments after the first landing confusion was over.

SOME EXCITING EXPERIENCES.

In the midst of a confusion that had Babel outdistanced many degrees, Mr. Sarvis proceeded to selected the carriages needed for the sight-seeing party. He seemed in imminent danger several times from the violence of drivers who were determined he should include their bony steeds in his list of eligibles. At last, however, there was a final shout, and the cavalcade moved off.

Then he returned to us, bestowed our baggage in some more of the carriages, put us into others, and we started for Nanking. First we drove through the streets of the harbor town, past the railroad station and across the bridge. Then shortly we reached the city wall, and passed through the gate. But this is two miles and more from the Drum Tower, where you really begin to enter the city. And all the way between you seem to be in the open country, with fields, gardens, wood-lots and occasionally houses on both sides of the road.

A crowd of all sorts of people was moving along the road, some going to the town and others toward the harbor. There were carts, rickshaws, donkeys, coolies, beggars, and people of all other vocations. On the right not far from the gate we passed the American consulate, where we called another day. Still further, on the opposite side, were the buildings of the Nanking Exposition, held a few years ago.

APPROACHING DRUM TOWER.

But at last we swung into a narrower, ascending street, on either side of which were little shops, and had to work our way more slowly through the crowd that filled the road. And just ahead of us, at the top of the little hill, stood the Drum Tower, the ancient city gate, a venerable pile of brick from whose top a commanding view of the entire district can be obtained. This was a landmark for which we had long been watching. For who among the Disciples does not know of this gate, and the work that Dr. Macklin and his colleagues have been working at since 1886? Who that has read Mrs. Laura De Lany Garst's stirring book, "In the Shadow of the Drum Tower," needs to be told more about the place?

We were soon in the missionary compound, and finding our way to the open homes of the missionaries. It seemed almost like the end of the journey. Nanking is the greatest of the missionary stations of the Disciples of Christ. The names of its workers are familiar in every household among our churches, where missionary facts are known. We felt as if we must see everything at once.

But other days were coming, and we had for that evening the greater joy of intimate fellowship with the friends we had not seen for many months. In the comfortable home of the Sarvises, who seem almost members of our family group, so long were they with us in Chicago, we talked of many things, and had long thoughts of those who were still closer to us in the family circle, and were so many leagues away. And so the night enfolded us in the old Nanking.

Amid Perils in China

A Thrilling Experience Told in a Friendly Letter.

BY EMMA LYON.

EDITORS' NOTE: That the age of heroism is not in the past is revealed by the following story of adventure in China, told by Miss Emma Lyon, missionary of the Foreign Society, in a letter written on September 7 to a relative in America. The letter is of value. not only as a human document of intense interest, but also because it describes the situation at Nanking at the time of the writing of the letter.

I REACHED Nanking Friday. The way seemed to be prepared for me. The One who promised to be with me led. I got off the large boat onto a steam launch, then went ashore. The launch is used by customs officials only, but somehow they consented to take me. I had to go more than two miles on it. I could get no ricksha or carriage, so called five boys to carry my baggage and I started to walk. We went less than a mile, then one of the boys found a ricksha for me. Then we started off again. We went less than half a mile and met a carriage. Most of the horses and carriages had been taken by the soldiers, so there were very few in the whole city. If the Lord was not leading, how was I so fortunate? Even at three dollars, when one usually pays seventy cents, I was thankful. After I reached home the servants told of their narrow escape, how the Lord had saved them. Two shells and a number of small bullets had fallen inside our compound. One shell fell about twenty feet away from the school building. A few women had come in for protection. Many more would have come if I had been here. The matron did not feel like taking the responsibility. I had not left my American flag out, so the matron and one of the other women made one, and it looks quite well. They have it on top of the school building.

HOW PROVIDENCE PROTECTED.

Another fact indicates how I was cared for the day I entered. Hundreds of the Northern soldiers passed me on the way. None of them was rude to me. I saw two other ladies in the afternoon and found that they did not go out at all without an American man with them. I cannot tell you the cruel things the Northern soldiers had been doing. There are worse things than death. They have looted a good part of the city, hundreds being left without anything; but the worst is, they are stealing the young women. I have over twenty women and girls in here that I am protecting. They shall not take one as long as I can do a thing. The girls sleep in the house with me and the women at the school. There is nothing so bad as war.

Some of the people have been in since I began to write this, and they say things are better on the main streets today than a few days ago, but there is still looting on the small streets. It is dreadful to hear the cries from outside our compound. Miss Kelly came last evening and stayed overnight. She got a carriage this morning to go to Hsia Kwan after her trunk, then went on down to her home. She took my American flag to put on the carriage, so no one would take it. It was the flag I had on the house during the Revolution. Two men came to ask me to take their sisters down to get on the boat. They were afraid that, if a foreigner were not with them, their things would be stolen. Then a young woman came in to ask if I could take another girl in for protection. All of the people had sad stories to tell.

A Convention Afterthought

BY W. J. LHAMON.

The red lantern was not needed. There was after all no ditch into which anybody could fall. The danger signal hung where the street was perfectly straight and smooth. It is said that history repeats herself. She does not. She cannot. She makes progress, going from stage to stage, now and again giving only the faintest echoes of some past cry of hers. An ecclesiasticism today would be an anachronism. Democracy is everywhere in the ascendant. Monarchies, autocracies, and aristocracies are falling. We could not be mediaeval if we would; we would not if we could. The day is forever gone when the few can "lord it" over the many. The many are too nearly the intellectual equals of the few, and they have learned that they are by rights their full brothers.

The whole world cries out against a repetition of mediaeval growths. Pulpit and press and parlor and platform are all democratic. The college is a guardian of liberties. The home is the mother of equality. The Church is the herald of fraternity. The open Bible forbids a closed circle of priestly potentates. Fraternities, legislatures, congresses and parliaments are but the mediums for the expression of the "common sense of most."

THEN AND NOW CONTRASTED.

When the dreaded ecclesiasticism arose everything was different. The people en masse were illiterate. There was no press. There was no great, popular public school system. Books were scarce and their prices prohibitive to all but the few. The empire of Rome filled the civilized world. The Caesars reigned, and democracies were not. Later, while Rome was falling the barbarians were coming, our grandfathers, East Goth, West Goth, Teuton, Frank, Jute, Saxon, and Vandal, wave upon wave of them, sweeping on, conquering, and being conquered. The Church, first driven to centralization by persecution, found herself during the fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth centuries face to face with the dying empire and the surging, idolatrous mass of conquering barbarism. What could she do? She did precisely what she could, and her history tells the story. She saved herself and her world by becoming a great and centralized power. Her unity was her strength, and her ecclesiasticism was the condition of her unity. The thing we all cry out against now was the inevitable thing then, and our cry against it now is simply our keen sense of having outgrown it. The conditions that made Charlemagne possible, and his great bishops, and his wisely placed bishopricks necessary, and his state Church inevitable, can never return. We need not fear. The cry against a representative convention is a cry against that deeper democracy which seeks to know and express the will and spirit of the greater numbers. The cry against ecclesiasticism has already been made in the spirit of the times better than by any individual. The red light was not needed. Nearly everybody knew that, and the convention passed off sweetly. Let us pray—and read our history books over again. Amen.

WILSON ON PROGRESS.

Well, we have started now at all events. The procession is under way. The standpatter doesn't know there is a procession. He is asleep in the back part of his house. He doesn't know that the road is resounding with the tramp of men going to the front. And when he wakes up, the country will be empty. He will be deserted, and he will wonder what has happened, declares the President in the Chicago News.

We are going to climb the slow road until it reaches some upland where the air is fresher, where the whole talk of mere politicians is stilled, where men can look in each other's faces and see that there is nothing to conceal, that all they have to talk about they are willing to talk about in the open and talk about with each other; and whence, looking back over the road, we shall see at last that we have fulfilled our promise to mankind. We had said to all the world, "America was created to break every kind of monopoly and to set men free, upon a footing of equality, upon a footing of oppportunity to match their brains and their energies," and now we have proved that we meant it.

"Painted Windows"

BY FRANK WALLER ALLEN.

"No man lives in the external truth, among salts and acids; but in the warm, phantasmagoric chamber of his brain, with the painted windows and storied walls."—From Lantern Bearers.

ROBERT Louis Stevenson taught me the philosophy of painted windows. Your man of dreams is the real man, after all; and what a man would like to be, and tries to be, yet cannot always be, is the man for me. It isn't so much what he does, you know, but what he sees, that makes him big and true, gentle and unafraid. It is the man at the window whom we love. And herein is to be found the reason why we love R. L. S. so well: He stood at the window—the brave, adventurous, painted window—and told us of the world he saw.

There are many histories of men and countries I do not care to read. They are merely compilations of facts; and fact is not always truth. We are more than fortunate in having but meager and uncertain facts about such makers of literature as Johnson and Shakespeare. They, themselves, have left us, in the record of their storied walls and painted windows, the truth, and that is all we need to know. Facts often distort the truth. To know a man for what he was, you must be able to look at him through his own painted windows . . . . I know more of Izaak Walton in a chapter of "The Compleat Angler" than in three hundred pages of a "Life." Thus do I know Herrick in three bits of verse; Waller in two; Lovelace in one.

For much the same reasons I am by Scotland as I am by Italy and Heaven and France: I fear to visit them lest I should spoil the view from my painted windows. My Scots are Alan Breck, Rob Roy, Piping Willie, Highland Mary and such. Why should I, who know they live and fight and fiddle and love, go a-visiting where I should have the garrulous guide pointing out the one-time homes, or the tombstones of the so-called originals, while he gave me the "real" facts? Even a tombstone is no place for facts!

Now others would have me believe that a railway runs from old Paris to the English channel, and that Louis XIV, of merry whim, is dead. Such are facts, I'm told. But have I not made that self-same trip from the city by the Seine to London town with D'Artagnan, Porthos, Athos and Aramis, a hundred times—yes, at least one hundred times—with never so matter-of-fact and material a thing as a railroad within a hundred years or two? It is a sort of happy, golden, sunrise road through the painted windows.

Yes, I remember the voluptuaries on the throne, the Revolution, Murat, the good, the bad. It makes me thank Life for the storied walls, for fairies, for my painted windows.

So, for at least today, why should I need to know any other Scotland than Stevenson and Walter Scott and Robert Burns and Barrie? And who, after all, are the historians of "la belle France?" Surely not Guizot and Michelet? Rather are they not Honore Balzac, old Dumas, Rabelais, Anatole France? For me, Francois Villon is ever young, ever loving, perhaps ever thieving, certainly ever kicking his heels on wine casks in savory tap-rooms, all the while reciting ballades and madrigals to groups of large-eyed rogues and amorous girls. . . Who dares to say that Pierre Ronsard is not yet at the court of Charles, making musical verses to the brows of his Cassandra? Moreover, all you who are dealers in whimsicalities and love so well your painted windows, will not deny me, for the lack of silly facts, when I tell you I am quite sure that flute-playing Dr. Campion, with his wit and pills and triolets, was physician to Will Shakespeare, Painter of Windows. You will know it for the rose-colored truth when I say that I have heard old Izaak Walton read aloud to Tom Carew by the river's brim; and that Robin Hood and Friar Tuck and Mab and Puck are friends of mine—personal friends!

Yes, there are times, too, when the evening sun paints with opalescent hues the immeasurable distances which lie beyond the Hills of Hope, that the man at the window views the Land-of-a-Thousand-Years-from-Now. . . There was once a Man, standing on a barren little hill without a city wall, serene, with dreaming face, while soldiers hurried and women wept. The ugliness, the sin, the shame of that day were not in His eyes. Through Painted Windows he saw the World that was to be, and he was glad.

Now tell me, You who understand so well "the great task of happiness," is this not so: To be a maker of windows, a painter of glass, that is the work; and the man at the window is the true philosopher.

Roosevelt's Early Experiences

The Ex-President Tells of His Early Struggles as a Reformer in New York City.

When I ran for speaker the whole body of machine politicians was against me and my only chance lay in arousing the people in the different districts. To do this I had to visit the districts, put the case fairly before the men whom I saw and make them understand that I was really making a fight and would stay in the fight to the end. Yet there were reformers who shook their heads and deplored my "activity" in the canvass. Of course, the one thing which corrupt machine politicians most desire is to have decent men frown on the activity—that is, on the efficiency—of the honest man who genuinely wishes to reform politics. So declares the ex-President in a recent issue of The Chicago News.

If efficiency is left solely to bad men, and if virtue is confined solely to inefficient men, the result cannot be happy. When I entered politics there were, as there always had been—and as there always will be—any number of bad men in politics who were thoroughly efficient, and any number of good men who would like to have done lofty things in politics, but who were thoroughly inefficient. If I wished to accomplish anything for the country, my business was to combine decency and efficiency; to be a thoroughly practical man of high ideals who did his best to reduce those ideals to actual practice. This was my ideal, and to the best of my ability I strove to live up to it.

In one session of the legislature the New York city democratic representatives were split into two camps, and there were two rivals for leadership. One of these was a thoroughly goodhearted, happy go lucky person who was afterward for several years in congress. He had been a local magistrate and was called judge. Generally I did something that irritated him. He was always willing to vote for any other member's bill himself, and he regarded it as narrowminded for any one to oppose one of his bills, especially if the opposition was upon the ground that it was unconstitutional—for his views of the constitution were so excessively liberal as to make even me feel as if I belonged to the straitest sect of strict constructionists.

On one occasion he had a bill to appropriate money, with obvious impropriety for the relief of some miscreant whom he styled "one of the honest yeomanry of the state." When I explained to him that it was clearly unconstitutional, he answered, "Me friend, the constitution don't touch little things like that," and then added, with an ingratiating smile: "Anyhow, I'd never allow the constitution to come between friends." At the time I was looking over the proofs of Mr. Bryce's "American Commonwealth," and I told him the incident. He put it into the first edition of the "Commonwealth"; whether it is in the last edition or not I cannot say.

The Convention City for 1914

Introducing Atlanta, "The Heart of Dixie."

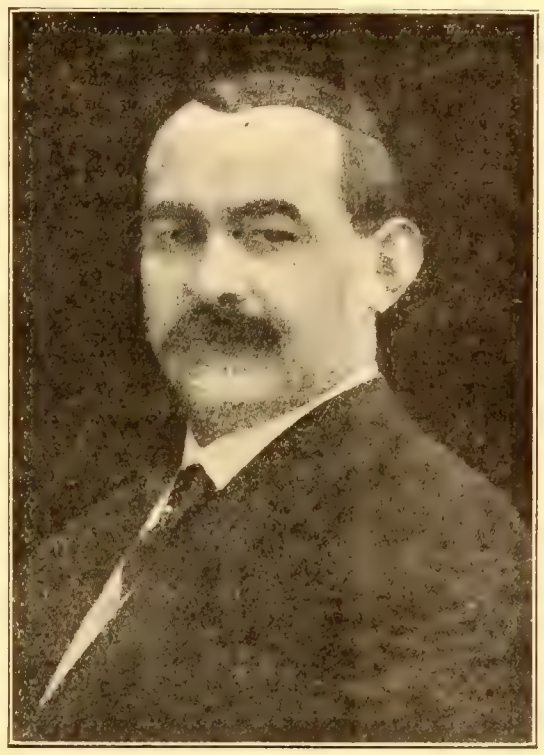
BY L. O. BRICKER.

AMID great enthusiasm the Toronto Convention named Atlanta as the convention city for 1914. It now becomes my gracious privilege to introduce Atlanta to the nation and to the world. There is a land known as the "land of Dixie"—a land of romance, of sentiment and beauty; and Atlanta is the heart of Dixie. There is an empire known as the New South—an empire born of the travail of war and desolation, sanctified by a baptism of blood, fertilized by the ashes of the Old South; and Atlanta is the incarnation of the spirit of the New South, and the center of its life.

Atlanta is a miracle city. Before the terrible "Battle of Atlanta," July 22, 1864, the city claimed a population of 15,000. When General Sherman began his famous march "From Atlanta to the Sea," he left behind him, in blood and ashes, a population of a little over seven hundred people, and nothing that could be eaten or burned. Today Atlanta is a metropolis of over 225,000 people, the financial capital of the South, its office city, railway center and distributing point. The Disciples have six churches in the city. First Church is regarded by all people as being the most vigorous and progressive religous organization in all this city of great churches. When our people come to Atlanta next year, they will not be strangers in a strange land.

AN IDEAL CONVENTION CITY.

In its ability to house great gatherings, Atlanta is second only to New York and Chicago. We can care for more than 4,000 people in our hotels alone. Six of our greatest hotels, four of which cost over a million dollars each, were erected within the past two years, and equal in convenience and service the hostelries of



L. O. Bricker.

New York. The one thing that is left of the Old South in Atlanta is its hospitality; and our convention visitors will find themselves to be real guests in the best homes in the city.

The convention hall in the huge Auditorium Building seats comfortably 8,000 people. The acoustics are perfect. There is a $90,000 Austin pipe organ for the free use of the convention. There are three other convention halls on the same floor, seating from 600 to 1,000 each; so that simultaneous meetings may be held under one roof. There are many reception rooms, parlors and office rooms. The Metropolitan Grand Opera Company say that it is the best auditorium for Grand Opera on the continent. Its auditorium, hotels, hospitality and places of historic interest have made Atlanta the convention city of Dixie.

Atlanta has three great daily newspapers. The Constitution is owned by the Howell family, and edited by Clark Howell—all life-long members of the Christian church. The Journal, which "covers Dixie like the dew," is the official organ of Hoke Smith. The Georgian is the great southern newspaper of William Randolph Hearst. These three papers have a daily circulation of over 400,000 copies. They will give us all the space we can use, and will spread the news and doings of the convention all over every section of this vast empire of the New South. No convention of our people has ever been held in a city of greater strategic importance, nor at a more opportune and propitious time. "Atlanta—1914" is a watchword of tremendous significance to our people and to our cause.

My Father's World

BY MALTBIE D. BABCOCK.

This is my Father's world,
  On the day of its wondrous birth
The stars of light in phalanx bright
  Sang out in Heavenly mirth.

This is my Father's world.
  E'en yet to my listening ears
All nature sings, and around me rings
  The music of the spheres.

This is my Father's world.
  I rest me in the thought
Of rocks and trees, of skies and seas,
  His hand the wonders wrought.

This is my Father's world.
  The birds that their carols raise,
The morning light, the lily white,
  Declare their Maker's praise.

This is my Father's world.
  He shines in all that's fair.
In the rustling grass I hear Him pass,
  He speaks to me everywhere.

This is my Father's world.
  From His eternal throne,
He watch doth keep when I'm asleep,
  And I am not alone.

This is my Father's world.
  Dreaming, I see His face.
I ope my eyes, and in glad surprise
  Cry, "The Lord is in this place."

This is my Father's world.
  I walk a desert lone.
In a bush ablaze to my wondering gaze
  God makes His glory known.

This is my Father's world.
  Among the mountains drear,
'Mid rending rocks and earthquake shocks,
  The still small voice I hear.

This is my Father's world.
  From the shining courts above,
The Beloved One, His Only Son,
  Came—a pledge of deathless love.

This is my Father's world.
  Now closer to Heaven bound,
For dear to God is the earth Christ trod,
  No place but is holy ground.

This is my Father's world.
  His love has filled my breast,
I am reconciled, I am His child,
  My soul has found His rest.

This is my Father's world.
  A wanderer I may roam
What e'er my lot, it matters not,
  My heart is still at home.

This is my Father's world.
  Why should I ever fear?
By night and day He knows my way,
  His arm to save is near.

This is my Father's world.
  O let me ne'er forget
That though the wrong seems oft so strong,
  God is the ruler yet.

This is my Father's world.
  The battle is not done.
Jesus who died shall be satisfied,
  And earth and heaven be one.

This is my Father's world.
  Should my heart be ever sad?
The Lord is King—let the Heaven ring
  God reigns—let the earth be glad.

HARVEST.

Out of a seed despised and cast to earth,
  A fragrant flower;
Out of a body weak and maimed from birth,
  A quickening power;
Out of the sunless depths 'neath mountain snows,
  A treasure rare;
Out of the grave of a dead hope rose
  A perfect prayer.

The Book World

A Page of Reviews and Literary Notes.

WHAT IS THE TRUTH ABOUT JESUS CHRIST? By Friedrich Loofs, Ph. D. Th., D. Dr. Loofs is professor of Church History in the University of Halle-Wittenberg. In the autumn of 1911 he delivered the six Haskell lectures at Oberlin College on the above theme.

During recent years the literary sources of the life of Jesus have been subjected to fresh and searching inquiry. Two radically differing interpretations of that life have taken form. One insists that Jesus was divine, so divine, in fact, as never to have lived in the flesh at all. He was a God, made man by human tradition. Such are the views of W. B. Smith, of the Tulane University, Arthur Drews, of Karsruhe, Peter Jensen, of Marburg, and others.

On the other hand the German Jesus-research school finds only the elements of a purely human life in gospel records.

Professor Loofs is satisfied with neither of these views, and points out what to him seems their fallacies. The Christ-myth theory is dismissed after an examination of the Christian sources outside the gospels, especially the Pauline writings, where he finds abundant material for a brief sketch of the life of Jesus. Equally he contends that the elimination of the superhuman element leaves insufficient data for any convincing portrait of Jesus.

But he regards the mediating and compromising orthodoxy of the church as equally unsatisfactory, because of the infusion of the terms of Greek culture, as in the effort to make the term "logos" deal with a philosophic concept, whereas, according to the author, it means simply "Word."

The positive conclusion which he reaches is that Christ becomes a revelation of God for us, and that he shows us in his own person what we are to become like. The discussion bristles with controversial points. The constructive portion is less strong than the critical review. But the discussion of the field of recent work on the life of Jesus is fresh and informing. (Scribner's, $1.25, net.)

THE ETHICS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, by Hinckley G. Mitchell. The Bible is recognized as the greatest of authorities on morality and religion. The Old Testament is the earlier section of the Bible, and the natural inference would be that its moral teachings are to be accepted as valid for conduct.

Yet the most casual reader soon discovers difficulties in the acceptance of its teachings or implications. It condones wars of extermination; it accepts slavery and polygamy as part of the recognized social order; it admits the rightness of the law of revenge.

Two explanations are possible. One is that the Old Testament is not an infallible text book on ethics, but the record of a national life, in which there was a never-ceasing struggle to reach better social conditions and correct the faults of current moral customs.

Professor Mitchell deals with these questions in a constructive spirit. He reviews the experiences of Israel through all periods from the legendary to the latest, and presents the advancing conceptions of deity as they were organized in each age and by each group of Israel's teachers.

This method prevents the following out of any one custom or principle by itself, such as slavery or concubinage, but it affords an admirable survey of the growth of ethical ideals in the greatest nation in antiquity. (University of Chicago Press. $2.00, net.)

THE WOMAN THOU GAVEST ME, by Hall Caine. It is not easy to form a satisfactory judgment regarding this latest story of the Manx novelist. It would be a light task to praise it as, in some regards, the strongest thing he has ever done. It would be just as easy to declare it the most glaring in its defects of all his books. Mary O'Neal, the heroine, is not in the least convincing. An incredibly weak creature she seems, tyrannized over by her father and aunt, and later by her husband whom she had been forced to marry. The two moments in which she really seems to have a will at all are when she refuses to live with the man she was coerced into marrying, and when she gives herself to the lover she should have wed.

Into the hopeless tangle in which this weakness of character involves her it is hard to go, so difficult, depressing and tiresomely drawn out does it appear. But it affords Mr. Caine an opportunity to tacitly condemn the Roman Catholic Church for its unbending insistence on the sanctity of marriage, without suggesting a better solution of the vexed problem of divorce. And it includes an arraignment of the charity system of London, in which the author would have us believe his heroine could find no institution that would harbor an infant borne by an unwedded mother. And so the book remains unconvincing and without a plan of social betterment, in spite of some splendid pages. (Lippincott, $1.35.)

LIVINGSTONE, THE PATHFINDER, by Basil Mathews. The life of the great missionary to Africa is like a romance. The story can never be told too often. It is here written in the form of a textbook of the Missionary Education Movement of the United States and Canada. The persistence and courage of the Apostle of Africa, from the days when he was a worker in a Scottish cotton mill to the moment when he died kneeling by his cot in the village of Ilala in the heart of the black continent, are the outstanding features of the narrative. His calm confidence in the face of deadly peril, his unfailing affection for the black people, his ceaseless hatred of the slave trade, which at last aroused Europe to exterminate the iniquity, all find proportionate treatment in this little book. (Missionary Education Movement, 50 cents.)

HOME LIFE IN COLONIAL DAYS, by Alice Morse Earle. The sort of life children led in early days in America forms a part of Mrs. Earle's interesting narrative. At meal time they were ordered never to seat themselves at the table until the blessing had been asked, and their parents told them to be seated. They were never to ask for anything on the table; never to speak unless spoken to; always to break the bread, never to bite into a whole slice; never to take salt except with a clean knife; not to throw bones under the table.

Colonial homes, lights, kitchens, meals, clothing, occupations, travel, Sundays, and gardens are among the interesting topics described in this reprint of a standard work. (Macmillan, 50 cents.)

ONE OF THE INTERESTING FEATURES of the American Magazine at present is a series of stories by Peter Clark Macfarlane entitled, "People Who Came Back." Each portrays the career of some man or woman who fell low, and apparently without hope, into the grip of some vice, and then came up from the abyss to a new life. These sketches are vivid enough to be drawn from life, as probably they are. Mr. Macfarlane's literary work is receiving increasing favor. He writes much for Collier's. He passed through Toronto during the sessions of the General Convention there, and visited for a short time with some of his Disciple friends.

MR. JAMES O'DONNELL BENNETT, dramatic critic of the Chicago Record-Herald, is writing a series of Monday morning sketches in that journal, entitled "What the Preacher is Like." They are suggestive pen pictures of Chicago ministers, and promise to be interesting reading. The series began two weeks since with Dr. Gunsaulus.

ARTHUR GORDON.

AN ELOQUENT MESSAGE.

It is said that a converted Mohammedan, seeing Gordon's statute, as it stands facing the great desert and the Sudan at Khartoum, sent this message to his church, and this message at this urgent hour is the message of this Men and Millions Movement:

"The strings of camels come in single file,
Bearing their burdens o'er the desert sand;
Swiftly the boats go plying on the Nile,
The needs of men are met on every hand.
But still I wait
For the messenger of God who cometh late.

I see the cloud of dust rise in the plain,
The measured tread of troops falls on the ear;
The soldier comes the Empire to maintain,
Bringing the pomp of war, the reign of fear.
But still I wait;
The messenger of Peace, he cometh late.

They set me looking o'er the desert drear,
Where broodeth darkness as the deepest night.
From many a mosque there comes the call to prayer,
I hear no voice that calls on Christ for light.
But still I wait
For the messenger of Christ who cometh late."

—From A. E. Cory's Convention Address.

The supreme power of the Church is the power to tell the truth. This is other than charity, except as the truth is told in love. But the truth to be told must be known, and to be known it must be sought out. Courage without knowledge is mere audacity. It may exhibit the man, it will not help the truth. I believe that the power of the Church of the future will rest more, rather than less, upon the pulpit. A truth-telling pulpit will carry the truth into the deepest and most remote places.—William J. Tucker.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

A MISSIONARY BIBLE STUDY.

AND JESUS went about all the cities and villages, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and sickness. But when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion for them, because they were distressed and scattered. as sheep not having a shepherd. Then saith he unto his disciples, "The harvest indeed is plenteous, but the laborers are few. Pray ye therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth laborers into his harvest."

And he called unto him his twelve disciples, and gave them authority over unclean spirits, to cast them out, and to heal all manner of disease, and all manner of sickness. . . . . These twelve Jesus sent forth. Matt. 9:35-38 and 10:1, 5.

Here we have one of the great classics of missions, almost as potent in its influence as the Great Commission, Go ye, into all the world, preaching the gospel to the whole creation .... teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.

In the brief passage just read, we have revealed some of the secret springs of the missionary enterprise.

INFORMATION.

How unwearying was Jesus in his journeyings and his ministries! Not alone in all the cities and villages, but we are told also, that he went throughout all Galilee, in the Decapolis, in Judea, in Perea, in Samaria, in the villages of Cesarea Philippi, in the borders of heathen Tyre and Sidon; and everywhere he traveled, he saw and studied the needs of struggling, blind, oppressed humanity. How his knowledge of them is revealed in his speech and in his teaching! I think it is Stalker who has said "that if the Palestine of our Lord's day were without a history, it could be reproduced with tolerable accuracy from his parables and figures of speech—so perfect is his knowledge of the people, so full are his teachings of allusions to their life and customs." Its bridal processions, its marriage feasts, the rich man in his hall, the beggar at the gate, the shrewd steward, the unjust judge, the unemployed laborers, the busy housewife patching a garment, grinding her corn, putting leaven in her meal, the children playing in the market place—these and many other pictures of the life about him are embalmed in his daily talk. And he not only spoke to the people in their own vernacular, but his teaching was on the plane of their understanding, not vague and wide of the mark; it went straight home to the needs of his hungry, bewildered hearers.

Is not information like this, as to the needs of those who sit in darkness, the first essential of missionary zeal and missionary service? The mission field of today is all the world, and the whole creation is too large a territory for us to visit its villages and cities and countries in person as did our blessed Master the land of his ministrations; but so full are our sources of information now—from the testimony of eye witnesses, from the books that are constantly issuing from the teeming press, from flashing cables and telegrams served to us each day in our daily papers—that ignorance of these conditions is wilful, even criminal. If we but knew all that is easily within our reach about the two-thirds of the human race who are still without the good news of their redemption by Jesus Christ, the evangelization of the world in this generation would be not only a cry, but a fact accomplished.

COMPASSION.

Jesus not only went about the cities and villages of the Holy Land, but when he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion for them, because they were distressed and scattered. The sympathetic heart must go hand in hand with the knowledge of distress, or such knowledge is searing and blighting to Christian character. How often it is said of Jesus that he had compassion on crowds, and on individuals! How we should pray for deliverance from the hardened heart that is closed to the hand of him who stands at its door and knocks, and from the ears, deaf to his voice, and strive for hearts open and tender and responsive to every call of the poor and needy! Missions that are pitched in any lower key than the divine one of compassion for distress and ignorance are not in harmony with the program of Jesus.

THE NEED OF LABORERS.

Our Lord not only knew the needs of the thronging crowds, and was full of sorrowful sympathy with them, but he felt that something must be done for them. He himself was teaching and preaching and healing all the time, ministering to the dull and darkened minds and souls, and to the suffering bodies as well. But he saw that other laborers were needed, both while he was on earth and when he should be taken away, and his word to his disciples was, "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth laborers into his harvest."

How often we interpret this passage as though the Heavenly Father had an ample supply of laborers, but he was withholding them until we went and interceded with him to send them to a waiting and distressed world! Is not our attitude too often that of old Dr. Ryland, who said to William Carey when he plead for sending the gospel to the heathen, "Young man, when the Lord wishes to convert the heathen, he can do it without any of your help."

We lay all the blame and responsibility for a lost and ruined world on the Lord —on that tender Father, who so loved it, that he gave his only and beloved son for its redemption! Against this statement of the old Baptist preacher, I like to place these words, spoken by Mr. Campbell White at the Edinburgh Conference:

"That as far as divine revelation and human experience went, we have no reason to expect that the conversion of the world could be accomplished apart from human instrumentality; and the most inspiring thought that ever came to the human soul, was that Jesus Christ had entrusted to man the completion of the task he had begun and left unfinished." The evangelization of the world lingers, not because God has to be persuaded to do his part but because man has failed to do his share.

Jesus directed his disciples to pray for laborers, and the result of the prayer was that twelve were set apart as apostles or missionaries, and were sent forth as laborers in the plenteous harvest fields. Those who prayed were those who went.

The prayer we need is not to persuade a Lord who is withholding the supplies for a missionary campaign, not necessarily to convince others of their duty as laborers, but primarily to waken our own cold and dull and slothful hearts to an appreciation of our duty to those for whom Christ died, and who know not of their heavenly inheritance; and when the divine fruitage of such prayers is realized in the indwelling spirit of God in our hearts, then, it may be, the contagion of zeal and service may be caught from us—from you, and from me—even me.

All preparation for the mission field is a failure, even such training as is given in our College of Missions, unless it represents, first and always, the Divine Spirit working through human instruments. "The one real lack today both in the church at home and on the mission field, is a lack of spiritual life; the one great need, the realization of the constant presence and power of the Holy Spirit."

Our hardest task is to make men understand that it is only their want of faith their half hearted consecration that hinders the rapid advance of the work, only their own coldness that retards the redemption of a lost world. We must ever bear in mind that the Father in heaven is eager and able to save the world already redeemed by him, if only we, his professed followers on earth, were willing that he should, and would give ourselves in whole-hearted surrender to his divine will.

FROM THE NEWS COLUMNS.

Demands for a law to punish persons who hinder the reformation of paroled men and women were made by Mrs. Maud Ballington Booth at the recent session of the American Prison Association, held at Indianapolis. Mrs. Booth told of the many men and women that had been paroled to the Volunteers of America, and of the hard fight they have for the first few weeks of their liberty to keep them from going back to the old ways.

The upper house of the Rigsdag is probably near dissolution on account of the bill granting universal suffrage to women. The bill is at the third reading stage and if it passes it will deprive the crown of the right to nominate twelve members of the upper house. The government is determined by this bill to make the upper house more democratic. It looks hopeful for the bill and the women are already organizing.

Theodore Roosevelt's sister, Mrs. Douglas Robinson, will join the "flying squadron" of New Jersey Progressive party stump speakers, which is fighting for the election of state Senator Everett M. Colby for governor of that state. Senator Colby has announced this fact. Mrs. Robinson already is forming a Progressive women's finance committee to aid in the fight.

HE HEARS.

To any cry sent up from earnest hearts;
He hears and strenghtens when he must deny,
He sees us weeping over life's hard sums;
But should he dry our tears to give the key,
What would it profit us when school were done
And not one lesson mastered? What a world
Were this if all our prayers were granted!

WHAT MONEY DID WITH SMITH

SMITH got rich. Honorably and as a result of insight, toil and thrift, he built up a fortune. Then all his friends watched to see what he would do with his money. God watched to see what the money would do with Smith. It was more important to get the reaction of the wealth on the man than to see how the fortunate master would use his new means. The spending of the dollars was an economic problem; the influence of the money on its owner's soul was a spiritual problem. Smith spent his money wisely and with commendable freedom; and, best of all, he kept the simple ways and the friendly spirit and the reverent temper of the days when he was poor. So Smith became one of God's rich men.

DON'T FORGET TO PLAY

THE world wants men who can play. Work is necessary and it is expected of strong men; but play is imperative and the strong man needs it more than the child. Under the pressure of life today we lose the earlier spirit of play and finally a holiday becomes a nuisance because we prefer to tread the mill of routine work. This is the symptom of spiritual disease. Fun has a vital part in the functions of the soul. Watch the symptoms! When joy has ceased to flow from play the doctor ought to be called. Of course the muscles grow less resilient and the joints of the body stiffen; so the games must be changed; but keep the old play-spirit living in the soul. Play to the end.

RESTORE THE AMEN CORNER!

OUR editorial on "The Passing of the Amen Corner" has brought to us many expressions of satisfaction and approval. We gladly go back to the source of that suggestion for a further word. As we stated before, the title and the seed thought came to us from an editorial in a secular newspaper, the Baltimore American, and the words of that editorial are so thoughtful and wholesome, we gladly print the article entire. We commend it to the very thoughtful consideration of all our readers. The article follows:

THE VANISHED "AMEN CORNER."

A decade or more has passed since the Amen Corner was silenced. Has the church advanced since this gauge of the spirituality of worship was supplanted by cold intellectualism, or has religion been retarded? There are many who bear in tender remembrance the days when the fire burned in the hearts of the hearers of sermons on Sunday, and when the preacher was inspired by the hearty attestations to the truth of his utterances by loud amens that came from the Amen Corner. What has taken the place of this powerful source of inspiration? In some advanced churches applause has been encouraged, and even sentences of prayers are so punctuated. But this has nothing of the spiritual glow about it. At best it is a sign of agreement with the speaker, and has nothing to do with the enthusiasm that rings out in a loud Amen.

Even those denominations whose worshipers regarded the Amen of the warm-spirited members of other denominations as grotesque are willing to admit that they received much spiritual power from the spiritually cordial atmosphere of the churches in the days when the assent of the members of some of them came in hearty outbursts of approval, in truly scriptural form. For be it borne in mind that the custom of crying out Amen in the midst of the congregation comes down from the time of the return of the Israelites from captivity, when a copy of the law was recovered and a generation to whom it was new heard it read in their presence. This was the greatest Bible class and experience meeting the world has ever known. As the prophet read the sacred work all the people cried aloud Amen! Amen! Israel was never in better spiritual trim than in those days and the sins of the people were swept aside in the tremendous outburst of interest in the study of the revealed word. In many orthodox synagogues the practice of crying Amen still is followed.

Enthusiasm is the breath of God, and the old Amen Corner was the place for enthusiasm. The sermons so punctuated were remembered and during the week days, "They that feared the Lord spake often one to another . . . and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord and that thought upon his name. And they shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels." How is it in these days of criticism of the pulpit, when every cynic and pulpit critic is ready to carp at the teaching and the method and the function of preaching? When, too, the members of congregations pride themselves more upon intellectual apprehension than spiritual absorption of the truth of the divine word. In the old days there was no need to exhort the people to be in the spirit and to have the unction of the Most High.

Upon the return of the preachers from their vacations and after they have gotten their churches in trim once more, following the waste of the summer, there will be a movement to hold a concerted revival. The city will witness an endeavor to have the work of the Lord revived in the midst of the people. It is safe to say that many of the old school will renew their Amen fervor. If so, doubtless sinners will be turned unto the Lord and the churches feel the power of the old-time revival spirit. The churches have gone far in the work of social reform and in the way of culture and in the path of social service since the Amen Corner was made obsolete, but the former occupants of the old corner who still survive are willing to declare that the ways of religious fervor are ways of pleasantness and its paths are paths of peace.

Whether one considers the Amen Corner literally or takes it as a figure for emotion in religion, the question may well be asked whether the churches have not lost much more than they have gained by the spirit of cold formality in worship where once there was deep earnestness and a sense of the presence of God in literal power. The preachers almost to a man are willing to say that the need for more fervor and personal participation in the spirit of worship is the greatest need of the Church today. The decadence of this encourages indifference. Will the power of the Amen Corner return to the churches?

A COWARDLY ATTACK.

A MAN with unblemished reputation did a brave deed which won him the ill will of a powerful political clique. As a result he suffered a most cowardly and despicable attack upon his reputation. He dragged the conspiracy into the light, and produced the sworn confessions of the suborned slanderers. He then procured an indictment for criminal libel against the perpetrators of the outrage. The chief justice of the criminal court has assigned that case to seven different judges in the city of Chicago, and they have refused, one after another, to try the case. It is a sad commentary on the courage of the judiciary. There are brave men on the bench in Chicago and elsewhere; but there are also political timeservers, and men who dare not face a powerful interest and do their duty. The book of Revelation curses the coward, and assigns him a place in the lake of fire.

MISSIONARY COMMISSIONS.

THE American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions is celebrating the centennial of missionary work in India by sending out a special commission consisting of Dr. Samuel Capen, Dr. W. E. Strong, and Dr. George A. Hall, eminent Congregationalists, to visit India as an official commission of that Board. During the last hundred years the American Board has spent, in India, ten millions of dollars in missionary work, and during the past year its contributions to India and Ceylon have reached the large figure of $190,000.

A CONSTRUCTIVE WEEKLY

The English government has recognized the value of the industrial and educational work undertaken by the Congregational body, and is affording substantial aid where its motives will not be misunderstood. Other lands like China and Africa seem to be absorbing a large amount of missionary interest at the present time, but India has a charm and mystery all its own, and the growth of Christian civilization in that land is watched with keen interest by students of oriental life. If it is worth while for Chambers of Commerce from many cities to send out deputations of their members at great expense to investigate the industrial and commercial opportunities afforded by oriental lands, not less is it worth while for the churches to send deputations now and then to make careful study of the new conditions in the East, and report them to the home churches.

GOD IN CHRIST.

THE hope of the Christian church is indissolubly bound up in its faith in Jesus Christ. It were better to believe Him only a man and the best of men than not to believe in Him at all, but such faith has never fully satisfied the heart-hunger of the Christian believer. God was in Christ, reconciliating the world unto himself. It is more than a mere article of faith. It is central to all articles of Christian faith.

It is our modern fashion to test all theories by the pragmatic method and to account that to be most true which is discovered to work best. Faith in Christ answers willingly to this test. Nothing else than this has been found sufficient to nerve the arm of the Christian church for the conquest of the world. Phillips Brooks was accustomed to speak in high terms of the Unitarian movement in New England when that movement was judged on its intellectual side, but with all its fine intellectual equipment and its inherited moral quality he was accustomed to say of it that "it is dying of its meager Deity."

The revelation of God as our Father is profound and satisfying, but the heart of the Father is revealed in its eternal sacrifice in the revelation of the Son of God.

WE DECLINE!

PEOPLE who desire us to come over to their religion usually start the thin end of the wedge, but Cardinal Gibbons feels no necessity for such a beginning. In a very genial statement issued to the public a few days ago, he tells the Protestant world that the first thing to be done if we want a reunited Christendom is to recognize the Pope. Here are his words:

"The reunion of the scattered branches of Christendom is a consummation devoutly to be wished, and I would gladly sacrifice the remaining years of my life in lending a helping hand toward this blessed result.

"The first essential requirement is the recognition of the sovereign pontiff as the successor of St. Peter, the divinely appointed head of Christendom. Every organization, whether religious, civil or political, needs a head for its peace and security, indeed for its very existence.

"Once the proper position of the Pope is recognized, I do not believe that the other controverted doctrines are as formidable as is commonly imagined. When a proper explanation is given of the various dogmas upon which Christianity is founded, I am persuaded that the logical sense of the people will prompt them to accept.

"And if the various Christian denominations of the United States were once united working with one heart and one spirit, what a wonderful influence our Christian forces would exert in the civilization and the Christianizing of mankind! What amazing things then would be done for society and humanity.

"But devoutly as we wish for such a union," continued the Cardinal, "we must wait for the conscience of the individual to bring about a state when union becomes possible. There are three courts, the civil tribunal, the criminal tribunal and the court of conscience. And until the last of these acts, until the soul demands, until, in a word, such a moment arrives, the time is not ripe.

"The union of the churches would bring about an era of civilization unknown in history. You and I may not live to see it; but it will come, I hope, and then the one undivided church will flourish and triumph."

Now as for us and our house, we are as ready to go on record now as we shall be at any time, and we want to be counted out of any plan of church union that either begins with a Pope or ends with one. We may as well say now that a certain suspicion we have of our high church Episcopalian brethren makes us less eager than they might desire to follow their lead in matters of alleged reunion. If we are to have a Pope at all we would as soon have him first as last. But we do not want him, nor intend to have him. The reactionary old gentleman who lives across on the Tiber holds no line of authority over us, and we have no inclination to begin in any course that points in his direction.

Those who have a Pope and like him are welcome to him; but we decline with thanks.

THE PARENT AND THE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.

IT were better for the parent that he should have a millstone hanged about his neck and be drowned in the depths of the sea than that he should stumble and cause one of his little ones to stumble by turning him over to the Sunday School, assuming that that is the end of his own responsibility for the spiritual well being of his child. The Sunday School, like many another good thing, has been used as a kind of moral umbrella to protect the conscience of fathers and mothers from inevitable self-condemnation.

A professor in the University of Illinois, addressing a religious gathering in Chicago recently, told how he had learned that his own little boy was not paying attention to his Sunday School lesson. He charged the boy to bring back on the next Sunday a full account of the lesson he had learned and the boy straightway forgot it until the moment when the father demanded to know what the lesson had been about. The same thing happened on the second Sunday, and then the father told the son what would happen if the same thing occurred again. For a third Sunday the boy returned ignorant of the lesson and the thing happened which the father had predicted, since which time every Sunday as soon as Sunday School is out the boy comes running to the father and tells him all about the lesson. The professor has done well, and he can do still better. He might very profitably see that the boy knows his lesson before he goes to Sunday School.

MISSIONARY CENTENARIES.

THIS is a year of missionary centenaries. It is a hundred years since the most notable date in the career of David Livingstone, and the event is to be properly celebrated in England this season. Another event of almost equal importance is the centenary of the Baptist mission in Burmah, founded by Adoniram Judson. This is to be celebrated in the early part of December with a series of meetings at Rangoon, the point at which Judson landed after being refused admission to India by the British East India Company. The later labors of Judson were at Moulmein, further south on the coast, and here also there will be a celebration. At Rangoon there is to be erected a "tower of peace" to commemorate Judson and his four companions, Samuel Newell, Warden Hall, Samuel Nott, and Luther Rice, who were ordained as American foreign missionaries at Salem, Massachusetts, in February, 1812.

THE MIRACLE.

God made the earth, and the immortal flowers;
He roused the grass, and set the stars in tune;
Then as we gather blooms he gathered hours,
And dropped them in a bowl one afternoon.

—Lippincott's.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

IS it not strange how a text of scripture passes through our minds and lips for many years without our ever knowing its meaning or even knowing that we do not know its meaning? I have had that experience so many times that I have come to think of the Bible as a book of perennial surprises. And I have formed the habit of expecting in the most familiar chapters some fresh lighting up of an old verse or phrase.

I read today the twenty-third Psalm, and my attention was arrested by the phrase, "for his name's sake," in the sentence, "He leadeth me in paths of righteousness for his name's sake." It came to me rather startlingly that I had never given any thought to the clause with which that well-worn sentence ends. More quickly than in many other instances what seems to me a reasonable, and certainly an illuminating disclosure of its meaning, was thrust upon me. God leads us men in the way of right-doing because our right-doing enhances his name, his reputation, among men!

Suddenly it occurred to me that God is concerned about his reputation as well as his character. His character has been the same from the beginning, but his reputation has been changing, as his dealings with mankind have come to be better understood from age to age.

THE idea has clung to me all through the day, as such ideas do that spring out of the word of God, and I have spent the end of the day in tracing out some of the suggestions that the Psalmist's phrase seemed to contain.

In the nature of the case, God must depend upon his reputation for whatever effectiveness he may hope to have in the life of man. If he has a reputation for warlikeness and power, perhaps for cruelty and disregard of the laws of justice as man knows them, then God's influence upon man will be in harmony with his reputation. Man will be hard, arbitrary, bloodthirsty.

If God has a reputation for favoritism among men, for loving our tribe, or our nation, or our kind more than others, there will be no vision of the brotherhood of man, no poetry of the federation of the world, no such ideas of internationalism as Dr. Macdonald set forth in his masterly address in your last week's issue, Mr. Editor, for both of which—the great paper and the great address—I cannot restrain the impulse in passing to thank you gratefully.

If God has a reputation like the Stoics gave him, of sitting afar off above the stress and struggle and pain of our human life in philosophic calm—a sort of Christian Science God—then we men are going to do either as the Stoics did or as the Epicureans did or as the Christian Scientists do.

If God has a reputation for finicalness in regard to the forms through which men may approach him—the dress they wear, the posture they assume, the mode in which they are baptized—if he is thought to be finical about the way they pronounce the syllables of the creed, then religion will organize itself so as to lay stress upon these matters and they will be made tests of fellowship among those who try to do God's will.

BUT if God has a reputation for being gracious and tender, for being inflexibly just, for being infinitely interested in all men of all races and tribes and conditions, for being concerned about righteousness and holiness more than about formal correctness, then men will look to him trustfully and lean upon him and he can bless them in the things in which his true character consists.

But it all depends upon God's reputation. If he is misconceived or inadequately conceived by us he falls short of the fullness of his power and his purpose in us.

The big task of Almighty God is to get men to think rightly about himself, to make a name for himself, a name that corresponds to what he truly is.

In our commerce between ourselves and God the important thing is credit, just as credit is the important thing in our commerce with our fellowmen. Credit means reputation. It means that a man's promise is held to be good by his fellows, that he will do precisely what he promises to do. Good business men, I have noticed, are extremely sensitive to their credit. They will go great lengths to keep it unshaken even for a moment. This is from self-respect, but it is also from a knowledge that their future business effectiveness inheres in their reputation.

IN like manner God is concerned for his own good name. He wants to stand in men's minds for what he is really worth, what he really is. Then he can help them.

But he depends upon men—how strange the helplessness of God!—to establish for him this good name and to preserve it. "He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake"—when I walk in ways of righteousness I enhance God's good name, when I walk in wayward paths I weaken God's reputation!

Every faithful man enhances God's good name. Somehow God's destiny seems to be in man's hands! When a trusted man "goes wrong" people say, in their first surprise and bewilderment, "It almost makes me lose faith in God!" We all have the sense that God has failed to make good in him. God's prestige has suffered, his credit is appreciably impaired.

TODAY I have been thinking of the man Sulzer, the poor, discredited, disgraced soul. I have been thinking how he stood in the spot-light of public attention, how men trusted him as the champion and embodiment of high ideals, how they took courage for their own moral enterprises from his presence at the head of the state. Such a man as he was believed to be made righteousness seem more possible and gave prestige to the God of righteousness.

But when his inward soul was exposed as that of a perjurer, an intriguer, a man of no honor, then he not only fell himself but he took God's reputation with him.

Isaac Errett is reported to have said intimately to a companion that when he contemplated the great trust which people reposed in him, the way they and their spiritual interests were invested in him, he was afraid to sin! No doubt the awe in this great man's soul as he faced his responsibility arose from his sense that if he failed those who trusted him, their faith in God would tremble, and so his failure would be God's failure, too!

NO thought stimulates me and illuminates our moral life so much as the perception that our faith in God is nearly always faith in some one else's faith. We may not be able to trace our faith definitely back to its human sources—these sources may be hidden and obscure, but they are surely there. Our faith in God is mediated through some other body's faith in him.

This will not be strange doctrine if we consider how it was that most of us were led to God in the beginning of our Christian lives.

God was really RECOMMENDED to us by some one who had tried him.

Some one had walked in the pathway of God's promises and found it to be a good way and told us that God would surely do what he promised to do, that he was to be trusted. And so, on the strength of the good name others gave God, we committed our souls to him. Our timid faith in God was really our faith in others' faith. We accepted God's promise on the basis of the reputation they were able to give him.

HOW greatly have the great souls of Christian history added to God's reputation! Think of Paul who was called Saul, of Augustine who left his lewd life to become a saint, of Mendel who, after his conversion, changed his name to Neander because he was a new man, of John B. Gough, of Jerry McCauley, of the twice-born men of Harold Begbie's book! All these have given God a reputation for saving sinners! He led them from their lives of shame to virtue and holiness "for his name's sake."

And with assurance any sinful soul may now approach him. God's name as a Savior-God is enhanced by every sinner he redeems.

I am watching that series of articles by Mr. Peter Clark

Macfarlane in the American Magazine on "Those Who Have Come Back," with eager interest. The promise of God is that "sins like scarlet" he will "make white as snow." The cynic says, the skeptic says, God cannot keep this promise. The cocaine "fiend," the debased alcoholic, the confirmed fallen woman—there is nothing to do but to abandon them, to cast them out and leave them to die in their sin.

But Mr. Macfarlane is showing that these have by God's grace been brought back to virtue, to purity, to self-control. In telling their story the author is telling God's story, extending God's reputation, building up what men call credit for God in a department of life where even the faith of Christ's disciples has been mostly doubt.

AFTER all's said, I wonder if the precedence of Jesus in our world is not due to just this: that he added so much to God's reputation. He proved God not in a few exceptional matters but in the consistent whole of his life, and he became thus able to speak with authority on what God could be trusted to do.

How far may man trust God? How far may human prudence be dispensed with in the presence of life's searching issues? This is the deepest question our soul can ask. And Christ answered it by the experiment of his life. He came to do God's will, nor question as to consequences. From the dawn to the end of the day he studied to know his Father's leading, taking no counsel from men nor from his own heart.

The story of that experiment has gone forth to the ends of the earth. And because God did not fail him, but gave him triumphant peace and a sure sense of the imperishable riches of his presence and grace God's reputation has been wondrously magnified wherever the Story has been told.

HUGH MACDONALD.

Our Readers' Opinions

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I am today sending, in a separate envelope, my renewal subscription to "The Christian Century" and I cannot feel content to do this without trying to tell you what the paper has been to me in the past year. "The moral and intellectual compulsion to seek and discover the truth" has led me to study the writings of the great modern thinkers. Though a lover of good literature, feeling the need of religious literature, I had given up all hope of finding in our own communion, journalism in sympathy with modern thought, and with the spirit of religious liberty. Last October I read in the Louisville Courier Journal your report of the Louisville Convention. I immediately sent my subscription to The Century and the paper has been a delight to me ever since. I wish to echo a statement of one of your readers which I read in the paper last winter: "The Christian Century is the hope of the young Disciples." The paper has been so helpful and inspiring to me, and has so fully supplied a long-felt want, that I am deeply grateful to you. I have enjoyed very much the two new departments, that under the heading "At the End of the Day," and the articles on the Sunday-school lessons.

Crittenden, Ky. VIRGINIA FENLEY.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

While writing I want to congratulate you on the splendid paper you are giving us. I have not always found myself in accord with its views, but I have ever admired its virility and awareness. A total absence of vapidness from its atmosphere makes it a more than welcome weekly visitor to our home. There is a field for a journal that holds to the higher levels. Its mental type is different. May The Century ever continue to be as worthy as it is at present.

Taylor, Texas. W. H. BAGBY.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I look forward eagerly to the coming of The Century and always enjoy reading it. As you know, I cannot always agree with you, but I think perhaps I enjoy the paper all the more for that reason, and am always profited by your virile, thought-provoking work. With good will and many good wishes and urging you not to forget that the "brake" is as necessary as the "motor" and begging you to be patient with the brethren to whom "a Sabbath Day's journey" is a long day's march. I remain. CAREY E. MORGAN.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I am perfectly delighted with The Century's new dress. There is a tone of dignity and an appearance that is highly pleasing. The spirit of The Christian Century has always been fair and I am happy to place myself on the list of well wishers.

Kansas City. J. L. THOMPSON.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I want to congratulate you on the high class paper that you are giving us now. I have been a subscriber to The Century for several years and its growth has been a source of pleasure to me. The last issue would be hard to beat.

Manhattan, Kan. J. DAVID ARNOLD.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

To my mind The Christian Century is the only representative paper we have. At any rate the spirit of it is to be appreciated by every one who is eager to destroy the "high board fence" that has hemmed and dwarfed visions so long in the past.

Elderville, Tex. ERWIN STARKEY.

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I wish to thank you sincerely for the splendid number of The Century issued this week. Your pages are full of pure gold. The inspiration of the convention has carried you to the mountain top of religious journalism. The Century is always good, but this number should stir with pride and enthusiasm our entire brotherhood. CHARLES T. PAUL.

THE PRAYER OF THE SOUL.

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

HUNGRY of soul for bread to satisfy,
Fed through the years with husks of vanity,
My body faint, drooping my weary head,—
Hungry of soul, I come to Thee for Bread.

Thirsty of soul for living waters pure,
Far from the spring, I scarce my life endure;
My throat all parched, and gone my power to sing,—
Thirsty of soul, I come to seek Thy Spring.

Darkened in soul, in world of darkness pent,
Gone sun and star from out my firmament,
Groping as blind, all things bring me affright;
Darkened in soul, I come to Thee for Light.

Weary in soul of all the world's hard strife,
Sick of the wrong that ever fills my life,
Sated with self and with my selfish quest,—
Weary in soul, I come to Thee for Rest.

"Win-My-Chum Week."

The national secretary of the Epworth League, Dr. W. F. Sheridan, has set the week of November 9-16 as "Win-My-Chum Week." During this period all league members are expected to make an effort to enlist their companions in an out and out declaration for Christ.

In preparation for this week of soul-winning, all leagues will conduct through October a training class for personal work. Books on evangelism and personal work will be studied. The first ten days of November are to be occupied with a systematic scheme of friendly calls on every young person whom any local league has recorded in its "constituency" list. Pledged prayer is to accompany the undertaking at every step of the way. Finally, on Sunday night, November 16, each pastor will be expected to conduct a "round-up" at the meeting of his league, and on that evening it is hoped a great host of young people will identify themselves with the church.

Congregationalists Erect Memorials.

Our contemporary, The Advance, of Chicago, pays tribute to William Eliot Griffis for the erection of memorial tablets in various places in Holland associated with the sojourning in that country of the Pilgrim Fathers. Ten such tablets are now, or are soon to be, in place. Chicago Congregationalists, two years ago, erected one of these tablets in the English Church in Amsterdam. The tablets now being unveiled include one at The Hague, on the site of the first American Legation, in commemoration of the completion of three hundred years of unbroken friendship between the United States and The Netherlands, and another at Rotterdam, in honor of Zierikzee, the pioneer settler of the State of Delaware and as a token of appreciation by America of the kindness of the Dutch people to continental immigrants to America.

Perhaps the most interesting of these tablets was unveiled Sunday, September 21, in the Scotch Church at Middleburg "to the glory of God and in honor of Robert Browne." The money for this tablet was contributed by the Sunday-school children in the Congregational churches of the United States. It bears a tribute to William the Silent, and the toleration of the Dutch Republic which sheltered the Puritans and the Pilgrims. Dr. Griffis, himself, unveiled the tablet. For the benefit of those who do not know who this Robert Browne was, it may be stated that his church took refuge at Middleburg in 1852, and there was sheltered unmolested and free from persecution.

High Church vs. Low Church.

What was looked upon as the first test of voting strength between the high church and low church elements in the Protestant Episcopal Church, came early in the convention of that church, held in New York City. Dr. Alexander Mann, rector of Trinity church, Boston, was elected president of the house of deputies. Dr. Mann was candidate of the low church element and defeated Dr. W. T. Manning, rector of Trinity church, New York, by a vote of 250 to 242.

The president wields a strong influence in the counsels of the house of deputies. He has duties and powers similar to those of the Speaker of the House of Representatives in Congress. The election of Dr. Mann was regarded by members of the low church as a substantial victory. One result of the vote, some of them declared, would be that the question of changing the denominational name to the American Catholic church probably would not be placed before the convention. High church delegates asserted, on the other hand, that the vote was too close to give any indication what course legislation would take.

Dr. Manning upon learning of his defeat, moved to have the election of Dr. Mann made unanimous.

General Booth's Daughter as Leader.

Mrs. Catherine Booth-Clibborn, who has spent most of her life as an evangelist in Europe, particularly in France, is now in this country, and has attracted much interest by her ability as a spiritual leader. The genius of the great General lives in his sons and daughters, it seems. Mrs. Booth-Clibborn, it may be remarked, is not connected with the Salvation Army, although she worked at one time under that banner. She finds she can accomplish greater results by independent evangelism. Mrs. Booth-Clibborn "has remarkable power as a speaker," writes one who has witnessed some of her work in this country. "There is the ash and energy of the old General, her father, in her voice and gesture and whole attitude as she speaks. We have heard four members of the Booth family speak, the father, one son, and two of the daughters, and we are disposed to think that Mrs. Booth-Clibborn is by far the most impressive and effective speaker of them all. Her story of her work in France and Switzerland, and of her imprisonment in the latter country, is one of the most thrilling it has been our privilege to hear. As a preacher she is exceedingly strong. She interprets the word in a natural and simple way, and then drives its message home with most appealing logic and moving force. She stirs a congregation. She awakens intense desire for a deepened spiritual life. She shows the attractiveness of a complete consecration in a way that makes one hungry for the deeper experiences of the Christian life."

Protestant Expenses in New York.

The Christian Intelligencer summarizes the large expenditures being made in New York City in the building of new Protestant churches and in the improvement of those already in use. This fall buildings will be opened for worship which have cost $3,500,000. Most of them are in what are known as "downtown" districts. There are other buildings in process of construction which will cost about $2,000,000. In Brooklyn a Beecher memorial in connection with Plymouth church will be opened next month, on which above $250,000 has been expended.

A New Profession.

A new profession has been born. With Mr. Charles Stelzle at its head it receives the name "Consulting Sociologists" with the following catalogue of services to render: Expert attention with reference to Sociological and Religious Surveys; Exhibits; Social Service Campaigns and Conferences; Social and Religious Work among Immigrant, Industrial, and Rural Populations; Publicity, Educational, and Evangelistic Campaigns; Efficiency Methods for Local Churches and National Organizations; General Industrial Problems.

Zionist Convention.

The annual convention of the "Zionist Movement" has just been held in Vienna, and in the opinion of the Zionists, the movement to repeople Palestine and restore it to Jewish control has thereby been set forward. There are two schools of Jewish patriots among the Zionists—one which would secure political control of Palestine, and the other which would promote primarily industrial and agricultural development, looking upon the territorial control as impracticable, more so now than ever, since Turkey has suffered so great losses in the Balkan war. At the Vienna meeting colonization was strongly urged. It was determined to establish a university at Jerusalem, $500,000 being named as the sum required. The delegates to the Congress subscribed one hundred thousand dollars, an American Hebrew giving one-fourth of it.

President A. W. Harris of Northwestern University has publicly announced a gift of $250,000 to that institution from N. W. Harris, former president and now chairman of the board of the Harris Trust and Savings Bank, of Chicago. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars will be given to the chair of Church History, Political Science and Economics, while $100,000 will be devoted to endowment. The gift was inspired by the following sentiment as expressed by the donor: "I am sorry I did not get such an education myself early in life. But I can hope this course will be of great value to the coming graduates of Northwestern and will help to turn out good citizens."

The National Council of the Young Men's Christian Associations in Great Britain is laying out plans for a national movement in the winter of 1914-15 which will be styled the Christian Manhood Campaign based in general upon the plans of the American Men and Religion Movement of 1911-12.

The Laymen's Association of the Illinois Methodist Conference took a strong stand at their recent meeting against the three popular forms of amusement—dancing, card-playing, and theater-going, and called upon their pastors to heartily co-operate with them in their stand.

The passage of a resolution in the New Jersey State Federation of Labor providing that daily sessions of the annual convention shall be opened with prayer was bitterly opposed in debate by speakers who contended that a labor convention was no place for religion.

In the missionary colleges of Turkey there were enrolled 3,796 students during the year 1912-13. Of these, 1,589 were Americans, 891 Greeks, 198 Turks, and 119 Bulgarians. Mohammedan students number 412.

G. Stanley Hall on "Willie."

Apropos of the fall opening of the schools and colleges, Dr. G. Stanley Hall, president of Clark University, said at a dinner in Worcester:

"We all incline to think our own seat of learning the best one, but we should beware of this inclination, for in its nature it is unpleasantly like the letter a Worcester schoolma'am received the other day:

"'Dear Miss Teacher'—so the letter ran—'Please do not push Willie too hard, for so much of his brains is intelleck that he ought to be held back hard, 'stead of pushed hard, or he will run to intelleck entirely, and I do not desire this. So please hold him back hard, so as to keep his intelleck from getting bigger than his body, and so injuring him for life.'"

Warring for Peace.

"I interviewed Andrew Carnegie in Brussels," said a newspaper correspondent. "The great little man talked of course, about peace.

"He told me that peace must be preached gently, affectionately. You can never convert people by enraging them. You can't fight for peace.

"He said a peace advocate of the fiery, virulent, bitter school made a speech one night at a banquet in Pittsburgh, and when he'd finished an old man shook him by the hand and said:

"'That was a fine speech, sir.'

"'Thanks. Glad you liked it.'

"'Yes,' said the old man, 'I liked it first rate. But excuse me, sir, what are you for—peace or war?'"

Interviewing J. J. Hill.

One of the Chicago papers reports this from a shop talk session at the Press Club:

Once upon a time a persistent young cub reporter person was sent to interview James J. Hill, the "empire builder," on how to build 'em. At that time Mr. Hill was more than busy with the Northern Securities case. He was not to be seen at his town home in St. Paul, his office or his country estate of North Oaks.

The faithful cub finally sighted Mr. Hill on the street, walking arm-in-arm with an associate, deep in conversation. The cub, dauntless, dashed up and pushed between them.

"Tell me, Mr. Hill," he demanded, "what are the essentials of success—my paper wants a page feature."

Mr. Hill recovered his glasses and poise. Looking the youth over carefully, he answered with deliberation:

"Nerve and luck, you have them both. Make a page out of that. Good day."

A Story From Ex-Governor Deneen.

Years ago when Former Governor Deneen went to school, he had the natural hatred for a youth in his class named Harold, who was a mathematical genius. Whenever young Deneen failed to solve a problem in arithmetic his anguish was doubled through the knowledge that Harold would have it settled, certified and bullet-proof. Years went by. Deneen became Governor and accumulated a competence. Recently he dropped into his club for dinner. A new but somewhat familiar waiter was busying about him, brushing off crumbs and the like, and finally served the former Governor's meal. Deneen looked over his check—the waiter had made an error of fifteen cents in making it out.

"I called his attention to it," says Deneen. "I scolded him for his stupidity. I grumbled about the incompetency of the club's servants. Then I said: 'Now hereafter you be more careful, George.' He took his scolding meekly, but replied, 'My name isn't George—it's Harold.'"

Not Fair Weather Friends.

United States Weather Forecaster Henry J. Cox is worried these days, says the Chicago Record Herald. He was called on for expert advice on prospective weather and gave it, not knowing of the chances of impending tragedy. He tells the story himself.

"A man called me up the other day and asked what sort of weather we were to have on the lake the following day. I told him that there would be heavy weather—very squally and dangerous. He hemmed and hawed a few moments and said: 'Is That so?' I reassured him that scientifically it was true. He gurgled a little, I don't know whether it was a laugh, and said: 'My wife's folks want to take a trip on a boat. I guess I'll tell them to go ahead.'"

Riley on Poetry.

It was in a recent interview that for the first time James Whitcomb Riley told of the actual work he had done in making his poetry come to possess its strange appeal.

In recovering Riley's "lost" works the editors of the complete edition found that as far back as 1879 Riley had been thinking along the line of "appeal." There were many evidences of his thought in some of his later writings, but that he should have been seeking for a basis of universal appeal so early in his career was indeed a revelation.

The first poem found, which disclosed the poet's ideas on poetry, is one entitled "The Ginoine Ar-Tickle," which was discovered in the files of the old Kokomo (Ind.) Tribune under the date of Nov. 8, 1879. Typically characteristic of Riley, it gives his views on poetry in a more readily understandable fashion than anything that might be said.

"Talkin' o' poetry—there's few men yit
'At's got the stuff biled down so's it'll pour
Out sorgum-like, and keeps a year or more
Jes' sweeter ever' time you tackle it!
W'y all the jinglin' truck 'at hes been writ
For twenty 'ear and better is so pore
You cain't find no sap in it any more
'N you'd find juice in puff balls! And I'd quit.
What people wants is facts, I apprehend;
And naked nature is the thing to give You writin' basis, eh? And I contend
'At honest work is allus bound to live.
Now them's my views! 'Cause you kin recommend Sich poetry as that from end to end."

Again in "A Tale of the Airly Days," a poem written in 1886, a similar idea was expressed in the following way:

"Tell of the things just as they wuz—
They don't need no excuse!—
Don't tetch 'em up like the poets does,
Tel they're all to fine fer use."

In the proem to "Poems Here at Home," written during the summer of 1892, which is the best known of all the Riley verse in which the poet has sought to give utterance to his thoughts regarding poetry, the following oft-quoted lines appear:

"What we want, as I sense it, in the line
O' poetry is somepin' Yours and Mine—
Somepin' with livestock in it and outdoors,
And old crick bottoms, snags and sycamores;
Putt weeds in—pizen vines and underbrush,
As well as Johnny-jump-ups, all so fresh
And sassy like, and groun' squirrels—yes, and 'We.'
As saying is—'We, Us and Company.'

"No 'Ladies' Amaranth' and 'Treasury' book—
Ner 'Night Thoughts' nuther—ner no 'Lally Rook.'
We want some poetry 'at's to Our taste.
Made out o' truck 'at's jes' a-goin' to waste,
'Cause smart folks thinks it's altogether too
Outrageous common—'cept fer me and you—
Which goes to argy, all such poetry
Is 'bliged to rest its hopes on You and Me."

From Near and Far

October 26 will be observed by many churches as Prison Sunday. Special attention will be given on this day to the problems which the day suggests. During the past year the Central Howard Association, which has this celebration in charge, assisted over 1600 ex-prisoners, to gain a new start in life. Information and materials for the observance of Prison Sunday may be secured from the Association, at their headquarters in the Monon Building, Chicago.

The Christian Endeavor unions of Chicago have swung their large memberships into the suffrage movement. The presidents of the Chicago and state unions have approved a plan of instruction for the women voters in the unions. There will be given a six weeks' series of lectures on the election laws of Illinois simultaneously in three parts of the city.

Motherhood is no permanent bar to a position as teacher in the Chicago public schools, according to Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, superintendent of the Chicago schools. A rule advocated by Mrs. Young and adopted by the school board, provides that a women may not be employed permanently as teacher two years after the birth of her child.

The will of Benjamin Altman, recently filed in the Surrogate court, New York, is a human interest document. In the twenty odd sheets, written on both sides, there is seen the purpose of Mr. Altman so to distribute his estate, which has been estimated at $40,000,000, that all his employes shall share in the profits of the business he founded.

The Western Forestry and Conservation Association will hold its annual conference about December 15.. This year it will meet at Vancouver, British Columbia, and will give its main consideration to the problem of forest fire prevention and control.

Disciples Table Talk

Forward Move in Indiana.

Because the work of Indiana missions has become too large for the hands of one man, those in charge of the state organization have divided Indiana into five districts. It is the intention to have a missionary or worker for each of these units. Already three have been selected. After consulting many preachers and laymen, the following men have been asked to undertake this work: T. J. Legg, the Western District; Fred R. Davies, the Southeastern District; Melnotte Miller, the Southwestern District. These workers will help existing churches to become more efficient, set in order things that are wanting, do the work of an evangelist and organize churches in needy and promising fields. The present secretary, L. E. Murray, will retire November 1. C. W. Cauble, who did effective work last spring in the special campaign for $5,000 will be the new Corresponding Secretary. He will begin work November 1. M. T. Reeves, of Columbus, whose generosity has inspired the churches of Indiana with a new enthusiasm for state missions, repeats the challenge of a year ago. He will give another $5,000 on condition that the rest of the state give an equal amount. Mr. Murray, retiring secretary, is very hopeful for the new plan, and asks earnest support for the worthy men who are taking up these several fields.

Booth Memorial at Hiram College.

From 1851 to 1867 Miss Almeda A. Booth was a teacher and lady principal at Hiram. Through about ten years she was associated with Garfield, first as fellow student and then as fellow teacher. No one knew her more intimately than Garfield. After her death in 1875 General Garfield said of her: "In native powers of mind, in thoroughness of scholarship, in womanly sweetness of spirit, in the quantity and quality of effective work done, she has not been excelled by any American woman." A year ago last June a reunion of old Eclectic students was held at Hiram at which a movement was set on foot to provide a suitable memorial for Miss Booth. It is proposed to raise a fund of $50,000 to endow a chair to be known as the "Almeda A. Booth Memorial Chair for Dean of Women in Hiram College." Two-thirds of the amount has already been secured in cash and pledges, mainly contributed by six hundred old Eclectics. B. S. Dean writes from Hiram College that he would be glad to hear from any such whose addresses are not known to him.

M. M. Davis Celebrates Anniversary.

Celebrating the twenty-third anniversary of the date which marked his entrance upon his career as a minister of the gospel in Dallas, M. M. Davis, pastor of the Ross Ave. Church, reviewed the events which led up to and immediately succeeded his coming to Dallas on Oct. 1, 1890, and the years which came after, marked by rapid growth in his church and in the city about him. "I have seen Dallas grow," he said, "from an insignificant little city of 30,000 people to the present magnificent city of more than 100,000, a city with prospects of a brilliant future second to none of which I know. I have seen the steady, rapid growth year after year, and I am glad that I have had something, at least, to do with the moral and spiritual development which has taken place. When I came to Dallas in 1890 we had a little church over on what is now Commerce Street, about where the Y. M. C. A. Building now stands. We had a congregation of about 300 people, and ours was the only church of the denomination in the city. I have seen this congregation grow and enlarge as the city grew, until today we have nine churches and nine big congregations instead of one. Not because it is particularly important, but because it may be of some interest as showing the amount of work which I have done, I will say that during these last twenty-three years in Dallas I have preached 3,287 sermons to my people, and have seen 3,829 people drawn into the church by one agency or another. Sometimes when I think of that enormous number of sermons that I have had the courage to inflict my people with, I am appalled, but I see many of you still looking hale and healthful, and I believe you can stand another one tonight."

Kansas in Convention Session.

The Kansas churches held their annual convention in Atchison, Oct. 13-16. Among out-state speakers were Walter S. Athearn, Iowa; Clair S. Adams, Illinois; A. McLean and Grant K. Lewis, Ohio; G. W. Muckley and Miss Constance Latshaw, Missouri; Mrs. Alice M. Wickizer, Oklahoma, and

Rev. W. S. Priest,
Chairman of Kansas Convention.

Miss Mattie Burgess, returned missionary from India. Walter Scott Priest, of Wichita, served as chairman of the convention. Judge J. N. Haymaker presided over the business sessions and W. E. M. Hackleman of Indiana had charge of the music. At the Toronto Convention the North American front rank banner for Sunday-schools was awarded to Kansas, and the Sunflower folks are making capital of this honor. They consider it a pleasant commentary on the kind of work being done in the Sunflower state. The banner was exhibited at the Atchison convention. There are more than fifty thousand members of the Christian Church in Kansas and the Atchison congregation with its twelve hundred members and its new $45,000 building, led by Jesse M. Bader, gave splendid entertainment to the hosts assembled.

F. F. Grim Discusses Christian Union.

At a recent union service held at the Presbyterian Church, in Albuquerque, N. M., Frederick F. Grim, State Secretary of New Mexico-West Texas Missions, spoke by special request on "The Road to Christian Union." Defining Christian union, Mr. Grim said:

"Christian union is union in the Father and the Son. It is a union of hearts to love and desire, of minds to plan and to think, of wills to execute. It is not a mere sentiment nor a figment of the imagination, but it is a visible, actual, permanent and organic unity constituting the body of Christ of which he is the head. Loyalty to Christ and his Holy Spirit make it imperative that we forget the things which are behind—our party pride, our party zeal, our party glory—and press forward to the goal. How is it to be brought about? Not by magic nor legerdemain, nor by controversy and debate, but every pulpit should resound with the message presenting not alone the scriptural teaching but enforcing the economic, social and national necessity for a re-united church. We should come together in frank and friendly conferences of our agreements and differences in which we will make an honest effort to understand each other. We should be courteous one toward the other and put the best possible interpretations on the beliefs and practices of others."

S.-S. Offering for Home Missions.

No one has had more influence in making the Sunday-schools of the Disciples efficient than Robt. M. Hopkins, the national secretary. One of the lines of enterprise he is pushing at this time is missionary offerings in the schools. Only thirty per cent of the schools sent offerings for missions last year, but Mr. Hopkins states that more schools are ordering supplies and sending in words of encouragement than ever before. November 23 is the day set for the offering this year, and every pastor owes it to his school to give it an opportunity to gain the missionary vision by giving missionary dollars. A Blackboard Review has been prepared for the use of the schools. This, with other supplies, may be secured by addressing R. M. Hopkins, American Christian Missionary Society, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Preacher Fights Social Evil.

An uncompromising crusade against the social evil has been taken up by W. E. Crabtree, pastor at Central, San Diego. In a recent sermon Mr. Crabtree argued that there was no ground for the claim that immorality is beyond the reach of reform because it is as old as the race, and with equal emphasis he declared it was not more respectable on account of its long survival. "They call it an ancient evil," he said, "and seek to prove that it is futile to attempt to handle it because it is so old. That there is no use to strive to eradicate licentiousness, because it is as old as the race, is a very foolish argument. Drunkenness is as old as Noah. Therefore, let drinking go on unrestrained. Murder is as old as Cain. It is no use having a law to forbid it. All evils are the same age. The first man had passions and appetites and he was just a little higher than the brute. The wonder is not that these evils are still with us, but is that man has climbed so amazingly out of the flesh. Now at this late date to throw up the hands and exclaim, 'Oh, it is so old, this evil of lust—it is not worth while to battle!' It is to declare oneself a miserable pessimist and a weakling. The evil is no more respectable now for its age. It is all the more reprehensible and worthy of a death blow."

Englewood Pastor Fights Vice.

C. G. Kindred, pastor at Englewood, Chicago, has lost his patience with the inactivity of State's Attorney Hoyne, in crime cases brought before him. At a recent meeting of the Englewood Law and Order League, Mr. Kindred declared himself in the following words:

"I do not understand the attitude of the state's attorney. We have no trouble getting the police to do their duty, but when we bring the cases to the prosecutor they go no farther. I cannot understand why Mr. Hoyne should take the position of shielding men who are accused of crimes against little girls. Is it possible Mr. Hoyne has allied himself with the saloon interests?" As a result of Mr. Kindred's speech, resolutions condemning the inactivity of the state's attorney in prosecuting "twenty-six" dice game cases and calling on him to stamp out gambling in Englewood were adopted. A letter from the Englewood Women's club, which promised the support of the club, was read at the meeting. The letter was accompanied by a check for $150 with which to carry on the fight. The Englewood Women's club promised its co-operation in an effort to bring the violators of the law to justice. Mr. Kindred declares an effort is being made by the state's attorney's office to block the prosecution of men charged with offenses against children in Englewood. "Something must be done," he said. "We have brought these cases to the attention of the men who are supposed to protect us, but we get no results. It is now time for the citizens to rise up and demand that Mr. Hoyne do his duty. Despite the evidence we have placed in the hands of the state's attorney, Englewood is honey-combed with vice dives."

Dr. Ainslie To Go Abroad.

Along with three other ministers, representing the Presbyterian, Congregational and Methodist churches, Dr. Peter Ainslie will go abroad in January to enlist the support of non-conformist churches of Great Britain in the proposed movement for a world conference on church unity. The other representatives are: Dr. William Henry Roberts, of Philadelphia, stated clerk of the Presbyterian church; Dr. Newman Smyth, of New Haven, pastor emeritus of the First Congregational Church of that city, and Bishop John W. Hamilton, resident Methodist bishop in Boston. These men were appointed to the mission by a conference of ministers which met in New York City recently.

Church Raised $100 per Minute.

The important work at Gary, Ind., where S. W. Nay ministers, was set forward several leagues when, at a men's brotherhood banquet, held Oct. 8, over $1,000 was raised in ten minutes. It was not planned beforehand to take this method of raising funds, but after an address upon the church's finances by Mr. Nay, he called for voluntary subscriptions and they came so rapidly that the $1,000 was soon raised. The congregation is working to clear up the debt upon the present church property and to start a fund for building a permanent church upon the same site. Cecil Sharpe, Hammond pastor, who has aided in the establishment of the Gary church, was among the speakers. Male quartet selections helped to enliven the banquet program.

Fresno, Cal., Has Good Report.

Among the items included in the annual report of the Fresno, Cal., church, Shirley R. Shaw minister, are the following: More than $10,000 has been collected by the church during the past year. Two thousand of this has gone for the support of missions. The two ministers, Dr. Harvey O. Breeden and Shirley R. Shaw, have made 3,151 calls. During the year 203 members have been added, which with twenty-eight removals and deaths brings the total church members to 913. The Sunday-school has collected during the past year $1,354, over half of which has gone for foreign and home missions. Membership has increased nearly 50 per cent and sixty-five of the Sunday-school students have become members of the church.

R. Ray Eldred's Boys Cared For.

B. S. Dean, writing from Hiram College, states that the report of the death of R. Ray Eldred, in the Congo region, came with a shock to those who are acquainted with Mr. Eldred's boys, Ray, Ward and Jo, who are being cared for at the Wharton Memorial Home, where Morton D. Adams and wife are in charge. This Home, writes Prof. Dean, is an ideal place for the children of the missionaries. But there is need, he declares, that some big hearted friends provide the means for the boys' support and relieve Mrs. Adams from the heavier burdens of the Home.

New Convention Plan in Montana.

District conventions, instead of one large state convention, is the innovation contemplated by the churches of Montana, which believe that the state has grown so rapidly in population that the churches are now too widely separated for participation in a single convention. Under the new arrangement the state would be divided into four districts, composed of the north, east, south and west portions of the state. Conventions would be held in each district, making four conventions instead of one. The first of the series is to be held at Anaconda Oct. 23 and 24. Among the speakers are Walter M. Jordan, Butte; Mrs. Tyler B. Thompson, Missoula; C. S. Miles, Salesville; A. L. Chapman, Bozeman; L. Hulser, Deer Lodge; Walter B. Reed, Billings.

Men's Brotherhood at Berkeley, Cal.

When the women of the Berkeley, Cal. Church issued a challenge to the men to organize a club similar to their own, and hold before them a banquet as a reward for their labors, they did not think they would be called upon so soon to fulfill their pledge. The club is now organized, with 101 members. Among the speakers at the banquet were Judge W. H. Waste, T. A. Boyer and H. J. Loken.

Charleston, Ill., Church Reports.

At the annual meeting of First Church, Charleston, Ill., it was reported that the net increase in the church membership during the year was 155. The present resident membership is 885. The Social and Industrial Society raised $188.99 for benevolent purposes. The C. W. B. M. raised $126.63, the Aid Society $380.71, the Sunday-school $281.47, the Brotherhood $18.30, the Christian Endeavor Society $30.00, the church $4006.98; total for all purpose, $5033.08. The church Treasurer reported a balance of $9.32, with all bills paid. Jno. McD. Horne ministers at Charleston.

Report of Kirksville, Mo., Work.

From the "Year Book and Directory" of Kirksville, Mo. First Church, where W. D. Endres ministers, we cull the following figures: One hundred and nineteen were added to the membership during the year, 34 by conversion and 85 by letter and statement. Forty-five letters were issued during the year. Net gain, 74. Received 27 more into the membership of the church this year than last. Resident membership, 525; non-resident membership, 91. Total 616. The church raised a total of $4,592.46 during the year.

A Woman With a Message.

V. W. Blair, pastor at North Tonawanda, N. Y., writes that "one of the richest heart stories" he has ever heard was given to his congregation on a recent Sunday evening by Mrs. Elizabeth Ross. Her theme was "Liberia and My Boy." Mr. Blair speaks unreservedly in commending Mrs. Ross, and believes that the churches generally should give her a hearing. "Her message is so simple, straightforward and convincing," he writes, "that I believe, if heard, she will become mighty in influence for missions."

National Michigan Chautauqua Proposed.

A national Chautauqua, to be conducted by the Christian church, is being proposed by S. O. Landis, pastor of the Central Church, Flint, Mich. Mr. Landis has just returned from the convention at Toronto, where many Michigan Disciples were present and talked of such an institution to be established in their state. The Chautauqua plan calls for a summer resort where ministers and institutional workers may spend several weeks each summer in recreation and at the same time be in a position to hear educational lectures, concerts, etc. Long Lake has been mentioned as a possible location for the Chautauqua.

W. B. Shaw, formerly pastor at Liverpool and Saltney, England, is becoming increasingly ill and helpless. He has for some time been scarcely able to recognize his acquaintances. His illness has been a long and trying one, and it is not a surprising fact that it is difficult to provide him with all the comforts desirable under such circumstances. It would be a gracious thing, the Christian Monthly writes, if some of his many friends would join together in making such a contribution as would secure for him such things as would make his last days as comfortable as possible.

At the Quarterly Assembly of the Chicago Disciples, held Oct. 19, at the First Methodist Church, E. Leroy Dakin, of Memorial Church, gave a report of the Toronto Contion; C. C. Buckner, of Irving Park, talked on "The Suburban Church," and Dr. H. L. Willett discussed "New Problems in the Orient."

"The Christian Call" is the name of the new church weekly put out by University Place Church, Des Moines, C. S. Medbury, pastor. From the second issue of this neat sheet we learn that nineteen persons represented this great church at Toronto.

Several of the good churches of Sixth District Illinois, are without preachers at this time. Among the vacancies are Niantic, Rantoul, Mattoon, Cowden, Bethany, Tuscola, Farmer City and Windsor, reports R. E. Henry, Niantic, Ill.

During a four days' visit of C. R. Scoville to Hiram College, following the Toronto Convention, eight persons were added to the church. Mr. Scoville gave addresses at the college chapel and in the church.

At a meeting of the District Board of the Sixth Illinois District Ralph V. Callaway, of Clinton, was elected Secretary of the District, vice R. E. Henry, resigned, the resignation taking effect November 1.

"The Century Men's Club" has just been reorganized in the church at Warren, Ohio, where E. A. Hibler ministers. The first meeting was held Oct. 14. L. G. Batman, of Youngstown, was chief speaker.

F. M. RAINS.

THE UNITED MISSIONARY CAMPAIGN.

The Home and Foreign Missionary leaders of the United States and Canada, have decided to engage this winter in the most extensive and important piece of coöperative work which they have ever undertaken. The object in view is to enlist a far larger number of church members as intelligent missionary workers, supporters and intercessors. Of the more than twenty millions of Protestant church members in North America, less than one-half of them are doing anything or giving anything to meet the missionary needs either at home or abroad.

In addition to aggressive educational plans to be carried forward within the various denominations, there will be several hundred two-day Missionary Conferences held throughout the United States and Canada. More than twenty teams of experienced speakers are already organized for the efficient conduct of the conferences.

This extensive campaign is planned to lead up to a simultaneous personal canvass in March, 1914, for all missionary purposes, on the part of all the churches of all denominations, so far as they will undertake it. More than two hundred speakers will participate in the conferences. Probably hundreds of churches will at once volunteer for the simultaneous canvass for missionary subscriptions. The entire effort should mean a marked quickening of the spiritual life of many thousands of churches, resulting in greatly increased Christian activity and liberality.

In view of the vast issues involved, the executive committee of the United Missionary Campaign appeals to Christian people everywhere to join in frequent prayer for God's clear guidance and manifested presence and power in connection with this entire undertaking. In private prayer, at the family altars, in the stated church service and in many other meetings called especially for the purpose, it is most earnestly urged that unceasing prayer be offered for a mighty spiritual quickening that will enable the church to strengthen and enlarge its work so as to meet worthily the present critical and stupendous opportunities both at home and abroad. Nothing less than a general and profound spiritual quickening among the churches will meet the present emergency. This quickening will come, and can only come, when fervent prayer is offered unceasingly to God, to this end. "In any land a revival will come when enough people desire it enough—that is, above everything."

Easy to Teach, Inexpensive, Modern

We have been using the Bethany graded lessons now for a considerable time. The objections urged against these lessons before we inaugurated them have been entirely met by the experience we have had with them. They are not harder to teach but indeed easier. We have not found that their use has made any material increase in the expenses of the school in the long run. The use of these lessons has convinced some of the best families of our community that our school was sufficiently modern that they might entrust their children to our care and instruction.

THE IMMORTALITY OF INFLUENCE.

By A. Z. Conrad.

How much are you worth? Not cash but credit measures your commercial power. How much can you lift? Very little with mere muscle. Your lifting power is determined by fulcrum and lever. Intellectually you are great, not as the storehouse of knowledge acquired through study, but you are equal to all your available resource in the way of great libraries which have the accumulated wisdom of the ages. It is therefore a question of appropriable wealth. Reputation is capital. Not what you have in the bank, but that, plus what your financial record and standing can command, determines what your investing ability is. In the industrial world the car of progress moves on wheels of credit. This illustrates the value of reputation and the importance of keeping your name untarnished.

INFLUENCE.

Your worth to the world is wholly a question of influence. Power to direct the conduct of others is the most sacred of all ability. Influence expresses itself partly in intellectual ability to convince. A logician is influential with the people who are capable of following his argument and who seriously desire to know the truth. It is a high privilege to satisfy an intellectual quest and to change interrogation points to periods. But greater than this is that power of persuasion that secures the surrender of the will. It is one thing to know the truth and quite another to be obedient to it. He is a much greater man who can persuade another to invest his life and energy in some enterprise than he who can merely convince another that the enterprise is a good one. The wooing note is a thousand times more effective than the warring note. The sword is no match for suavity. Artillery is useless against icebergs, sunbeams compel them to capitulate. Wind awakens the wrath of the sea but the persuasions of gravity control the whole ocean. Portrayal, counsel, appeal, all these are phases of influence, but all of them taken together do not represent influence at its highest and best.

EXAMPLE.

The very heart of influence is example. In example we have the radiation of personality and the real measure of personal power. Here is something for which every man is accountable and whether he will or not, he must and does exercise an influence on others by what he thinks, feels and acts. It pertains to the high and the low, the rich and the poor, the learned and the ignorant, the good and the wicked. The great Apostle to the Gentiles recognized the inestimable importance of example in the development of the Kingdom of Christ. He noted the inevitableness of influence, the impossibility of separateness which would excuse anybody from the responsibility of influence. Romans 14:7, "For none of us liveth to himself and none dieth to himself." We stand or fall not so much by what we say as by what we are. A single act can neutralize and destroy the effects of the exhortations of a lifetime. Precept depends for its support upon a corresponding example. We are blasting or blessing. We are destroying or developing. We are awakening faith or creating doubt. We are advancing life or hastening death in other lives. The universality of the law gives it special importance. None so poor, so weak, so ineffective, so belated but that they lead some other one. All this is independent of purpose or desire. It is a necessary part simply of being.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF LIVING.

The glory, the sanctity, together with the overwhelming responsibility of living, all these are wrapped up in the single word, "example." Lack of eloquence, a lack of prominence of position, a lack of noteworthy heredity, these things cannot divest life of its worth. There yet remains the fact of influence. Romans 14:12, "So then every one of us shall give an account of himself to God." Not of what his talent is; not of what his environment is; not what his privilege of education is; irrespective of all these things he shall give an account of himself. Personality is the thing that counts because from personality emanates influence. To be sure there are collateral considerations of importance; wealth, education, reputation, natural endowment, all these are in the nature of trusteed power. Waste is wicked. All ability is a trust. It must be administered conscientiously and righteously. We have to be both wisdom and will to those less favored than ourselves. It is vain to ask, "Shall I not do what I will with mine own?" Right here we confuse issues and ignore facts. Nothing I have is my own. We read, "All things are yours." Yes, but there is added to this, "and ye are Christ's." Living is tremendously serious business. To live superficially, flippantly, indifferently is itself sin. Example is the tragic, telling fact of life. On its spiritual side it is all glorious, since it gives life its zest and satisfaction. It includes all who will it so in the list of world-builders. On its vice side it is terrible to contemplate, and its consequences, who can measure? The apostolic caution should receive larger attention from the Christian world: "Judge this rather that no man put a stumbling block in his brother's way, or an occasion for falling."

EVIL THE PERVERSION OF GOOD.

V. 14. "I know and am persuaded of the Lord Jesus that nothing is unclean of itself." Certainly not, no power of mind or body, no material object is in itself despicable. It is in the use or abuse of things that their moral significance is found. Good or bad has to do with human decision. The misuse or abuse of a thing in itself good, changes it at once from good to evil. The saddest of all facts is this, that vision comes to be so distorted, conscience so seared, the current of evil desire so intense that men can actually confuse evil with good until they say, "Evil, be thou my good." An evil practice may be so habitually indulged in as to lose all of its repulsiveness and become positively attractive. All this emphasizes the importance of influence and the necessity of clearness of discrimination and consciousness in choice. It is this very perversion of good into evil with which we have to reckon in the matter of influence. If the misuse and the abuse of a thing are probable, then we must hesitate even though we might ourselves indulge innocently in it, simply because of the probability of its trend of influence. It is not enough for me to know that I can do this or that. I must know that my use of it would not be likely to lead someone else to its abuse. A study of consequences is imperative, and must always be taken into consideration in determining my own conduct. It is undoubtedly true that many men may safely engage in practices without injury to themselves which others cannot indulge in without almost a certainty of self-destruction. An athlete can row with safety on the quiet waters above the falls and move far down where the current becomes swift, while an invalid or an inexperienced oarsman following the example wouid be dashed over the precipice to death. If the athdete knows that the example will lead others less strong to ruin, he has no right, however safe to himself, to go down into the danger zone.

LIBERTY AND LICENSE.

My liberty can easily lead to another man's license. With a disciplined mind and a fixed purpose I might safely read books containing much of falsehood and many expressions of unbelief, but when I know that the reading of these books, however much of valuable scientific information they may contain, are likely to unsettle the faith of another or lead to a lack of reverence of holy things, my business is to let such books alone, and this in order that my example may not be destructive of the faith of others. The principle is put in the fifteenth verse of the fourteenth chapter of Romans, "Destroy not with thy meat, him for whom Christ died." Reference is here made to the practice of eating meat offered to idols. Some might do this with impunity and without affecting in the least their sound support of truth. They might ignore entirely its relation to heathen customs. But with others its influence would be different. It might lead many to a disrespect of the Christian faith and even to an acceptance of idolatrous practices. In this period when the pleasure passion is on so strong the exhortation of the Apostle is all the more important. If I discover that the use of my automobile on Sunday, for physical benefit, for a sincere and honest communing with nature, is leading multitudes of people not very closely attached to the church to disregard their Christian obligations and make Sunday a mere holiday, there is only one thing for me to do as a consistent Christian, and that is for me to voluntarily deprive myself of my liberty in order that my example may not destroy someone for whom Christ died. Not alone for my brother's sake, but for my Redeemer's sake I must recognize the sacredness of influence. I dare do nothing which will destroy or even lessen my power to persuade men to live for Christ. "Let not then your good be evil spoken of." V. 16. To be careless in these matters is to forfeit all right to discipleship. It is to diminish our worth to the Kingdom because it lessens our power among men. No pleasure is worth it. Right here we find abundant reason to condemn unsparingly the use of tobacco by clergymen. It is bad business for a minister of the Gospel. He who visits the sick should be clean. He who would help mothers keep their sons pure should set an example to which mothers can point.

RIGHTEOUSNESS AND RIGHT.

Jesus, who is our perfect example, dwelt very little upon his rights. He was concerned with righteousness. What no man has a right to demand of me I may willingly do for my Master's sake. The weak man or the wicked man may have no right to say to others, "You have no business to engage in this or that because I am likely to take advantage of it and go wrong." We are not questioning the rights of the individual to do many things which he had better refrain from doing because of its influence upon others. It is not that other men have a right to demand of you that you should refrain from certain practices, but that you should voluntarily be willing and glad to do so for the Kingdom of Christ and the salvation of souls. In the extension of the Kingdom the application of this principle is vital. Jesus made this clear when again and again he said, respecting certain lines of conduct, "If you do these things only, what thank have you? Do not even the publicans the same?" Indeed, sacrifice begins right in the centre of our rights and not when we have reached their limit. This principle can appropriately have application to every law of the Decalogue, but it has its peculiar force with respect to certain great evils of our own day. It is immensely important in relation to maintaining church and the investment of influence in it through regularity of attendance and enthusiastic advocacy. It is wonderfully pertinent with respect to the keeping of the Christian Sabbath, but probably it finds its most important application with respect to the liquor traffic, in all of its forms and phases.

CHRIST IN MODERN LIFE.

Our final appeal must ever be to our Lord. What would Jesus do if he were to move in the social circles of our day? It would be the worst sacrilege to say he would either drink himself, or exonorate the moderate drinker. It is safe to lay it down as a broad principle that Jesus Christ in modern life would do nothing which would endanger the life of a brother man. It is more than possible we would hear once more, "Woe unto you Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites." Let us move to the levels of high Christian privilege and think less of our rights and more of our opportunities.

UNION WITH CHRIST.
Oct. 29. John 15:1-8.

Union with Christ is a theme that rejoices the heart of the mystic. To him that union is deliverance from doubt and fear and distraction. It causes things of time and sense to pass from the mind and it introduces the Eternal. If we were all mystics, ecstatic experiences would mark the consideration of the present theme. But we are not all mystics, perhaps it would be nearer the truth to say that we are mystics only occasionally. We like to think that we approach the discussion of religion with the determination to keep within the bounds of the severely practical.

Union With Christ's Disciples.

From the day he spoke his last word to his disciples down to the present Christ has had disciples. The facts seem to give ample warrant for the belief that disciples of Christ will be found upon earth in the future. One who wishes to be joined to Christ will, if he knows what he needs, join himself to the disciples. The Christian is not an Ishmaelite with his hand against every man. His is the social mind. He is a free man, he will not be coerced; but he is far enough along in intelligence and feeling to choose companionship in religious experience. He gives attention to the ideals that are common to himself and his fellow disciples and he values these so much that he can recognize the differences between his beliefs and practices and those of his brethren and maintain his right to hold opinions not approved by others without being alienated from them. One may contend earnestly for the faith once for all delivered to the saints, so he thinks, and not be cantankerous and opinionated. In fact, if there is any man whose discipleship he doubts, it is the man who is arrogant in opinion and who substitutes prejudice for honest investigation.

The Mind of Christ.

There is a certain way of looking at life and conduct which is distinctively Christian. Those who have this way of estimating themselves and their neighbors possess the mind of Christ. The robber, whether he masks his face and uses a gun to induce his victim to hand over his property or brings to his aid business; and legal habits that society has acquired from pirates, is a stranger to the mind of Christ. Jesus was always fair. He sought to take advantage of no man. Fairness is a mark of discipleship, the absence of it is the mark of a mind alienated from Christ. Is business organized so that the spirit of fairness counts for success? Is it just that the spirit of war should be fostered and that taxes should be made more and more burdensome that armies and navies may be supported? The mind of Christ is a radical mind. It permits no compromise. Our morality is too much of a mixture to be called Christian. It has many elements of Christianity. There are many admirable Christian lives blessing the world by their presence, but we have as yet only glimpses of the world in which the mind of Christ shall be the mind of government and business and personal conduct.

The Hope of Christ.

It is fatal to a man's character to lose hope. Jesus inspires a great hope. He saw, as we do not, the sin of the world. The hurt that sin inflicts upon the souls of man we see but dimly. We are indignant when some one robs us or one of our associates. A few of us have a profound sense of the awfulness of sin. Jesus felt its power whenever it defiled and destroyed the weakest. Nevertheless, he was hopeful. He looked to the day of triumph. We are not learning from him that a certain number of women must be sacrificed to the lust of man, that greed must forever be allowed to feed upon childhood and womanhood, or that the unscrupulous and violent shall inherit the earth. Much of our preaching is hopeless. Even when we say that Christ is conquering, our voice betrays the absence of hope. Union with Christ is life to hope. The mind that is filled with the sentiments originating from this union is possessed of reasons for hope.

The Pastor and Religious Education

A few pastors, not alert to the modern educational emphasis in church work, are so unwise as to declare that they are not concerned with the literature used in their schools. They "leave that to the Superintendent," they say. Such a statement implies a lack of understanding of the work of the Sunday school. Last week The Christian Century told of a church building that had been constructed as a religious education plant, rather than according to the conventional style. Whether that was just as it should be or not we do not say, but we do say this: The greatest task before the Church today is Religious Education. And we say this also: The most important element in successful Sunday school work, next to the character of the teachers employed, is the kind of literature used.

How many schools today are using the literature of a certain publisher because they have "always used it," or because there has been no special dissatisfaction with it! What would become of a public school superintendent, think you, who would continue to use the same text books for years on that sort of pretext? Or could a manufacturing plant succeed for long that made no change in the machinery, because they had "always used" that sort of machinery!

A conscientious pastor will make a careful examination of all the available literature produced for Sunday school work, and see that that literature is chosen which is best adapted to the purpose of true religious education.

The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade

A Celebration in Gladness and in Service

THE announcement of a plan to celebrate The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary, which falls on next January 1, by a Crusade for Twenty Thousand new Subscriptions and Twenty Thousand Dollars to pay for them was made in the issue of October 23. All our readers are asked to give special attention to that original announcement. If by any chance you overlooked it or wish to refer to it again we will be glad to send an extra copy of that issue free of charge to any address. The essence of the Crusade plan is as follows:

The Disciples Publication Society proposes to make a concession of $10,000 on 20,000 new subscribers, provided,

1) that present readers of The Century send in 20,000 names, without cost or any other obligation, according to instructions on the blank on page 4, and,

2) that the friends of The Christian Century will donate $20,000 to send the paper to these names for one full year. The list of names will include 4,000 ministers not now taking The Christian Century (this list to be compiled in the office from the Year Book, not by our readers) thus putting The Century in the hands of virtually every preacher in the brotherhood.

Such a list of 20,000 new names (every name carefully selected because it represents an active church worker, if not a leader) added to our present list of subscribers, will give The Christian Century the most valuable subscription list of any religious newspaper in the United States!

There will not be one subscriber on such a list who takes the paper from a sense of duty! Our entire list will be 100 per cent interested—and eagerly interested.

During the year the publishers will be enabled to produce a paper as far ahead of the present Christian Century as the present Christian Century is declared by its enthusiastic readers to be ahead of any paper published for the Disciples.

The result will be that by the end of the year, 90 per cent of these gift subscriptions will be renewed on their own account, and The Christian Century will be established in the hearts of a constituency which, by ordinary methods of subscription increase, it will take many years to gain.

Here is the most important, farthest-reaching, deepest-going philanthropy now presenting itself to open-minded, progressive Disciples. The large success of The Christian Century means the enormously increased success of every missionary enterprise among us. It means the success of the ideals of education—a scholarly ministry, a non-commercialized, non-sectarian Sunday-school literature, a true and rational pedagogical method in the religious education of the young, and an evangelism in accord with the deepest religious feelings and ideals.

The success of this Anniversary Crusade means the serious taking to heart by the Disciples of Christ of the duty of practicing Christian unity—a duty which their marvelous numerical success as a separate body had almost eclipsed.

We have cast upon our friends' hearts this high enterprise. We are confident they will send in the 20,000 names and do it promptly.

We are not less confident our friends will respond in gifts of money—from $1,000 down to $1—as their part in sending this paper to 20,000 new subscribers.

Its Subscribers Truly Love The Christian Century

DURING the thirty years of The Christian Century's life there has never been a time when there were so many and such positive signs of enthusiasm for its message as at the present moment.

For the past two years, including the period of approach to the Louisville convention, and since that convention, there has been a rising tide of positive sentiment which is still swelling in volume and earnestness.

The expressions at Toronto from men and women of all shades of conviction were so many and so earnest and so heartening that the editors themselves, accustomed as they are to hearing nice things said about The Century, were caught shyly blushing more than once, and as for your humble servant, the Circulation Man, he confesses here, publicly, and with sincere penitence, that he did not dream the paper whose subscription list he took charge of last September 1 was held in any such intense affection as he now knows Century readers cherish for their paper.

This C. M. has promoted circulation on several large city dailies and has also headed the subscription department of another Disciples' weekly, but he has never known what it was to have subscribers who literally LOVED their paper and who would make sacrifices for it until he got on the inside of The Christian Century office.

Behind the counter of our booth at Toronto a little woman set down some of the kind words she heard spoken to various members of the Century staff. Here are some of them:

"The only paper I care to pass on to my neighbor."

"I give mine to the Presbyterian preacher every week. It has changed his conceptions of us Disciples."

"Here is one dollar. Continue the subscription to A. B., the Congregational preacher in our town."

"The Century is the only paper among us that has a message for the time."

"I am delighted every time I open the wrapper."

"I look for it eagerly."

"Our biggest paper."

"It has atmosphere."

"You are making us a new people."

"Your interpretation of missions makes The Century itself our most important missionary agency, and I believe it ought to command our gifts just as our societies do."

"The Century is edited!"

"If you'll not go too fast we'll all be with you soon in practicing Christian union!"

"Hugh Macdonald—say, he has brains!" "Yes," added a companion in reply to this remark, "and he has something that ought always to go with brains, too."

"Best thing now happening in the brotherhood."

"Couldn't keep house without The Century."

"I want The Century. Hugh Macdonald's article alone is worth the price of admission."

"I am going to try this year to get it into the families of my church. Its policy of leaving other papers to do the quarreling and backbiting makes it our only fit family paper."

"It's alive!"

"I like it because it leaves out so much!"

"Your paper is religious. It feeds our spiritual life."

"You have no idea how much you are leavening the whole lump of our people with your message of the deeper spirituality."

And so forth and so forth.

A Plain-Spoken Criticism--and What Came of It!

But there was one big criticism, and that was directed at this poor Circulation Man's department. This criticism was made again and again, and bluntly, once almost harshly. One man, in greeting the editor said, right out where twenty people heard it:

"Why don't you show some business enterprise? Why don't you PUSH your paper? You fellows haven't enough enterprise. There are thousands and thousands of people hungry for such a paper as you are putting out every week. They know that The Century exists, but they don't know what kind of a paper it is. You put the goods in the store, but you don't advertise! You need a selling force. You need to talk your paper up. Other papers use their own columns for this purpose. Why don't you use yours? Your Circulation Man must be a dead one!"

And our editor—well, he shuffled a little in his characteristic way, and mumbled something about never having had a Circulation Man at all until thirty days ago, and something about not liking to blow one's own horn, and, besides, there had never been any money for promotion purposes, adding, however, that a number of friends had come to the support of the paper this summer and that there were some plans maturing that he thought would please his plain-spoken friend.

Right then and there your Circulation Man took his hint. Everybody praises The Century. Everybody believes its message is vital to the times in which we live. And pretty nearly everybody sees how weak has been its circulation policy in the past. And there entered into the Circulation Man's soul a stern determination that our plain-spoken friend would have to take it all back when he meets us at Atlanta a year hence!

For some time the editors had been talking with the staff about this Thirtieth Anniversary Crusade. It was to be a quiet unannounced affair. The editors themselves were to go out into the field among the friends of the paper and raise twenty thousand dollars to pay for twenty thousand subscriptions. A sort of "gumshoe" Crusade! Think of it!

Well, here is where your Circulation Man's "stern determination" got to work. He went boldly up to the editors and declared that the business of editors was to edit—and that now was the time of all times for The Century to be edited—and that if the editors went off raising twenty thousand dollars there would be precious little editing done—and that if our loyal friends only knew what a big scheme was in our heads they themselves would get us the twenty thousand subscribers and the twenty thousand dollars to pay for them by the time our birthday rolled around—and they would do this with very little personal solicitation from the editors—indeed, that many a man and woman would give more money if the editors would stay at home and edit a great paper than they would give if there had to be any let-down in the quality of each issue—and that if two pages a week could be put at the disposal of the Circulation Man, he and the host of present loyal subscribers would do the rest!

The Circulation Man was out of breath, but his "stern determination" was not out of breath.

After talking it over the editor-in-chief replied that he was somewhat skeptical but would give the plan a trial. He had a deep aversion, he said, to asking people personally for money, anyhow. (This "aversion" isn't taken at its face value in the office. Some of us think that the editor just talks that way, that people treated him so well last summer when he was out "asking for money" that he is only too glad to try it again. But maybe that's unfair to him.)

At all events it's perfectly clear that the Circulation Man's first act was a great success. His two pages were certainly read last week! The congratulations are pouring in on every mail. And they are so hearty, so appreciative of The Century, so hopeful that the great birthday goal will be realized and the paper given the hearing and the standing it deserves, that the C. M. has added three degrees of "sternness" to his "determination" to make The Christian Century the leading paper of the Disciples of Christ in circulation, and then the leading religious paper of the United States. And it begins to look as if hundreds and perhaps thousands of others are going to help. As we go to press there lies on the C. M.'s desk a great stack of letters of congratulation and encouragement received in the past three days—and our subscribers have but just received their last week's paper. This week and next week there will be a constant shower of these words of felicitation.

And the names, too, are beginning to roll in! We had not expected many names so soon. What is desired is careful, painstaking thought by each compiler of names—not a hurriedly made out list.

But do not hold your list until you are sure you have everybody down whom you will think of! Send it in and wait until the next week for another blank. The blank will appear in every issue of The Century during the Crusade.

Keep the names rolling in!

The Spirit in the Wheels

This is an age of organization. Great combinations of capital and labor make their influence felt in every department of our economic life. In our churches as well as in business relations the demand is for organization, for societies and committees. All this is well, but well only so far as it gives expression to the real spiritual life of the church.

Back of all the great organizations of capital is some directing spirit, either a guiding principle or a definitely accepted policy or the strong individuality of an acknowledged leader. We ride upon a railroad train dependent for its forward motion upon the physical labor of the fireman who shovels the coal; but above him is the engineer who pulls the throttle, and above him again is the conductor who commands the train, but none of these embody the full spirit of the road. Above these is the train dispatcher and above him the superintendent, and above these the board of directors; and when we are told at length that this road upon which we ride is a part of the Vanderbilt system or the Gould system or some other great system, then we acknowledge the name of the man or group of men who control the spirit of the railroad.

The Church is an independent organism, with a life of its own. Its life is the aggregate of other lives, individual and collective. Above the membership, above the pastor, above the various societies and committees and boards of trust who express its organic life, there is a guiding purpose, an impelling Spirit, else the Church itself is lifeless.

We visit a coast defense battery, and examine the disappearing guns that comprise its armament. Here is a twelve inch rifle so finely adjusted that any one man may turn the mighty tube in any direction and raise or lower it at will; but it is powerless of itself. There is its projectile, a great conical mass of nickel and steel weighing fifteen hundred pounds, large enough to sink any ship that sails, but it lies upon the ground an inert thing. Here is the powder in brown prismatic cakes with a hole in the middle of each, and these carefully packed into bags with a charge in each one sufficient to send a shell approximately one mile for each inch in the diameter of the gun; but the powder is as inert and lifeless as the shell. A hostile ship might sail in no fear of it as it lies upon the ground. But let the shell be placed in the gun, with the powder behind the shell, and then let a single electric spark be communicated to the powder, and the shell speeds forth across the blue waves with a velocity sufficient to command the shore for a radius of ten miles, and thus afford protection for the three thousand miles behind it to the opposite shore. The defense is in the life spark that communicates the flame to the waiting powder.

Some of the bitterest disappointments that come to ministers grow out of misplaced faith in church machinery. There is a meeting, an address, perhaps a dinner, and an organization. A constitution and by-laws are adopted; officers are elected; a list of worthy objects is approved, and it is assumed that with such an organization the kingdom will come before breakfast. But the members oversleep next morning, and the kingdom does not come. The organization is inert. It has no power in itself. All the labor expended in setting up the new machine and explaining its uses and testing its gears has been wasted. The help which the new club or guild or society was to have rendered to the minister results in this, that the minister has one more load to carry or push.

There is a verse in the Bible which says that "Some trust in chariots and some in horses," and which suggests that these sometimes disappoint those who trust in them. Translated into modern language it might read, "Some trust in organizations and others in committees, but we will make mention of the name of the Lord our God."

What is true of the local church is true of national societies. There is nothing in a constitution and by-laws which can save a soul. Machinery, even the best of it, is not an end in itself. The worth of all machinery is to be tested by the severest tests of pragmatism. It is good if it works, and if the product is ample and good, and if nothing better and simpler is in sight. If it fails to meet any of these tests, the machine belongs on the scrap pile.

It is vain to put our trust in mere machinery. Machinery of itself but adds to the load and increases the friction. We have quantities of machinery which does not produce enough power to replace the labor which it cost to dig the coal it burns. We need machinery, but it should dig more coal than it consumes; and no machinery will be a permanent advantage to the Church of Christ unless it embodies the life of the Spirit of God.

Ezekiel had a vision which might well be the vision of the Church as it now is organized. There was wheel within wheel, and he grew dizzy trying to discover and remember what all the wheels were for. Probably he never discovered; if he did, he was one of a very few men who could have told. But one thing gave him courage. The Spirit of the Living God was in the wheels. So let it be now and evermore.

Fellowship With Christ in Suffering

BY W. C. BOWER.

EDITOR'S NOTE: There was no feature of the Toronto Convention programs that received wider comment than the series of addresses on "Fellowship With Christ," arranged by the Foreign Society. Four of them—those of President Frederick D. Kershner, Rev. George A. Campbell, Rev. J. H. Goldner and Prof. W. C. Bower—were delivered during the early Foreign Society sessions; that of Rev. Carey E. Morgan was given at the Sunday morning service. In subsequent issues we hope to present to our readers other numbers of this helpful series.

LIKE a Mont-Blanc, from the Alpine range of Paul's thinking rises his doctrine of the mystical union between the disciple and his Lord. Beneath his forensic manner of conceiving salvation is Paul's belief in the method of salvation through the identification of the saved with the Savior. In his deepest thought that relation is vital and personal, transcending the thought forms of judicial procedure or of status. In that union the disciple ceases to live, but Christ lives in him.

Kindled by imagination and penetrated by profound emotion, this conception of the vital union is transfigured into the purest mysticism. Paul thinks of himself as sharing with Christ the crucial experiences of His redemptive life. With Christ he suffers death by crucifixion; with Christ he is buried in baptism; with Christ he rises as by a resurrection to walk in newness of life; with Christ his life is hid away in God, above the reach of the vicissitudes of this changeful life; and, looking forward to the supreme moment of history when his glorified Lord will return, he sees himself manifested with Him in glory. It is against the luminous background of these fundamental ideas that there emerges Paul's conception of his fellowship with Christ in suffering.

SOME PRACTICAL IMPLICATIONS.

To be sure, in many fragments dealing with the doctrinal content of Christianity there is a theological import in this idea. But there is an extension of this conception of fellowship with Christ in His sufferings which has the most far-reaching practical implications. It finds frequent expression in his correspondence, and always in connection with his missionary labors. Measuring his fragile body against the stupendous task of carrying the message through Asia Minor, across the Aegean into the Grecian peninsula, and westward past Rome to the edge of the world, bearing to his death the scars of stonings, and beatings, of exposure and disease, we do not wonder that he should construe his ministry as a continuation of the ministry of his Lord, and his afflictions as a sharing in his Lord's sufferings, not differing greatly in purpose, spirit, or in kind. In a letter to a mission church, and with a boldness of thought that startles us, he says: "I rejoice in my sufferings for your sake, and fill up on my part that which is lacking in the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his body's sake which is the church." To another church founded by his missionary labors, out of prison cold and impending martyrdom, he affirms that his one passion is to know Christ and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, becoming conformed unto His death. As his thought sweeps across the centuries and glimpses the program of God, the daring thought takes possession of his mind that for the accomplishment of so stupendous a task even the sufferings of Christ are not sufficient, but that in the plan of God his own sufferings are needed to partially complete that which was lacking in the passion of his Lord.

Not that the unique passion of our Lord was in itself inadequate. On the contrary, its completeness and finality are everywhere insisted upon in the Scriptures of the New Testament. Before His passion He was able to say, "I glorified thee on the earth having accomplished the work which thou hast given me to do." Nevertheless, sufficient as was Christ's passion when viewed in itself, Paul felt that when viewed in the light of the entire history of the Kingdom of God, there was a lack which must be fulfilled by the sufferings of the disciples.

A CLEAR MESSAGE.

This conception, so difficult for the commentators, speaks a clear message to the Christian heart. God's purpose is eternal, having its beginning before there was a human race, and by no means yet complete. It lies like a broadening path of light across the centuries. Many have been the toilers in its behalf. Unique as was the work of Jesus, it was but a segment of God's redemptive purpose. Such was the mind of Jesus. While witnessing to the consciousness of Jesus as to the completeness of His personal task, the Gospel memoirs equally witness to His consciousness that the task itself was unfinished. He left a program for a continuation and completion of the ministry which He began. On the eve of His departure He said to His disciples, "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you." From His point of view, the work of the disciples was to be a continuation of the ministry to which He gave His life. From His point of view, He came not so much to do something for us as to do something with us. This, I take it, is both the method and the meaning of the incarnation. From His point of view, the work of world-redemption is one which can only be accomplished through loving co-operation of the Divine and human agencies.

But, in the nature of our constitution, fellowship with Christ in His redemptive work involves fellowship with Him in His suffering. It is written in the structure of our universe that the good of the many springs from the vicarious suffering of the few. The Divine method of salvation through the humiliation and the death of Christ was not only pursued in absolute obedience to that law, but was its most perfect revelation to the human mind. The greatest benefactor of our race, He was Himself the prince of burden-bearers. His visage was more marred than any man's. He was a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief. Men thought Him smitten of God and afflicted for His own moral shortcomings. But a truer moral and spiritual insight perceived that He was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities, and that Jehovah had laid upon Him the iniquities of us all. Never was truer word spoken than in the reproach that was cast upon Him on His cross: "He saved others; himself he cannot save." For Him it was the choice of an alternative—He could save others or He could save Himself; but He could not save others and save Himself.

WHAT THE CROSS SYMBOLIZES.

Out of His own experience of suffering incurred in the service of others, He announced that he that would follow in His way must take up His cross daily. Like his Lord, he who would save his life must lose it in the lives of others. Unless one's life fall into the earth and die, it abideth by itself alone. The Christian consciousness has not erred in seizing upon the cross as the symbol of Christianity. The cross is the symbol of self-giving in loving service for others, and self-giving is the heart of Christ. In the heraldry of spiritual men, the cross is the badge of the world's benefactors. Would we share with Christ in His redemptive task? Then we must drink His cup, and be baptized with the baptism with which He was baptized. We too must be amazed and sore troubled as we enter within the shadow of our own impending cross.

Only a mind illumined by the Divine wisdom can begin to appreciate what it has cost and will yet cost to redeem the world. The transaction of Calvary is only a momentary disclosure in time and space of the tragedy which rests eternally in the heart of God. The atonement there revealed amidst the sympathetic travail of nature, is an eternal atonement.

Great is the cost of progress. It seems to be a law of life that the keel of progress shall be reddened with the blood of sacrifice. Is it too much that the sea should claim its toll of human life if only a highway be made for men and their burdens on the trackless deep? Is it too much that the bodies of our adventurous sons be offered to the Moloch of the air, if only he yield us the secret of flight? Is it too much that men should be buried in the starless caverns of the earth if only the ancient hills yield us their reluctant treasure? Our age of progress answers with an emphatic "No!" if only civilization and the good of the many are thereby advanced. Is it too much that a flood of fire and blood has swept thousands of missionaries and native Christians to their death in China? Is it too much that the heart of Livingstone lies buried in the heart of Africa? Is it too much that G. L. Wharton sleeps in Indian soil, or that Dr. Loftis rests beside the highways of his own Thibet? Is it too much that the Congo claimed the body of Ray Eldred as its people claimed his life? Our Christian consciousness answers with an equally emphatic "No!" if the Kingdom of God is thereby advanced. The evangelization of the world has not yet cost us what it cost the Son of God. Nor will it seem too much when the world-task is finished and our race, united and redeemed, has realized itself in God.

GOD'S METHOD OF REDEMPTION.

The incarnation, by which God merged His sinless and immortal life with ours, was the method of redemption in Christ. For Him the incarnation involved humiliation, suffering, and death. It must needs be so, since redemption comes from the sharing of the life of God. But through that incarnation a portion of our race is beginning to realize itself in God. That God's redemptive work may be completed there must be a new incarnation. The church in Christian lands must take upon herself the form of a servant, and humbling herself, must become obedient, if need be, even unto death. The church must merge the life that is in her through the indwelling Christ with the life of the non-Christian nations, that Christ may be formed in them also, and that they may be lifted into the life of God. The method of the incarnation must remain forever incomplete until the Christ has clothed Himself, not only with the flesh and blood of the Hebrews or of the Occidental peoples, but with the flesh and blood of China, of India, of Africa, and of the islands of the sea, and the whole race shall be united and redeemed in Him.

THE VISION OF THE INNER SHRINE.

Only through the rent veil of vicarious suffering can we enter into the holy of holies of Jesus' life. It is much to enter into His thought-life as with admiring wonder we listen to Him teaching the multitudes in Galilee; it is much to feel His sympathy as He moves among the eager throng healing and helping as He may; it is much to gaze in awe while He is transfigured before us. But if we would really know the Lord we must enter the silence and the shadows of the Garden with Him. We may believe from the memoirs of His life that He longed for human fellowship in that earthly hour; does He not long for it still? The pathos of the Garden, now as then, is that we sleep while He suffers. And thus we miss the vision of the inner shrine which only eyes baptized in tears can see.

Some Convention Sign Posts

A Statement of Some "Signs of the Times" Among the Disciples, Which Appeared at the Toronto Convention.

BY E. B. BARNES.

AS a people, we are beginning to realize the value of the devotional element in our conventions. Toronto was a decided improvement in this particular over previous conventions. The morning sessions of half an hour at the King Edward Hotel were helpful beyond expression, while a new spirit pervaded the opening sessions at Massey Hall, the arrangements of which assisted in making the services what they were intended to be. It is next to impossible to have a devotional service in a barn-like building. The people must be close together, and no opportunity afforded for visiting. In addition to the devotional exercises proper, the addresses in many instances, might readily be compiled into a book that would take its place with the literature of Andrew Murray and S. D. Gordon. It would mark our passing from dogmatic theology to the realm of introspection, and to where emphasis is laid upon conduct rather than upon creed. We are journeying much more rapidly than we think from the days when no convention was complete without a sounding of controversial notes to the day when the conciliatory temper is pervading all our counsels. We are going from bugle-blast eras to the era of the olive branch, a fact which is most encouraging to a people devoted to the task of calling Christendom back to apostolic standards.

THE FRATERNAL SPIRIT.

A splendid spirit of fraternity was everywhere manifest. There were fewer groups of the disaffected to be seen lamenting the degeneracy of the times. Men of scholarly attainments and deep spiritual power had set the pace of the convention, and almost to a man their addresses would have reached high-water mark among convention addresses, if there had not been so many good ones. The excellence of them all may cause us to forget how great they were. And the hearers had every reason to congratulate each other over the future of the Disciples which holds more promise than we have been able to discover in many a year. The backwoods theologian who glories in his adherence to exploded ideas while ridiculing the standpatism of China, might be seen on the outskirts of the crowd; but even he must have been able to read the handwriting on the wall which interpreted meant that among us the tail was no longer to be permitted to wag the head; he must have spent much time bemoaning the fate that had befallen the faith, sulking while his hopeful brethren shouted; he must have spent his days under a juniper tree while 98 per cent of all present were rejoicing over the victories of the year; he had a grim season of depression while all others had a season of refreshing. To the belated and disgruntled there were abundant reasons why Toronto should be forgotten—if forgetting were possible. But all those who believe that the world moves rejoiced to see our young preachers joining the scholarly forces of the age and moving bravely on. They believed that the Toronto convention was equal to a revival. There was a united rejoicing in the service of the King.

A LARGER LIBERTY.

A new spirit is in our midst that promises good things for our future. The influence of the fanatic and the fossil is passing with every year; an era of toleration is at hand. The cruel ostracism of ten years ago is not possible at this hour. Men of bold and liberal minds were heard on the convention platform, and with enthusiasm. The fear and extreme caution that made good men set a guard at their lips, and cultivate the art of repression for the sake of peace, rather than to develop the art of expression for the sake of progress, was wholly wanting at Toronto. The concessions to a stubborn minority by men who held the opinions of such a minority in contempt, for the sake of harmony, are becoming a thing of yesterday. There is less tight rope walking among us, less of the disposition to jump with the cat, more desire to stand on solid ground where we feel that we ought to stand and take the consequences, than ever before. We are beginning to discover the difference between genius and heresy, between what the Scriptures teach and what we think they teach. We are doing today in fact what soon we will be doing in form, viz., recognizing men of diverse views among us as worthy a place in our councils, not because their views are yours and mine, but because they love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity. At heart our people are strongly united; their aims are one, their faith is one; the differences among us are largely over words, as are the differences everywhere in Christendom. Brethren of widely differing views met on common ground at Toronto, and dwelt in unity.

A SPIRIT OF TOLERANCE.

We have learned to dwell with those of other communions as members of the same Lord; when shall we learn to tolerate each other as now we tolerate those of other folds? But Toronto showed that we are learning to do that very thing. We are growing into a larger liberty each year; and "it is better that we should love Christ in the largeness of our liberty than that we should love him in caves of Adullam."

Shoshone, the Beautiful

A Narrative of Life in a New Country.

BY MINNIE L. KINTON.

HAVING become dissatisfied with "flat" living in the crowded city, and longing for a home which would prove a healthful spot for the bairnies, we decided to return to our first love—the farm. Then followed a tedious search for the ideal spot. Circulars, advertisements, and articles were devoured. Some, like certain photographs, showed too clearly the retoucher's skill; others required too much capital; still others were subject to cyclones, hail storms and like evils. After many hours of study, and being somewhat socialistically inclined, we decided to take the westward march and secure a homestead under the United States Reclamation Service in the Big Horn Basin, Wyoming.

A LAND OF SUNSHINE.

Think of a home in a land of sunshine, where lightning never sends its deadly stroke, where one can work in one's shirt sleeves all winter, where no social engagement need suffer because of rain, where a settler can "work out his payments if desired." (How many toilers in your crowded city entertain even the faintest hope given by their creditors of working out payments on their suburban homes?) All these glowing promises were literally swallowed and this tenderfoot family, with unlimited faith and hope and trust, started westward and took up a five years' sentence under Uncle Sam in order to obtain the coveted farm home. Before relating experiences, however, it may be of interest to review briefly the story of the Big Horn Basin and of the effort which has been made by the United States government to reclaim the arid plains of this territory.

John Colter, according to most authentic accounts, led an expedition which first discovered the Big Horn Basin, and his reports of the famous hot springs and natural wonders of what is now the Yellowstone National Park were received with derisive doubtings. But Colter was not the first nor the last whose discoveries have been received with scorn. Evidently curiosity was aroused, for soon we read of explorers and settlers. "Buffalo Bill" is known by every boy and girl in the land and here in this beautiful valley he has built his monument. The thriving little city of Cody close by the Park entrance not only bears the name of the fearless horseman, but at every turn are mementoes of its hopeful founder.

Shoshone Reservoir, Capacity 456,000 Acre Feet of Water.

THE RECLAMATION ACT.

When President Roosevelt, on June 17, 1902, by his signature made the reclamation act a law, attention was turned to reclaiming the arid lands. Perhaps no section offered more promising assurances of ultimate success than this which might be watered by the inexhaustible supply from the Shoshone River. Here is a natural basin, rimmed by towering mountains—Big Horn Mountains form the eastern circle, McCullough's Peak rounds the south, while Heart Mountain is the sturdy sentinel guarding the west. Entrance to the Basin is through the beautiful canyon in Pryor Mountains on the north whose scenery as viewed from the car window on a clear morning challenges the descriptive powers of pen or brush. And throughout the Basin with the surrounding mountains many miles distant, the changing glories of earth and sky are never-tiring visions of rest.

A VAST ACHIEVEMENT.

The story of the efforts of the United States government for supplying the needed water for this vast area is filled with daring and adventure. Mighty indeed must have been the forces which cut the canyon through which rushes the waters of the Shoshone River. Engineers decided to back up the waters at the point where, in ages past, they had evidently broken down through the chasm. In order to do this the highest masonry dam in the world, 328½ feet in height, has been constructed between the nearly perpendicular cliffs; and behind this solid concrete wall the waters form a peaceful lake, and are turned to bring the moisture for the ranchers' harvests. It was not an easy matter to obtain access to this dam site. Nothing daunted, the government set to the task of road building. The gorge was well-nigh inaccessible, but by tunneling, blasting and digging, one of the finest highways in the world now leads to the big dam, and also opens a new entrance to the Yellowstone National Park. Probably no less than fifty "gypsy" wagons were fitted out last year by settlers here who, accompanied by eastern relatives, toured Uncle Sam's wonder ranch. Many stated that they found no scenery more awfully sublime on the entire trip than in the canyon leading to the dam. One little chap of four when asked what he thought of the big dam, naively replied, after gazing intently at the massive pile, "mighty purty." This canyon road, however, is a sorry spot for timid hearts. Almost kissing the blue heavens rise the perpendicular rocks on the one side, while deep down an abysmal precipice on the other side rush the roaring waters of the Shoshone; and every curve of the road opens new wonders of grandeur and awe. Even teams realize the gravity of the situation, for horses which on the plains jump to a barb wire fence at sight of a motor-car, in the canyon walk quietly past with never a quiver.

SHOSHONE, THE TEDIOUS.

The lure of the land as pictured by some railroads and promotion companies is very alluring and points to an easy pathway to success and a home; a place where a poor man may, with perfect confidence take his place with the world's financiers. Theory and practical experience tell opposing stories. Any one who is led—or misled—by advertising matter to turn from city comforts and discomforts to the farm as an easy way to wealth awakens all too suddenly to realize the cold, stern fact that for most people there is no easy down grade to prosperity, but rather that success comes only by steady, hard and continual pulling. Lest any reader mistake the following sketch for discouragement, I want first to say that never since leaving the city have we regretted it. We love the farm—the western farm—the glorious sunshine, the wondrous possibilities, the opportunities and the associations. We believe we are in a winning battle, and that the battle is much easier and far more satisfactory along the daily way than any "position" ever offered in any city.

The Shoshone project presents an interesting picture to an easterner. The soil produces castus and sagebrush plants. There is not a tree in sight and fruit and all shrubbery are foreign products. The first unit of this vast arid prairie—over 15,000 acres—was opened Nov. 25, 1907. In May, 1909, the second unit, somewhat larger than the first, was opened. The Ralston unit has been taken and a fourth unit was recently opened. Homeseekers are privileged, complying with homestead laws, to file on any ranch, making the necessary filing fee and paying $4.60 an acre for construction of the water system. The total cost of water is $45 per acre for the first unit, $46 for the second. Actual residence must be maintained on the ranches for a period of five years, hence this must be a community of homes.

We filed on forty acres with the opening of the second unit, May 22, 1909, and in two weeks were living in our own house (a 12 ft. by 24 ft. shack). We paid a man $1 an hour to break and seed twenty acres to oats. After purchasing a team, the other twenty acres were prepared for alfalfa.

IRRIGATION FARMING MEANS WORK.

Should any eastern farmers think it an easy proposition to break and prepare land for crops in an irrigated section, it may be helpful to know the process. For —well, no matter how many years—this land has been the undisputed home of prairie dogs, rabbits, rattlesnakes, coyotes and some other things, including the rancher with his sheep. The prairie dogs have been home builders, and the first duty of the farmer who would cover his ground with water is to even down the dog knolls. This requires a fresno with four horses. Then the land is plowed; the owner of four horses uses a riding plow. Others—and they are in the majority—tramp in the furrow. Then the land is leveled, another four, or six, horse job. Next the disc comes—"double disc the land" and then level again. Of course the harrow follows the plow. After the second leveling order water—of course you have made your ditches and have your dams ready and have secured an irrigation shovel. The water proves the inaccuracy of the eye for it is astonishing how many high places there are on level ground.

Nearly all the ranchers have now learned that the best results are obtained here by corrugating the land—that is, make small furrows every two or three feet—so that the water will soak in better. So soon as the land has dried sufficiently to enable the team to walk over it, the seeder does its work, and then the field is corrugated for future watering. We did not know this method the first year and nearly all of the twenty acres of alfalfa were winterkilled. You easterners ever buy alfalfa seed? Then imagine the feelings to see that twenty acres in the spring of 1910! Most of the settlers break the raw land and seed to grain the first year; after this better preparation can be made for alfalfa. Many, however, seed to alfalfa, putting a grain in as a nurse crop; and the second year fresno the dog-knolls if necessary. One thing is certain and that is, alfalfa is a necessity to build up the soil, and it requires two years to produce a crop—after this three crops are cut during the season —yielding all told on the average four tons per acre.

FUTURE POSSIBILITIES.

But "nevertheless" and "notwithstanding" we have great faith in the possibilities of this land. We expect in a very few years to be eating apples from our own trees and fruits from our own vines, and shipping the best alfalfa in the United States. There are some facts to be faced by any one considering farm life, especially in a new country.

First: It's no poor man's proposition. At least $3,000 is needed to start a forty and live comfortably until an income can be obtained from the farm. (Of course one owning team, cows, hens and machinery has a good capital to start on.)

Second: It is a long, hard pull, requiring great faith and greater grit. It is a pull worth while. It is out in the open fields, with God's sunshine, pure air and the happiness of seeing things grow and being a "co-worker with God."

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

CONVENTION GLEANINGS.

Notes from the Reports of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, Submitted to the Toronto Convention.

The mission fields of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions are Jamaica, India, Mexico, Porto Rico, China, South America, New Zealand, Canada and the United States.

The forms of work in which the Board is engaged are evangelistic, educational, medical, industrial, benevolent and social.

During the missionary year just closed, from all the fields, we are able to report about 3,500 conversions.

We have in our schools in the homeland and abroad about 6,000 pupils.

The work in the United States is widely diversified. It trains missionaries for the fields; it reaches the students of the State universities; the people in the Eastern highlands; the Orientals on the Pacific Coast; the Mexicans on our Southern border; the negroes of the South. We are doing evangelistic work in thirty-four States.

According to the reports received Missouri stands first this year in membership in the auxiliary societies.

The largest single amount received during the year is from the estate of Mrs. M. M. Blanks, $20,000; Mrs. Letta E. Cooley, bequest, $5,000; estate of Mrs. Maggie C. Ferguson, $1,900; estate of Mary Atkins, $2,266; bequest, Belva M. Herron, $475; a friend in Illinois, $3,000; two friends in Indiana, $1,000 and $1,500; friends in Ohio, $400, $500, $1,000, $600, $500, $600 and $5,300; a friend and his wife, in Pennsylvania, $1,000; a friend and his wife, in Nebraska, $1,000; a friend in New York, $1,000; a friend in North Carolina, $1,000; a friend in Kansas, $1,000; friends in California, $500, $612, $675; pledge from a California friend, $5,000; Mr. and Mrs. L. M. Omer, for Farrar Memorial Home, $568; three Indiana friends, $500 each; $500 from a friend in Iowa; a friend in Kentucky, $500; friends in Missouri, $500 and $750; friend in Nebraska, $500; a friend in Texas, $500; State Secretary of Washington West, $3,600; State Secretary of Colorado, $10,000. A friend of the negro work will provide $5,000 for African hospital.

The Young People's Department this year has developed a closer relationship between the State superintendents and local workers which has proved helpful. The interest in providing systematic missionary instruction is steadily increasing, creating a missionary conscience not only for the mature life, but also for the opening mind of our young people.

J. B. Lehman is leading our colored brethren out in a great effort for $20,000 in the next three years, as a celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of emancipation.

One of our mountain teachers gives her service to the work, not even receiving her living expenses while thus engaged.

The past year has witnessed the beginning of the effort of our Board for China. We are to establish, as our first work there, a school for girls at Luchowfu. We hope to erect the buildings for the school this coming year. We are seeking two splendid young women qualified as teachers for this school.

There have been reports through our auxiliary societies of 118 young people who are contemplating the giving of their lives for mission work.

The missionaries of India, during the past year, have given more than a thousand dollars for missions.

Dr. Earnest Pearson sailed from New York early on the morning of September 24. He will spend three months in the study of tropical medicines in London before going to Africa.

Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Santmier, among the American Indians in Canada, are now under the full support of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

Since our last convention the Christian Woman's Board of Missions has sent to the foreign fields ten new missionaries, and Dr. Jennie Crozier has returned after four years' leave of absence. Seven of these new missionaries were students in the College of Missions.

Our missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Harry Schaefer and Miss Orah Haight, on their way to India, had the privilege of being in the convention of our English brethren. Here they were most cordially received and their messages were appreciated.

Mr. and Mrs. O. J. Cohee have been called to the Mexican work and are now at Piedras Nigras.

Twenty-four regular missionaries and missionary candidates attended the College of Missions last year. Besides these there were fifty-five students for special classes.

Marked enlargement has been made during the year in the Mexicano work in San Antonio. A $12,000 building for institutional work has just been completed.

We are beginning at this time a city mission work in Indianapolis, Ind. Many forms of Christian social service are contemplated in connection with it. Prof. H. J. Derthick is inaugurating the work. We plan that this shall be but the beginning of this kind of work in many cities.

Enlargements for next year already anticipated will demand $30,000 for Chinese building, San Francisco; $30,000 for Japanese Home, Los Angeles, California; hospital for Africa, $5,000; Farrar Memorial Home, Pendra Road, India, $2,000; tuberculosis hospital, India, $5,000; small buildings, chapels, school buildings, houses for native evangelists and helpers, etc., India, $1,000.

Three more chapels in Jamaica must be rebuilt; building for girls' school at Lu Chow Fu, $7,500; passage, outfits and salaries for twelve new missionaries, $4,000.

In addition to the above, funds should be raised for an additional bungalow and hospital in India and for a new building in Argentina.

We expect to send out at least twelve well-equipped missionaries from the College of Missions to distant fields within the next year. We would gladly send twenty if they were available. We need thirty at this very time.

In the very heart of India, Jabalpur, we are to build the Burgess Memorial, which will be a school for young women. It is planned that it shall eventually be a college. Trained Indian women are most essential to the evangelization of that land.

UNITED SOCIETIES CLAIM 20,000 WOMEN.

Twenty thousand women voters are expected to be in the ranks of the United Societies in Chicago by Jan. 1.

"Already thousands of German women have joined us," said Leopold Neumann, organizer. "Polish women, Italians, and Bohemians are yet to be organized. There are forty settlements of Polish people in Chicago, with more than one-half million Poles. We will have a large membership from the Polish race."

FIFTY THOUSAND GIRLS LOST.

Every year in the United States 50,000 girls disappear, and all trace of them is lost. Mr. Orrin C. Baker, general secretary of the Travelers' Aid Society, says that people who doubt the existence of a widespread white slave traffic do not know what they are talking about. He adds:

"No girl is exempt. In 1910 over 1,700 girls disappeared while traveling between New York and Chicago alone. The men and women who make a business of the traffic in girls are working harder today than ever before. Their methods are more subtle. They are more daring. The public is fighting them, but they are using every scheme imaginable.

"Only a few weeks ago a woman was arrested as the proprietor of a disorderly house. It was found that she had been one of the matrons in charge of immigrant girls at Ellis Island!

"And by the way, the general impression seems to be that it is only the girls who come over in the steerage that are in danger. That is a mistake. There is just as much danger for the refined foreign girl traveling second cabin. The daring attempts to decoy these girls are almost incredible.

"Some people who read 'My Little Sister,' said that was one of the things that couldn't happen.' But the author of the book told Mrs. James Lees Laidlaw that the story was absolutely true, except that it was softened in many points. Miss Robbins laid the story before a noted police justice in London. He said that it was 'really a commonplace.'

"There is no question as to the dangers threatening girls. Certain uninitiated persons feel that our claims that women need protection in traveling are extravagant. They don't realize that we are doing something more than telling timid women what train to take. The unscrupulous do not sit passively back and wait for their victims to come to them. They hunt them—hunt them with cunning and deliberate devices. It is a business with them. And our business is to defeat them."

What can one man do? By himself nothing, but everything in fellowship with God.—F. B. Meyer.

EPISCOPALIANS MEET IN NEW YORK CITY.

The spirit that is animating the General Convention of the Episcopal Church, being held in New York City during October, is revealed in the opening words of the address of Bishop William Lawrence, of Massachusetts, delivered October 8. "When the general convention of 1880, meeting in New York City, was about to dissolve," Bishop Lawrence said, "the bishops at the request of the House of Deputies, sent forth to the church a message of which this paragraph was the dominant note: 'We should endeavor to throw ourselves into the actual breathing world around us, and speak to the living present rather than to the dead past. We should seek to know the needs of our country, the tendencies, dangers, exigencies of our times, to what God calls us in His providence, what traces of His guidance and direction we can discern in past history, and whither He points us now.'"

The Churchman, New York, the eastern organ of Episcopalians, inspired by the earnestness of the early sessions, makes the following declaration: "The Church faces its work in the General Convention today with a new sense of courage and power. The stream is flowing deeper and once dreaded rocks and shallows are safely submerged and need not be so much feared. There is new confidence and a new sense of mission as the representatives of the Church come together."

First Sessions Peaceable.

If one were to predict the history of the convention from newspaper statements of the past few weeks, he would expect to find the bishops and deputies composing the convention lining up for bitter warfare. The Churchman remarks that "All the news concerning us has been of probable controversy and discord." But that organ states that a study of the early sessions of the convention reveals the fact that the prevailing spirit is one of peace and brotherly love and desire to do only what may be for the good of the Church. In the first days of the convention partisanship has not asserted itself.

Many were the expressions of regret, on the opening of the convention, that J. Pierpont Morgan could not witness the assembling of the deputies in the New Synod Hall, which by his liberal offering, with that of the late William Bayard Cutting, has been erected near the Cathedral. A quarter of a century has passed since the last meeting of the convention was held in New York, and for many years Mr. Morgan had desired the meeting here again.

The outstanding feature of the first week's work at the convention seems to have been the address of Bishop Lloyd, President of the Board of Missions. This was primarily a plea for a national consciousness in the Church as contrasted with individualism and localism. The address was significant, for the reason that one of the leading questions to be thrashed out during the convention is whether the Church shall not elect a "Presiding Bishop," placing all the officers of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, and all the work and the administrative functions of the society, under the presidential leadership of this officer.

Bishop Lloyd's Address.

Bishop Lloyd showed the opportunities that were knocking at the door of the Church, but were being neglected. Among these were the incoming immigrant, the college men and women, and the rural population, all of which were being sadly neglected, greatly to the loss of the Church of today, as well as of the Church of tomorrow. This is not due to a lack of money among the people of the Church, but to a lack of united purpose, was Bishop Lloyd's declaration. The great weakness of the mission work of the Church today lies in an exaggerated individualism. Too often the diocese thinks it can do nothing for missions until it has secured everything it needs for itself; the parish, taking up the same idea, can do nothing for either diocese or mission until it has secured for itself all the luxuries it desires, and with such an example it is but natural that the individuals, who make up the parishes, should assume the same attitude to parish, diocese and missions. The result of it all is that the Church is losing splendid opportunities.

A late report from New York states that the Episcopal Church has taken one of the most radical steps of its history in America. The action was covered in two parts. One was to make the Episcopal Church officially a part of the Federal Council of Churches; the other to instruct the Episcopal board of missions to co-operate with mission boards of other religious bodies. Stoutly opposed by the conservatives, both propositions were carried overwhelmingly. Up to the present time, steps toward federation have been taken through committees, not as a church.

CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL IN KANSAS CITY.

The Congregationalists have been working at the problem of a more efficient church government longer than the Disciples, but have not yet found a satisfactory solution. It is hoped that the net results of the biennial National Council, now in session at Kansas City, Mo., will signify a long step taken in the direction of a more effective church polity.

The lines of improvement for which progressive Congregationalists are striving are several in number. They may be inferred from a glance at the following proposals which are being placed before the National Council by the Committee of Nineteen which has been working upon them for many months:

Four Proposals.

1. The National Council to be henceforth an administrative body, devoted to considering as of chief interest the affairs of the missionary societies and to voting as of right who shall be the officers of these societies, and what shall be their policies. Up to this time the National Council has occupied this relationship only to the Board of Ministerial Relief. The National Council, as a great occasion for great addresses upon various high themes, is considered inefficient. It is to become a great missionary business meeting.

2. A missionary commission to be constituted which shall keep in touch with all the societies, making recommendations to them which it is expected the societies will at once put into effect, and reporting recommendations to the National Council, to be acted upon biennially.

3. This commission to have as its secretary the secretary of the National Council, who is to be chosen without limit of terms as to eligibility for service. Members of the commission are, however, eligible for two successive terms only. The secretary can therefore be the continuing and leading member of the commission and a new figure in Congregationalism.

4. The societies ultimately to be consolidated into three groups, viz., for foreign missions, for home missions and for education, these being directly responsible to the churches through their one and only representative body, the National Council.

Not Perfect Harmony.

That there is not absolute harmony in the Congregational camp is evident from the fact that while 575 delegates have said they would come to the council, seventy-five have declared they could not come, and 500 have not been heard from. One minister writes adversely, claiming that the new Secretary will be nothing more nor less than "a denatured bishop," and closes a rather strong letter with the following words: "It was to escape the tyranny of centralization and presiding permanent authorities that the Pilgrims left England. As one closes the report of the Commission of Nineteen and gazes at the seal on the back cover, with its picture of the Mayflower, he is tempted to hail the ship with, 'Whither bound?' with a suspicion that the Mayflower on the seal is not outward bound for the land of promise, but is returning to England."

That saner views will govern the proceedings of the National Council is evident, for there seems to be a very general desire for a forward move in organization and efficiency. A leading Congregationalist makes the statement that the whole movement for the reorganization of the National Council and for a definite and organic relation to it of the missionary societies is in response to the awakened missionary conscience of the church. If this fact is borne in mind, he believes, it will help at once to dispel certain feelings of distrust and apprehension which may still exist towards the proposed modification of the existing status of Congregationalism.

EDITORIAL

"DAMAGED GOODS."

THE teaching of sex hygiene has become a matter of recognized importance within the past five years. The sudden interest in this field of instruction was in large part due to the publicity given the work of the Chicago Vice Commission. Suddenly men and women seemed to become aware of the imperative duty they owe to their children and to youth generally to make known the dangers and the significance of the sex idea. There has always been a sex literature accessible to the initiated, and efforts have been made to spread it among young people. But these efforts were regarded with more or less indifference or suspicion until the present widespread interest in the matter took form.

This public concern has perhaps best expressed itself in the astonishingly favorable reception accorded Brieux's play, "Damaged Goods," which first awakened widespread concern in its printed form, and has recently been played to crowded houses in this city. Such a frank and sobering interpretation of the perils of society through the terrible consequences of venereal disease could not by any means have secured a public presentation five years ago. Its message is tremendous, and its lesson is being taken to heart by multitudes who never gave thought before to one of the most insidious dangers of modern life. If the interest does not pass as a mere fad, but results in a permanent campaign of information, in which parents and teachers shall feel themselves responsible for making youth aware of its perils, great good will be done.

It is very easy to permit such a movement to become a mere sensation, and probably against this feature the Roman Catholic Church is raising its voice in protest against all sex instruction, save as parents wish to communicate it to children. But that this is an impossible view most interested persons believe. At any rate it is to be hoped we shall not fall back into the attitude of unconcern which a false modesty formerly justified.

PERSONALITY AND THE IDEAL.

GREAT men symbolize a nation's ideal and enable it to express its hope and aspiration in terms of personality. This is the supreme value of great men to any generation, that they enable the people to think of their ideals in terms of actual character. This is the value of all sentiment that comes to us out of history, of all the ideals derived from associations with places and incidents in the past.

But it is not only great men who thus typify for us the stability and the value that sometimes express themselves in human life. One stormy day while waiting for a train the writer stepped into a moving picture show. It was an unusually large place of its kind and one of high grade. The place was filled, for the pictures shown were of an event of great public interest. Suddenly the lights went out, the pictures stopped. There was a moment of bewilderment and of swift and nameless fear. In an instant a policeman appeared in one of the middle aisles, commanding everyone to keep his seat and remain quiet. He spoke a calm word to the young woman at the piano, and she began to play, and while the room filled with smoke the people marched out quietly, calmed into good order and safety by the authoritative word of the policeman and the quiet heroism of the girl who kept her place at the piano. In times like that when the mad impulse comes into people through sudden fear to rise and rush for the door, regardless of other people's rights or safety, how much it means to hear a calm voice in a tone of authority, to catch the inspiration of someone faithfully doing duty unafraid.

We hear constant warnings that the times are degenerate, that men are less manly and women less womanly than they once were, that human life is unfitted to bear the growing strain to which it is subjected. It is not to be denied that we have some solemn warnings which we shall do well to heed; nevertheless, there is good reason to have faith in the growing adaptation of manhood and womanhood to the tasks and burdens which are sure to fall upon human life.

This is the spirit of those fine words of David Starr Jordan:

> "When shall man rise to manhood's destiny?
> When our slow-toddling race shall be full grown,
> Deep in each human heart a chamber lone
> Of holies, holiest shall builded be,
> And each man for himself must hold the key.
>
> "Each man must kindle his own altar fires,
> Each burn an offering of his own desires.
> And each, at last, his own High Priest shall be!"

The tests of our systems of education, of our systems of government, and even of our religion, come finally to this. Are they producing manhood and womanhood that are reliable, stable and righteous? The promise of God is that this kind of character shall possess the earth. Let us hasten the time when it shall be true.

MIRACLES OF THE BARGAIN COUNTER.

MIRACLES are cheap, that is, miracles of a certain sort. Nearly every strange cult performs them, and offers them as premiums to converts. The following clipping illustrates the strange psychology that underlies cures without medicine: "The psychology of miracles has received a new example in the wonderful recovery from sickness which it is alleged a Washington boy made a few days ago. The physicians had despaired of his life, but having observed that in his delirium he babbled of a certain baseball pitcher whom he had evidently set up as an idol in his heart, they communicated the fact to this famous athlete, who wrote a letter to the boy and accompanied it with the gift of one of the baseballs he had been using on a Western trip. The effect of all this was magical. The boy began at once to improve, and it was predicted that he would soon be out of the hospital and joyously playing with the ball which so marvelously quickened his waning powers and stimulated nature to overcome disease."

If this case be authentic, and we have no desire to deny it but on the contrary sincerely hope for every reason that it is true, it illustrates a number of things. It shows us, for instance, how far bodily cures fall short of proving that those who have experienced them may have discovered with the cure the one and only spiritual fountain of spiritual authority. The magicians do the same with their enchantments.

THE DEMAND FOR STEEL CARS.

SINCE the last sad accident on the New York, New Haven & Hartford railway, there has gone up from the press of the country a vociferous demand for steel cars, and sweeping condemnation of that railroad system because it had no other kind. A moment's thought on the part of a sensible person would do something to modify this outcry. Steel cars came into being only yesterday. The rolling stock of a great railroad cannot instantly be transformed. It is beyond all reason to insist that a new and expensive form of equipment, hardly past its experimental stage, should suddenly appear on every railroad to the exclusion of all that ever had been before. It will be years before the entire equipment of any of the railroads can reasonably be expected to be of steel.

Moreover, this is not the most vital need. If there were no accidents it would make very little difference whether cars were steel or wood. It is indeed important that fewer people should be killed when accidents occur, but it is far more important that there should be fewer accidents.

The New Haven road has been using banjo signals, and these come in for their share of condemnation. But other railroads are said to be using banjo signals and not to be having accidents. The important thing in all this is that the public should be contented with no scapegoat, but should locate the responsibility somewhere in its human relationships.

We have the same problem in morals. People are forever rising up and demanding a stoppage in the leaks of society's dams. It were better to build the dam a little nearer to the brink.

NO UNFRATERNAL THRUST.

ONE of the heartiest letters of congratulation and encouragement received in our Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade, and which it is intended to publish next week, contains a postscript to the editor suggesting, in the kindest tone, that the writer could wish for the elimination of only one sentence from the circulation department's announcement last week. The communication follows:

> I felt it would be better if you had left out the one sentence which reads like this: "No millionaire sustains it." That looks like a little strike at Mr. R. A. Long. Of course it may not have been so intended when you wrote this, but since he is a millionaire and is back of the Evangelist, I believe the better taste would have eliminated that, and I am sure in calling your attention to it you will agree with me.

If the sentence referred to was taken by any reader to convey a "strike" of any sort at Mr. Long we will agree with our esteemed correspondent that its admission into the text of the announcement was unfortunate. Our subscription department conceives this Crusade as a "celebration in gladness and in service" of the approaching birthday of this newspaper. Had the slightest sinister import of this sentence been felt by its writer it would have been reconstructed or cast out.

The statement was meant simply to heighten the sense of responsibility that rests upon the democratic many to support The Christian Century, in view of its having no individual of great wealth upon whom it may lean. There was no intention of reflecting on Mr. Long or his paper.

Indeed there is no one who would be more sincerely welcomed as one of our Anniversary "Crusaders" than this generous benefactor of so many good causes.

WE AND TWO OF OUR CONTEMPORARIES.

WE take occasion on the foregoing as a text to base a statement or two concerning our attitude toward contemporary Disciple newspapers.

With neither The Christian Standard nor The Christian Evangelist does The Christian Century regard itself as a competitor. The Standard itself has made even friendly competition impossible. It has chosen a field lying far apart from our field. Very few of the readers of The Century ever see The Standard. Our purposes and ideals are radically divergent. The Standard seems to have put itself outside the cooperative fellowship of the Disciples. Yet with some of its doctrinal positions concerning questions now at issue The Century has more affinity than with the doctrinal tendency of the Evangelist.

As to the Christian Evangelist we feel that we are coworkers, not competitors. Our journalistic ideals are quite unlike. The services we are both striving to render to our readers are supplemental, not conflicting. We have chosen different fields. But our fields lie near together. The Christian Century's fixed policy in building up its circulation is to avoid the very appearance of hostility or even competition with any other newspaper.

Our circulation department plainly instructs its agents that they are to speak nothing but good of the Christian Evangelist and Mr. Long. Instead of trying to displace a Christian Evangelist with a Christian Century the solicitor is instructed to urge that an Evangelist in a home is only an added reason why a Century should be there too.

And in good faith we welcome the reverse of this policy. A Century in a home is an added reason why there should be an Evangelist there too.

No, our Crusade for what our circulation department happily calls "birthday subscriptions" to The Christian Century does not call for any "strike" at anybody, but is conceived and carried forward in the spirit of glad fraternity and co-operation.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE.

CAREFUL students of Philippine affairs are watching with solicitude the conduct of President Wilson in regard to the future relations between the United States and these islands. Judge Charles Lobingier, one of the leading administrators of justice at Manila, was recently in this city and expressed himself as anxious over the outlook. Several utterances of President Wilson have given the Filipinos grounds for believing that the administration plans the early independence of the islands. In fact the appointment of several members of the Upper House from the native population is a step in that direction. Against such a loosening of control the voice of commercial interests is being lifted constantly. Men who have invested money in the Philippines are fearful of a decline in prices and the ruin of their holdings if native control is permitted.

Men of Judge Lobingier's type accept the principle that ultimately the islands must be free, but believe that the time must be long ere the native peoples are competent to assume the highly responsible task of autonomy, and that an early liberation would be disastrous for the people themselves, as well as the interests that have found a place in the islands.

MR. MESSER IN THE ORIENT.

MR. L. WILBUR MESSER, the general secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association of Chicago, sailed from New York on October 21 to visit the Orient in the interest of Association work. Mr. Messer is one of the most valuable citizens of Chicago. He combines extraordinary business capabilities with a keen interest in the progress of Christianity and the welfare of young men. His administrative work in connection with the Association in this city has given it a commanding place, and has greatly assisted in making the work of the Y. M. C. A. an appreciated and efficient factor in the Christian life of Chicago. Mr. Messer is open-minded enough to appreciate the value of scholarly work in Association teaching, and yet he has the true evangelistic spirit which make his messages everywhere an inspiration to men and communities.

The Y. M. C. A. secretaries of the Orient are eagerly awaiting Mr. Messer's arrival. His journey will be a combination of pleasure and work, and we believe that no visitor who has traveled through the Orient in recent years will contribute more to the welfare, not only of Association work, but of the cause of Christianity in general, than he.

YUAN SHI-KAI.

YUAN SHI-KAI'S election as president of the Republic of China for a term of five years will perhaps have a tendency to quiet somewhat the revolutionary sentiments that have manifested themselves in various forms, all the way from mutterings of disaffection to open revolt in the provinces along the Yangtse. China is so vast a territory that unity of action seems difficult to secure, particularly with the rather slow methods of transportation and the lack of intercommunication of intelligence among the provinces. A comparatively small body of enlightened and eager patriots is attempting to bring to early consummation their hopes for a real constitutional government. The man who has been chosen president is not the ideal ruler of any of them, but perhaps the best man within sight. China's desperate need is leadership, and this will come from the schools, both those of the government and the missionary agencies so promisingly at work. But leaders are not quickly produced and China's need is urgent. Meantime Russia and Japan both watch ceaselessly to take advantage of any weakness in the young republic, and such opportunities are not wanting, especially in the effort to foment disaffection among the Chinese themselves.

The House That Baby Built

Telling How a Plotless Writer Found a Plot.

BY EDGAR DeWITT JONES.

HE WAS a young clergyman in his first parish which was a rural one and very poor. He was brilliant too, and the world was some time to discover him but it had not as yet.

The young clergyman was married to a slip of a girl, as poor and attractive as himself and they had one fine baby boy, blue eyed with a face like one of Raphael's cherubs. The young clergyman wrote well. Divine fire slept in his soul and tingled in his finger tips. He had the budding gift of letters and the sentences of his sermons fell upon the ears of his country congregation with a charm as unmistakable as it was indefinable.

Sometimes the young clergyman wrote stories and sent them on to the great magazines but they always came back. One day there came with one of the rejected manuscripts a brief note from a certain famous editor known on two hemispheres and in it he said:

"You write well,—far better than the average story writer whose goods get in our pages,—but you have no plots worth while. There is no heart interest in what you write. It is very beautiful but soulless. Some day I think you will overcome this fault, but till you do your stories will not sell."

The young clergyman and his wife read together this note several times and after a little while she inquired, "Dearest, what is the story you sent him?"

The young clergyman spread out the manuscript so as to exhibit its title, "'The House That Baby Built,'" he explained, "a story about a husband and wife whose palatial home, though luxurious, was barren and unhappy till a most wonderful baby came. Our own boy was the inspiration of the sketch. Not that we were unhappy before he came," he added quickly, "but because I tried to imagine what the coming of such a child into many a wealthy and worldly home might mean."

The girl wife and mother said nothing but took the hand of the young clergyman and led him softly into the room where the beautiful boy lay sleeping in his crib, over which they bent adoringly.

Through an open window the moonlight streamed across the child's face and head touching with glory the perfectly rounded cheek and tangled curls, the delicate, blue-veined eyelids and the marble-like temples.

"Dearest," whispered the young mother close to the ear of her husband, "did there ever live another baby so beautiful as ours?"

"No more beautiful than ours, little mother," replied the young man, speaking low and softly, "What shall we make of him, a second Beecher, another Spurgeon? How I should like him to be a great preacher of the Word."

The mother clasp of her husband's hand tightened, "Or a great doctor," she rejoined, "next to a great preacher a great doctor can best serve the world."

The child stirred slightly and made as though he were waking. The young mother laid a finger on her lips and looked at her husband and the movement and her eyes spoke as articulate words: "Let us leave him now." Very reverently the two still hand in hand stole softly from the room, leaving the sleeping babe alone in his crib on which the moonbeams lingered as if loath to depart.

And this was on a night in early spring—a night full of romance and poetry. The same year, when November was well advanced and the leaves were all fallen and there was a sharp suggestion of winter in the air, the young clergyman's church was crowded to the doors. It was the funeral of a little child—the child of the Raphael face.

A church funeral for a child is unusual and almost always unnecessary but that the child of this little church should be buried from its sacred precincts seemed peculiarly fitting. Besides the parsonage was far too small to admit a tenth of the great numbers that came.

The minister in charge of the service was from a nearby city and in the course of his simple, comforting address he said: "Having lost a little boy myself I think I can in a measure enter into the sorrow of this occasion. Home builders indeed are the little people—the wee boys and girls. Their little hands construct greater temples than Solomon's and the smile of their small faces lightens up many a window grander than art glass of cathedral. And the very wonderful thing is that even when these divine architects are gone from us their work of building stops not but goes on forever."

November passed and late December was come. A heavy snow covered the rural parish far and wide. The modest manse stood half buried by the deep drifts and the great silence of the outside world was not as great as the silence within the parsonage. It was Christmas Eve and husband and wife were all alone in the tiny room that served both as study and parlor. The husband sat at a table studiously bent over some sheets of paper. The wife, in a low rocker in front of the glowing grate, was darning a stocking, but much of the time her hands were idle in her lap, and she sat watching the blazing coal. Presently the young clergyman arose, gathered up the closely-written sheets from the table and going over by the side of his wife laid them in her lap. "It's the story, little mother," he said gently, "the one we talked about last spring. I have rewritten it. I wish you would read it, that is if—if you can."

It was February and in the editorial room of a great magazine, an even half-dozen of manuscript readers were poring over a pile of papers. Suddenly a door opened and the great man of the place came in, holding a number of closely-written pages in his hand. His eyes looked as if he were suffering from a cold and his voice was husky. "I am glad you passed this story on to me," he said, clearing his throat. "It's good stuff and it ought to go into our April number. The title's catchy too, it—." He dropped the manuscript on the table and turned abruptly and went back into his private office, closing the door softly.

There was silence among the little group for a full half minute. Then a thin, angular and slightly bald man sitting at the desk nearest the manuscript picked it up and glancing at the title page read aloud,

"The House That Baby Built."

The Eternal Goodness.

HOWEVER well and happy and successful we may be, sorrow and pain are never far away, and the world pain is everywhere; and there is no peace or joy for us at any time if we cannot feel that in and through and over all the sickness, sorrow, pain, and loss, and shame, and sin there is the Eternal Goodness.—John W. Chadwick.

How Far Is It to Childhood Town?

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

HOW far is it to Childhood Town?
A wee one asked of me,
Not knowing of the pain she gave—
My heart she could not see;
For as I sought, in simple words,
To please her eager ears,
A tear broke past unwilling eyes,
Which looked on other years.

How far is it to Childhood Town?
Oh, many miles, my child!
Beyond the Mountains of Defeat,
Where blasted hopes are piled;
Beyond the Vale of Sorrow, where
The trees with blight are brown;
Far, far away that happy place
We once called Childhood Town!

How far is it to Childhood Town?
Far past the sun-scorched plain
Where thronging men, with hearts inflamed,
Wage war for sordid gain;
Far o'er the Sea, where many ships
Have stranded and gone down.
Oh, far away that happy realm
We once called Childhood Town!

And yet your heart, my happy child,
Feels naught of human woe;
No mount, no vale, no stormy sea
Your simple life can know;
For you a river, passing fair,
Flows evermore adown
By that rare realm, sweet Fairyland,
Your own dear Childhood Town.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

MY OLD FASHIONED HABITS are revealed by the continued pleasure I take in reading Isaac Errett's "Evening's With the Bible." The three volumes of these studies by the great editor have been in my library for many years. They were published in 1884—the year, Mr. Editor, in which, I take it from your announcement of last week, The Christian Century was founded.

From them I have drunk more deeply of the thought-life and spirit of Mr. Errett than from any other of his published works. I like even now, though much has been changed in Biblical interpretation during these thirty years, to sit under the evening lamp and meditate upon the things of holy Scripture under the gentle guidance of this rare teacher upon whom the mantle of Alexander Campbell fell.

In candor I must confess that I get more help from Errett than from the younger Campbell. He does not possess the breadth of intellect, perhaps, but I think there is greater richness of content in his thought, and certainly there is a humanness of insight, a delicacy and a spirituality which I feel often the lack of in his great master.

IT IS POSSIBLE that a personal equation enters into my estimate of these volumes. They were in my father's library before they were in mine. We used, at the end of many a day, to close up the family circle around the hearth-fire and either my father or mother would read a chapter from this series. I always shall remember the hush that came upon me as the little prayer at the end of the "study" was read. Then came my father's prayer, and then good night.

The books fascinate me now, with their pencil markings in the margins and their underscored sentences and paragraphs. I am strictly orthodox in my theology, Mr. Editor, but I claim for myself the most radical powers of higher criticism in assigning the authorship of these marginal and interlinear markings. I know with infallible insight which are my father's and which my mother's. There is both "external" and "internal" evidence at my command.

My father's marks are rather straight and deliberate lines; my mothers are wavy and heavy as if she had concentrated her emotion at the tip of her lead pencil. My father simply drew a line down the side of a paragraph; my mother drew a separate black line under each word of her sentence or paragraph, so that I have to hunt for the printed words as one hunts for the limbs behind the leaves.

MY FATHER, I find, marked the exegetical passages; my mother marked the practical applications. It seems to have been my father's delight to find the text illuminated, the situation reconstructed, the word made plain for its own sake. I imagine that much of this was skipped over hurriedly by my mother that she might get to the author's application of the text to practical life. She underscored heavily the fine passages treating of home and love and prayer and sorrow and nature with her birds and flowers and sky.

And the beautiful stories of both Testaments are so well told that I wonder why we keep on writing new books when there's so much richness in the old!

These meditations on the Bible appeared at first, so the preface tells us, in the columns of the author's paper, The Christian Standard. I have been thumbing through the volumes this evening, tracing out the passages marked by my parents, and re-reading them with tender feelings as now this and now that one freshens my memory of my father's and mother's mental characteristics. They have long been gone. No more the dear voices are heard in reading or in prayer. But nothing reinstates their presence and brings us all together again in so vivid imagination as does the perusal of these marked volumes of exegesis and devotion.

Yet into my heart there creeps a thought marring the happy pathos of my meditation. How unlike these precious volumes has become the Christian Standard in which these chapters first appeared! Here is the note of peacefulness, of spirituality, of harmony, of inward culture, of communion with God. From these chapters one carries away a sense of soul-enlargement, of widened vision, of tolerance, of sympathy, of conciliation.

I FIND NOTHING analogous to these chapters or the temper of them in the journal founded by their great author. I have been trying to find a place for these meditations—and for these prayers—anywhere in the forty pages of that journal as it exists today, and I can find no column or corner where they would seem at home.

Their still small voice is drowned by the jangling of harsh controversy and the clang of commercial machinery, no matter where I try to put them. I find no message from contributors or editor with which these chaste and spiritual chapters could find companionable affinity.

With the spell of these chapters upon me the condemnation which the last decade's course of the Standard has created in me, and increasingly confirmed, passes into deepest pity.

What a fall is this!

From the gracious, oftimes mystical, words of Isaac Errett, prince and leader of his people's leaders,—words my mother pored over and treasured in her heart, to the recalcitrant and menaceful words which now fill the white pages these chapters once consecrated, how great is the distance!

AFTER all, is not the way of leadership the way of the spirit? Does not the fighter, the contentious person, the partisan, the faction-maker leave a short memory behind him? Do we not cherish longest in our hearts the quiet teacher, the good shepherd, the patient spiritual guide?

All the manifestations indicate the complete, the pitiable, failure of the vindictive policy. Dr. Medbury's speech at the closing session at Toronto—I refer to it again because it was singularly felicitous and significant—contained a solemn admonition to those who persistently stood in the way of the work—God's work—that they would inevitably be left behind while the body of workers moved on.

The continuance of the attitude of obstruction and threatening, notwithstanding the solemn lesson taught in the past few weeks, would seem to indicate that the spirit of Isaac Errett has not only departed from the paper but has departed not to return.

What our people need in these stressful times, Mr. Editor, is the revival of the spirit of Errett's "Evenings with the Bible" in our editorial offices. If I may be so bold, I commend the volumes to you, though I know full well you are familiar with them, and I commend them to all your readers.

Have we not at last reached a time when the disturber of our peace may be ignored—neither resisted nor indulged, but ignored—while our workers set their hands to constructive tasks, especially the building up of an inner life of fellowship with God?

The need of it weighs upon me.

I wish I might believe that we have entered upon an era of good feeling in our communion. I am strongly constrained by much that I see to commit myself to such a belief. I think one of the indications that most surely induces confidence that such an era has begun, is the fact that everybody seems tired to the point of irritation with the disturber and the contentious person.

We have great tasks on our hand. They call for much quiet study and meditation and prayer. We need to pass from the turmoil of the past decade to the twilight quiet, with our Lord's word in our hand, and perhaps the spirit of some teacher like the great Errett prompting our devotion, while the deeper truths of God fill our souls. This I pray for myself and for all my brethren!

The Book World

BY ARTHUR GORDON.

EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, by Loring W. Batten, Ph. D., S. T. D. This is the latest of the Old Testament volumes in the International Critical Commentaries, of which Drs. Briggs, Driver and Plummer have been the editors. Dr. Briggs died while the present volume was in the press. Prof. Batten is connected with the General Theological Seminary (Episcopalian) of New York. His work on this volume maintains the very high standard set by most of the volumes of this series, which is the most exhaustive and scholarly work of biblical commentation produced in this generation. There are few books which present more puzzling phenomena than Ezra and Nehemiah. Their arrangement, sources, and value have long been debated questions among students of the Scriptures. The careful and exhaustive treatment given by Prof. Batten will be of great assistance to the general student who has not access to the large body of recent literature on the subject. Among the more important pronouncements are the following: The Apocryphal book of I Esdras is a close parallel to Ezra and parts of Chronicles and Nehemiah, and though not the original text as claimed by Howarth, it is superior to the LXX text. The sources of the book of Nehemiah are found in the personal journal of that leader, and, in opposition to Torrey, who maintains that the Ezra memoirs are a myth, the author finds a genuine journal of the reformer at the foundation of the book of Ezra. The date of Nehemiah is earlier than that of Ezra. This has long been the claim of many Bible scholars. Batten sums up the proofs and finds them convincing. The work of Nehemiah is placed in the reign of Artaxerxes I (Longimanns) 464-425 B. C. and extended from 444-432 B. C. How long his second administration lasted it is impossible to tell. The reforms of Ezra fell in the reign of Artaxerxes II (Mnemon) 404-358 B. C., though at what precise time is not known. The treatment given these books by Prof. Batten is adequate, constructive and satisfactory. And the commentary will prove a most valuable aid to the study of an intensely interesting period of Jewish history. (Scribner, $2.50.)

FORTITUDE, by Hugh Walpole. This is one of the strong novels of the year. Its scenes are laid in Cornwall and London, and of both the impressions conveyed are very vivid. The central character, a boy with deeply marked individuality, lives at first in a strange, unfriendly Cornwall home. Then a school, a typical English boys' school, takes him for a time. Next he is in London, a clerk in a second-hand bookstore, but always dreaming of the great story he is to write; and at last he achieves this purpose. But his troubles have only begun, for there are no publishers, the position is lost, dire poverty is faced in the East End, and his only companion is a faithful Cornwall friend, as wretched as himself. Then suddenly the unexpected publication of his book, a flood of popularity, wealth, social recognition, love, marriage, the child, and then an accumulation of tragedies that seem to mark him out for swift ruin. Yet it is not ruin that faces him in the closing chapter. What is it? One is not quite sure. But there is a gripping force to the story that makes one wish for and expect a sequel. (Doran, $1.50.)

MAKING GOOD IN THE LOCAL CHURCH, by Ernest Eugene Elliott. The problem of getting the church to perform its needed service in the community weighs heavily on the hearts of many ministers. In a large majority of cases the pastor is regarded as the professional hired man, who is to be held responsible for the efficiency of the church on the single condition that he is paid a (more or less adequate) salary. The utter failure of this system is outstanding in a multitude of cases. Such churches are killing their ministers and losing their own lives. Mr. Elliott has had competent experience to enable him to discuss with awareness some of the more serious problems of church efficiency. Just to read this little book will be a help to a preacher. To get the officers and members of the church to read it would go some distance toward arousing a conviction that there are simple and practical ways of improving conditions. Principles and plans are presented. A bibliography is appended. (Revell, 35 cents.)

A HISTORY OF GREEK ART, by F. B. Tarbell. The author is well known as professor of classical archeology in the University of Chicago. The work was originally prepared for the Chautauqua series, but has been revised and corrected for the Macmillan Standard Library. After an introductory chapter on art in Egypt and Mesopotamia, it deals with Greek art in nine chapters of admirable and illuminating comment, with a wealth of illustrations and closes with a brief treatment of Greek painting. (Macmillan, 50 cents.)

DOLLS OF MANY LANDS, by Mary Hazelton Wade. Here is a charming group of doll autobiographies. For nine dolls from Japan, Alaska, Holland, England, France, Korea, Persia, Egypt, and the lands of the North American Indians, tell the stories of their lives, their making and their experiences, in a manner both to delight and instruct girls of the doll age. Their pictures are given in color. (W. A. Wilde Co., $1, net.)

A LINE O' CHEER FOR EACH DAY O' THE YEAR, by John Kendrick Bangs. There is a bit of genial, helpful philosophy, mostly in short verse, for every day. Some of it is serious, some playful, and some in dialect. Here is the fragment for one day:

THE SURE ROAD.

The surest road to Happiness
That I've diskivered yit
Is wantin' nothin' more ner less
Than what I'm sure to git!

(Little, Brown & Co., $1.25, net.)

RACE ASSIMILATION, by John James Holm. A discussion of the problem of the negro race in America by one who believes that its solution is to be found in a removal of the legal barriers to intermarriage of whites and negroes, as a means of checking their immoral relations now widely prevalent. (J. L. Nichols & Co.)

THE YOUNG HOMESTEADERS, by J. W. Lincoln. A stirring, wholesome story of two ambitious boys who took up a quarter section and after journeys, hardships and adventures they win a home in the region of the great lakes. (W. A. Wilde Co., $1, net.)

A GLIMPSE OF SHADOWED LIVES IN A GREAT CITY, by Mrs. N. S. Bliss. An autobiographical sketch of work in behalf of the fallen. (Pub. by the Author, 35 cents.)

Literary Notes.

IN A SERIES of articles in the Biblical World Prof. C. R. Henderson is discussing the "Social Significance of Christianity in Modern Asia." In his recent journey as Barrows lecturer he had large opportunity to observe the social activities which are springing out of missionary work. In the October number he mentions the social studies which are being instituted by the Y. M. C. A. and the mission stations, particularly in China, to discover the actual conditions in which some of the poorer groups, such as the 'rickshaw men, live, and what can be done to improve them. Such studies and opportunities for actual work make an appeal to the alert mind of the native youth which no programs of abstract studies can do.

THE FIRST ATTEMPT at a life of W. T. Stead has been published by his daughter. It is an affectionate and readable story of an exceedingly busy life. Mr. Stead was a journalist of a high order. His work as assistant editor, and then as proprietor of the Pall Mall Gazette, was the best of his life. He always wanted to be in charge of a daily paper, but his one effort in that direction ended in disaster. He was only fairly successful with the Review of Reviews. He had a host of friends, but few of them could follow him into his spiritualistic adventures of recent years. His death in the Titanic tragedy cut short a most industrious and useful, if erratic, career.

A SCOTCH BLESSING.

If after kirk you bide a wee
There's some wad like to speak to ye.

If after kirk you rise and flee,
We'll all seem cold and stiff to ye.

The one that's in the seat with ye
Is stranger here than you, maybe.

All here hae got their fears and cares.
Add you your soul unto our prayers,
Be you our angel unawares!

THREE SONGS.

BY JULIA C. R. DORR.

Sing me a song of Living.
Exultant, strong and clear;
A song of the joy of Being,
Rolling from sphere to sphere;
A song that the choiring angels
Might lean from heaven to hear!

Sing me a song of Loving,
Tenderly, sweet and low;
Sing of its rose-flushed dawning
And its lingering sunset glow;
Of its heart like a ruby flaming
In the depths of Alpine snow!

Sing me a song of Triumph
Over the mists of death;
Over the deepening shadows;
Over the failing breath;
Over the lonely valley
Where no voice answereth!

Of Human Interest

Riley's "Same Old Cat" Story.

In none of his prose writings is James Whitcomb Riley more naive and gripping than in his "same old cat" story, in which he tells, in his inimitable way, the story of a "much-aggrieved and unappreciated lad" who made up his mind that he "could not stand the tyranny of home longer," and so early one morning he put a long-contemplated plan into execution, and ran away.

All day long he played down at the old "swimming-hole" with the other boys, making a raid on an orchard at noon to stifle the pangs of hunger. At night, when his companions went home, he was left alone, "with a lump in his throat that hurt worse when he didn't notice it than when he did." As it grew dark, he "oozed" toward home. He climbed the back fence into the big back yard, which had such a "homey" look that he had never noticed before. After roaming round getting acquainted with his home that he had left so long ago (about twelve hours since), he wandered into the sitting room, where father was reading the evening paper and mother was sewing. They took no notice of him, and he sat down on the remote edge of a chair and waited to be recognized. He could hear the boys playing out on the commons their nightly game of "town-fox," but he didn't want to join them. He just wanted to stay right there at home forever. The clock ticked, O! so loudly, but otherwise the silence was so deep that it was painful. Finally, when it became more than he could bear, he cleared his throat and mustered up courage enough to say:

"Well, I see you've got the same old cat!"

"Uncle Joe" as a Comic Actor.

Henry M. Goldfogle, congressman from New York, tells in a recent number of the Sunday Magazine of witnessing a scene on the House floor that was not only amusing but interesting on account of the weapon used by Uncle Joe Cannon to defeat a resolution that had been agitating John Wesley Gaines, of Tennessee, for several days. This resolution embodied inquiries as to the disposition of relics that had been in the White House and had been disposed of, and Gaines wanted Congress to make an appropriation to repurchase them and restore them to the White House. He was highly wrought up and said:

"It is with a feeling of deep humiliation that I call the attention of this House to the astounding fact that the mahogany sideboard, presented to Mrs. Hayes when she was mistress of the White House, is now located in a Washington brewery. The young ladies of Cincinnati presented this sideboard as a token of their approval of her action in barring wine from the presidential dinners. The sideboard, which remained wineless during the Hayes administration, is now filled with siphons, bitters, decanters, and liquor bottles. On the top shelf there is ranged a row of old German beer steins. Rightfully or wrongfully, a mirror and some candlesticks were sold at this same public auction that were national relics. My God! think of it! Such a sentiment, Mr. Speaker, would drag angels down! A land without ruins is a land without memories; but a land without relics—what a land! I understand that it is the intention of some person who bought many of these White House relics to furnish a White House saloon at the St. Louis Exposition and equip it with paraphernalia that he bought at the White House of our country.

"I would have these relics placed back for the sake of preserving the sentiment that has made our Republic. It is a question of doing violence to our love of country in allowing these old relics, which are as dear to our hearts as our own life blood, to be carried within the shadow of the Capitol to the auction shop and sold from our sight forever.

Here Mr. Cannon asked to interrupt, and Gaines yielded.

"Before I put the question or inquiry I desire to preface it with a statement of what occurred at the White House many years ago. Tradition says that when Madison was President the laundering facilities were not so good as they are today. On very rainy days or during cold weather it was difficult to dry the clothes. The East Room being then in an unfinished condition, the mistress of the White House used to cause the weekly washing to be hung in there. And that clothesline became historic."

Then, raising his eyes heavenward, as only Uncle Joe can do effectively, he exclaimed, "In the name of our beloved country, gentlemen, I ask you, what has become of that clothesline?"

The House was convulsed with laughter. That was the last of the John Wesley Gaines resolution.

When Mark Twain Joked With Royalty.

Martin B. Madden, representative from Illinois, states that once, when in London, he stopped at the same hotel with Mark Twain. Mark was on such friendly terms with King Edward, Mr. Madden says, that he was admitted to the king's presence almost informally at any time.

One day he said, "Madden, do you want to see the king?"

"Sure," I answered.

"All right, wait a moment. I'm just going over; but I'll telephone him first that I want to bring you along."

Presently returning, he said, "It's all right, Madden, the king will be glad to see you."

The visit was entirely informal, and with no more ceremony than one would expect at a downtown office. The king and Mark Twain swapped stories. Two of these I remember. Mark Twain told them.

An English rural school teacher, when giving a natural history lesson to her class, explained that sparrows were originally imported into England because the worms had become so numerous that they were destroying the trees; but, now that the sparrows had become so numerous, it was a question which were more destructive, the sparrows or the worms. When the teacher asked the class what they thought about it, all hands were raised eagerly.

One little boy was conspicuous by his diffidence, and the teacher singled him out.

Johnny rose bashfully at his desk and said, "I don't know, teacher, I never had the sparrows."

OUR PREMIUM STORY.

A Lack of Obstacles.

A Scotsman who had worked for many years on the railroads among the highlands of Scotland went to the United States in his later years and settled on a section of homestead land on the plain of the Far West.

Soon after his arrival, says Tit-Bits, there was a project for a railway through the district. The Scotsman was applied to as a man of experience in such matters.

"Hoot, mon," he said to the spokesman of the delegation, "ye canna build a railroad across this country."

"Why not, Mr. Ferguson?"

"Why not?" repeated Ferguson, with an air of effectually settling the whole matter. "Why not? Dinna ye see the country's as flat as a floor, and ye hae nae place whatever to run your toonels through?"

From Near and Far

Yuan Shi Kai, elected first president of the Chinese republic, October 6, is fifty-four years old. Born in the province of Ho-Nan in 1859, during most of his adult life he has been in official life. At the age of 23 he was sent with a Chinese detachment to Korea and three years afterward became Chinese imperial resident at Seoul. His election is for a term of five years. He received the necessary two-thirds vote of the united houses of parliament on the third ballot. The inauguration was attended with great pomp. It was enacted in the vast building called the Tai Ho Tien, or hall of supreme peace, which sits high up on triple terraces of marble and is decorated everywhere with dragons and imperial gold.

A new campaign for moral education in the public schools is on foot in Wisconsin, fostered by the State University under its Extension Division. Mr. F. J. Gould, an officer of the English Moral Education League, is to conduct the enterprise, spending a week in each town and giving demonstrations for the benefit of both parents and teachers. Some of the more important towns have already completed arrangements for the visitation. Afterward Dr. Gould will give similar courses in St. Louis, Rochester, New York City, Philadelphia, Washington, Pittsburgh, Louisville and Baltimore.

In her first address, delivered to an audience of 3,000, upon her release from Ellis Island, Mrs. Pankhurst said, among other things: "Women tried persuasion and argument in England, peaceful means that have been effective here. These failing, violence became necessary. Nothing was ever got from an English parliament except through violence. The machinery of the British government is an elaborate arrangement of how not to do anything. Whatever social legislation has been obtained has been due to women's civil war, and much of it was granted to soften the spirit of the suffragettes."

The answer of the Philippines to President Wilson's message, delivered through Governor General Harrison, came by cable October 21. It was in the form of a resolution adopted by the Philippine assembly, which says that the few days which have passed since the declaration of the Wilson policy "have sufficed to bring about a good understanding between Americans and Filipinos, which it had been impossible to establish during the thirteen years passed."

Disciples Table Talk

Canton, Mo., Church Finds Strong Leader.

Earle N. Todd, former pastor at Fort Wayne, Ind., but for the past seven months in charge of the Union Church, at Monroe, Wisc., has been secured by the Canton, Mo., church as leader. Mr. Todd is a man of remarkable intellectual and spiritual power, and this church is to be congratulated upon securing his services. He said in resigning the pulpit at Monroe that his reason for making the change was tnat the college town offered him more opportunities to do effective work. He will be accompanied to his new location by his sister, Miss F. Flora Todd, who will be the contralto soloist in the Canton church.

A. W. Conner, Boy Expert.

A. W. Conner, of Irvington, Ind., has received the thanks of all the schools that have engaged him for a week of his unique campaign for boys. Mr. Conner is a genius in his way, and for many years has been making a study of the much discussed "boy problem." He recently gave a week's addresses at University Church, Champaign, Ill., These lectures are a peculiar blending of fun and philosophy, and are exceedingly helpful. After hearing the lecture on "The Big Boy: His Nature and Power," one Champaign father said, "I would have given anything to have heard that lecture when I was a boy." The work being carried on in Champaign is backed by a number of business men.

Some Atchison Convention Results.

That the University of Kansas has a detrimental influence on young men studying for the ministry was the contention of several delegates to the state convention recently held in Atchison. They held that the influences could not be received there by the students for the ministry that are received at denominational schools. At a business session of the convention the following resolutions were passed: "To favor the establishment of a training school where young men in poor circumstances can study for the ministry and work their way through; to keep a record of the Sunday attendance at all Christian churches in the state; to institute a plan whereby all rural districts without pastors may become affiliated and support preachers and receive district evangelists; to use influence with the state legislature to pass and enforce a law that all working men shall have one rest day in the week." The Kansas Christian Missionary Society instructed a committee to prepare plans of building and financing a Christian college in this state. The school will be in the nature of an industrial university, in which students who are compelled to secure educations through their own efforts can become self-supporting while pursuing their studies. The school's chief mission will be to train young women for religious work. A site probably will be chosen somewhere in the Salina district.

Benton Harbor, Mich., Dedicates.

About five years ago, T. W. Bellingham came to Benton Harbor, by Lake Michigan, to become pastor of the First Church. Additions were frequent, and the growth of the work demanded enlargement, so about two years ago a new lot was secured in the growing section of the city and plans were laid for a new building. A structure has now been reared in the form of an oblong square, 40 by 80 feet, a two story building and as the financial conditions at this time would not permit completion the lower auditorium has been finished, with a seating capacity of over three hundred. A splendid primary department is provided and several rooms for Sunday-school work. The leading force in the movement has been Dr. Carl A. Mitchell, a physician of note in the city, and one of the elders of the church. He planned the building, and engineered the workmen, and it is due to his "sticktuitiveness" that success has come. On October 12, the basement was dedicated. J. F. Green, of Owosso, state secretary, preached. On that day funds were raised, and at 3 p. m. the pastor led the congregation in the vows of dedication.

Euclid Avenue, Cleveland, Celebrates.

"A great church like a great soul is not the creation of a dozen years or even a generation; but the product of generations." Of no church an this be said more truly than of the Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, which during the week of October 12-18, celebrated its seventieth anniversary. During the seventy years of its life this church has added 2,200 members,

Rev. J. H. Goldner, whose church in Cleveland has just celebrated its seventieth anniversary and who occupies the place of honor in Christian Century fellowship for sending the first check received on its Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade.

867 of them having been received during the past fourteen years. The present resident membership is 782. The growth has not been rapid, but steady and solid. The history of the church has not been in any way remarkable, but in some respects it is a unique church among the Disciples. Few churches are characterized by such a high level of intelligence and spiritual culture. Probably none has a more thoroughly worshipful and impressive Sunday service. The exercises of the Anniversary week began October 12, with a reunion and rally of the Sunday-school, attended by standing features of this service. Prof. Jabez Hall, of Butler College, for eighteen years pastor of the church, was the guest of honor and delivered the anniversary sermon in the morning. One of the most helpful services during the week was the Christian Endeavor reunion and rally, attended by 150 former and present members of the society. The address of President Miner Lee Bates, of Hiram at the evening service, dramatically pictured world conditions and the opportunities afforded educated young men and women today. On Wednesday evening Judge F. A. Henry read the history of the church. The climax of the service was reached when a six-year old mortgage was burned and the church property, valued at $170,000, was declared free of debt. The Thursday night service was addressed by C. A. Brooks, on "The Church and the Immigrant," and by David W. Teachout on "World-wide Conquest versus Local Supremacy." The Euclid Avenue Church has had but nine resident ministers, three of whom are still living: Jabez Hall, A. A. Knight, and J. Z. Tyler, the latter two being residents of Cleveland and elders of the church.

Missouri Leads in Ministerial Relief.

W. R. Warren, Secretary of Ministerial Relief, is happy over the gains in offerings to that cause. He reports that the receipts for the year ending September 30, 1913, were $33,960.16, nearly double the receipts of two years ago. The most gratifying gain of all is in church offerings, an increase of 45.03 per cent over last year. Missouri still leads with $2,420. Indiana continues to hold second place with $1,973. Kentucky moves up from fifth to third place by giving $1,256. Illinois is fourth with $1,135 and Ohio fifth with $1,118. The second division includes: sixth, Iowa $717; seventh, Pennsylvania, $650; eighth, Texas, $606; ninth, Tennessee, $398; tenth, California, $391; eleventh, Kansas, $327, and twelfth, New York, $274. The largest gain is in Texas, from $163 to $606 and from twelfth to eighth place. Tennessee, Kansas and Illinois each almost doubled her offering.

"Cost of Being a Christian" Discussed.

That being a Christian means a good deal more than reforming one's habits, such as smoking, swearing, card playing, etc., was emphasized in a recent revival sermon preached by J. R. Perkins, at Sioux City, Ia. "It will cost a man a great deal more than a few accidental and incidental personal habits in order for him to become a Christian," Mr. Perkins declared. "It will cost him his sin. Jesus treated sin as one thing and the weakness of personal habits as quite another. For example, toward those unfortunate derelicts in the social order of his day his attitude was one of tenderness, of understanding, of sympathy. But when dealing with those coldly respectable gentlemen who religiously kept the Sabbath, but who never scrupled to build their own success at the cost of their fellows, Jesus had only indignation. So that man who would become a Christian should first be taught that his relations with other men must be made right, whether he abstains from smoking and from reading his Sunday newspaper or not. To become a Christian will cost a man all methods for enriching himself that are wrong methods. It will cost him his old selfishness that the church in the past has tacitly allowed him to keep just because he has consented to obey a few forms of a creed. It will cost him every desire that he has that does not in some way make for the good of all men. And the hour is at hand when being a Christian will mean more than the average theological platform has conceived hitherto. For to be a Christian does not so much mean that a man must change petty personal habits that touch only himself, but his habits that create strife in the social order of which he is a part, doing hurt to untold numbers."

Another Sunday School Specialist.

Keeping pace with the advanced movement in church work, Broadway church, Lexington, Ky., has called J. Randall Farris, of Atlanta, Ga., to be its superintendent of religious education. He will have under his supervision all the educational work of the church. Mr. Farris spent seven years in college at Lexington. During this time he was very active in church and Philanthropic work. Since leaving college he has made a specialty of Sunday-school work, believing that the future of the church depends upon this department of activity. At present he is Southeastern Bible School Superintendent for the Christian Church. He will move to Lexington and assume his duties the first of January.

Pastor Writes Letter to Candidates.

Mark Collis, pastor of Broadway Church, Lexington, Ky., has addressed the following letter to the candidates for city commissioner in Lexington: "Gentlemen:—The public has read with interest much that you have said in regard to the management of the city, if you should be elected, but the undersigned has seen nothing reported as coming from you on the question of Sunday closing and the management of the red light district. That Sunday laws are openly violated is known to all, and that the closing of picture shows, barber shops, groceries, fruit stands, etc., would bring relief to many and would contribute to the moral and financial welfare of our city, no one would doubt. It is well known that the social evil exists to an alarming extent in our city, and our bad name in this respect stands in the way of our progress. Some of us have recently been to Toronto. It is a city of 450,000. There is no red light district there and Sunday closing laws are enforced. The opening of barber shops, groceries, fruit stands, picture shows, etc., are not looked upon as necessary there. As we saw the marvelous growth and prosperity of that city, it was very evident that a quiet Sunday and the banishment of the houses of shame do not kill a city. I should like to see Lexington killed in the way that Toronto is being killed. Gentlemen, if you will, kindly speak out on these two questions and help some of us to a decision in making our selections for commissioners. Yours for a bigger and better Lexington."

North Middletown, Ky., Dedicates.

The dedication of the new $25,000 church at North Middletown, Ky., marks the beginning of a new chapter in the history of that work. This is really a rural church, and the erection of such an expensive building speaks loud for the determination of this congregation. That the young men of the church were the givers of a $2,000 organ, is significant. For a church that draws men is a winning church. John Christopherson, pastor of the church, and also president of a college in Middletown, is to be congratulated. W. E. Ellis, pastor of the Paris Church, delivered the address of dedication. The history of the North Middletown church dates back to 1817, and for a time was closely allied to that of the Baptist denomination. The former church building which has been replaced by the new edifice, was erected in 1842, and its walls have resounded with eloquent sermons from the lips of some of the most noted preachers of the Disciples, viz.: Aylette Rains, Moses E. Lard, Robert Graham, John T. Johnston, C. M. Arnold, E. V. Zollars, J. W. McGarvey and others. L. H. Reynolds was pastor of the church for about six years, but on account of advancing age he resigned, and was succeeded by W. S. Willis. J. W. Ligon was pastor until his resignation about two years ago.

Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Burns Mortgage.

Sunday, October 26, was the date set for the mortgage burning at Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, where Austin Hunter ministers. For several months this congregation had been planning to celebrate clearing its records of several thousand dollars indebtedness. At the morning session were given two addresses, one by Edwin W. Stewart, for forty years elder of the church, and one by the pastor on the theme, "Go Forward." Leon L. Loehr, president of the Board officiated at the ceremony of mortgage burning. The sermon in the evening was preached by C. G. Kindred, of the Englewood Church. A reading also, "The Vision of Sir Launfal," was given by Mrs. Venice B. Jackson. On the Tuesday night following, a church dinner was given at the church.

Christian College Must Enlarge.

Christian College, Columbia, Mo., opened September 17, with the largest resident enrollment in the history of the institution. Over 160 students have matriculated and it was found necessary to enlarge dormitory accommodations. The enrollment in the Conservatory of Music is unusually heavy and additional studios were provided to meet the demand for increased space. Mr. Frank Parker, recently of the faculty of the American Conservatory of Chicago, is the new head of the voice department. Mr. Cady Kenny, recently of Baker University, is a new artist teacher of piano. Mr. Alvin L. Barton, recently of Alma College, and previous to that concert master at Cornell University, is the new head of the violin department. New members of the faculty of the School of Arts and Science are: Miss Hall, from Hamline University, who has courses in college history and English; Miss Mullenbach, the new head of the School of Modern Languages, whose graduate work was done in the universities of Halle and of Berlin; and Miss Bateman, of the Mathematics department who received her training at the Woman's (Goucher) College, Baltimore. A new building for the growing School of Home Economics, is being planned.

Pastor's Tribute to Toronto Sunday.

Edgar De Witt Jones, pastor at First Church, Bloomington, was especially impressed with the Canadian Sunday and gave the following tribute to Toronto on this achievement in the report of the convention given his people: "I was very greatly pleased with the courtesy of the Toronto people as a whole; the fine type of civic pride and the devotion and reverence of the people for the things of the spirit. A Sunday in Toronto is as different from the average Sunday of a large American city as one can imagine. All the shops and stores, and places of amusement are closed up tight. There are no Sunday newspapers for sale, and it would seem that every one goes to church."

Campbell Club Meeting at Yale.

R. L. McQuary, secretary of the Campbell club at Yale University, reports that the club, which consists of all Disciples enrolled in the university, with their wives met for the first time this school year on the evening of Oct. 8 with Mr. and Mrs. W. H. McLean. A short business period resulted in the choice of Mr. J. C. Archer as president for the year. Speeches of greeting were given by the new men as follows: Shields, Prewitt, Owen, Crown, Corn, Gish, McQuary, Pickett, Gordon, Burkhardt, Montgomery, and Cunningham. The president made his inauguration speech, and a helpful message was given by Prof. D. C. MacIntosh of the Divinity School faculty.

Greyfriars Entertain Judge Ragland.

"The Greyfriars" is the name of a men's club organized in the Paris, Mo., church, where Frank Waller Allen, preacher, novelist and social worker, ministers. The purpose of the club is to have some part educatively in bringing the local church abreast modern idealism and in giving to the Paris community itself a large and inspiring social vision. At a meeting of the Greyfriars, held October 12, the guest of the evening was Judge W. T. Ragland, circuit judge of his district of Missouri, holding court in Paris, Hannibal, New London, Palmyra and Bowling Green. He is a member of the Paris church, and is in hearty sympathy with all modern idealism. In clearing ground the speaker compared the typical church, adhering to dead forms and outworn dogmas, to the courts, now in travail in an effort to meet modern demands for justice on its merits by dispensing with senseless and antiquated procedure. He cited deserted country churches as proof that the old individualistic appeal no longer carries force and discussed the big social problems convulsing the world, and declared that the church, like every other institution, must be of value or die. That value, he pointed out, must be in applying the idealism of Jesus to the distressing problems now confronting the race. Judge Ragland paid a high tribute to Mr. Allen for his affective work in the Paris community.

Church Establishes Free Clinics.

A new line of church activity has been begun by the Hillside Church, Indianapolis, Ind., through the establishment there of free clinics under the direction of physicians. Charles M. Fillmore, pastor of the church, believes the church should lose no opportunity to do good, and that the ministration to physical needs as well as spiritual needs is a part of religion. The clinics are being held at the church each Friday afternoon. In regard to the need for free clinics, those having charge of the work at Hillside say: "We have been told by one in a position to know that there are two hundred children in the Washington school alone who need some attention to their eyes, ears, nose or throat. As many of the parents feel they can not afford to employ a high-priced specialist to do the work and dread taking them to the dispensary, the free clinic at Hillside is the natural place for them."

Passing of a Saintly Woman.

An interesting life closed when Mrs. Rebecca Faddis passed away at Seattle, Wash., Sept. 7, after an illness of about two months. Mrs. Faddis was eighty-four years of age, and was the widow of John M. Faddis, who died twenty-four years ago. She was a Presbyterian in early life, but became identified with the Disciples at the time of her marriage. Mrs. Faddis was best known by the congregations at Mankato, Minn., and at Hyde Park, Chicago. Nine sons and daughters were born to her, eight of whom survive.

At the recent session of the Central Kentucky Christian Ministers' Association which met at Lexington, Ky., there were forty members present. J. H. McNeill, president, presided. The paper of the meeting on "Modern Theology and Social Service," was given by Prof. W. C. Bower, and the discussion which followed was lead by Dr. Max Hall, of Uniontown, Pa. The discussion was continued by Prof. S. M. Jefferson, Prof. B. C. Deweese, Prof. H. L. Calhoun, Prof. A. W. Fortune, Dr. I. J. Spencer and President R. H. Crossfield.

At a recent evening service at the Massillon, Ohio, church, where H. E. Stafford ministers, the women's organizations had charge. An unusual feature of the service was the Scripture readings. A number of women characters of the Old and New Testament were alloted to selected women, who briefly related the life-setting of each and then read a short biography or interpreted a favorite saying. The pastor delivered an address on "Woman and the Kingdom."

A. D. Harmon, resigning at First Church, Omaha, will possibly take three years' rest upon his farm in Wisconsin before again doing pastoral work. But his doctors will not permit him to do much walking for three years.

BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

While the offerings of money for the year —$97,406.95—were less than last year—$18,606.19 less—an analysis of the same shows a gain in the amounts received from individuals, Sunday-schools and churches for maintenance. Individual gifts received or reported at the national office ranged in size from eleven cents from a tiny child to four thousand dollars from a long-time friend. These offerings, however, were mostly in small amounts and came from a great multitude and from everywhere. The Sunday-schools in increasing number made offerings this year. An indication of their growing liberality is seen in the fact that the Easter offering, which comes largely from the schools, amounted to $25,584.39. This was over $4,000 more than last year and about twice what it was a few years ago. The offerings from churches are more numerous and larger than ever before. Many are adopting the budget plan.

A Personal Word to Pastors

You are interested, more than anyone else, in the character of the literature going into your school. Are you satisfied with the results in character, in moral backbone, in spirituality, you are getting through the paper you are furnishing your adult and young people's classes? Do your scholars read this paper, or throw it away? Millions of pieces of literature are distributed in our schools each week. Are there real results in the thing you are most interested in—character-building?

One of our pleasant experiences at Toronto was a conversation with Jessie Brown Pounds, the beloved story writer and poet of the Disciples, regarding "The Conquest," our new paper for young people and adults. In the course of this conversation Mrs. Pounds said she believes "The Conquest" is going to be just the kind of paper our schools need—readable, virile, spiritual.

Will you, as pastor, do these three things for us, helping in this way to make "The Conquest" what it should be:

(1) Send for sample copy of "The Conquest."

(2) Write us your opinion of the paper.

(3) Put the paper into at least one of your classes.

Yours for character-building literature,

Thomas Curtis Clark

Editor "The Conquest."

THE PASSING OF A PEERLESS PERSONALITY.

By A. Z. Conrad.

Life's withheld rewards tax faith and patience. To meet disappointment uncomplainingly is a mark of true greatness. To be turned to a new goal after eighty years of running and to accept the change complacently is unmistakable evidence of harmony with the Infinite Will. The day was closing. Evening shades were gathering. A solemn peace steals over all the world at eventide. The toils of the long day were ending. The hero-patriarch proves every inch a king. Reviewing yesterday in which God wrought his great deliverances for his dependent children, commander and director though he was, he now becomes a Father in his exhortation, admonition, instruction and appeal, to those from whom he soon must separate. He told his yearning love to Israel's host and occupied the closing hours of day in beautiful portrayal of God's ways with men. The book of Deuteronomy, fifth in the list of records that he gave, was mostly spoken at this momentous parting hour. In height and depth and breadth these final words surpass the best the sons of men have given to the world. In flights of oratory they are quite unmatched. In poetic strain they discourse sweetest music. They have the glow of holy inspiration. They have the wisdom of the seer and the sublimities of divinest truth. With winter on his head and eternal summer in his heart, austerity has united with serenity. No longer is it necessary that the war-horse spirit shall be curbed. Vigor and virility have ripened into triumphant tranquillity. With vision unimpaired and all his faculties alert this Prince of Men swept the tents of Israel with eye prophetic and saw them when the promise of the Lord shall be fulfilled, the battle fought and victory complete.

THE DAY'S WORK.

His life had been a series of surprises and of tragic triumphs. It had been a day's work arduous indeed. A morning rescue had been followed by a noonday parting of the ways, an afternoon of test and contest, and now the eventide had brought climax stupendous. We watched him at the mid-forenoon of life, rich in the privileges of luxury, with mind well disciplined, a body strong, and will to do and to endure. He stood beside the throne in favor first of all the courtly men about the king. He knows full well the meaning of continuance in favor with the court. The wealth and honor of all Egypt he places in the scale-pan. He turns, to see a race enslaved, maltreated, hopeless to the point of dark despair, with ties of nature kindred to himself. He thinks and then he prays. He prays and thinks again. Redemptive passion surges in his soul and then he boldly sets all this upon the other scale-pan. Wealth and luxury and the splendors that await him are lifted as though of nothing worth. His own great personality, now weighted with true love for men, outranks a thousand fold the weight of wealth and fame. The real day's work had just begun. Its hours henceforth could not be wasted. God had called him to enter on new training for a work he was not yet prepared to do. For forty years he studied in the wilderness enjoying privileges quite other than Egyptian schools had offered. In God's great outdoor temple of instruction the Eternal was his counsellor and tutor. At last in burning bush he saw the signal light for larger service and then, unafraid, he confronted Pharaoh with vigorous demand for liberation of the people whom he loved. Nine times he startled court and country with demonstrations absolute of power Divine. He then became the witness of the tenth command of God to Pharaoh defiant, when death stalked through the land from end to end. When now the relenting monarch bade the slaves depart he stood before them, the appointed of Jehovah, to lead them to the Promised Land. Behold him now, confronted by the waters of the sea, a lifted wand, a prayer, the breath of God, and then the waters parting while he led the anxious host to freedom! Complaint and accusation cruel he later braves without resentment. When thirst oppresses and the people faint, God speaks, and Marah sends forth waters sweet. He answers hunger's call with bread from heaven. Into the Holy Mount he goes for fellowship with God and hears the voice Divine speak forth the Decalogue. For forty days he lingers in the heights, receives the tables of the Law and pattern for the Holy House of God. The forward march brought new and greater dangers. Each one in turn the dauntless leader met, and conquered every one, until at last he saw the opened gateway to the Promised Earthly Paradise. In mutinous rebellion, the hosts, affrighted by the timid spies' report, made necessary a stern rebuke from heaven. Right nobly then their hero leader stood in earnest supplication, interceding for the ungracious company that had derided him and in contemptuous words had spoken of his God. When wrath Divine was on the people turned, he thrust aside the proffered crown and plead for their acquittal. No word escaped his lips of provocation or despair, when from the mouth of God a sentence fell forbidding this unholy host the conquest of the Land of Canaan and added forty years of desert journeying to their pilgrimage. When forty years had sped away he found the sons and daughters like their sires, and for one brief moment human weakness showed itself in doubt and anger. This evidence of incapacity for a conquest of the Land of Canaan relieved him of command and closed a day of splendor incomparable.

OUTLOOK AT NIGHTFALL.

"And so he died," but not until vouchsafed a vision of the land of glory up to whose very borders he had led the chosen tribe. Believers in Jehovah all conclude the earthly day but never do they close the book. The intrepid leader at his Lord's command mounts up to Nebo's heights, then passes on to Pisgah's peak, and looks upon the hills and vales of Palestine. Though not allowed to cross the turbid river flowing at his feet, he still has outlook. The way is never closed unto the eyes of faith. Right here the Christian has the fullest meaning of his life for God. Whatever may befall, he still has outlook. No matter how the path may wind about the hill, there is a look beyond for those who live within the circle of God's smile. Faith's holiest distinction we have in this, that even nightfall can ne'er prevent a further view. The scene beheld by Israel's deliverer from Pisgah's heights is like the glimpses of the Great Beyond vouched unto the children of the King of Kings.

FAREWELL.

And so he died.

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power
And all that beauty, all that wealth ere gave,
Await alike the inevitable hour;
The path of glory leads but to the grave."

Thus it has been truly said: and yet not here do all roads end. It would be sad, indeed, if spirits like the son of Amram should journey up the slope and steps, enduring the whips and scorns of time, at last to find that discipline severe had gone for naught, and one cold word alone confronted pilgrims at the close of day, the hard, unwelcome "dead." But through this portal all must pass. "Set thine house in order," for western skies will soon be crimson with the glory of the day's decline.

GOD'S CHRONOMETER.

"So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord." It is then by Divine appointment that we live and die. His words gainsaid by none, stand sure as is the throne eternal. The hand upon the dial no man can stay and when they reach the appointed hour no error has been made in his decree. To know a wisdom Infinite is over all and that unmeasured power is yet directed by a holy love, ah, this above all else enables man to wrap the drapery of his couch about him and lie down to pleasant contemplation of a glad awakening in God's great beyond. Why wait for longer day and more of trial when wisdom Infinite decrees our work is ended? It were better far to be content with God's sweet will and say, "He doeth all things well."

THE SECRET SEPULCHRE.

How much ado we make of trivialities. The splendid sepulchre with lifted shaft of stone or sculptured marble, what are these to souls departed? They give to none a lasting name, but with the passing years they crumble to the dust. It were wiser far to trust in holy deeds for immortality. It is in loving service and compassion tender we build our monuments which last, untouched by tooth of time, through all the ages long. A life faith-filled and with a holy love directed, cannot and will not die. The unmarked grave of Israel's emancipator rebukes the vulgar lavishing of wealth to mark the resting place of mortals ordinary. It bids us look, not where the mortal lies, but to "the house not built with hands, eternal in the heavens."

GROWING OLD VIGOROUSLY.

"Yet was not his natural force abated." Let devotees of pleasure turning night to day and day to night, well know that for each hour of dissipation nature takes reprisal. She exacts her rights, not now, but in the near tomorrow. Think not to escape the paying of this toll. The harvest shows the seed. To grow old vigorously is much to be desired, but calls for discipline severe. Tempestuous passions must be kept in leash. Let energies be cautiously conserved against the day of need. A form erect, elastic step, with countenance aglow with hope and happiness when age has left behind life's trials and triumphs, gives evidence of fellowship with God and tells of glad obedience to his laws of love and life.

TRANSIENT TEARS.

V. 8. "And the children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days. So the days of weeping and mourning for Moses were ended." Alas, the transiency of tears! A leadership of eighty years has now reward of thirty days of mourning! God pity human frailty. And yet what matters it how little or how long they weep if so be God has said, "Well done." It matters nothing, to be sure, to those who pass beyond, but it may matter much to those who yet remain and toil. To hold too cheaply the sacrificial service of noble souls who pass beyond, is to ignore the value of our heritage. We best do honor then, the dear departed, when most we stand beneath the causes they upheld and thus continue that for which they gave their lives.

PEERLESS PERSONALITY.

V. 10. "And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face." Right here we have the secret of his power. 'Twas in the closeness of his fellowship with God. Though face to face with God we may not stand, as Moses stood, yet we may come into his very presence and through the Holy Spirit hear and see the things that are Divine. Not less unerringly may we be led than he, and though our power is not displayed in miracle, not less worthy or less wonderful is the Holy Word entrusted to our keeping which calls the dead in sin to life in Christ. To leadership we, too, are called who bear the name of Christ, nor shall we shirk the task divinely given. Our nearness to our Lord determines our successes and measures growth and glory for each soul. If some desired goal shall be withheld we can be sure the love that builded Calvary will lead us to a greater and a better goal than that of our own choosing.

Do well the appointed task at any cost and then the setting sun will hold no terrors of a threatening night. Love lights and lifts until in God's good time we see Him face to face our faith securing for us victory complete through Christ our Lord.

THE BODY OF CHRIST.

November 5.

"Not only does the church, as the body, stand in need of Christ, as the head, but the apostle ventures the bold expression that Christ also needs the church, as the body, as that which belongs to his completeness, or makes his being first entirely complete." This view makes our relation to the church a serious matter. To hinder its work, to distort its message, delays the revelation of Christ to the world.

THE AUTHORITY OF CHRIST.

It has been said that force and love rule the world, force until love is ready. The authority of Christ has been misunderstood so often because we associate authority with physical force. The king compels men to obey his commands whether they feel that the commands are right or wrong. The rich man has the force that riches give and his opinions are held in respect for this reason if for no other. The power of a labor organization is at times more in evidence than its justice. Force has ruled the world so long that we are able only with difficulty to think of force as subordinated to love. We preach the message of Christ as if we were delivering the final pronouncement of an absolute monarch who demands abject obedience. The authority of Christ is spiritual. Men who obey him know why they obey. They bow to him because they are governed by their sense of what is right and fitting.

DISCLOSING THE WISDOM OF GOD.

We have added much to our knowledge of facts. We have been busy workers in the field of science, examining the things of sense, classifying them, and discovering their causal connections. The ways of men present and past have been carefully scrutinized by historian, philosopher, and moralist. We have at hand a vast amount of material to use in getting an answer to our question as to what is right and good in human conduct. In science and in ethics we find the wisdom of God. We rejoice in their disclosures, but we seek for further light. The church professes to have what we seek. The wisdom of God in Christ is the wisdom the church teaches. It is needed by the wisest philosopher and by the child. To teach it the church needs all her learning and all the pedagogical skill of the schools.

THE STRENGTH OF THE INNER MAN.

Organization is a prominent characteristic of the church of the present. We can do nothing unless we organize something. We have men's clubs, women's societies, young people's leagues, junior builders, Bible classes, social committees—the list has no end. Are these organizations expressions of deep convictions or are they substitutes for the love of goodness and truth? Are the men and women who encourage and promote them trying to find some way to be of service to mankind or are they searching for some form of respectable amusement?

A GLORIOUS CHURCH.

Barbarous display is sometimes called splendor. The glory of a nation may be identified in the minds of the unthinking with the pomp and circumstance of royal weddings and of coronation ceremonies. It would appear that for many the glory of the church consists in elaborate worship, robed ecclesiastics, and richly decorated houses of worship. These have their uses, but they are not the glory of the church. The father who loves his family more than he loves wealth and honor and pleasure, the mother who teaches her children how to live well and to reflect credit on whatever institution they serve, the workman who puts honest work above advancement or pay, the Sunday school teacher who imparts the knowledge of life freely and joyfully, the merchant who holds that profits are less important than honorable dealing, these and all others who live in the fear of God and render service with intelligence and fidelity, are the glory of the church.

Don't Cheat Your School

This is written only for pastors who feel some measure of responsibility for the quality of literature going into the hands of their Sunday School scholars.

And, no doubt, all pastors who read the Christian Century are of that sort. Their point of view is that of religious education. The Sunday School to them is more than an aggregation of units brought together each week to go through a certain formal program—calling the roll, "doing" the lesson, "taking up the pennies," asking for birthday money, and telling the children to be sure to "have a good lesson" next Sunday!

The Sunday School is to them rather THE CHURCH STUDYING THE WORD OF ETERNAL TRUTH, and developing in minds and hearts the spirit of the Christian religion. It is, indeed, the Church's best chance to guarantee Christly men and women in the next generation, as well as in this.

To pastors who hold this high ideal of the work of the Sunday School, the matter of literature becomes a most vital one. Second only to the influence of the teacher in the life of the pupil is that of the literature upon which the scholars feed their minds and souls. And, in many cases, we are sure the influence of the literature comes first.

Roosevelt declares that one of the strongest influences that moulded his early life was a child's paper he subscribed for, and which he valued highly. Are not your children and youths just as likely to be so influenced?

ARE YOU WELL ACQUAINTED WITH THE LITERATURE YOU ARE USING IN YOUR SCHOOL? or would you, in ordering, ask for so many "blue quarterlies," so many "green quarterlies," as actually some persons have done?

If you are alert to the responsibility upon you as the leader in religious education in your church, by all means secure samples of all systems published, and see to it that your school uses the literature that it finds to be the most up-to-date, most virile, and BEST ADAPTED TO CHARACTER BUILDING.

The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade

Thank You! Thank You! Thank You!

WITH THE EDITOR out of town holding an evangelistic meeting in Missouri how can the Circulation Man adequately do the honors of this great occasion? Congratulations! Congratulations! We are with you! Glad you've started something business-like! The Circulation Department will measure up to the Editorial Department if it keeps on! Here's my list of names! Here's my birthday gift! [not many say this, but they're mighty good!] Here's our hand! Put us down as Crusaders! It took you a long time to get started but you're sure started now on the right track! We feel responsible for The Century; it's OUR paper now!—this is the chorus that has been sounding in the C. M.'s ears every day at mail time.

How happy everybody is! It seems to the Circulation Man as if the friends of The Century had just been "waitin' 'round" to get an invitation to a party like this. They like it. Who doesn't like a "Donation Party!"

But the C. M. solemnly promised last week that he'd not talk much this week. He intends to keep that promise. But he just must rise and say:

Kind friends: We are glad and grateful for your words of congratulation and encouragement, and for your prompt acceptance of the invitation to be at our party. We hope you and all our friends will from this time on lend your best efforts in all-around practical co-operation to make our great Celebration a great success!

This Subscription Crusade is a perfectly frank affair. It wears no disguise. It does not talk about one thing and work for another.

It is an out-and-out SUBSCRIPTION Crusade.

We are asking for subscriptions—twenty thousand of them, and twenty thousand dollars to pay for them. The Crusade is just what it is, and nothing else! The editors of The Century have attained some reputation for their candor, and now your Circulation Man is being appreciated for the same quality! Here is a letter from Rev. H. W. Hunter, of Higginsville, Mo., which expresses this appreciation. He says:

> The Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade that you are starting in your columns is the most stupendous undertaking, besides being the most liberal, that has characterized any paper of recent years.
> The frankness with which you state your plan is very refreshing. There is nothing concealed. It's an open deal. He who reads can run and not get his foot into something. Everything is fair.
> The spirit of enlisting new readers should enter into the heart of every reader of your great paper. If a thing is good for us it is too good to keep to ourselves. We must share the contents of your Weekly with a multitude. You can count on me doing what I can to help the good work along.

That middle paragraph contains just what we want to make plain. We want everybody to know right from the beginning what our plan is, and everybody can find out all that the C. M. himself knows about this Crusade if he'll read pages two and three in each week's issue.

We are out after subscriptions, and money to pay for them—and we intend to be perfectly frank about it. Don't you like that way better?

That is my speech. Again thanking you, and so forth and so forth—I now propose that we hear from others.

Judge FREDERICK A. HENRY, Cleveland, O.

For thirty years of faithful Christian service well performed, The Christian Century is entitled to and has my hearty congratulations and my best wishes for many happy returns of the anniversary of its birth on New Year's Day of 1884. No one should, I suppose, agree with every utterance of his favorite periodicals; but in the main I have approved the spirit in which The Century has spoken its mind. To be vigorous without being quarrelsome or censorious, is a wholesome ideal which I believe The Century has both sought and realized in considerable measure. Under that rule of conduct our people can well support several religious weeklies, reflecting as many different points of view, and such competition will do both writers and readers good. I shall be glad to help in the form of birthday celebration which you announce.

Pres. HILL M. BELL, Drake University.

I am glad indeed to congratulate you upon your Crusade to enlarge the constituency of The Christian Century. I wish you the very greatest success.

Rev. E. L. POWELL, Louisville.

Permit me to congratulate The Christian Century on its past record and on the announcement of its splendid programme of endeavor. I hope you may be so gladdened on your anniversary that you will feel disposed to break forth into singing. I like the spirit of The Christian Century. I like its keen, incisive writing. I am half inclined to say that I like its heterodoxy, for it strikes me as being very close to orthodoxy. I like it because it proposes to work under a supreme sense of loyalty to Christ, and through the body of Christians known as the Disciples of Christ, and claiming the splendid independence within that body which is embraced in the two words—liberty and loyalty. I may not personally be able to be one of the Crusaders [Yes, but he will!—C. M.] but I am most glad to approve of the Crusade; and I pray the blessing of God to rest upon your fine paper.

Rev. GEORGE W. KNEPPER, Ann Arbor.

I certainly wish The Century success in its new venture. It seems to be the only paper we have ever had as a people, which recognized the fact that as a communion we are not the end, but only a means, and that emphasizes that other potent fact that we are not the whole but a part. Surely there was never such a need for the wide preaching of these truths as now.

Rev. JAMES N. CRUTCHER, Neosho, Mo.

The Century thirty years old! So youthful in spirit, so aggressive, and yet, I hardly realize that the years had grown into such lengths. Congratulations and best wishes for another thirty. The Century occupies a field rather unique. It is needed because it is unfearing; it is sometimes, in certain quarters, considered an irritant and the folks who do not like it apparently fail to realize the value of a journal that is not a follower, but a leader. I wish you every success in the campaign for twenty thousand new members to The Century household.

Rev. A. B. PHILPUTT, Indianapolis, Ind.

Your plan of increasing the subscription list of The Christian Century is legitimate and praiseworthy. Success to you. The "open mind" is the slogan for our times. There is no danger to truth in free discussion. There is no hope for it under other conditions.

Mr. WENDELL HUSTON, Carrington, N. D.

I have the last edition of The Century, and hasten to congratulate you on your enterprise in conducting this the best religious weekly I have read for many years. In fact it has been some time since I have subscribed for a religious weekly, but now The Century fills the place. The editorial page is so broad and full of scholarship, that it is a delight, and the Outlook or any other religious paper does not contain more strengthening views on the great live religious present day questions. Just as sure as thought progresses, so will your paper grow, for it represents the purest and best in religious thought.

I can be counted in class two, in your campaign for subscriptions and will mail in a few days a selected list of friends to whom you must appeal for support. I am sure they will respond. Sincerely believing in your message to men, and wishing you ever increasing power, I am, yours sincerely.

Rev. HOWARD T. CREE, Augusta, Ga.

The contemplated program to increase the circulation of The Christian Century rejoices my heart. Thousands should read it where now there are hundreds. What matters it if some do not agree with your positions? That very fact is an asset: if I do not coincide with your opinions you have performed for me the very great service of stimulating thought and always your rare spirit of grace ministers to my spiritual growth. I covet the privilege of every member of this congregation being a constant reader of The Century, but a selected list I shall immediately forward.

MR. SAMUEL HARDEN CHURCH, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Congratulations on the thirtieth anniversary of The Christian Century. I note a great improvement in matter and form recently. This week's Literary Digest has a full page of extracts from one of your editorials, which discusses God's leadership in a splendidly appealing and intensely spiritual way. I am proud that you could write an article so profound and so tender. Such work will give you tremendous influence in guiding the religious tendencies of the nation—an imperative need. You seem to put life—and the sympathy, love, and work which constitute life—ahead of the foolish intellectualities which men have heretofore called religion, and in doing that your course makes a great contrast to the bigotry and denunciation which we constantly meet elsewhere. I hope you will get your 20,000 new subscribers. You deserve them!

Rev. J. LESLIE LOBINGIER, Santa Monica, Calif.

I have just finished reading the splendid convention number of The Christian Century, and cannot refrain from expressing my appreciation and delight. To those of us who were unable to attend, you have surely given in large measure the inspiration of the Toronto gathering.

Mr. JOHN M. REID, Denver.

Permit me to say that I have been well pleased with the original research, the freshness and broad way in which you have treated questions of a religious and moral nature. As long as the paper remains a progressive one, making original and fundamental research along the lines for which it is established, you may count upon me as a subscriber and as a hearty supporter of your paper.

Rev. ALLEN T. SHAW, Macomb, Ill.

I find The Christian Century diet wholesome in the main, conforming to my idea of the pure food laws. I have gotten several good sermons from recent issues. I like your temper, open-mindedness and progressive methods. I hope you will receive the patronage you deserve.

Rev. C. R. MITCHELL, Montgomery City, Mo.

I wish you every success with The Christian Century.

Rev. WM. ROSS LLOYD, Flemingsburg, Ky.

Your report of Toronto Convention is in the things said and in the way they are said so fine and helpful that I must tell you. The quality of your paper is to me a wonder. I am proud to hand it to my friends. I believe you and the C. E. and the Standard are more together than ever.

Mr. A. J. BARTH, Cedar Rapids, Iowa.

After reading your announcement of the Anniversary Subscription Crusade I wish to offer you a word of encouragement in your work. The Christian Century has been excellent in the past, but the more recent numbers have been exceptionally fine, leading me to look forward from week to week for the new numbers. I occasionally find single items that are well worth the entire annual subscription price. May

Twenty Thousand New Subscribers and Twenty Thousand Dollars to Pay for them

I tender you my best wishes for the success of the Crusade you are now entering.

Rev. V. W. Blair, N. Tonawanda, N. Y.

Not only does The Christian Century deserve success in the contemplated Subscription Crusade, but it will be achieved. May I mention three features which cause me to support The Christian Century enthusiastically? 1. Your front page article nearly always is rich. 2. Silas Jones' Prayer Meeting "stories," year in and year out, are the best I ever have read. 3. Your editorial opinions have received more comment and recognition from such standard journals as "The Independent" and "The Literary Digest" than all the rest of our Disciple publications combined so far as I have noticed. I do not always agree with all The Christian Century says but that is saying nothing against The Christian Century! I have not a friend in this world with whom I agree in toto, and I never feel free with him who is not "square" enough to disagree with me. I believe in The Christian Century because it has proved its honesty, love of truth, constructiveness, spirituality and vital touch with the problems of today.

Rev. T. E. Winter, Fulton, Mo.

Congratulations on the approach of the thirtieth anniversary of The Christian Century, and also on the splendid Crusade you have planned. The Century is of very great constructive value to the Disciples' movement, and I wish you the highest degree of success in this crusade.

Rev. W. F. Rothenburger, Cleveland, O.

Accept my heartiest congratulations upon the forward step of The Christian Century on the eve of its thirtieth anniversary. The movement ought to command response from a host of Disciples of Christ.

Rev. Austin Hunter, Chicago.

The Crusade for twenty thousand new subscriptions and twenty thousand dollars to pay for them is a large and worthy undertaking. I hope you may have great success. The improving quality of The Century entitles it to this support.

Rev. Geo. W. Hemry, South Bend.

This week's issue of The Century proved so fascinating that I read it entire at a sitting. You are fulfilling your mission in an excellent manner and bestowing a great blessing even if you have made us anxious sometimes. The Christian Century has a "reserved seat" at my reading table.

Rev. Edgar DeWitt Jones, Bloomington, Ind.

I rejoice with you and others who have put so much of their very selves into The Century, that "the long night has rolled away." I mean the night of meagre financial resources, the night of misunderstandings and misrepresentations. A new day for The Christian Century has dawned. I predict that the Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade will be a success, a great success and I shall be glad to have some part however humble in helping.

Rev. Ralph V. Callaway, Clinton, Ill.

Permit me to congratulate you and The Century on the forward movement to secure twenty thousand new subscribers. The Century is worthy of heartier support than it has been receiving. I shall be glad to help in the way suggested.

Rev. Irving S. Chenoweth, Philadelphia.

I have been greatly pleased with recent numbers of The Christian Century—the convention numbers have been splendid and will serve as permanent records. Such improvement merits our generous support. I have wished that more of the people in our church were subscribers to The Century and when they have had it a year I know they will be. Congratulations and Godspeed!

Rev. Clark W. Cummings, Ipava, Ill.

What a glorious convention number of The Century you gave us. I am so glad the Disciples of Christ have such a paper. It is one I am glad to have the members of other religious bodies see.

Prof. Arthur Holmes, Pennsylvania State College.

Congratulations upon The Christian Century's thirty years of service and especially upon its latter years of expansion and progressiveness. May it continue in its new and broader field with the same vigor and broad-mindedness that has characterized it in the last years. It deserves success because it does good.

Pres. R. H. Crossfield, Transylvania University.

I wish to congratulate The Christian Century most genuinely upon the occasion of its thirtieth anniversary. I read every issue with great interest. What The Century has to say always stimulates thought and interest whether one agrees with its positions or not. This, it seems to me, is the most valuable sort of journalism.

Rev. H. J. Loken, Berkeley, Calif.

My heartiest congratulations on the plans of celebrating the thirtieth birthday of The Christian Century. May a new host of friends be raised up behind it to make the ideals for which it stands realized in our midst.

Rev. R. W. Gentry, Winfield, Kans.

I take pleasure in congratulating The Christian Century on the subscription campaign just begun. What thinking person can doubt that The Christian Century holds our future in its hands? It is certain that ten years from now the paper that voices the highest ideals of the Disciples, and speaks the deciding voice in their tendencies, will be The Christian Century, or a paper like it. Therefore, to labor in its interest is to choose that which abides.

Mr. Harris R. Cooley, Cleveland, O.

I want to congratulate you on the work which The Christian Century has done. "Who knoweth but thou art come unto the Kingdom for such a time as this?" The future years will demonstrate the great service The Christian Century has rendered to our religious movement. Best wishes for its future!

Mr. Horace G. Murphy, Muncie, Ind.

I am glad to be counted as a friend and well-wisher of The Christian Century. We differ radically in some important things, but I enjoy its sweet and thought provoking spirit. May it live long and prosper greatly.

Rev. A. L. Cole, Carthage, Il.

I rejoice in the present plan to secure twenty thousand new subscribers to The Christian Century. This is the most constructive period in the history of the Disciples and The Century seems to be leading the way. You may count on all your friends.

Rev. L. J. Marshall, Kansas City.

I believe in the mission of The Christian Century. I enjoy and appreciate it most thoroughly. I wish you great success in your new program. Enclosed find list of names.

Rev. W. G. Winn, Rensselaer, Ind.

I congratulate you on the plan that you have adopted, because it is not a selfish one since you are making it possible for all of those who believe in The Century to have a part in the celebration. With the experience of thirty years of loyalty, devotion, and progressive policy exercised in the development of the Master's Cause, The Century is better equipped today for a larger, riper and sweeter ministry than at any other period in its history. I shall be glad to know that the paper will be a weekly visitor to the homes of those whose names I am sending in this letter, for I am positive that the spirit of The Century will be an inspiration.

Rev. Roger T. Nooe, Frankfort, Ky.

I herewith send renewal and one new subscription. The Christian Century is an inspiring visitor to my study. It comes with morning freshness. Every paper has an atmosphere. There is nothing stifling about The Century.

Rev. Frank Waller Allen, Paris, Mo.

I am certainly with you in The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade. There is no paper among us that so well deserves the loyal support of all Disciples as The Christian Century. I am with you because of your integrity, because you recognize the law of change, and because you are not afraid of the truth about life.

Rev. H. W. King, Beaver Creek, Md.

The Century is being delivered regularly now, and I have received all of the issues since the convention. I take this opportunity of saying that I am pleased with your paper. The editorials are thought-provoking and very suggestive; the devotional articles are helpful, and "At the End of the Day" is very interesting reading. I do not agree with some things that are said, but on the whole, if the paper continues to be as good as the few issues I have read, I will not regret the wherewithal that brings it to my desk.

Rev. C. H. Winders, Indianapolis.

I congratulate The Century upon the approach of its thirtieth birthday and you upon the splendid paper you are giving us. I hope your plans for a greatly increased circulation may meet with abundant success. In my judgment we have never had a better convention number of any paper than the issue of The Century for October 16.

Rev. B. A. Abbott, St. Louis, Mo.

Every sign of prosperity and progress of The Christian Century gives me pleasure. Its influence on us all has been wholesome and I congratulate you that you look into so bright a future. I trust your Crusade for more subscribers may succeed beyond even the large outlines drawn by The Century which always comes to us with the morning face.

Rev. H. E. Stafford, Massillon, Ohio.

That The Century is to go into several score homes of our congregation, that 20,000 new subscribers are to be added to its already splendid list, is a fact that gives me more real joy than anything I have felt for a long time. While you are worthy of the heartiest congratulations, I feel that the larger congratulations must go to the twenty thousand who are to be so richly blessed.

Rev. Wm. Mullendore, Franklin, Ind.

I congratulate you on The Christian Century's thirtieth anniversary and the subscription crusade for twenty thousand new subscribers. But more especially I congratulate you on the more solid financial basis of The Century and its outlook for larger usefulness, for I feel that the very life of the real plea of the Disciples of Christ depends upon the triumph of certain ideals some of which are voiced by The Christian Century alone at the present time. So long as The Century champions these ideals it will deserve to succeed and to deserve success is a greater thing than success itself.

Rev. J. H. Goldner, Cleveland.

Your thirtieth anniversary subscription crusade is finely conceived. Better is it that ten or twenty thousand men, distributed all over the Brotherhood, should give $20,000 than that the amount should be given by one man. This ought to succeed. I enclose my list and also my check.

Rev. J. P. Givens, Carbondale, Ill.

The Christian Century has the ear marks of a great religious journal. It has done some constructive work, is always fresh and for the most part has kept sweet.

Mr. D. F. Givens, Des Moines.

The appeal of The Century for a wider circulation to reach the heart of a progressive thinking Discipleship indicates a spirit that should meet a generous response. To take a forward step with a vision of optimism is characteristic of The Century's editors. Certainly as this virile type of religious journalism finds an opportunity to impress itself on a thoughtful reading constituency, a more lasting and tolerant interpretation of the Disciples' plea will be manifest.

Rev. John R. Ewers, Pittsburgh.

The Christian Century is a delight. It comes like the invigorating air from a mountain. I admire its policy of courageous leadership. Every communion needs one journal which is clearly committed to progressive ideas. The Century fulfills this mission perfectly.

Rev. Peter Ainslie, Baltimore.

I have been a regular reader of The Christian Century ever since it has been a newspaper, and I take pleasure in conveying to you my sincere congratulations on its attaining its thirtieth anniversary under your able editorship. You are making it one of the most readable papers in this country. I always enjoy its broad, catholic estimation of movements looking to the common good. I wish you every possible success.

THE CRUSADE BRIEFLY STATED

A Celebration in Gladness and in Service.

The announcement of a plan to celebrate The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary, which falls on Jan. 1, 1914, by a Crusade for Twenty Thousand new Subscribers and Twenty Thousand Dollars to pay for them, was made in the issue of October 23. If by any chance you overlooked it or wish to refer to it again we will be glad to send an extra copy of that issue free of charge to any address. In brief the Crusade plan is as follows:

The Disciples Publication Society proposes to make a concession of $10,000 on 20,000 new subscribers, provided,

1) that present readers of The Christian Century send in 20,000 names, without cost or any other obligation, according to instructions on the blank enclosed herewith.

2) that the friends of The Christian Century donate $20,000 to send the paper to these names for one full year as a gift.

The list of names will include 4,000 ministers not now taking The Christian Century (this list of ministers to be compiled in the office from the Year Book, not by our readers) thus putting The Christian Century in the hands of virtually every preacher in the brotherhood.

Such a list of 20,000 new names (every name carefully selected because it represents an active church worker, if not a leader) added to our present list of subscribers, will give The Christian Century the most valuable subscription list of any religious newspaper in the United States!

During the year the publishers will be enabled to produce a paper as far ahead of the present Christian Century as the present Christian Century is declared by its enthusiastic readers to be ahead of any paper published for the Disciples.

The result will be that by the end of the year, 90 per cent of these gift subscriptions will be renewed on their own account, and The Christian Century will be established in the hearts of a constituency which, by ordinary methods of subscription increase, it will take many years to gain.

OUR PRIMARY INTEREST IS TO SECURE THE NAMES OF PERSONS WHO, AFTER READING THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY ONE YEAR, WILL BE LIKELY TO SUBSCRIBE FOR IT ON THEIR OWN ACCOUNT FOR ANOTHER YEAR.

Each name may represent almost any theological attitude. Open-minded "conservatives" find almost as much pleasure in The Christian Century as do open-minded "progressives." The paper appeals to no partisan constituency. It pleads for the "open mind." Let that hint guide you in selecting your names.

Another hint: Your list should include those who possess a degree of intelligent interest in church matters. We find that our subscribers who "stick" are almost always the more intelligent and the more earnest ones. The Century is a dead-in-earnest paper, devoid of claptrap, sensationalism, church gossip; and it makes its appeal to persons intelligent enough to desire the kind of aid it gives. Note however that we say intelligent IN CHURCH MATTERS. Not mere academic culture but Christian culture—this is what we want you to keep in mind in making out your list.

We trust implicitly your good judgment. You will try to make your selection of names not merely from the standpoint of bestowing a favor upon personal friends, but from the standpoint of securing ultimately a list of permanent subscribers for The Christian Century.

Let the names roll in!

Use the blank on next page. If not sufficient send for more.

The Forgotten Good

"Ye did it unto me," said Jesus.

They did it unto Christ! That is most surprising. The people to whom they did good seemed so unlike Him. He is in glory, and these poor wretches were in shame. He lives in heaven, and these poor creatures lived in the slums. How in the world could it be true that they did these good deeds to Jesus? Surely, there must be some mistake! Some of them spent six months in heaven fairly rubbing their eyes with astonishment to find that they had ever done anything of importance for Jesus. Why, He lived from about 5 B. C. to 30 A. D., did He not? And they lived from 1860 or 1870 till nineteen hundred and something. How could they have done anything for Jesus?

They did it in the good they did to others in His spirit. Not all of them thought very much about it. Not all of them realized at the time that there was anything very religious about it. There was some one needing help, and they helped. That was all there seemed to be about it. And behold, the first morning in heaven, they are told that it was Jesus they assisted!

Can we make this a little more modern, and some way understand its meaning?

So much is said about right living, and so little about right living with people. A large share of the treatises on ethics would seem to have been written for Robinson Crusoe; but all the rest of the world is living and has lived in human relations, and needs to be taught less how to cultivate itself in spiritual life than to get on decently and righteously with that portion of the twelve hundred million inhabitants of the globe with whom they touch elbows.

The plan of salvation has been defined very often on its forensic side. But on its practical side, it is something like this. God cannot say to men, who differ widely in knowledge and ability, "Do these things and live;" for some can do more and some less. But He has displayed his own nature and spirit in terms of human life, and permitted men to say, "I accept Jesus as my Saviour."

Men may no longer minister to the physical needs of Jesus of Nazareth. Still, the same needs weigh on the world that did in His day. You show your attitude toward God and every duty, by your relation to Christ. You show your attitude toward Christ by your conduct toward your fellow men. We help God when we do good to our brothers.

It is not strange that Jesus reckons good done to his brethren as done to Himself. The Spirit of God, which was in Christ, is identical with the Spirit which He imparts to His brethren. There is double kinship between Him and His—a kinship both divine and human.

Moreover, by virtue of this kinship, there rests upon us the double obligation of calling out in every other man a Christ-like spirit; and in refusing to permit any other man to call out from us any other spirit than that of Jesus.

We have made our mistake in limiting the test to beggars and those generally whom we count unfortunate. The translation "unto one of the least of these" may seem to afford ground for such a limitation. But the revision gives it correctly: it is "unto one of these, my brethren, even these least." It may be a service rendered unto one of the Lord's great brethren, but it is not because of his greatness that the service is important. That is why "even these least" is added. It is the Christ-like spirit that makes the service great, irrespective of the rank of the person served. The text is not to be limited to service rendered to outcasts; the principle is of universal scope.

It would seem that God has endeavored to prepare us for living together in the widest possible relations by the variety of association imposed upon us wholly without our consent in the home. It seems a simple matter, this association within the four walls, and with a restricted circle. But there are two or three noteworthy things about it. The first is that we have no choice whatever about the homes into which we are born, or the people who are our associates there. The next is that the home circle, narrow as it is, has a very wide variety of association. And the next is that the welfare of each member of the home depends upon the acceptance of the arrangement in good faith, and the working of all to the common end for which the home is established.

If you have the true spirit of Jesus, these things will you do:

You will be considerate of the feelings of others.

You will not make sport at the expense of people's misfortunes or weaknesses.

You will never remind a black man that he is black, or a cripple that he is deformed, or an awkward man of his awkwardness.

You will never do to another a thing which you would not enjoy yourself, assuming that he does not mind it.

You will seek everywhere, and always, to treat men and women with the respect belonging to manhood and womanhood.

The Social Gospel

And Its Relation to Home Mission Ex pansion.

BY FREDERICK E. LUMLEY.

HITHERTO, emphasis has been placed chiefly upon evangelism of an introductory sort. Many evangelists have been at work calling the people to repentance. And our papers babble and sometimes scream with the reports thereof. Quantitative expansion has been and very generally is, the sort most desired, although some have felt that this craze for numbers was leading us upon thin ice. But there are many evidences of depth and permanency; higher educational standards, intensive Sunday-school work, a growing literature, a real desire to practice union as over against the excessive mouthing of it, a desire for the better organization of our unwieldy religious democracy, and other things, are proofs of enlargement which is healthy, desirable and reassuring. I brush them all aside, however, to speak of the upwelling fountain of interest in the social ministry, the tide of enthusiasm over the social gospel as the central message of future home mission expansion. Many have felt that our plea for Christian union was right but that it contained an impractical element or was deficient in some respect; but the social message fulfils this deficiency and makes union the most practical of all ideals. This means union on a basis of deeds and not on a basis of words. This is the unifying principle which all protestantism is adopting.

THE NEW CALL TO THE CHURCH.

In the first place consider the urgency and the appropriateness of the social gospel. God speaks to us in the times. Great as the church in general may be in promise there are streaks across her banner, not of sacrificial blood but made by rents in the fabric. The wrongs done to Christ by religions have again rent the temple veil. There is nothing wrong with the divine foundations but there are cracks in the superstructure which threaten to become breaches of large dimensions. There is a widespread disaffection and a recent prophet reasons thus about: "Most of our churches are operated today on an antiquated theory of the church's function. We have in the country 164 separate protestant denominations. For many years each of these boasted and paraded its reasons for separate existence but no church ever pretended that it offered a better opportunity to play the Good Samaritan; or that it was capable of producing a higher type of manhood or womanhood. No denomination ever boasted that it had a peculiar ability, fitness or willingness to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to visit the sick" and generally to practice the brotherhood of the burning heart. Every church has generally practiced the brotherhood of the burning head and stinging speech. Every one rushed into the over-crowded field of theological speculation and attempted to gain a foothold; not one has made for the unoccupied region of social service. Loyalty to Jesus was supposed to be identical with assent to a body of speculations; the function of the church was to formulate and defend this body of speculations; the function of the minister was to justify the existence of the denomination that held the speculations and convert people to belief in them.

But out of the great mystical movements of God among the sons of men have come new ideals of function and standards of judgment as a part of a new world view. The younger generation has no more than an academic interest in those splendid theological battles of the past. The young people of our day never go near those churches which dogmatize mostly and therefore fossilize completely. They have seen clear through this religious artificiality and to them it is not Christianity. The test of a religious life is no longer to consist of subscription to systems ingeniously extracted from the Frederick E. Lumley.

Scriptures; it must consist in Christ-like life, vibrating sympathetically with the down-trodden of our age. Problems other than theological tower Swiss-like and formidable on every hand and demand a Christian solution; the Social message is indeed very urgent. And if the Christian church loses itself in the solution of these problems it will find itself according to Christ's word. Today it is being forced into the laboratory of social unrest to seek there the victories denied to its merely doctrinal propaganda. And there is a new spirit in all ecclesiastical watch towers; it is the spirit of research going beneath the methods and principles based on traditional assumptions and rising to the surface again with programs, Christ-prompted, solidly reasoned and socially masterful.

THE SOCIAL GOSPEL DEFINED.

But what is the social gospel and wherein does it differ in character and purpose from what is already preached? Manifestly a satisfactory answer is impossible here but some hints may be given. The social gospel is the message of Christ to the individual, not as an atom in a vacuum, but as a social centre; it is the message of Christ addressed to the environment of the man as well as to the man; it is a proclamation of the truth that the principles of Jesus must be injected into the social tissues, the infinite number of life-relationships; it is a message which should issue in a social religion involving at least, "clean living, social service and social justice;" it is a pronouncement against all schemes whatsoever that hinder the progress of the kingdom of light and love and opportunity and self-respect.

But is it Scriptural? Yes, it is the fulfillment of the Scriptures for it brings into the central foreground the ideal of the Kingdom of God, the central teaching of Jesus. In this light all Scriptural terms take on additional significance. Redemption is thus a far more comprehensive word than most of us have thought; "it encompasses every relation and realm of man's being, it circumscribes a circle which gathers up in its significance the unlimited purpose of God in the world." Thus the man who is completely saved is saved in all his relations, body, mind and spirit, family, church and society and not before. Redemption is a unity, a totality and it means that people are not saved in sections and fragments. The social gospel is fully buttressed in the Scriptures.

ILLUSTRATED BY A STORY.

It is also reasonable. Perhaps a story will impress this truth better than an argument. In a New York kindergarten one winter's morning, a frail, dark-eyed girl stood by the radiator warming her tiny blue and benumbed hands. Pinched by poverty and unutterably sad, she looked up to the teacher and asked:

"Teacher, do you love God?"

"Why yes, dearie, of course I love God," answered the wondering teacher.

"Well, I don't,—I hate Him," was the fierce rejoinder. "He makes the wind blow and I haven't any warm clothes,—He makes it snow and my shoes have holes in them,—He makes it cold and we haven't any fire at home,—He makes us hungry and mama hadn't any bread for our breakfast,—Oh, I hate Him."

A PERTINENT QUESTION.

Tell me what would you do or say to preach the gospel to this girl? How would you turn that hate into love? You know that the first effective message would include warm clothes, nourishing food and comfortable shelter. Now multiply this girl by almost ten million, the number annually in poverty in a land of wondrous plenty, and you have the chief home field at this hour in America. And multiply the message delivered to her by almost ten million and you have the social gospel adequately preached. Starving people, victimized by rampant injustice, are incapable of understanding theological dogmas and their time is too valuable to listen to them. Unmitigated destitution is the only hell thousands of people can think of, and a sufficient supply of food, clothes and fuel, the only heaven they want, immediately. "We cannot make saints in hell," says Batten, and while conditions are as they are it is simply impossible for converts to preserve their integrity. Hence the great losses after evangelistic meetings. Strike off the shackles of economic slavery, the worst of all forms of slavery now existing, and the people will leap forward to hear of the love and care of God. A certain reasoner of old said: "If a brother or sister be naked and in lack of daily food, and one of you say unto them, go in peace, be ye warmed and filled; and yet ye give them not the things needful to the body, what doth it profit?'' And the thousands of empty pews in the land answer nothing. ''The things needful in order,'' that is the burden of the social gospel.

A FORWARD STEP NEEDED.

To survive the swift revolution of the present age, the worship of the church must take on some additional features and trim off those which are a hindrance to the Christian life. The Germans and Italians stated plainly that they did not come to the church where I once ministered because the worship was unintelligible to them. Is the average church service unintelligible only to foreigners? Is it not in many respects out of joint with the times? And if the church chooses to stand apart in worship as in other things, inflexible and unsympathetic, society will go its own way and leave it to its sublime isolation. Miss Ecclesiasticism is expected to be the aggressor in this case and win Mr. Worldly-wiseman. But having his interests neglected, he has gone in search of another spouse, it may be Miss Socialism, or Miss Trade Unionism or possibly Miss Agnosticism. This is a tragedy for all concerned. The preaching of the social gospel will help ''to remove the stuffy air and stuffier ideas of the meeting-house and prevent Christ from becoming a wooden part of a wooden scheme.'' There is a steep dip into fundamentals in such a ministry.

THE CAUSE OF RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

Take the case of religious education. The best Sunday-school ever dreamed of can but be a temporary expedient, a mere ripple on the surface in the religious-education-for-the-young movement. Religion is a part of life; Jesus is the greatest name in history. What foolishness then to pretend to understand social evolution with a prime factor omitted? By resting content with any sort of Sunday-school, the leaders are helping to perpetuate this foolishness. The Sunday-school forces are strong enough, if a determined effect were put forward to put the Bible into the school curriculum where it belongs; this is the goal towards which they should work but of which we hear little. There are those who hold that if the working classes of the country were made dominant in politics tomorrow, they would undertake this particular task at the outset. It would be difficult to suggest a more far-reaching method of home expansion.

We believe in a united discipledom; we believe in a united protestantism; some have dared to believe in a union of protestantism and Catholicism. And these are good and desirable, but they alone will most assuredly not fully recover for the church its oozing power; a simple union would be scarcely less objectionable to the labor party, for example, than any one of the uniting bodies. Something more is needed; a united Christendom is vastly more than a consolidated protestantism, it is a union of all Christo-centric forces and movements whatsoever, ecclesiastical and non-ecclesiastical and it alone is equal to the task of ''Christianizing the social order.'' The destructive forces in society are more than a match for any lesser opponent. It is the splendidly conceived union for which Christ prayed that we must work and not only that which seems possible to us. As Christians we dare hold no lesser ideals as final. But what does this larger union imply?

THE FIRST TASK.

It is agreed by many students of social conditions that the economic system is the chief fortress to be taken in the present campaign against unrighteousness in the land. And, while the church has ''scouted around it, dived under it,'' and ballooned over it or like Saul's army has been in motionless array against it, fearing the attack, the labor movement like the spirited son of Jesse has not been so spineless; it has opened the attack with some very brilliant tactics. While the church hesitates, impetuous Peter Syndicalism snatches up the sword of ''direct action'' and carves off an ear just to show his mettle and as a hint of what may follow. But the time has now come when the church also must attack this last entrenchment of the predatory and unbrotherly spirit, for it is ''the strategical key to the spiritual conquest of the modern world.'' And one of the best methods of attack is by closer cooperation with those movements which have had nerve enough to begin the engagement. Not that the methods of the labor leaders can always be approved but why is ''the more excellent way'' not demonstrated? Is it true that the church has gotten itself into the position of Achan at the conquest of Ai? Must we ask the down-trodden to slip into the bottomless abyss of social injustice and make no noise about it? It would seem clear to penetrating minds that Christianity cannot be Christianity and remain a silent witness of such monstrous social wrongs. This battle for justice has been taken up by organizations outside the church and in an unschooled and often brutal manner they are doing a work for Christ. Why cannot the church work with them to soften their methods and be inspired by their enthusiasm? In their ultimate purpose they are akin to the church; they ''both seek to bring about a psychic change, a moral revolution, first.'' Both are ruled by the conviction that all the world ought to be brothers in fellowship with one another and with the Creative Power; they both desire a spiritual regeneration. At the present time these non-ecclesiastical movements have tremendous power politically, educationally and numerically. If through an exchange of leaders, and agreement on platforms of social amelioration, these forces and the church could be veered towards each other, a mighty work would be started and a mighty tide of enthusiasm would rise up in both.

A NEW CALL FOR UNITY.

In pleading for union, then, the Disciples of Christ can expect no less a consummation for nothing less was in the mind and purpose of Christ; union means this much and vastly more but this much is within our finite view. Our vision of union has been preserved plastic for this great leadership; our creed has remained broad enough and our church organization democratic enough to include all who believe in Christ. These things place upon us the ungainsayable responsibility, and the present frightful social diseases challenge us to captain the movement for uniting Christendom. The times are ripe for a re-affirmation of the call of Jesus to union; they are ripe for us to preach the glad tidings of converted wills, clean bodies, sanitary homes, wholesome cities, righteous politics, the abolition of child-slavery, the annihilation of commercialized vice and every other phase of the gospel of salvation to the uttermost; the times are ripe for us to sound forth the summons to every follower of Christ to make common cause against any and every obstructor of the King's highway.

''BUT WHAT SAYEST THOU?''

(St. John 8:3-11.)

By W. D. Nesbit.

We have saved the soul of the man that killed,
  We have turned to shrive the thief;
We restored the pride of the man that lied
  And we gave him our belief;
But for her that fell have we fashioned hell
  With a faith all stern and just—
It was so of old; and no man has told
  What our Lord wrote in the dust.

We have sighed betimes of our brothers' crimes
  And have bade them be of cheer,
For the flesh is weak, and the soul grown meek
  May yet read its title clear.
But we draw away from the one astray
  As the truly righteous must.
She is cursed, indeed! and we did not read
  What our Lord wrote in the dust.

For the men who thieved, and who killed and lied—
  Who have slain the woman's soul—
We have worked and prayed, and have seen them made
  All clean and all pure and whole.
But we drive her out with a righteous shout
  In our Pharisaic trust.
So the man goes free—but we did not see
  What our Lord wrote in the dust.

The Fountain of the Great Lakes

Chicago Sculptor Tells Origin and Meaning of His New Work.

BY LORADO TAFT.

IT happened in this way. Almost twenty years ago—I remember it was soon after the World's Fair—I was on my way one evening to Evanston, and chanced to sit beside Mr. Burnham. We were talking of the triumphs of that most beautiful of all expositions and Mr. Burnham criticised gently the lack of initiative of our sculptors, remarking that he was sorry that none of us had thought to make a fountain personifying the Great Lakes. I recognized at once the beauty of the suggestion, and felt appropriately ashamed that none of us should have thought of it. Later I made the sketch which has developed in the course of years into the group now completed. There was a long dreary period after the World's Fair; a hopeless eternity of depression and longing, illumined only now and then by the ghoulish hope of a death mask of a prominent citizen and a possible bust.

ARTIST'S NEW ATTITUDE.

It came over me gradually that the coy attitude of our artists—like a girl waiting to be proposed to—was not a success; that while our public needed sculpture it did not know it, and never would guess it unless someone showed it what it wanted! It was high time to visualize some of those pent-up emotions. But sculpture is an expensive craft—it is like architecture in that respect—and its most beautiful dreams are impotent unless you can externalize them. By good fortune I chanced to have at the same moment here in the Art Institute a large class of young people eager for something to do. I began to devise subjects for their united efforts. One year we did the Nymph Fountain which astonished the world. The next year, I think it was, five of my young sculptors made from a sketch of mine the first model of the "Great Lakes." They were less than life size; they were not very good, and being made separately they did not fit together very well. But people liked the idea, and I was encouraged to do them again. I did so, this time doing the work entirely myself, though at intervals between lecture trips and writing and teaching and "death-masquerading." It was a rather desperate time, but there was what musicians call a "leit motif" of hope running through those days and months. When at last the group was finished and exhibited, it found friends, and some never ceased to work for it until the order was assured. This first model was made in my little studio in the Fine Arts Building, a space but little wider than the group, so that I never saw the ends of the composition from any distance. Upon receiving the definite order from the Ferguson Committee I made the group all over again, enlarging the figures from seven and one-half feet to ten feet.

"The Fountain of the Great Lakes" Chicago's New Statuary Group.

THE MOTIF OF THE GROUP.

The motif of the group is not profound. I have sometimes wondered if it were not too obvious. "Lake Superior" on high and "Lake Michigan" on the side both empty into the basin of "Lake Huron," who sends them on to "Lake Erie," whence "Lake Ontario" receives them. As they escape from her basin and hasten into the unknown, she reaches wistfully after them as though questioning whether she has been neglectful of her charge.

Some have thought that my personifications of the Lakes were, or should be, Indians. Naturally the idea suggested itself to me, but was never seriously entertained, since the Indian type of womanhood is hardly our ideal, while a classic Diana in moccasins and feathers —a prettified, characterless Indian—is no longer acceptable in art. Back of this, however, is the feeling that these creatures should be of no time nor race. They are the Danaides of the new world whose immemorial task was solaced for a moment by the canoes and camp-fires of the red-skins.

MR. FERGUSON'S PART.

All my work would have ended where it began had there not come into the plan a man like Mr. Ferguson, a man of means. I never met Mr. Ferguson, but I wish that I had. I remember what a thrill I felt when the significance of his unprecedented benefaction first dawned upon me. I felt that I should have known him. I wanted to thank him personally in the name of all Chicago, the Chicago of today and of the many tomorrows. And I would have thanked him with still greater emotion in the name of Chicago's new school of sculptors which this bequest makes possible—the group of men and women who will bring a fair fame to our city as a direct result of this gift.

I mentioned this desire to a friend who remarked dryly that perhaps it was well that I had not met Mr. Ferguson—if he had heard my wild talk he might have changed his will and left everything to an asylum or library. But whether or no he foresaw the workers as well as the work; whether the sculptors and architects entered into his consciousness, this remains to me the highest cause of enthusiasm and gratitude, that artists are growing up in our midst who shall win for our city recognition in the world of beauty; who shall crown our commercial life as was crowned the commercial life of Athens and Florence and Venice.

CHICAGO'S LACK.

What Chicago lacks, what all our new American cities so deplorably lack, is a background. Our traditions are all before us. Our homes, our streets, our lives are casual. We need something to give us greater solidarity—to put a soul into our community—to make us love this place above all others. This art alone can do. Jane Addams has understood it when she wrote:

"After all, what is the function of art but to preserve in permanent and beautiful form those emotions and solaces which cheer life and make it kindlier, more heroic and easier to comprehend, which lift the mind of the worker from the harshness and loneliness of his task, and by connecting him with what has gone before, free him from the sense of isolation and hardship?"

THE VALUE OF MONUMENTS.

Such is the value of monuments; such is the potency of this ancient awfully permanent art of sculpture. It bears its message through the ages, reaching a hand in either direction, binding together as it were the generations of men. On mouldering stone and corroded bronze we read the aspirations of a vanished race. In the same materials we send our greetings to myriads of souls unborn. There is elation in the thought. It is immortality.

The World Work of Missions

BY CHARLES F. AKED.

IN a recent issue of "The World's Work," there is an article entitled "The Business of Christianizing the World." The article is in itself remarkable; but the really striking thing is that it appears, not in a missionary magazine, but in "The World's Work." One needs a minute or two in which to take in some of the implications of this fact. But there is no escaping the conclusion. The business of Christianizing the nations of the earth is now a part of the world's work! It is not a fad. It is not an amiable weakness on the part of gushing simpletons. It is not a diversion for the idle leisure of maiden ladies of a certain age with more money than sense. It is not even a legitimate outlet for Christian enthusiasm too exalted for this work-a-day life of ours. In the judgment of sober magazine editors and publishers who are not in the editing and publishing business "for their health," missionary enterprise is a substantial part of the world's work.

MISSIONS A BUSINESS.

The writer has made no mistake in talking about "the business of Christianizing the world." He points out that it has long since passed a stage when it could be conducted by a few pastors meeting in the study of some city church. It is now a big business which demands and receives the attention of big business men—the words "big business" used here without their popular connotation of distrust.

Times have changed since the best that Charles Dickens could do to help on the "business of Christianizing the world" was to represent Mrs. Jellyby, "who carried the world in her eye," as intent upon supplying flannel petticoats to the Hottentots and moral pocket handkerchiefs to the native populace of Borrioboola-Gha!

One wonders what Dickens would have said of a "business" whose success enables this "World's Work" writer to report that it was a missionary who first explored Africa and gave the first impetus toward the development and enlightenment of that great dark continent. Within the last few months a missionary made the first complete ascent of Mount McKinley. An American missionary manufactured the first set of movable types for the Chinese, thereby making possible the development of the Chinese newspaper. The jinrikisha comes from the inventive genius of another. More than twenty-five years ago the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions was able to fill a large book of five hundred pages with a record of the contributions of missionaries to science and a second volume of equal size would be necessary to bring the record up to date. The probability is that Dickens would have had to abandon his beloved Cockney and exclaim in pure American that this is "going some!"

VAST WORK DONE.

It is impossible to give the number of hospitals at present maintained by the "business of Christianizing the world." The "World's Work" writer says, safely "more than a thousand." And there are thousands of physicians and surgeons, men and women, engaged in this part of the "business." Dr. Sun Yat Sen received his first training in a missionary hospital. And he is only one of many now prominent in their own countries whose education was begun under similar conditions. This writer asserts that in the new Republic of China a surprisingly large number of city and provincial officials are graduates of the mission schools.

KIPLING ON MISSIONS.

The genius of Kipling has analyzed for us the emotions of a native who sees for the first time an automobile somewhere on the road beyond the Simla Hills. Dr. Patton, just back from India, writes enthusiastically of the utilization of the automobile—"the epitome of modern civilization." He pictures for us Dr. Kate Scudder, out in Southern India: "A finer sight can hardly be imagined than Dr. Scudder returning from one of her medical trips, her touring car, fitted up as a dispensary, loaded down with the garlands of grateful patients she has ministered to along the road. They meet her at designated points, as at a bridge, or under a large tree; and it is an unusual day when she has not treated one hundred such cases and brought back several patients to her excellent hospital at Vellore." And, to go back to the writer in "The World's Work:" In 1900 there was tragic testimony to the success of foreign missionary work in China, for during the Boxer outrages more than thirty thousand Christian converts chose to be killed rather than deny their faith.''

San Francisco, or the religious part of it, is to take a hand in this business of Christianizing the world in 1915. It is probable that a great building, approved by the Exposition management, will be erected on the Fair Ground by the Christian organizations of the country. Here will be arranged exhibits, showing in massive proportions and splendid detail the progress of this great ''business.'' Here will be held meetings for the advocacy of the Christian religion, in which the gospel will be preached by men from all ends of the earth in all the great languages of the world. Of material triumph and artistic achievement the Exposition is assured. Its greatest achievement, its greatest triumph, may yet turn out to be a demonstration to mankind that the effort to Christianize the nations is an essential and inevitable part of the world's work.

The Rural Ministry

A Practical Discussion of a Timely Question.

BY L. E. MURRAY.

THE church has at last awakened to the consciousness of a new demand upon the church and her ministry. The church of to-day must minister to men of to-day. The church must have something on her program besides preaching, praying, singing hymns, and an occasional funeral or wedding. The ministry must have a message and type of service adaptable to every condition and to every type of mind. The same preparation and qualifications will not assure equal success in all fields.

The country church has some problems peculiar to the country. The country minister needs special preparation for his task. He should be just as well educated as the city preacher. He should be as devoted to his work and to his field as the foreign missionary is to his, and esteem his mission of equal importance. In addition to the usual ministerial education he should have some knowledge of the things in which the people he is to serve are interested. He should know something about agriculture and horticulture, of stock and machinery.

OPPORTUNITY FOR THE RURAL MINISTER.

An intelligent student of rural conditions will note the absence of two important factors of prosperous community life that may in a measure be supplied by an efficient minister. There is a lack of leadership and consequently of co-operation. Cities and towns have in their municipal government a kind of leadership provided and a form of co-operation. They have in addition many social and benevolent organizations. These bring people together into groups with a common interest. Laboring men have their unions, merchants and manufacturers their associations through which they express their common interest in the welfare of all. Not so the farmer. The grange which was intended to meet this need has not been generally successful. Moreover, there is a woeful lack of intelligent appreciation of the value of such co-operation. Here is an opportunity for the minister. He may be able to cultivate and lead to expression the desire for organization and co-operation. He can show how industrial interests may thus be conserved and at the same time an opportunity afforded for social intercourse and intellectual culture.

The efficient country minister will also provide for the entertainment of the young people. He will tactfully seek to give direction to their choice of amusement and their reading. The intelligent country minister who would render efficient service will recognize the absolute, imperative necessity of residence in the community he is to serve. The minister who lives forty miles away and comes into the community once a month for a Sunday engagement can not solve the problem of the country church. And yet few country churches have any other service from the minister. The Rev. Warren H. Wilson of the Department of Church and Country Life of the Presbyterian church says, ''It is almost impossible to find ministers who will live in the country with the farmers. Among forty-four churches in one presbytery only two have pastors giving all their time and only four have pastors living at any of the points for which they preach.'' In Ohio it was found that nine-tenths of the ministers of country churches were absentees. Once a month preaching is the prevailing custom.

HIS WORK AN HONORABLE ONE.

The country ministry should be recognized as a specialized ministry, fully as honorable as that of the city, demanding just as strong and fine a man. The minister who would render most effective service in the country must find here an absorbing life mission claiming all his powers and demanding a consecration as thorough and enthusiastic as the call to the foreign mission field. He should recognize his great task as a community builder. He should be able to see that his problem is one of industrial efficiency, economic progress and social co-operation and recreation; that it is a problem of home comfort, of educational equipment for rural life, of personal happiness, of religious vitality and institutional development for community service. With such a conception of his ministry and a proper appreciation of its importance in the wide scope of its influence he may feel a just pride in his position and have a humble consciousness of superior claims to public recognition.

God Is Not Far

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

GOD is not far from any one of us:
The wild flower by the wayside speaks His love;
Each blithesome bird bears tidings from above,
Sunshine and shower His tender mercies prove,
And men know not His voice!

God is not far from any one of us:
He speaks to us in every glad sunrise;
His glory floods us from the noonday skies;
The stars declare His love when daylight dies,
And men know not His voice!

God is not far from any one of us:
He watches o'er His children day and night;
On every darkened soul He sheds His light;
Each burdened heart He cheers, and lends His might
To all who know His voice.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

THE SPIRITUAL LIFE OF THE MISSIONARY.

Part of An Address Made Before the Conference of Foreign Missionaries at the College of Missions.

IT seems like presumption for one like me to attempt to speak to a body of missionaries on this spiritual life—it would be far more fitting for me to sit at your feet and learn of you; but the task was imposed on me by those whom I cannot refuse anything. I am glad, however, to render this service because it gives me an opportunity to express my feeling on a point that is not always emphasized, and that is, that there are many things on the mission field to test a man's spiritual fibre to the straining point, and that the church there is a church militant in a peculiar and trying sense. I once asked Mrs. G. L. Wharton what was the hardest thing she had to endure in India, thinking she would tell of some of her experiences in the great famine, through which she had recently passed; but she said it was the ever-present atmosphere of evil, as though Satan, the great adversary himself, was always at hand. We sometimes fail to appreciate this terrible oppression from the surrounding mass of heathenism, with its constant suggestion of low and degrading ideals. And how especially hard to train children in such an environment! With what heartfelt fervor must the missionary utter that petition, "Deliver us from evil—or the evil one!"

TESTS OF CHARACTER MET.

And in the community life we find in some of our stations, where a number live together in the same bungalow, there are often testing conditions to Christian character. Because people are good, it does not necessarily follow that they are congenial, and the fine art of living harmoniously and happily together is not always of easy attainment. Eccentricities, a hasty tongue, a quick temper, fault finding, lack of adaptability, all come to light in the close contact of daily intercourse.

With this depressing isolation from Christian surroundings, with this stifling atmosphere of heathenism always encompassing him, the missionary must know how to endure great strain with equanimity, and to maintain a high level of spiritual life, so that he may be at once a pattern and a guide to those to whom he ministers.

SPIRITUAL LIFE IN THE HOME CHURCHES.

I would also emphasize the necessity of a deepening of the spiritual life in the home church as a contributing force to the spiritual life of the missionary. In these days of frequent furloughs, and of missionary contact between the homeland and the mission field, the spiritual pulse of the western churches is making itself felt over the whole world. If our missionaries are to be fitly and fully prepared to convince the world, they must go forth from churches in which the spirit of Christ is evidently at work.

THE DUTY OF THE CHURCH.

Is it not, then, the perennial duty of the church of our day, and of all days, to search itself, and see if it be growing in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ? Every thoughtful person must recognize a danger in conventionalizing and limiting Christian virtues to a certain set of qualities. The decadence in the Jewish church seemed to consist in such over-emphasis on a certain kind of loyalty to their form of worship and its traditions, mainly along lines of outward observance, that they almost lost the old prophetic ideal of "doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly with their God." What more terrible arraignment and philippic in all literature, than Jesus' denunciation of the religious leaders of His day! And yet his most scathing words were not against gross and outstanding sins, but against things that were masquerading as religious virtues—against their form of long prayers, of fasting, of Sabbath observance, their love of chief seats in the synagogues, their very gifts to the support of their worship, not because they were too small, but because the motive of the giver was wrong.

Miss Emma Lyon, missionary, whose thrilling experiences in China were reported in a recent issue of this paper.

The most subtle peril, the most deadly blight that can attack the spiritual life of the church, is the danger of falling into the formalism of Pharaseeism, of emphasizing the outward semblance of the religious life, rather than the deep things of justice, mercy and faith. It is so easy, so natural, seemingly, to place the emphasis on regularity of church attendance and contribution to church finance—on things that minister to the outward minds of the local congregation, rather than on heart-searching teachings of the attitude of its members to their God and their fellowman. One might attend every service of his church, might give to its support, might lead in its prayers even, and do it for a selfish and sinister purpose, as the Pharisees did it—and Jesus called them "Sons of hell," and said that publicans and sinners would enter into the kingdom of heaven before them.

THE SUBSTANCE, NOT THE SHADOW.

So, in approaching the spiritual life of the missionary or of anyone, we must try to deal with the substance and not the shadow. The commission on The Preparation of the Missionary in its report to the Edinburgh Conference says, "Methods of religious thought and expression are changing, and we must recognize this change, if we are to maintain our hold on our ablest young men and women today." To express this life in pietistic terms is not enough—the garb, the phrase, the outward observance of Christian routine is insufficient—something more sincere and searching is demanded by the clear thought and clear eyes of today. We find this report warning against such fundamental lacks, as "inability to work with others, low ideals of honor in practical matters, failure to pay one's debt, straightforward sincerity," and it is especially emphatic on the necessity for self-control, and says, "No man, who cannot control his temper, can hope to exert spiritual influence in the mission field." These are the homely, every-day virtues, that we do not always include in the category of the spiritual life, but we must have them, before we can pass on to higher ground. Because they are the ideals of so-called worldly persons, is no reason we should undervalue them. My ideal of the Christian man is, that he should possess every virtue of the world, in the amenities of life, in veracity, in integrity, in honor, and should add to them all the graces of the indwelling spirit of God, until his life is changed into the very image of the Lord Jesus Christ.

THREE GRACES OF THE SPIRITUAL LIFE.

The Edinburg Commission on Preparation of Missionaries mentions three graces of the spiritual life which are indispensable in the missionary. The first of these is Docility, for a missionary more than most men needs the peculiar grace that belongs to a teachable spirit. Capacity for growth at any time depends on willingness to learn. This is preeminently true of the young missionary; no matter what his preparation before he goes to the field, his attitude to his senior colleagues should always show the humility, the hopefulness of the patient learner, entering a new and strange environment.

The report says of the second quality, that it is not easy to find an English equivalent for it, but for want of a fuller word it names it Gentleness. Possibly a better phrase for it would be Matthew Arnold's "Sweet reasonableness." It is at the very root of adaptability; it is the spirit of courtesy and forbearance, which produces the right attitude toward alien races, strange customs, and unfamiliar conditions of life; there is no place in the world where personal adaptability is more difficult and important than on the mission fields of Asia.

The third quality emphasized is Sympathy. The tact which comes from gentleness and forbearance is sufficient to prevent giving offense, but the secret of personal influence, the power that wins, is the capacity for sympathy. It was Paul's power of identifying himself with every class and every race, of being "all things to all men," that opened men's hearts to his gospel. The habit of generous and intelligent appreciation of the glories of an ancient civilization, of the childlike and often Christlike elements in the character of the backward races, must be cultivated, as well as the sense of their compelling need for the gospel of our Saviour and our Lord. HOBSON FOR UNITED STATES SENATOR.

JUST how slightly political party lines ought to be held in the presence of a moral issue or a candidate representing positive moral progress is beautifully illustrated in the the candidacy of Captain Richmond P. Hobson for the United States senatorship from Alabama. Captain Hobson is now congressman from his district, and upon the recent death of Senator Johnson announced his desire to succeed him. Under the recent amendment to the Federal Constitution the selection of a successor will be by a state-wide popular election, for both the unexpired and the regular term.

Congressman Hobson's candidacy is being opposed by a combination of the basest forces of his state, including, of course, the liquor interests there and the federated liquor interests of the whole nation. Anybody who ever heard Capt. Hobson's temperance lecture—and hundreds of thousands have heard it—know what a tremendous force for the anti-saloon cause he would be if elevated to the Senate.

Ex-Governor J. Frank Hanly, of Indiana, has stepped boldly forward from the ranks of his Republican affiliation to declare that Hobson, the Democrat, ought by all means to be elected and that right-thinking men and women the whole country over should send contributions to E. L. Clarkson, secretary and treasurer of the Hobson Senatorial Campaign, Tuscaloosa, Ala., to see that he is elected. This is the way Gov. Hanly talks:

> Captain Hobson is a Democrat and I am a Republican, but I am so profoundly convinced that his election to the Senate will be a victory of such stupendous importance to the cause of temperance and ultimate national prohibition of the beverage liquor traffic, that I gladly waive all political differences and make common cause with him in his fight down there. His in signal measure is the Nation's fight, and is, therefore, our fight. It is not right that he should be left without support to meet the odds arrayed against him. If we want defenders for the temperance cause, we must go to the rescue of our defenders when they are assailed.

That is good doctrine, and we hope every enemy of the liquor traffic will have a part in bringing victory to Hobson, hero of the Merrimac and hard battler for the purest and highest social ideals.

TURNING LUMBER INTO BRONZE.

THE dedication of the Fountain of the Great Lakes was an event of unusual significance. The wide esplanade south of Chicago's Art Institute was filled with a large throng while Lorado Taft, the sculptor, told the story of the monument, and the president of the Art Institute presented it to the City of Chicago. It is the first of many monuments to be erected out of the income from a million dollar legacy.

The picture of the monument in this issue shows its general design. The five figures are grouped so that Superior pours her waters into Huron, Michigan also emptying into Huron from the side, Huron pours into Erie, and Erie with outstretched hand points where the river flows in far distance into the sea. The design has the merit of extreme simplicity; it is almost a personified map of the five great lakes; but it is characterized by dignity, strength and lasting beauty.

A city is often known by the historic places it possesses. Too many American cities have no historic background and remain unnoticed and unsung. There are few great events in the history of Chicago, for instance, which are of wide significance. The most important characteristic of Chicago is the city itself—unless it be its citizens. But a city in order to be great requires more than territory, buildings, business and inhabitants—it must possess a soul. A recent writer has declared that Chicago is striving to save its soul. One of the ways in which this worthy task is being pursued is by the widespread effort to make the city more beautiful. A unique agency for increasing the outward beauty of Chicago is a fund amounting to over $1,000,000 provided by a bequest of the late Mr. B. F. Ferguson, a former Chicago merchant. He sailed the great lakes, he bought and sold lumber, he unostentatiously saved his money. His will directed that after the payment of certain annuities the entire income should be paid to the Art Institute of Chicago, and entirely and exclusively expended by it under the direction of its board of trustees in the erection and maintenance of enduring statuary and monuments, in whole or in part of stone, granite or bronze, in the parks, along the boulevards or in other public places within the city of Chicago, commemorating worthy men or women of America, or important events of American history. The cultivated imagination of this far-seeing man is turning his plain lumber into enduring bronze. The first evidence of this modern miracle, which is not only by the alchemy of sentiment creating beauty out of commerce but is a notable contribution to the external beauty of the city, is the splendid Fountain of the Great Lakes, dedicated Sept. 9. The fountain gives evidence of the poetic idealism of the art of the sculptor, Lorado Taft. It is one of the first of many such works which will help to make Chicago beautiful as well as big.

It is also a prophetic illustration of the way in which rich men can be idealists as well as men of practical affairs.

THE COMMON PEOPLE.

THAT WEIRD, uncanny philosopher, Nietzsche, whose brain reeled and gave way under the strain of his sometimes profound and sometimes erratic thinking, held that as human life had risen from lower stages to its present condition, so humanity as we know it is only an evanescent stage in the process of evolution, and that we are yet to develop a "superman" far greater than the greatest of human beings past or present. This thesis has been popularized in the plays and writings of Bernard Shaw, and we now hear much about the coming "superman." Let him come. There will be work enough for him.

But we shall not be here to witness the deeds of the superman. Indeed, we much doubt his coming. The human body was arrested long ago. The superman will have to get on with much such a body and much such a brain as we have. We will not dogmatize about him; we are entirely willing he should come. But for a long time the world will have to get on as best it can with men and women. Let us hope they will be stronger in body and mind than we, and better in every way, but they will be genuinely human, and not superhuman.

We have to deal, not with supermen, but with men; and the majority of them are commonplace men.

It gives us a momentary shock to learn that the people who most nearly appreciated Jesus were the common people. It was not the learned who discerned the wisdom of His utterances. It was not the theologians who recognized the soundness of His theology. It was not the professional philanthropists who best interpreted His constant deeds of mercy. The common people best loved Him, and most nearly understood Him.

THE PROPHETS.

IN THE Boston Public Library is Sargent's famous mural painting of the Prophets, a composition which has been photographed and half-toned all over the country and the world. It is a work of marvelous technic, but as a work of spiritual interpretation it is a ghastly caricature. It is no more true to life than the stock stage clergyman—a pale, side-whiskered gentleman without enough backbone to ask for a second lump of sugar in his coffee. The prophets were men of their time, strong, virile, red-blooded men. They were far-sighted political economists; they were wise conservators of public interests. Above all, they were men of vision, able to interpret to their own people the spiritual significance of the age in which they were living.

The worst thing about Sargent's painting is its popularity. It either answers to the general idea of what the prophets were, or it finds the public mind such a vacuum on that subject that it is ready to adopt the idea. So there stands on many a mantel, and is hung in many a hall, that hideous row of howling dervishes, chiefly studies in drapery. Does any one suppose that pallid, haggard, bloodless men like those could have stirred the moral depths of their own time and created ideals which have remade the world?

The prophets were preachers of righteousness, guided by the Spirit of God to interpret God to their own generation, and to find the spiritual truth of current events in the life of the world.

The world has small need of priests, but it has perpetual need of men of the prophetic mind and heart.

DOWN WITH THE SALOON.

THE FIFTEENTH Annual National Convention of the Anti-Saloon League to be held in Columbus, Ohio, November 10 to 13, promises to be the greatest assembly ever convened by the Church of Christ in opposition to the power of the saloon. Governors, senators, members of Congress, bishops, clergymen and men of affairs, with the great host of women who publish the tidings, will be there arrayed against the power of the saloon. Let the Church of Christ rally to this great convocation. May the powers of evil tremble at the assembled might of the hosts of the Lord.

SUCCESS AND BELIEF.

"SUCCESS is the science of being believed in," says Gerald Stanley Lee. Salesmanship is successful when the representative of a business house wins the confidence of possible purchasers both in himself and in his goods. Successful teaching rests on confidence in the integrity of the teacher and in the worth of the truth. In the work of a church especially is success founded upon mutual confidence. The minister who has brought his congregation to the place where they believe in him and in his message has succeeded. Jesus is the great example of success won through confidence. The ultimate fact in the triumph of the gospel is belief in Christ. Success is grounded in personal faith.

RELIGIOUS PAPERS.

GONE is the day when a newspaper can maintain itself by appeal to the abstract principle that "there ought to be a religious paper in every home," or on the assumption that "one owes it to his denomination to take the denominational paper."

Both of these propositions are true, especially the first one. But neither one is a good and convincing reason why a person should subscribe for the particular paper that urges it.

A denominational paper may narrow the vision of its readers and contract their sympathies.

It may foster a state of mind obstructive of the great forward-flowing tides of God's spirit in the modern world.

If it does, it is nobody's duty to take it, but everybody's duty not to take it.

And a paper may be religious enough but so dull that it makes the members of the family think of religion and the Church as dry and juiceless matters. If it fills its pages with local parish gossip in order to make the appearance of being a great NEWS-paper, its effect on the minds of its readers—if readers really read these padded pages—is vitiating.

Subscribers have a right to expect their religious papers to be interesting, color-full, graphic, broad-visioned, discriminating, interpretative of the great things of the world and of the soul.

The average religious paper has conceived its ideal in terms of harmlessness. It must do nobody any harm. It must suggest nothing new. It must reflect the consensus of opinion —it must not have positive opinions of its own that vary from this consensus.

But that day is gone. The sense of duty will no longer support the religious press.

If a paper succeeds it must be because it helps people and because they like it.

MRS. PANKHURST.

THE VISIT OF Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst to America has awakened a considerable degree of interest, favorable and otherwise. She represents the aggressive, militant wing of the suffrage movement in England. There are many American suffragists who seem to believe that their Amazonian sisters across the Atlantic have been justified in the militant measures they have taken to attract attention, and that the destruction of property and the endangering of life are quite justifiable in so excellent a cause. It was regrettable that Mrs. Pankhurst was detained by the immigration authorities. There was no reason why she should not have been admitted promptly, to speak in America with entire freedom, even though the vast majority of American suffragists have no sympathy with the anarchistic methods of a small section of their British sisters. We believe that the cause of woman's franchise will win in England in spite of these outbreaks of misdirected energy. The Kingdom of Heaven has suffered violence from the beginning, and the violent have tried to take it by force. But in the end it is only education of the public mind that can win victories. Mrs. Pankhurst is a most ladylike and engaging speaker, and under the spell of her eloquence it is easy to see how women might be swept away into the actions which have brought discredit upon their name. There are great causes which need championing, and some of those interested have felt at times that violence was justified in the effort to arouse public attention. But neither the hatchet in the fight with the saloon nor the hammer in the effort to secure suffrage can ever advance these causes in the minds of balanced and impartial citizens.

HOW LONG MUST COLLEGES WAIT?

IT IS APPARENT that with the increasing emphasis placed upon beneficence in our churches, and the larger offerings now being gathered for missionary ends, there is imperative need of a crusade in behalf of educational endowment. Our colleges have too long waited for the opening of the large resources which the churches command.

Every enterprise in which the Disciples are interested depends upon educated young men and women. A campaign to secure five millions of dollars to adequately endow our colleges ought to be started at once. We have already raised one million for the equipment of our foreign missions. Two and a half millions more are contemplated as the imperative need of our united missionary work. Not less than five millions will satisfy the absolute necessities of those colleges among us which have a right to claim the regard of our churches, and to hope for a permanent equipment.

We hope to see the educational leaders among the Disciples unite in such an effort as will dignify the cause of education among us, and will obviate the necessity for individual and competitive canvassing, which so frequently fails of results.

A UNITED MISSIONARY MAGAZINE.

PROSPECTS FOR a united missionary magazine are brightening. The value of such a monthly exponent of all our missionary and philanthropic interests would be very great. The experience of those religious bodies that have tried this plan is assuring. Such a magazine would command a type of contribution and an attention from the rank and file of the Disciples that none of the separate journals published by the boards could ever gain. More than this, the constituency of such a magazine, being so much larger than that of any of the individual journals, would secure an education on all departments of our work which it is impossible at the present time to provide.

The editor who has been tentatively selected for this responsible work is in every way worthy of the position, and may be trusted to place such a journal in a conspicuous rank in missionary literature. We hope the boards may early agree upon the plan, and that it may be launched at no distant day.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

MANY are the rules that have been prepared for attaining happiness. Perhaps no rule is quite capable of general use. But I have today run across an illuminating formula that is fertile with suggestion. It comes pretty nearly going to the root of the matter, as well as a rule can.

I say as well as a rule can, because I am well aware that no rule, no maxim, can give us happiness. What we lack who are restless and discontented, or contented without being happy, is not a new rule but a new dynamic. Many souls possess a life of great richness and peace and deep gladness who have never had formulated for them the rule they live by.

But there are other souls who have been started wrong or have fallen into a self-regarding way of life, whose instinct for finding the great ends worth living for has been diverted, if indeed it was ever awakened. These souls often come into revolutionary experiences—of pain, of disappointment, perhaps of a deep-going love, that bring confusion and disillusionment into their little self-world. Suddenly such souls awake to find how empty their little life is, how really unhappy they are, and they want to know how to find happiness.

Amid the confusion of their inner life a rule, a formula, may help to guide their awakened spiritual impulses and interpret to them the true ends in whose attainment happiness also is found.

SUCH a prescription I found today, and I have been reflecting on it as applicable to the lives of most of us who go stumbling more or less selfishly along through life missing so much of its meaning.

"To cultivate the sympathies all the time and keep doing something useful"—this is the simple formula which I found in a novel I am in the midst of. The book is that very popular story, "V. V.'s Eyes."

A bit of philosophy in a novel has to be pretty gripping to deflect my interest from the plot. I confess that it is only by the exercise of considerable effort—intellectual conscience, you might call it—that I have overcome the childhood habit of "skipping" the descriptive or moralizing paragraphs so as to take up the thread of the tale which, I almost invariably discovered, I could pick up neatly enough in the short, juicy-looking sentences of conversation following these arid wastes of description or philosophy.

But this formula, appearing casually in a conversation between the serious young doctor and the gay society girl, seemed to pin itself to my brain, and so I have closed the book, letting the love-story take care of itself for a time, while I talk with your readers, Mr. Editor, about our "great task of happiness."

That word of Robert Louis Stevenson's which makes happiness a "task" for every one of us to work at is the secret presupposition of Dr. V. V.'s rule. Most of us are under the delusion that happiness lies along the way of indulgence, not along the way of stressful labor. But this girl is going to find out—I can only conjecture, but it is, I am satisfied, a safe guess—that happiness is attainable for her, only by an effortful direction of her impulses, a conscious investment of herself in others' lives and a deliberate forgetting of herself.

WHAT a wonderful world it would be if, some morning, every one of us should wake up determined to work this day at the great task of winning happiness! To really work at it, not just hope to slide into it. To set oneself at it with as much purpose as a farmer sets himself at the task of plowing his field. If we went at happiness that way we should all be inquiring in dead earnest: How shall I make myself happy? Where is the road that brings me out at the place where I can say in full truth, at the end of the day: It has been a good day, and I am glad that I spent its hours just as I did!

Dr V. V.'s rule discovers for us this road and takes us a long way upon it, if it does not bring us fully to the end.

"To cultivate the sympathies" is the first thing. Our world is just as big as our sympathies. By sympathy is not meant merely sentimental pity. Pity may inhere in specific cases of sympathy, but the latter is a much bigger experience than is denoted by pity. Sympathy means an imaginative grasp of the facts—the human facts—of the case. It means insight into the inner life of people, enabling one to "feel with" them.

How we differ from one another in our ability to enter into other people's lives! There are great-souled women and men of our acquaintance who always see the human side of a situation before anybody else does. If a boy is disobedient at school they see more than the lad and the broken law. They see his home life, the kind of discipline or license he has there; they feel the adolescent impulses that stir in him and they act toward him in the light of this sympathetic knowledge. Whereas the person of duller sympathies sees only the lad and the broken law, and judges mechanically.

OUR contacts with people are mainly in the outermost zones of their lives. Social conventions and the instinct of self-protection keep people from turning their warmer side out to the world's touch. And then there is, on our part, the habit of classifying people and reckoning with them as members of a class rather than as personalities with feelings and purposes like our own.

This is the great difficulty of our moral life: the difficulty of vividly conceiving other people and treating them as having a warm, insistent, passionate inner life JUST LIKE OUR OWN.

That was the fault of the young society woman whose soul Dr. V. V. seems (at the point I have reached in the book) about to awaken. She talked a great deal about "the poor." But she knew no poor PEOPLE. She never entered imaginatively into the soul of a poor PERSON. She mapped off a great section of humanity under the category of "the poor," but it never occurred to her that "the poor" were poor PERSONS who had precisely the same stirrings in their breasts that she had in hers.

She therefore lived in a very narrow self-world which was bound to be invaded now and then by fugitive hints and echoes from a larger world which would make her restless and wistful and unhappy. And soon or late there was bound to be an idea, or an experience, or some person, that would either gradually or abruptly shiver her little self-world through and through.

It looks as if something like this is about to happen now in this young woman's life, and the doctor tells her that her salvation lies in the enrichment of her sympathies and in keeping herself doing something useful.

OUR sympathies can be cultivated. The habit of taking the human point of view in our relationship with people can be cultivated just like any other habit. We can teach ourselves to think of the "butcher and baker and candlestick-maker," not as mere symbols of the things we get from them, but as human beings with a warm inner life of their own. And we will be surprised what a glow this attitude will bring to our souls in all our dealings with them.

I often sit in the street car and try to construct in my imagination the home life and the personal inward life of the men and women who come into the car. At times I have carried this process so far that, instinctively, I felt on leaving the car that I must say good-day to the care-worn lady opposite me, or the man with the knitted brow, or the kindly-faced man whom I pictured as having been a scatterer of kindness in his neighborhood all his life, so friendly had I become with them in my imagination.

This habit of admitting people clear into your soul, of peopling your imagination with them and their interests—this is the best thing in life. With it goes a wonderful sense of the expansion of one's world. It banishes cynicism and selfishness, the twin foes of healthy joy. And it brings happiness to one's soul.

It brings happiness provided there goes with this imaginative sympathy a systematic practical doing of kind deeds—"something useful," Dr. V. V. says. There is always a reaction where the imagination is indulged without doing something.

Happiness begins within, in our sympathies, our human appreciations, our sense of being part and parcel of the warm human lives that touch us; but it matures and maintains itself in overt deeds of service, in the practical virtues of neighborliness and love.

May all your readers, Mr. Editor, thus seek life's highest good, and seeking thus be not disappointed!

CONGREGATIONAL COUNCIL EPOCH-MAKING.

"Not with a shout and cheer, not with the exultation of victory, but with the solemn hush which betokened humble submission to the Divine guidance," the National Council of the Congregational Church, meeting at Kansas City, Mo., approved the report of the Commission of Nineteen on Polity, which for the past three years has been conducting a referendum on the proposed advance steps in organization and polity urged by progressive leaders of the church.

In last week's issue of The Christian Century mention was made of four proposals, which would be presented to the Council by the Commission. Of these, three were passed with practically not one dissenting voice, the fourth being carried over for future consideration.

Powers of Council Enlarged.

Up to the present time the Council has had very little influence in determining the policies of the church. By the adoption of the following resolution a significant advance was made in its power:

"The purpose of the National Council is to foster and express the substantial unity of the Congregational churches in faith, polity, and works; to consult upon and devise measures and maintain agencies for the promotion of their common interests; to co-operate with any corporation or body under control of or affiliated with the Congregational churches, or any of them; and to do and to promote the work of the Congregational churches of the United States in their national, international and interdenominational relations."

Commission of Missions Provided.

A second proposal of the Commission of Nineteen was for a Commission on Missions, which should keep in touch with all the societies and make such proposals as it deemed wise to the National Council.

The Commission was provided for, whose duties are, according to the resolution: "To consider the work of the home and foreign societies, to prevent duplication of missionary activities, to effect all possible economies in administration, and to seek to correlate the work of the several societies so as to secure the maximum of efficiency with the minimum of expense. It shall have the right to examine the annual budgets of the several societies and have access to their books and records. It may freely give its advice to the said societies regarding problems involved in their work, and it shall make recommendations to the several societies when, in its judgment their work can be made more efficient or economical."

Enlarged Secretaryship.

The powers of the Secretary were greatly enlarged, among his duties being: To serve as Secretary of the Commission on Missions; to advise in matters of polity and constructive organization, and, with the Moderator, to represent the Council and the churches in interdenominational relations.

The New Creed.

Though Governor Baldwin, of Connecticut, proposed the cutting out from the Commission's report of the "declaration of faith," the new creed was adopted, in the following form:

FAITH.

"We believe in God the Father, infinite in wisdom, goodness, and love; and in Jesus Christ, his Son, our Lord and Saviour, who for us and our salvation lived and died and rose again and liveth evermore; and in the Holy Spirit, who taketh of the things of Christ and revealeth them to us, renewing, comforting, and inspiring the souls of men. We are united in striving to know the will of God as taught in the "Holy Scriptures, and in our purpose to walk in the ways of the Lord, made known or to be made known to us. We hold it to be the mission of the Church of Christ to proclaim the Gospel of all mankind, exalting the worship of the one true God, and laboring for the progress of knowledge, the promotion of justice, the reign of peace, and the realization of human brotherhood. Depending, as did our fathers, upon the continued guidance of the Holy Spirit to lead us into all truth, we work and pray for the transformation of the world into the kingdom of God; and we look with faith for the triumph of righteousness and the life everlasting.

POLITY.

"We believe in the freedom and responsibility of the individual soul, and the right of private judgment. We hold to the autonomy of the local church and its independence of all ecclesiastical control. We cherish the fellowship of the churches, united in district, state and national bodies, for counsel and co-operation in matters of common concern.

THE WIDER FELLOWSHIP.

"While affirming the liberty of our churches, and the validity of our ministry, we hold to the unity and catholicity of the Church of Christ, and will unite with all its branches in hearty co-operation; and will earnestly seek, so far as in us lies, that the prayer of our Lord for his disciples may be answered, that they all may be one."

METHODIST MEN MEET.

At least two big ideas were before the convention of Methodist men, in session at Indianapolis last week, prohibition of the liquor traffic and world-wide missions.

Enthusiasm reached its highest point when a response to an address on "A Call for Advice in the Temperance Work" was made by Clarence True Wilson of Topeka, Kas. Applause followed nearly every paragraph.

"There is a better chance now," Mr. Wilson declared, "to get a prohibition amendment to the national constitution through both houses of congress than there was two years ago to get the Webb interstate commerce law through."

Dr. Wilson declared that President Taft waited until the last minute, when he hoped there would be no time for reconsideration before vetoing the Webb liquor bill, and said that his administration "went down to defeat beneath an avalanche of indignant protest, such as never has been duplicated in the United States."

"A great Christian leader is Secretary of State now," continued Dr. Wilson. "Our former Secretary of State used to send out letters to all American consuls, notifying them of brewers' conventions and ordering them to investigate and see what they could do to increase the exportation of American beers to their country. William J. Bryan will never do that."

After leaving C. A. Rowland, representing the Southern Presbyterians, A. E. Cory, representing the Disciples, and J. Campbell White, representing the United Presbyterians, tell of what their churches had accomplished in missions, the delegates separated into nineteen sectional meetings, each representing the territory of a bishop. At each meeting were discussed the propositions for the enlargement of the church, especially the new financial plan introduced in the convention.

A striking statement made by J. Campbell White was that if 15,000,000 of the 23,000,999 of Protestant church members in America would give as much per member, $3.50, as the United Presbyterians did last year, there would be funds enough to evangelize the world in the present generation.

Mr. Cory said the reduction of the sale of opium in China from $220,000,000 a year to less than $20,099,999 in five years was due to the efforts of Christian missionaries in China.

GENERAL CONVENTION A DEADLOCK?

On the face of the reports it appears that the General Convention of the Episcipal Church was a deadlock convention. It is conceded by the newspapers of the church that "the two Houses differed on rather more measures than usual," but accounts for that fact by mentioning the unwieldy size of the House of Deputies. It is elsewhere declared that "if there was not much that could be called vital legislation, it need be no matter either for surprise or for disappointment. The machinery of the church ought not to be materially altered once in three years."

As a more complete report will probably be given next week, it is enough to state here that the name of the church was not changed at this session; nor was a separate episcopate provided for the negroes; nor did the Bishops approve the resolution of the Deputies to accept the platform of the Federal Council of Churches, and thereby to constitute the Protestant Episcopal Church one of the affiliated bodies in that organization.

Some Worth-While Reading

BY EDGAR DeWITT JONES.

FOR all of ten years I have spent a part of my vacation in reading the best of the current books. Given a good book and a shady nook, and the long slow hours of a summer day in the country pass by with incredible swiftness. The best preparation for reading contemporary literature is the careful study of a discriminating book review column. In this way, men and women who are too busy or too wise to read even a little of the annual output of fiction, get their literary bearings. There are a few magazines in the land, the book reviews alone of which are worth their subscription price. A careful reader of the reviews of Arthur Gordon in "The Christian Century" will soon come to have a valuable knowledge of "what's what" among the new books, even if he should never so much as open a single volume. As a matter of fact, however, the average reader of book reviews opens many volumes in the course of a year. Of my summer reading for 1913 there are four books that I deem worthy of special mention.

"V. V.'S EYES."

No book of recent years has received such praise from the reviewers as this volume by Henry Sydnor Harrison, whose first popular success was "Queed." To begin with, this book has a title that is nothing if not unusual and striking. The reader may say he does not like the title, but he can not get away from the originality thereof and a really striking title, other things being equal, is half the battle of a best seller or a successful play. V. V.'s Eyes has much to commend it, despite of, or besides, its title—just as you prefer.

I opened V. V.'s Eyes at 8 o'clock on an August morning and with but two closings of the same, I finished the volume at 6:30 post meridian that very day. The volume is bulky, 509 pages in all, but the story is compelling in fascination from first to last. V. Vivian, M. D. is the hero, and a hero of finer grain was never made. He is as lovable as he is quaint and useful. He limps a trifle when he walks and his eyes—Oh, his eyes are wonderful! They see so far, so high, so deep! V. V. is a lover of all men and incidentally of one woman especially. The new social passion is in this book. The cry of the poor and the undone is in one's ears as he reads the book, and likewise the cheery answering cry of help is also heard. There is just a suggestion of the quaint, whimsicalness of "Queed" in V. V.'s character, only V. V. is twice the man that Queed was, and that is saying something. I do not marvel because of this book's success. There is every good reason for it. This story stirs; it is big and vital throughout.

I can not but believe that every one who reads this book will experience a rising respect for social reformers in general and the V. V. type in particular. V. V., in the end, after cruel misunderstanding and not a little scorn and much real suffering, is—but no, it would not be fair to tell what happened to this Prince of Heroes. That the reader must find out for himself at the end of this book, one of the biggest and best stories of the season.

"THE SOUTHERNER."

I read this book not because I care over much for Thomas Dixon's literary style, or the subject matter of his books, but because I was informed that here was a new Lincoln story. In truth Mr. Dixon has done in this book for Mr. Lincoln from the viewpoint of a staunch southerner what Col. Henry Watterson did for the great war president on the lecture platform; he has claimed him as a true son of the South and her greatest and best friend. Mr. Dixon gives his story two scenes as follows: First, "A Cabin in the Wood," second; "The White House."

In the first he shows the backwoods cabin of Tom and Nancy Hanks Lincoln before the boy was born and during his boyhood days on up to the time of his mother's death. The story is interesting to me chiefly because of the witness it bears to the transfiguration of Abraham Lincoln by all sections of our now Reunited Republic. Mr. Dixon claims in his foreword that "every word relating to the issues of our national life has been drawn from authentic records in my possession." I fancy that sooner or later there will be some interesting discussions over this feature of Mr. Dixon's latest book. But the spirit of the work is admirable and the eulogy the completest imaginable. Witness this closing paragraph:

"The curtains of the box in Ford's theatre were softly drawn apart by an unseen hand. The angel of death entered, paused at the sight of the smile on his rugged face, touched the drooping shoulders, called him to take the place he had won among earth's immortals and left to us the gentlest memory of our world."

The book is dedicated to "our first southern-born president since Lincoln, my friend and college mate, Woodrow Wilson."

"THE INSIDE OF THE CUP."

This is the latest of Mr. Winston Churchill's rather long list of widely read novels, all having the letter C prominent in the title line. This is a tale of the church and the ministry and the new conscience on methods of building fortunes upon which the white light of scrutiny is now playing remorselessly. This book is already the most talked of book of the season and interest in it continues to grow. The story centers about the rector and the wealthiest man in his parish, whose fortune has been made by methods which his pastor cannot reconcile with the teaching of Jesus. Theology plays a part in the story, particularly the kind labeled as "new." The book is a serious study of modern conditions as they bear upon organized Christianity. A weakness of this strong story would seem to be, not the minister's indictment of his millionaire parishioner, which is splendidly brave and true to the facts in his possession, but rather to his unbending and almost pharisaical attitude toward the millionaire who at once showed out and out hostility to the minister's social views. How this could be otherwise is the natural question. If John Hodder had dealt with Banker Parr, after the way and spirit of V. Vivian, M. D., one wonders if perhaps the rector might not have converted him after all. However this might have been, "The Inside of the Cup" is a strong story, vital and in parts thrilling, and it deals with a problem, a peril and a menace very much alive, though fighting for its life at this hour. Every minister should read this book through twice, the first time rapidly, the second slowly and with pencil in hand.

"THE HEART OF LIFE."

This volume is from the French of Pierre de Coulevain, who by the way is a woman and apparently coming into considerable vogue. "On the Branch" is one of her popular successes and "The Heart of Life" is selling widely. The book is not fiction, strictly speaking, though there is a slight and interesting love story wrought skilfully into the background. The charm of this book is the delightful conversational style that characterizes it from the first to the last page. The author is a philosopher and possesses a wholesome view of life. Christian Science, the Bible, marriage, love—all come in for brilliant and epigrammatic commentation. There are some fine passages of description in the book, which is to be expected since five of the six chapters center about some picturesque watering places. Concerning the philosophy of this readable volume consider this excerpt from page five:

"Life is stronger than death and hope never really leaves even those who commit suicide. The sigh of departure is perhaps as mechanical as the cry on arrival."

And here follows the author's closing paragraph:

"Others and still others later on will take up the unfinished task, and in the triumph of the one who attains the goal, will be the triumph of all those who have made the venture. In the glory of the one who sees God will be the glory of all those who have sought Him; for here below, and everywhere throughout the whole universe, everything is linked together, everything holds together, and as Frances Thompson, the English philosopher-poet, so marvelously puts it:

"That thou canst not stir a flower
Without troubling a star."

This is a capital volume to have lying around handy, the same to be taken up any time, opened anywhere and read as long as you are in the mood.

To these four worth while books I should like to add "My Little Sister" by Elizabeth Robins, a harrowing yet necessary account of the peril of the social evil. Of this book some one has said: "It is to White Slavery what Uncle Tom's Cabin was to Black Slavery."

Of Human Interest

Janet, Higher Critic.

Mayor Gaynor, complimented in New York on a brilliant letter that he had written in defense of Sunday games, said with his quiet smile:

"Well, you know, some of these people would hardly have us breathe on Sunday.

"They are as bad as the old Scotchwoman on Queen Victoria's Balmoral estate. This old woman was scandalized because the queen went driving on Sunday afternoons. She even ventured to speak about it.

"The queen, who allowed a good many liberties to her Balmoral tenantry, smiled and said to the old woman:

"'But Janet, the New Testament tells us distinctly that the Sabbath was made for man.'

"'Aye,' said Janet severely, 'I know it does, and I think none the more of the New Testament for that.'"

W. R. Hearst's "Goat."

The first time William Randoph Hearst ever made a public speech was when he was nominated for Congress in New York some years ago.

He was nervous about it and spoke to Timothy D. Sullivan, according to the Saturday Evening Post.

"Sullivan," he said, "that convention of yours is going to nominate me for Congress and I suppose I've got to make a public speech to the delegates. I never made a public speech in my life and I'm scared. What shall I do?"

"It's simple enough," Sullivan replied. "The thing to do is to pick out one man in the crowd and talk to him just as you would talk to him if he was alone with you in a room. Select one man and make your speech to him, and forget that there is anyone else in the audience."

Sullivan was curious to see how Hearst would make out, and sent one of his men down to watch the proceedings and report. The man came back.

"How did Hearst do?" Sullivan asked.

"Well," said the scout, "he lost one good vote. He talked all the time to one man in the crowd, and that fellow got mad and nervous and left the hall, cursing Hearst for making a goat of him!"

President Wilson's Personality.

There never has been a president of the United with a greater genius for friendships than Woodrow Wilson, yet never before has there been a man in the White House who has lived so entirely alone and with a certain aloofness that makes one ask the other:

"Who are the President's friends?"

Their name is "Legion," because they are many, remarks the Record-Herald.

No one who meets the President for the first time, much less the person who has known him until the years have established the intimate friendship, ever speaks of him except with enthusiasm.

His predominant quality, honesty of purpose, which appeals to the popular soul as nothing else in the campaign speech, is not a unique characteristic; one turns back to the pages of history, and time is wasted in the attempt to find the President without an honest purpose when he realizes the solemnity and tremendous responsibility of his high office. But there is a certain force, an appealing power in the personality of President Wilson which even the 19-year-old American youth recognizes but cannot define, except in his own vernacular.

"* * * and what do you think of the President?" asked the typical mother of the American youth, who placed respectful stress upon her son's opinions.

"I cannot tell you, mom," said the typical American youth, "but he's great ——and there's something in him that gets my goat. I'm for him!"

Those who know just what it is that "gets the goat" of the American youth, aged 18, or what the quality that makes the man of the world "for him" may be able to explain the strong, compelling force of President Wilson.

Rockefeller on Debt.

John D. Rockefeller, at the end of a church service in Hartford, cautioned a group of young men against borrowing.

"Getting into debt," he said, "grows on one horribly. Getting into debt, in fact, is like going into the ocean for a bath—it's cold and unpleasant when you're only in up to your ankles, but when you get quite out of your depth you find you can float in warmth and comfort."

Senator Oliver Tells Story.

Senator Oliver was talking about a brazen-cheek lobbyist.

"He took rebuffs with the utmost sangfroid," said Senator Oliver. "He was like the youth whose fiancee, having discovered his unfaith, said hotly:

"'Permit me to return your ring.'

"'Oh, you needn't bother about the ring,' the youth replied. 'I buy 'em by the dozen.'"

On the Self-made Man.

Howard Elliott, the new president of the New Haven and Hartford Railroad, was talking at a luncheon in New York about a millionaire who had been boasting overmuch—boasting about his Raphaels, his Louis Seize furniture, his Gobelins and his Aubussons.

"Of course, he's a self-made man," said Mr. Elliott. "I'm very fond of self-made men. The only objection to them is that sometimes they've failed to put themselves together so as to work noiselessly."

OUR PREMIUM STORY.

Literary Preference.

A reference to books the other night reminded Senator John R. Thornton, of Louisiana, of the literary conversation between Mrs. Smith and Mrs. Brown.

Mrs. Smith, according to the narrative of the senator, was very fond of reading, and while on a visit to Mrs. Brown one afternoon she started a book talk with a view to discovering what work her hostess liked best.

"You have quite a number of books, I see," remarked the visitor, glancing around the room. "Which do you think is the most helpful to you?"

"Webster's Dictionary, without a doubt," was the prompt response of Mrs. Brown.

"You don't really mean it!" exclaimed the visitor, assuming for some reason a look of surprise. "May I ask in what particular way?"

"Certainly," was the obliging reply of the hostess. "The baby sits on it at the table, and it saves the price of a high chair."

They Should Have Known Better!

Richard Le Gallienne, the poet, was talking in New York about the hardships of a poet's lot.

"Poetry is popular," he said, "but there's no money in it. Have you heard the latest about the well-known poet, Pindar Oade?

"Mrs. Oade nudged her husband in the dead of night and whispered:

"'Pindar, wake up! There's burglers in the house!'

"'Well, what of it?' said Pindar Oade sleepily. 'Let them find out their mistake for themselves.'"

Time and to Spare.

When Senator Kern was running for governor of Indiana he stopped one noon at a little hotel in Brown County for some food.

"Hurry up, now," Kern said to the proprietor. "I have only fifteen minutes before my train comes."

"No hurry, governor," the hotel keeper replied. "You can eat all there is in this hotel in five minutes."

From Near and Far

No child in Chicago need weep this Christmas because there was no tree in his home. A municipal Christmas tree, which may be claimed by every child in Chicago as "his own," is to be erected in Grant Park on Christmas eve, and will remain until New Year's day. Besides the tree, there is to be a municipal celebration, with addresses by Mayor Harrison and other prominent men of the city.

Six hundred foreign daily and weekly newspapers have been asked by the American Association of Foreign Language Newspapers to join in a nationwide campaign against quack doctors who are preying upon immigrants and others in the United States. The recent expose made by The Chicago Tribune will form the basis for this campaign.

Chicago's public safety crusade was given added impetus when the pulpit united with the press to educate the people a wek ago, from at least 1,000 pulpits of the city. The word was sent forth urging the observance of the rules laid down by the safety committee.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, of Amsterdam, Holland, has awarded a gold medal to Mrs. Russell Sage in recognition of her work in protection of wild birds.

Equal suffrage leaders of the world will be called upon to arrange a great international congress of women voters to meet in San Francisco at the Panama Exposition, 1915.

Three hundred pupils of a Cleveland public school who refused to go to school till a policeman was stationed at a dangerous crossing to guard them have won their fight for safety.

Clay tablets dug up from Nippur record that five thousand years ago the schoolchildren of that city were taught arithmetic, geography, history and grammar.

Disciples Table Talk

Will Teach "Theologs" Farming.

The agricultural extension department of Iowa State College, at Ames, Iowa, and the theological seminary at Drake University have entered upon a project of co-operation that is wholly unique in the educational field. Under arrangement just made by Director W. J. Kennedy of the extension department of the college and Dean Sherman Kirk of the seminary, six of the strongest lecturers of the extension department will go before the "theologs" and give them a "short course" in agriculture. There has been much talk of injecting a little of agriculture into the theological courses of men who are to preach in small towns and rural districts, but this is the first time this step has actually been taken. The six lectures will be delivered at Drake university at intervals during the year. M. A. Hauser will lecture on farm crops, in November; A. M. Ten Eyck will lecture on soils and farm management, in December; Director W. J. Kennedy will speak on animal husbandry, in January; James Watson will present the subject of dairying, in March; H. A. Bittenbender will lecture on poultry, in April; and R. S. Herrick will discuss horticulture and rural landscape gardening, in May.

Governor Clarke Addresses Brotherhood.

"It is the duty of churchmen to take an active hand in civic affairs and in legislative acts," declared Governor Clarke, of Iowa, before the Men's Brotherhood of the University Place Church at Des Moines, recently. "It is their duty to go before these bodies and obtain better laws and more humanitarian ones. The real spirit of Christianity," declared the governor, "does not consist alone in sermons and hymns, but in active work in the affairs of life and political administration. All men are entitled to the square deal and it is the duty of the church to see that they get this." The anti-pass law was praised as an example of the square deal and an illustration of twentieth century applied Christianity. "It is unchristian," declared the governor, "for a rich man to ride on a pass and a poor hard working man to be compelled to pay his fare." The public health condition was declared a prolific subject for church extension work and the pure milk crusade and employment bureaus were likewise set out as fields for church work. Prof. C. N. Kinney, of Drake university, presided at the meeting, which was attended by more than two hundred men and women. Dr. G. H. Summer, secretary of the state board of health also spoke briefly on the duty of the men of today to the churches. This brotherhood has only recently taken charge of Grand View and Mondamin Avenue Churches.

"The Village of a Thousand Souls."

A remarkable sermon was preached by Frank Waller Allen, of Paris, Mo., recently. The text was the familiar one embodied in the question asked Jesus, "Whose is this man's sin, his own or his father's?" and the sermon was based on a very startling article by Arnold L. Gessell, a professor in Yale University, appearing in the American Magazine for October. The article carries the heading, "A Village of a Thousand Souls," and is a scientific study of the effects of heredity in a Middle West town of that population whose history the author knew intimately through a period of 33 years—one generation. The article shows the increase of the insane, the feeble minded, defectives, eccentrics, alcoholics, misers, tuberculars and other diseased persons in that time, and of 250 families, only 110 had not been afflicted in some of the particulars mentioned. Of the total population 26 per cent could not be classed as normal, but appalling as these figures were, yet more startling was the statement that the village in question, located in the heart of a rich agricultural community and with no environmental factors, was not an exception, but typical of American small towns in general.

To test the matter three men of middle age and past, born and reared in Paris, made from memory a similar survey of this town, on a basis of 1,500 people, excluding negroes, for the same period, and furnished it to Mr. Allen. They had conducted the study unknown to him and the results showed up fully as bad as those cited by Mr. Gessell. Of 250 families 100 were normal in reproduction and 150 not normal. There were 36 insane, 33 feeble minded, 50 alcoholics, 75 tuberculars, 100 syphilitics, 25 prostitutes and near prostitutes, 10 chronic liars, and 7 misers. Of defectives, eccentrics and suicides there were 96. And yet Paris is a normal town. The figures visualized an alarming social problem to the audience and Paris, looking in on itself, was astonished. The sermon was an eloquent plea for the right of all children to be well born and an inspiring prayer for the adoption of the standards of Jesus in individual lives.

El Paso Church Has Good Report.

about sixty of these have been added at regular services. An average of over four dollars per resident member is reported for missions during the past year.

"The Gospel to the Streets."

"The church has been getting away from the workingman for a long time—slowly, but surely," declared Burrus A. Jenkins, pastor at Linwood Boulevard, Kansas City, in a recent sermon. "Churches are moving to the suburbs, leaving the thickly populated sections of downtown districts where they are most needed. The workingman who used to drop into church on Sunday because it was a stone's throw of his home doesn't care to journey out to the suburbs after his week of work, so he either stays in bed or walks over to a pool hall for recreation. Many of them never hear a sermon. Besides, the church is losing its popularity, because it clings to doctrine and does not deal sufficiently with human life. The church is keeping aloof from the spirit of the times. It is undergoing a reaction from the time of our fathers. It is paying too much attention to working out dogma, and there is too great a tendency on the part of ministers to deal with philosophical, doctrinal and academic questions which do not reach the life of the people.

Mr. Jenkins would have every minister give over one day to helping the church to get back to the people. "There should be an extensive movement begun at once to reach the people who do not go to church," Mr. Jenkins said. "Every employer ought to be willing to throw open his shop or his factory for the purpose for an hour, say twice a year, or oftener. The employer would gain in the end, because Christianity means efficiency. Ministers should go out on the streets, down into the slums of the city, to the saloons, the brothels, every place in fact, that every man may have a chance to hear. The rich man in his pew has no more right to hear a good minister propound the doctrine than the poor man has to hear it."

Detroit Pastor on Young People.

Young people, the world's mainstay, also form the source of supply for the powers of evil and indicate the necessity of conserving the young men and women, declared C. J. Tannar, of Central Church, Detroit, Mich., in a recent utterance.

"Plenty of good, red blood is essential to life and vigor," the speaker stated. "Sometimes an invalid can be saved by the transfusion of blood from a young, healthy person. The prominence and importance of young people in every department of life is most significant. Bright, healthy, well-equipped young people are the joy and crown of the home and the greatest gift the home can give the world. The educational system exists for the young people. The business world would be paralyzed tomorrow morning if the young people as a body should boycott it. The devil depends on the young people to constantly fill up the depleted ranks of his followers and workers. Would it not be a strange thing if the church of the living God should be indifferent to or underestimate and neglect the young? The church can save young people from a worthless, wasted life; can give them an ideal of life and a life work that means success and happiness."

An Idea for Missionary Leaders.

The Missionary Education Movement, of New York, has published the text of a demonstration reproducing the examination of immigrants at the Ellis Island Immigrant Station, New York, and at other immigrant stations in the United States. The demonstration bears the significant title, "The Immigrant Gateway" and comprises the dialogue of an immigration inspector with eighteen different immigrants, full directions for presenting the demonstration and suggestions for making immigrants' costumes. In connection with the text of the demonstration, the Missionary Education Movement has prepared for rental, outfits of decorative and educational material on immigration, consisting of flags, charts and mounted photographs, which may be displayed in the room where the demonstration is given. The demonstration may be helpfully used in the home missionary campaign in the present year, a feature of which is the study of immigration. The demonstration is suitable for an entertainment, or a program for a missionary meeting. The text of the demonstration and the outfits may be obtained from the Missionary Education Movement, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Church Practices Legitimate Communism.

When the church at Hamilton, Mo., paid off a mortgage of $300 on the home of one of its oldest members who was about to lose all, it was getting back to the spirit of the early days, when "they had all things common." Harley Swift is pastor at Hamilton, and is leading in a campaign of remodeling and improvement in church equipment to the cost of several hundred dollars.

"Beacon Lights" at Mid-week Services.

C. M. Watson, minister at First Church, Norfolk, Va., is making the mid-week services during October and November a medium of "edification, education and inspiration." Each week Mr. Watson is discussing one of the "Beacon Lights of Church History." The "lights" being discussed are: 1. The Apostolic Age; keyword, "Field." 2. The Progress of the Church; keyword, "Light House." 3. The Blight of Ecclesiasticism; keyword, "Altar." 4. Medieval Glory of the Papacy; keyword, "Darkness." 5. Foregleams of a New Day; keyword, "Dawn." 6. The Protestant Reformation (Luther, Zwingli); keyword, "Heart." 7. The Protestant Reformation (Calvin, Wesley); keyword, "Mind." 8. The Nineteenth Century Reformation (The Campbells); keyword, "Knight." 9. The World's Challenge to Christianity; keyword, "World."

G. A. Miller on "The Church of the Ages."

During November and December, Geo. A. Miller, at Ninth Street Church, Washington, D. C., is preaching a series of sermons on "The Church of the Ages." The following are the topics discussed: "The Age of the Apostles." "The Age Before the Papacy." "The Age of the Rise of the Papacy." "The Age of the Papacy." "The Age of the Crusades." "The Age of Wiclif and Huss." "The Age of Savonarola." "The Age of the German Reformation." "The Age of the English Reformation."

Fellowship Supper at Charleston, Ill.

"The Official Board of First Church, Charleston, Ill., has had an uncommon joy and rare blessing," writes J. McD. Horne, pastor. "The elders, deacons, stewards, trustees and ministers of our sister churches were our guests at a Fellowship Supper on the evening of Oct. 24. Our invitations to the church officiary and their wives were generously received and 90 per cent of them were accepted. In addition to these, our own people were invited to make the total number 200. Peter Ainslie gave his incomparable plea for the unity of the church. Other speakers gave short addresses. From every quarter comes the word of gracious appreciation and approval."

Pastor Becomes Drake's General Secretary.

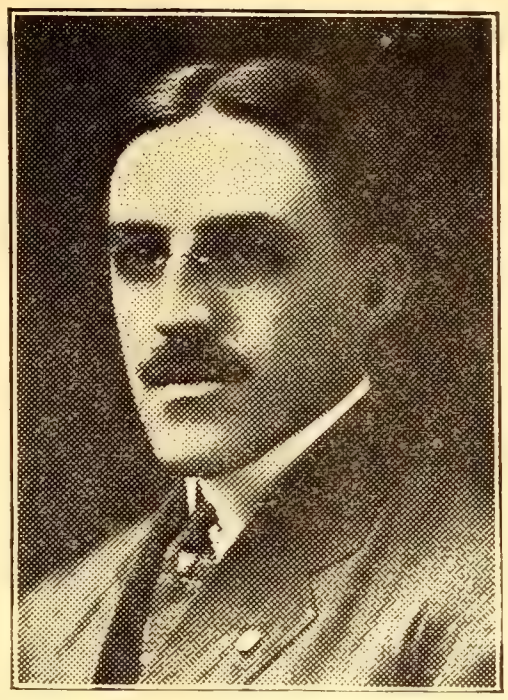
T. F. Paris has resigned as pastor of Second Church, Cedar Rapids, Ia., to assume the position of general secretary for Drake University. His work will be largely to visit churches and conventions in the promotion of religious education and the general interests of the university. Mr. Paris graduated from Drake with the class of 1911 and during his college course was prominent in the forensic activities of the university.

Teaching Hymns to the Children.

First Church, Richmond, Ky., is attempting what E. B. Barnes, pastor, reports is a modest experiment only. Mr. Barnes writes: "We are trying in our Sunday-school to teach the children the standard hymns of the church, believing that it is better to teach them something now that there will be no virtue in forgetting later. Then we have passages of scripture which we repeat every Sunday for a quarter, also some noteworthy prayer, endeavoring to have all take a part in the reading or in repeating the prayer. Room is left for the customary extempore prayer. Thus far we are well pleased with the venture. It is an attempt to eliminate the haphazard service of the Bible-school."

P. J. Rice on "Things That Abide."

The city of El Paso, Tex., highly appreciates the splendid work of Perry J. Rice, pastor of the First Church there. The city papers reproduce many of his sermons at length. We quote from a recent address of Mr. Rice on "Things That Abide." "Will the Scriptures abide? Yes, so long as people continue to find in them nurture for faith, hope and love. Will Christ abide? Yes, so long as men continue to see in him the express image of the Father 'full of grace and truth,' so long as he continues to speak the word that strengthens faith, that quickens hope, and that stimulates love. Will the church abide? Yes, just as long as she makes it her supreme business to nourish these abiding qualities of the soul. The church is not in danger save when she turns aside from her heaven appointed task and tries to rest her case in the doctrines and dogmas of men, which, valuable as they may be for the time, are more than likely to be cast aside in the course of the world's growing life."



E. E. Elliott, Author of the new book on "Making Good in the Local Church."

"Disciples Union" at Des Moines.

About 150 persons were present at a recent meeting of the official boards of the Churches of Christ in the city of Des Moines, Ia., held at Central Church. Following a social programme, those present banded themselves together as "the Disciples' Social Union," which organization will exist in the future for the purpose of promoting fellowship among the various churches of the denomination in Des Moines. Finis Idleman was elected president of the organization. President Bell, of Drake, was one of the speakers at the organization meeting.

"Building the Kingdom About the Child."

The following story of growth, from J. P. Rowlison, carries its own lesson: "When I became superintendent of the Sixth Missouri Missionary District, I was directed by the Board to move to Vandalia and preach for them the third and fourth Sundays of each month and give them the week intervening. One of the first things done was to get the official board of the church to recognize that they must build all the interests of the Kingdom about the child life of the community. This meant that they should become responsible in every way for the Sunday-school. At once the attendance and interest of the school felt the influence of the board's action. There has been a constant growth in the ten months that have elapsed, and on October 27 there were 227 present and the offering was $14.86. As the entire church membership is only 225, resident and non-resident, this seems to me to be a good showing. The school is graded, and as efficient as a school can well be that meets in one big room. We have partitioned off the various classes with curtains and that helps materially. We were expecting a modern church plant this year, but the drouth was too severe for us."

A Useful Evangelistic Worker.

J. R. Perkins. of Sioux City, Ia., who has just closed a successful meeting with the assistance of Zoe Pearl Park, of Chicago, writes enthusiastically of Miss Park's work. He insists that Miss Park should be engaged exclusively by Disciple churches. She has given much time to other communions. Her work with children is especially fine. As a contralto soloist she is excellent, Mr. Perkins writes.

Homecoming Week at Noblesville.

First Church, Noblesville, Ind., L. C. Howe, pastor, observed Homecoming Week October 19-26. Addresses were given on the several evenings of the week by E. S. Conner, E. L. Day, W. D. Starr and William Mullendore, former pastors of the church and now living in Indiana. Mesages from ex-pastors now out of the state were read. On Friday evening a recetpion was held in the fine new parsonage recently completed. On Sunday, Oct. 26, was observed Rally and Decision day. The pastor delivered on that day two special addresses, reviewing the history of the church in one, and speaking on fellowship at the union service in the after-"Day of Prayer for Moslems," November 9.

By Robert E. Speer.

The great Moslem feast of Sacrifice, known in Turkey and Egypt as the Bairam, falls this year on Sunday, November 9. The feast is a part of the rites of the Pilgrimage to Mecca, although it is observed also in all sections of the Mohammedan world, both as a day of Sacrifice and as a great festival. Tradition records that Mohammed observing the Fast of the Atonement by the Jew on the tenth day of the seventh month, asked them why they kept the Fast, and on being informed that it was a memorial of the deliverance of Moses and the children of Israel from the hands of Pharaoh, replied, "We have a greater right in Moses than they," and commended his followers to fast also. Later when Mohammed broke off his friendly relations with the Jews, Mohammedans preserved the day, only substituting in its observance the sacrifice of animals and a Feast. Mohammedans generally hold now that the Feast was instituted in commemoration of Abraham's willingness to offer up his own son as a sacrifice, and maintain that the son was Ishmael and not Isaac. Apart from its religious ceremonies Bairam is observed as a great time of rejoicing and holiday.

The Continuation Committee of the Lucknow Conference of Christian Missions to Mohammedans suggests that the day be made this year a special day of prayer by all Christians for our brothers and sisters of Islam, that God may turn their hearts at this crisis in Moslem history and on this great day in their calendar to Jesus Christ, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world, and that a feeling of compassion and kindness may spring up in the hearts of Christians toward the Moslem peoples.

noon. The purpose of the week of celebration was to stimulate church attendance, to give an impetus to missions and evangelism, and to celebrate the successful completion of the many lines of improvement that have been cared for. Miss Una Dell Berry, singer, was present to lend aid in the season of rejoicing.

Good News From China.

W. R. Hunt, Chuchow, China, writes: "Chuchow sanitation is now in the hands of our own church workers under the rule of a citizens' league. It is wonderful how God is using the evangelists. Our services are crowded. We must have a Sunday-school auditorium. Some classes meet on the veranda of my house, and my own senior Christian Bible class meets in my study. The Christian church in Chuchow is influencing adjacent cities and the hard work fills us with thrills of hope and enthusiasm."

Son of G. W. Muckley Weds.

The marriage of Mr. Dwight Hartman Muckley to Miss Eva Marie Right in Chicago recently is an event in whose announcement Diciples generally will take especial interest. He graduated from the Engineering department of the University of Michigan, and with his bride will reside in St. Louis. The wedding was an event of marked social significance.

The congregation of First Church, Terre Haute, Ind., George Darsie, pastor, deserves commendation for its heroic loyalty. We take the following paragraph from the church bulletin: "Our congregation has been meeting some big interest accounts and has been rallying splendidly to the same. It met a year's interest on a $5,000 note the first of September, as well as paid $600 on the principal of another note. It paid $853 interest the first of October. The interest on some smaller notes has been met. The money has not been borrowed, but raised."

A movement toward a larger and more intimate fellowship among members of the congregation of the University Place Church of Christ was begun October 21, when thirteen neighborhood gatherings were held at various homes in the University district. The attendance averaged over 100 persons at each meeting. Dr. and Mrs. Charles S. Medbury and representatives of the Sunday-school spent a short time at each gathering with a word of greeting for the assembled members.

Under date of September 2, Miss Mary Kelly, writing from China, says: "For the last two weeks we have almost hourly expected to hear that Nanking had been taken by the government troops, but the rebels still hold out. Dr. Macklin has done the heroic thing again by going out and getting the government troops to promise not to allow wholesale slaughter when they come in. He secured a proclamation to that effect also."

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

It Grips and Holds! Why?

The Conquest is an attractive paper. Gripping serials and short stories have a place in each issue.

The Conquest is an up-to-date paper. The articles used are not moss-grown. A striking feature of the paper is the illustrated Modern Science page.

The Conquest is a useful paper in the work of the church. Its "Conquest Bible Class" is unsurpassed. Its Christian Endeavor and Prayer Meeting columns are vital and suggestive.

The Conquest is a newsy paper. Its news is not merely small talk of Sunday-school attendance, contests, etc., but real news that builds up and helps.

GOD'S INVINCIBLES IN LIFE'S CONQUESTS.*

By A. Z. Conrad.

SEPULCHRES AND SUCCESSORS.

"The King is dead! Long live the King!" The echo of the mournful dirge has not died away before we hear the stirring strains of victorious march. Such is life as we see it. Does it seem cold and heartless? But is it? It is not to sepulchres but to successors that the world must look for progress. Kings die, but kingdoms remain. The lament for a lost leader must not lose sight of the fact of a living nation. After Moses, what? Who could take the place of that fearless mediator? No one! No one ever did! There are no duplicate men. There are worthy successors and the new man has the new task. The greatest compliment to Moses was that his work was so well done that another Moses was not needed. Moses' grave was of far less concern than was Israel's greatness. A man's real monument is found in the momentum which he has given to a great cause.

HUMAN PILLARS.

God rests his great causes on human pillars. The withdrawal of one support is invariably followed by the transfer of the cause to new shoulders. God's introductions are usually surprises. The majority of the world's great leaders did not reveal the secret of their power until divinely introduced. Providence uncovers the veins of gold in the mines of manhood. The inauguration of a new movement has invariably called for a new man. God is never without reserves. Broken ranks are quickly filled. Worthy causes have never been without great advocates. When a standard bearer falls a new hand prevents the banner from trailing in the dust. Pisgah's secret was the people's despair. Doubtless the tongues that had lashed the living leader were noisiest in lament when he was lost. The knell of doom had not sounded because the weary and worn champion of emancipation had been called home, though they probably thought so.

FROM PILGRIMAGE TO CAMPAIGN.

"Now therefore, arise, go over this Jordan, thou and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel." Who is thus addressed? A man eighty-three years young! His name was first Hoshea, which means, "salvation." But he had learned to gear into the Infinite power. He had linked himself with Jehovah and now his name is Jehoshua, which means, "Jehovah's salvation." The name was later contracted to Joshua. Forty years old when the oppressed people of Israel set out on the emancipation-pilgrimage, he had witnessed all the cruelties of Egyptian slavery. A boyhood and early manhood of slavery had not broken his spirit. A witness to the marvels of Divine revelation in repeated deliverances, he had come to be a man of mighty faith in the Eternal. In the hour of battle Moses had discovered in this stalwart man the qualities of generalship and he had already commanded a campaign against the enemy. He was chairman of the committee sent on a tour of inspection of Canaan and returned with an honest report of the delights, dangers and difficulties ahead, and with an earnest courageous appeal to undertake the conquest of the land. He was every inch a soldier, and a soldier was now needed. Ability must have opportunity. Circumstances do not make the man but furnish an arena upon which he can reveal his power and prowess. The shuttle may not be thrown until the threads in the loom are parted yet the parting of the threads cannot make the web, independently of the shuttle. The important thing is to know when the shuttle is to be thrown and throw it through. The hawser must be thrown at just the right moment to be seized and fastened.

COMMISSIONED FOR CONQUEST.

The first stirring word he hears is "Arise!" The business of his life will not be instruction, exhortation, the giving of the law. That had been done. His business will be to command. He is to be a man of action, making application of the great principles which Israel had already received from Moses. He is summoned to a sublime task. He is to be the guiding spirit through whom the ancient promise will become a realized fact in the occupancy of the Land of Canaan. The very first command was to undertake the impossible. The swollen Jordan was impassable. A disciplined army could not be safely taken across in the face of an enemy, much less a great nation of people. Yet the command is unqualified, unconditional. "Arise! Go over Jordan! Thou and all this people." A lesser man would have doubted the reality and the reliability of the communication received. Only a transcendent faith would respond to an appeal like that. It is noteworthy that God's commands are accompanied with a communication of power from himself which enables his obedient children, unappalled, undaunted, to face the difficult and the seemingly impossible. Evidence that a communication is Divine is the resultant empowering, almost to a supernatural extent, of the recipient of the revelation.

POWER TO POSSESS.

"Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you." Here is the great law of human and Divine partnership. They could never earn the Land of Promise. It was the gift of God. But even God's gifts are made available through human co-operation and effort. The best things of life are not earned, they are won. The distinction is striking. After we have done our utmost we are yet indebted to God for everything we enjoy. Nature abounds in illustrations. The gold in the mine is the gift of God, but the mine must be worked. The harvests are the gifts of God through sunshine and fountain, but they are never gathered without seed-sowing and reaping laboriously. The trophy won at the game is not earned by the athlete, it is won. Eternal life is never earned, it is won. It costs to appropriate Divine gifts. Eternal life which is the gift of God is only made available through surrender and self-sacrifice, through heroic devotion to holy ideals, through unremitting efforts to overthrow and overcome evil in the heart. Even Eden must be cultivated or its rewards forfeited. Heaven itself will not be merely a state of selfish enjoyment but its delights will demand true spiritual appropriation. Canaan was to be possessed through conquest. Until the feet of the invading army stood on the promised territory it could not be theirs. Faith is no substitute for applied energy. Even the manna had to be gathered.

YESTERDAY AND TODAY.

"As I said unto Moses." The permanence of promise is emphasized. The value of the study of history is a discovery of the ground and basis of hope for today and tomorrow. We may linger with the past only long enough to be inspired for present and future undertakings. Our God is an unchangeable God. His covenant is everlasting. The great principles, whether in the mechanical, moral, or spiritual world never change. All modern inventions are simply applications of principles which are as old and unchanging as eternity. New laws find new application. The fulfillment of a promise may be long in being realized, but the promise of God never loses its force. The arm of the Infinite is never weakened and never lowered. He who wrought miracles can, when occasion requires, manifest the same power today. The promises of God are sure, enduring forever. Unnumbered multitudes attest to the fact that God actually does things in answer to prayer. If He has in the past, He will in the future, hence, we can appeal with confidence and be positively assured that the experiences of yesterday will find repetition under similar conditions today.

PREVAILING PURPOSE.

"No man shall stand before thee," literally, "No man shall set himself against thee," that is, in successful opposition. Nothing is impossible that God commands. In present-day reform we have the encouraging testimony of history that God Almighty has never commanded any undertaking he has not led his children through. With respect to the White Slave Traffic and the Liquor Traffic men are continually saying, "Let it be regulated, it cannot be exterminated." God says nothing of the kind. He speaks to every reformer of today and says, "No man shall set himself against thee successfully." Again of many evils we hear, "It has come to stay." Nothing has come to stay but God and truth. Nothing is inevitable that God condemns.

LOYALTY.

Guarantees of promise rest upon a twofold loyalty, the loyalty of God to us, and of us to God. "I will not fail thee," literally, "I will not be weak toward thee." What a fine shade of meaning we find here. He had just demanded the impossible. It would require an appropriation of more than human power. The appropriableness of Divine power is intimated. "I will not be weak toward thee." Our commission invariably implies the co-operation of Jehovah. One of the tragedies of life is human disloyalty. There are scores of men wrecked financially and morally because they have been abandoned in the hour of their need. Desertion is despicable, but how often it is practiced. Every great cause suffers for the lack of dependable men. The call today, pathetic, persistent, is for dependable disciples.

FACING THE FUTURE FEARLESSLY.

"Be strong and of a good courage," literally, "Be strong and vigorous." Strength does not result from mere exertion or action. There is a reason for it. The very promises of God have power to awaken courage. Granted an arm strong enough and a love deep enough there is nothing to fear. Courage is impossible without confidence. But the appeal here is to moral stamina. "That thou mayest observe to do according to all the law." Many a general has courage to lead his army to battle who is afraid to kneel down at his bedside in the presence of one of his captains. Confessing is greater than commanding. Witnessing requires more bravery than warring.

DISASTROUS DEVIATION.

"Turn not to the right hand or to the left that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest." Godliness is profitable for two worlds. Honesty is the best policy and it is also the best principle. Allegiance to the law of God assures the continuance of the love of God. A life of vacillation is a life of vexation. It only takes a slight deviation of the magnetic needle to belie the heavens and wreck the ship. God can do nothing with a fraction of a man. Joshua was to observe to do according to, not a part, but all the law. "The Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest." There is a definite relation between piety and prosperity. The fact that many prosper without piety by no means proves that devotion to truth and duty is a handicap. Transient successes are not prosperity in its best sense. All true prosperity has in it an element of permanency. Futhermore it carries with it a soul satisfaction which never obtains from mere acquisition. Real prosperity is a development rather than an acquisition. It is an unfolding rather than an ingathering. Nothing but companionship with God will make a man invincible in the presence of insidious foes. We are in an enemy's country and no fortress but the Everlasting Arms can prevent successful invasion. A sense of the presence of God empowers and calms. The gladdest thought is that of available Divinity. The conquest of Canaan is a true type of world conquest. The Church of God is bound to win. All the powers of earth and Hell will fail to stand before a courageous, God-accompanied, Christ-enthroned Church. The fight is on. Good can never compromise with evil. The holiness of God, like the sunlight of heaven, is an opponent of everything corrupting and degrading. Fear is failure in the seed. Courage is victory half won. Practice the presence of God and power which promises prosperity is yours.

REPRESENTING CHRIST.

Nov. 12. John 17:17-25; 2 Tim. 2:19-21, 24-26.

We are the moral and religious representatives of Christ. It is allowable to use illustrations taken from military and political life, but these illustrations must not be understood to exhaust the meaning of our relation to Christ. We are ambassadors of Christ when we announce in the proper way religious truth. Let us beware lest we look upon our mission as that of a representative of Caesar. The kingdom of Christ is not built upon the ruins of human hopes.

Sanctified in Truth.

The sanctified person is one who is fit by motive and training for his work. "Beware of the over-pious ignoramus and the one badly trained," said the Jewish wise man. "The chief thing is not learning, but the deed." Pious ignorance has wrought much mischief in the world. The disciple who truly represents Jesus spares no pains to equip himself for what he is to do. He is not deceived by temporary success. It is one thing to see the evils with which we are afflicted; it is another to provide a remedy.

For the Sake of All.

The church is not a private establishment. All who name the name of Christ and unite with their fellow believers in worship and service must expect to have their motives and their conduct examined by critical eyes. They profess to have a great faith. Their confession that Christ is their Master commits them to definite obligations to all the world. If the Pope demands submission to his authority, we ask him how that will affect the church in its larger mission. Of the high churchman we ask what is of universal validity in his idea of churchly practices. What do our denominational shibboleths signify when we face the needs of the world? It is in order to inquire whether the demand for the practical in the teaching of the church comes from those who have a wide vision or from those who are moved by personal and local consideration. To represent Christ to the world is the business of great souls. He who knows the mind of Christ is able to say with George Eliot, "The great lesson of life is tolerance." To be intolerant in advocating the fundamental truth of Christianity is to misrepresent Christ about as completely as it is possible to misrepresent him

Separation from Unrighteousness.

If the good people with whom you associate do not know of the evil in your life, the bad people whom you denounce know it well. The lawless element know of your defiance of law. Even when you repent, they hold up to you your past and ask by what process of reasoning you have arrived at the notion that you are better than the men you condemn. The selfishness which you tell yourself is absorption in duty is well known to the man whom you are scolding for the sin of drunkenness. Naming your avarice economy does not change its character in the eyes of the man whom you have injured by it. The cruelties of your greed remain cruelties and are known to be such by your victims in spite of your attempt to pass them off as discipline. The tumult and shouting of the religious meeting are poor substitutes for faith, and they deceive no one. If we have been unrighteous, the world is slow to accept at its face value our profession of repentance while we cling to the advantages gained by unrighteousness. Sincerity and fair dealing distinguish the disciple. There is tremendous power in the upright life. The poor wretches whose passions rule them with a rod of iron have no hope unless they have before them examples of self-control. In a time of general laxity of morals, the few who see clearly and act from the highest motives are the salt of the earth.

These momentary upliftings of the soul to God, in shop and factory, in street and railway, keep the soul from hardening and make it responsive to the words of God.—Cosmo Gordon Lang.

Don't Cheat Your School

This is written only for pastors who feel some measure of responsibility for the quality of literature going into the hands of their Sunday School scholars.

And, no doubt, all pastors who read the Christian Century are of that sort. Their point of view is that of religious education. The Sunday School to them is more than an aggregation of units brought together each week to go through a certain formal program—calling the roll, "doing" the lesson, "taking up the pennies," asking for birthday money, and telling the children to be sure to "have a good lesson" next Sunday!

The Sunday School is to them rather THE CHURCH STUDYING THE WORD OF ETERNAL TRUTH, and developing in minds and hearts the spirit of the Christian religion. It is, indeed, the Church's best chance to guarantee Christly men and women in the next generation, as well as in this.

To pastors who hold this high ideal of the work of the Sunday School, the matter of literature becomes a most vital one. Second only to the influence of the teacher in the life of the pupil is that of the literature upon which the scholars feed their minds and souls. And, in many cases, we are sure the influence of the literature comes first.

Roosevelt declares that one of the strongest influences that moulded his early life was a child's paper he subscribed for, and which he valued highly. Are not your children and youths just as likely to be so influenced?

ARE YOU WELL ACQUAINTED WITH THE LITERATURE YOU ARE USING IN YOUR SCHOOL? or would you, in ordering, ask for so many "blue quarterlies," so many "green quarterlies," as actually some persons have done?

If you are alert to the responsibility upon you as the leader in religious education in your church, by all means secure samples of all systems published, and see to it that your school uses the literature that it finds to be the most up-to-date, most virile, and BEST ADAPTED TO CHARACTER BUILDING.

The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade

The Mother of All Our Philanthropies!

DOESN'T it stir your blood, Mr. Progressive-minded Layman, to think of The Christian Century going into the homes of virtually every preacher in our brotherhood for one full year? When you consider the kind of current literature that circulates most widely among our ministers do you feel that you could spend $100, or $500, or $1,000, to any better advantage than to help send the light of The Christian Century right into 4,000 preachers' homes where The Century does not now go?

Four thousand ministers in addition to the large ministerial list we already have! It is a proposition to challenge the liberality of every person who knows the service The Christian Century is now rendering to the cause of constructive Christianity among the Disciples.

Four thousand ministers, besides the 16,000 names of church leaders—Sunday-school workers, elders, deacons and many others who make up the substantial part of our local churches!

Where is there a more direct piece of missionary service than this in which generous-hearted men and women may invest money?

Isaac Errett used to say that if the brethren would give his paper 100,000 subscribers he would see that all the missionary money was raised that our people had the ability to give. And he could have made good his promise, too.

A Christian press is the mother of all our church philanthropies and missions.

And the Christian newspaper that embodies the highest ideals of Christian missions and Christian unity is itself the most deserving philanthropy of the brotherhood.

The Circulation Man is accustomed to do calculating. He sometimes calculates in figures and sometimes in forces. This time he calculates in forces, and he can demonstrate that twenty thousand dollars given to The Christian Century by men and women who believe in the thing The Christian Century so ably stands for will go farther toward helping the great enterprises that our business men and women are giving millions to than twenty thousand dollars put anywhere else.

Here is a proposition this C. M. believes he is well able to demonstrate: Twenty thousand dollars given to The Christian Century right now will be worth more to the cause of missions than $20,000 given directly to the missionary society.

And here's another like unto it: Twenty thousand dollars put into The Christian Century's Subscription Crusade will advance the churches of the Disciples of Christ farther than $20,000 invested in evangelistic meetings.

And here's yet a third: Twenty thousand dollars invested in twenty thousand new subscribers, including all Disciple preachers not now receiving The Christian Century, will mean more to the cause of Christian unity than a like amount invested in any agency now in existence among the Disciples for promoting Christian unity.

No person who has read more than one issue of The Christian Century will take these propositions as implying the slightest reflection upon or any competition with our missionary, evangelistic or Christian union agencies. This C. M. rejoices in them and their great doing. The Christian Century interprets them and solicits support for them.

But the C. M. believes that, at the present moment, this paper is the most important constructive and progressive agency operating on behalf of Disciples' ideals. He believes that more hopes for progress along the right paths are centered in this newspaper than in any other single enterprise among us.

The three propositions above stated will not sound audacious to any one who takes into the reckoning these three factors:

1. The power of the press in general and among Disciples in particular.
2. The critical fork in the road at which the Disciples now stand.
3. The constructive program of The Christian Century.

And if reflection on these factors does not convince one of the strategic place occupied by this paper surely the reading of those words of appreciation from the leading men of our communion published in last week's and this week's issue will convince him that The Christian Century deserves the most generous support from men and women of means who believe in its message.

Judging from the way the names are rolling in, your C. M. has no doubt that twenty thousand names will be received before our birthday.

Now let the dollars overtake the names!

Salient Data in The Christian Century's History

Established as The Christian Oracle in 1884 by Rev. F. M. Kirkham and Gen. F. M. Drake, at Des Moines, Iowa. Attained a high degree of popularity as organ of Iowa churches. Removed to Chicago in 1891. Became a national organ, though featuring especially the Iowa work and the local parishes of Chicago. Mr. Kirkham continued as Editor and owner of The Christian Oracle, whose son, Mr. Arthur O. Garrison became Managing Editor. For a short time Rev. George A. Campbell was Editor.

In 1900 the stock of the Oracle Publishing Company was purchased by a group of men headed by Rev. Charles A. Young. The name of the paper was changed to The Christian Century and that of the company to The Christian Century Company. During the next seven years the paper was edited by a group of writers, including Rev. J. J. Haley, Rev. Frank G. Tyrrell and Prof. Herbert L. Willett.

In September, 1908 The Christian Century was purchased by the New Christian Century Company, a new corporation. Charles Clayton Morrison and Prof. Willett became associated as joint Editors.

At the beginning of the year 1913 the Disciples Publication Society, a corporation without capital stock and operating not for pecuniary profit, was chartered under the laws of Illinois. Its membership was constituted of representatives of the churches and Sunday-schools of the Disciples of Christ. This Society purchased The Christian Century and all other assets of The New Christian Century Company, and is now publishing The Christian Century in the unselfish interest of the cause of religious education and progress.

On Sept. 1, 1913, Mr. Morrison became sole Editor, Dr. Willett continuing as Contributing Editor in a no less vital relation to the paper than before.

Twenty Thousand New Subscribers and Twenty Thousand Dollars to Pay for them

More Congratulatory Messages!

REV. H. C. ARMSTRONG, Baltimore, Md.

I am sending you today a list of names for the anniversary subscription. I have selected them with some care and hope that many of them will prove to be permanent additions to The Century's list of subscribers and readers. Wishing you and The Century every success.

REV. J. W. UNDERWOOD, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Here is a list of my best workers, and I assure you that you will have my hearty co-operation in getting a Christian paper into their homes. Your offer is a liberal one and should bring results. Appreciating your efforts, with hopes and prayers for great things, I am, Fraternally yours.

REV. J. IRVING BROWN, Sac City, Ia.

Am enclosing list of names all good, earnest, Christian people and will know a good thing when they see it and they will see a good thing when they see The Century—one of the brightest and most up-to-date papers published. Am a subscriber to Century and Evangelist—can't "keep my religion" and read the un-Christian ————. Great success to you my brother. Your work is greatly appreciated.

REV. B. H. SEALOCK, Illiopolis, Ill.

I am taking the liberty of enclosing an additional list of names—there may be one or two duplicates but I hardly think so. One of the big things in selecting these names has been the thought of the "open mind" and while some of these are rather conservative it is not in a bad sense—they are for progress. Wishing you every success,

REV. CLAUDE E. HILL, Valparaiso, Ind.

I think you are making a great paper out of The Christian Century. I think it is one of the best edited religious papers in this country. I rejoice in the success you have achieved and in the good The Century is doing. You have my very best wishes.

REV. T. J. CLARK, Albion, Il.

I am glad to see the fine expression of sentiment favorable to The Century from our preachers. Since The Standard is going "loaded for bear," and cannot waste ammunition on a possible "cotton tail" in the bush, I want to urge that you do not get the idea that your business is to look for and go loaded for bear. That is the thing that has caused the sad deterioration of the splendid paper Isaac Errett published. The meditations of Hugh Macdonald on that phase of The Standard history were so true to my own experience that I enjoyed it greatly. Even if H. M. proves to be a "cotton tail" in the bush so long as he keeps up to his present standard of meditations "at the end of the day," he will be giving to us old time admirers of The Standard something of the helpful writing that flowed so easily from the pen of Isaac Errett, but which unfortunately never appears in the editorial matter of the present day Standard. H. M. is all right. Tell him to keep it up.

REV. LOUIS O. LEHMAN, Gibson City, Ill.

My congratulations on the present effort of The Christian Century are a little late but they are none the less sincere. There is a spirit among our people waiting for constructive leadership and ready to follow it and The Christian Century is the paper that seems to have sensed this. Many of us are feeling that new issues have come in to challenge our attention in the place of the historic controversies and we are groping our way to meet them. We are growing in the belief that The Christian Century is our coming leader in the new service that awaits us and are praying for her a larger audience. May the Father guide you in all wisdom and bless your labors for the kingdom.

PROF. J. G. MCGAVRAN, College of Missions.

The Century is making us think. We read it. We never know just where a stimulating thought may be tucked away, so we read it through. If we were always perfectly sure of your soundness we should lovingly file you away without taking the wrapper off. We don't want you to be so exactly right that all we have to do is to think your great thoughts after you. We like to think, a little, once in a while for ourselves. We don't mind your being judge, prosecution and defense, but we do want to be the jury. The money order I enclose is to pay my own subscription and to help along in the good work. The names I send are all worth sending.

REV. J. D. GARRISON, Fort Collins, Colo.

In the enclosed list is no name which should not be good for a subscription. They are all important to the church in some way. I shall be delighted to have you get a large list from this church. The plan you have adopted is a most generous and far sighted advertisement.

REV. ALLEN T. SHAW, Macomb, Ill.

The above names most nearly represent the kind of material you desire. I believe you will succeed in getting permanent subscribers wherever there is a painstaking reading of the paper; it certainly embodies many excellent things. I have been encouraging some of the above persons to take the paper, telling them it is their kind of a paper. I congratulate you on the auspicious outlook for The Century and shall take pleasure in doing something toward the realization of your plans for celebrating the anniversary of your excellent journal. I confess to a liking for your type of journalism, and am indebted to you for a needed mental stimulant which comes occasionally by way of disagreement with some positions taken. Wishing you an enlarged sphere of usefulness.

REV. H. V. WHITE, Berkeley, Calif.

The Christian Century is the hope of the Disciples of Christ in this generation. It is a source of inspiration and encouragement to us young preachers who face the colossal task of interpreting Jesus Christ to this modern day. We can do nothing less than help it in any way possible.

MR. S. R. REESE, Bergman, Ark.

Do as you are doing! I am unspeakably grateful for The Century, just as it is! I have no suggestions to make. May God, our Father, bless you.

REV. C. M. SMAIL, Beaver Falls, Pa.

When I began my ministry I subscibed for The Christian Century. The more I read it, the greater becomes my delight in it. Nothing cheap is entered upon its pages. I am glad that The Disciples of Christ possess a religious journal of such high order. Best wishes for a great increase in its circulation, which it deserves.

REV. N. M. RAGLAND, Fayetteville, Ark.

With all my heart I believe The Christian Century is in every way worthy of the proposed twenty thousand new subscribers and the twenty thousand dollars to pay for them. It will give me a great deal of pleasure to help you in every way I can. The Christian Century read in every home among the Disciples of Christ would hasten the coming of the better day for which we have hoped and prayed so long. With grateful thanks for the great religious journal you are giving us, I am fraternally yours,

MR. E. T. CLEMENTS, Blue Mound, Ill.

I am sending list of names. I have put down only names of those who I think will like the paper, all of whom are abundantly able to pay for it, if at the end of the year they elect to become regular subscribers. I was a subscriber for the Oracle, and since the name was changed to The Christian Century, have not missed a copy from the first number to the last. I love the paper and its editors. Have never felt that I had just cause for criticism or fault finding, of either the paper or its editors. I am 80 years old and quite feeble. Wishing you success in your splendid enterprise.

REV. C. R. STAUFFER, Norwood, O.

I desire to congratulate The Christian Century on the splendid improvements in the paper during the last few months. May the good work go on. I am enclosing a list of names of men prominent in the Norwood Church that I believe will enjoy The Century. I trust that you will be able to add thousands of readers to your list during the crusade.

REV. EDWARD B. BAGBY, Baltimore, Md.

It is my conviction that you have devised a scheme which will prove as successful as it is unique. A weekly visit of The Christian Century to twenty thousand new homes will mean a vastly enlarged interest in the truest and best things held by our brotherhood.

REV. HARLEY SWIFT, Hamilton, Mo.

I take The Christian Century; I like its Christian courtesy to those who are opposed to its policy; I like the life, the very spirit that seems to make it a living personality in the room, not cold type. I can hand a copy to a person, with the idea of interesting him in some phase of the Master's work, without being compelled to first look through it to see if there be that discord of bitter controversy written in such spirit that it takes the sweet out of all the rest of the paper. Papers of all communions, taken as a group, bear the marks of the average congregation. Some we visit are ever complaining and pessimistic; others seek to turn our gaze toward the rising of the sun. To be able to see conditions, but not letting them blind us, to the ideal, to feel the misery of the world, with its inconsistencies and inequalities and not become morose is, a Christian virtue. To me your paper has this quality.

REV. L. E. MURRAY, Indianapolis, Ind.

I find myself so often in hearty agreement with you that I have taken it as a matter of course and not worth mentioning. But I do want to tell you how much I appreciate and approve your warning against denominational tendencies set forth in your recent editorials on Delegate Conventions. Our opportunity for promoting unity lies in the fact of our undenominational attitude—if we can only maintain that attitude. This we are not consistently doing. Our practice of magnifying the significance of membership in the local church is a very serious departure and is one of the great obstacles. The "receiving of members" has been so magnified in significance that we sit in judgment in Christ's stead.

REV. PERRY J. RICE, El Paso, Tex.

I rejoice as I always have in the success of The Christian Century and I most heartily congratulate you and all others who are interested in it not only on account of its past achievements and present attainments, but also, and especially upon its prospects. Your Anniversary Subscription Crusade deserves the greatest success. In every way I hope your ideals may be realized.

REV. CHARLES E. SMITH, St. Louis, Mo.

I gladly send you in a small list of those to whom your paper may profitably go, both for you and them. I frankly wish I could make it much larger and send the money too. You are giving us a splendid paper. Such articles as those recently by Peter Ainslie and Bert Wilson either and alone are worth many times the subscription. E. B. Barnes sometimes says things with which I do not agree, especially as to the second coming of Christ, but I enjoy reading after him as after very few. Enclosed please find draft for my own subscription.

REV. J. I. CARTER, Hazel Green, Ky.

I appreciate The Christian Century and favor the move to make it a brotherhood paper. We need such an organ as you publish.

REV. HENRY PEARCE ATKINS, Birmingham, Ala.

While The Century takes off its hat each week to the men and churches who are doing things for the Kingdom, a host of us want to take off our hats to The Century for the splendid character of its journalism. You have my best wishes in the campaign for subscribers you are now conducting, and the small check I enclose is simply a good-will contribution to the expense account for Alabama. Apply it wherever you will. I wish it were large enough to send The Century to every family of my congregation.

THE CRUSADE BRIEFLY STATED

A Celebration in Gladness and in Service.

The announcement of a plan to celebrate The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary, which falls on Jan. 1, 1914, by a Crusade for Twenty Thousand new Subscribers and Twenty Thousand Dollars to pay for them was made in the issue of October 23. If by any chance you overlooked it or wish to refer to it again we will be glad to send an extra copy of that issue free of charge to any address. In brief the Crusade plan is as follows:

The Disciples Publication Society proposes to make a concession of $10,000 on 20,000 new subscribers, provided,

1) that present readers of The Christian Century send in 20,000 names, without cost or any other obligation, according to instructions on the blank enclosed herewith.

2) that the friends of The Christian Century donate $20,000 to send the paper to these names for one full year as a gift.

The list of names will include 4,000 ministers not now taking The Christian Century (this list of ministers to be compiled in the office from the Year Book, not by our readers) thus putting The Christian Century in the hands of virtually every preacher in the brotherhood.

Such a list of 20,000 new names (every name carefully selected because it represents an active church worker, if not a leader) added to our present list of subscribers, will give The Christian Century the most valuable subscription list of any religious newspaper in the United States!

During the year the publishers will be enabled to produce a paper as far ahead of the present Christian Century as the present Christian Century is declared by its enthusiastic readers to be ahead of any paper published for the Disciples.

The result will be that by the end of the year, 90 per cent of these gift subscriptions will be renewed on their own account, and The Christian Century will be established in the hearts of a constituency which, by ordinary methods of subscription increase, it will take many years to gain.

OUR PRIMARY INTEREST IS TO SECURE THE NAMES OF PERSONS WHO, AFTER READING THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY ONE YEAR, WILL BE LIKELY TO SUBSCRIBE FOR IT ON THEIR OWN ACCOUNT FOR ANOTHER YEAR.

Each name may represent almost any theological attitude. Open-minded "conservatives" find almost as much pleasure in The Christian Century as do open-minded "progressives." The paper appeals to no partisan constituency. It pleads for the "open mind." Let that hint guide you in selecting your names.

Another hint: Your list should include those who possess a degree of intelligent interest in church matters. We find that our subscribers who "stick" are almost always the more intelligent and the more earnest ones. The Century is a dead-in-earnest paper, devoid of claptrap, sensationalism, church gossip; and it makes its appeal to persons intelligent enough to desire the kind of aid it gives. Note however that we say intelligent IN CHURCH MATTERS. Not mere academic culture but Christian culture—this is what we want you to keep in mind in making out your list.

We trust implicitly your good judgment. You will try to make your selection of names not merely from the standpoint of bestowing a favor upon personal friends, but from the standpoint of securing ultimately a list of permanent subscribers for The Christian Century.

Let the names roll in!

Use the blank on next page. If not sufficient send for more.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

The Ownership of Life

The greatest single discovery ever made by a human being is that which draws a line of separation between himself and the rest of the universe. This discovery made by each of us in early infancy, lies at the basis of all our scientific knowledge. Everything else in the way of classification begins at this point of fundamental difference. "I am here and something else is here." The "something else" includes the stars in the heavens and the sawdust in the baby's doll, the baby's mother and the moon, houses, people, trees, money in the bank, stocks, bonds, mortgages and other playthings, great and small ancient and modern history, and all the people and things concerned therewith. All these go to constitute the "something else" that every human being comes in time to discover as inhabiting the world with himself. However far he carries his classification he resolves the universe ultimately into two groups, himself and everything else.

In the beginning of our thinking the first is a very large group and the second a very small one. It takes a baby some time to discover that the moon is not so much a part of him as his own chubby pink toe. It dawns but slowly upon him that some things in the universe have any other missions than to minister to him. It would not be strange if he had a feeling of incurable loneliness when he finally discovers how small he is himself and how large the rest of the universe appears to be. This first step in the classification of the contents of the universe leads inevitably to another. The world consists not only of me and something else, but of me, mine which is not myself but which I am able to control and possess and utilize. Next after the question, How much of this universe consists of me, rises the question, How much of the universe is mine? Here again the process is a rather discouraging one. Labor with what zeal you will, the world is larger than you are. No man ever has been able to drink all the ocean, nor breathe all the air, nor to take into his possession all that is outside himself. The part which comes to be his is really a very small part. We are not the whole universe, we do not possess the whole universe. We are a rather small fraction of it and the added fraction which we can control is really quite insignificant. Even a Morgan or a Rockefeller is able to gather into his own control only a very tiny part of the universe and he cannot keep it very long after he gets it.

Before the child gets very much farther, he discovers another class to be recognized in the "something else." There is not only that which is not me and not mine, but it consists of other "me's" each insisting on a division which gives to each a part of the "something else" and enables him to call it "mine."

But, there is still a further discovery to make and that forces itself upon us in a variety of ways, namely, that a man does not possess unlimited control even of himself. The apostle Paul is speaking here in no mere figure of speech, "Ye are not your own."

Ye are not your own because you belong to humanity. You are a social unit and you are also a part of various larger social units—the family, the community, the state, the nation, the club, the firm, the church. Life must be lived with exceeding simplicity if it does not involve a very large degree of co-operation, and co-operation imposes mighty limits upon independence. Every human relationship is a declaration that man is not wholly his own. He is a son, a brother, a husband, a father, a partner, a citizen. All that means that someone else has claims upon him. Some of these claims are very imperative, some of them exceedingly insistent. They compel him to work to feed other mouths than his own; they compel him to practice self-denial for the sake of his family, or his friends. They involve him in enterprises in which he must be helped by other men and must help other men in turn. They compel him to pay taxes and support governments.

These obligations impose tremendous restrictions upon man. They do not permit him to let Canada thistles grow in his field, nor to own cattle afflicted with tuberculosis. These restrictions compel him to work on the road, to pay poll tax, to be subject to jury duty and, if necessary, to take his gun and to stand up and be shot for the sake of a government whose president he may never have seen, and in support of principles which were wrought into constitutions before he was born.

We belong to God for God has possession of us. We cannot escape Him. We are living in His world. We cannot step off; we cannot flee anywhere from His presence. If we could take an airship and fly to Mars we should be no farther from God and no nearer than we are now. Only within the sphere of our own free choice has He made it possible for us ever to get away from Him.

* * *

We belong to God because He has redeemed us. Even when in our waywardness we had gone far into sin and sought our own ruin, God's love followed us and His mercy overtook us. The loving Lord gave himself for us and died for us and rose again that His eternal life might ever belong to us, and ours to Him.

Practical Atheism

A Sermon Preached at First Church, Louisville. Text: "The Fool Hath Said in His Heart, There is no God."

BY E. L. POWELL.

I SHALL NOT ATTEMPT in this sermon to prove the existence of God. It would upon its very face be not only an anachronism, but an absurdity. The Bible does not essay such a task. Its opening sentence reads, "In the beginning, God." Jesus nowhere attempts to prove the Being of God. He says to the Disciples and people gathered about Him, "When ye pray say, Our Father, which art in Heaven." If the existence of God is not self-evidencing, as a necessity of thought and as a necessity of the needs of the human soul, it is incapable of other demonstration. You cannot prove a spiritual fact by mathematics. And so, tonight, in speaking of atheism I am speaking of that sort of atheism concerning which the text speaks, when it is declared, "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

No man who thinks, no man who uses even his intellectual processes, has ever said there is no God. Did it ever occur to you that such a denial as is here recorded in this Scripture, is an affirmation? To say there is no God is to deny non-existence. Can nothing be denied? Is it possible to deny other than something—a thought, an idea or a concrete thing? The very denial is itself an affirmation. If there be no God then it is possible to have thought without a thinker; it is possible to have motion without a mover; it is possible to have sensation and feeling without any influence or agency to create sensation or feeling; it is possible to have conscience without that which alone creates moral sanction; it is possible to have aspiration with nothing to awaken aspiration; it is possible to talk about being good and grow better when there is nothing to even suggest or intimate that there is such a thing as goodness or betterment in the world.

"MORAL INCAPACITY EXPLANATION."

The most absurd proposition that was ever entertained by a human mind is even the thought of the non-existence of God, who is the explanation of our own thinking, the interpretation of our own being, the inspiration of whatever there is in the world upon which approval rests.

But I want to speak of this atheism of the text. Observe that the fool hath said—not in his head—but in his heart, "there is no God." It is possible that the soul may become atrophied through wickedness as that moral incapacity is produced. If there be moral incapacity, then for that soul it is a fact that there is no God. If there were no air, there would be no sound; if there were no eye there would be no light; if there were no heart there would be no feeling, and if one has brought himself to that condition when all moral distinctions have been obliterated he not only does not feel the moral sanction or recognize what philosophers call the categorical imperative, but these things do not exist.

Only the man who says in his heart—his corrupt heart—there is no God, is speaking the absolute truth. For him the Heavens have been made black with the void of God's disappearance, and for him there is only the brazen sky, and all the glory of the right or the shame of the wrong have been taken away from him. His soul is atrophied, his heart is black, his vision has been extinguished; he cannot see God, and if the voice of Heaven were to sound in his ears in thunder tones it would be to him only discord and confused sound without significance or without meaning.

CLAIM TO INFINITE KNOWLEDGE..

I am persuaded, friends, that what the Bible calls the sin against the Holy Ghost is that moral condition to which it is possible, certainly exceptional, for a man to come when he cannot distinguish between light and darkness, when he cannot distinguish between God and the devil, when he cannot distinguish between an angel with the lamp or the minion of the pit. It is an awful truth that such atheism is possible, and its very possibility is a warning against the neglect of conscience, the dulling of moral sensibilities, the stifling of noble impulses, the thrusting back into the heart of high aspirations. It means that presently you shall say, as the fool says in his heart, there is no God.

You see, of course, the intellectual absurdity of the proposition even on the part of the fool using what intellectual faculties the fool may be possessed of, for when one says there is no God it is virtually a claim to infinite knowledge. Such a one virtually says, "I have searched the heavens above and the earth beneath, I have searched all corners and crevices of creation, I have gone down into the depths of the pit, and I have moved among the stars and nowhere, having searched every part of the universe, is there to be found a God."

Such tremendous intellectual self-conceit would seem to be impossible.

BELIEVES IN EVER-PRESENT GOD.

But, my friends, let me speak to you for awhile of what I regard as practical atheism. Atheism in the church, atheism in circles of culture and refinement, an atheism that is not conscious of being atheistic, an atheism that is denied and yet logically implied.

I speak, for instance, of that logical atheism involved in the denial through its theology of a present-day, living and immediate working God in the universe now and here and today. In the Nineteenth century, a century that has been called a wonderful century because of its wonderful inventions and discoveries, and its marvelous scientific and moral advance, there was a man named Darwin, who has been time and again denounced by the church as an infidel, and yet he, through his—shall I call it discovery of what has been denominated evolution—saved for the church a living, working, present God! A God who is immediate in the activities of the world, a God who never for one moment is absent from any of the developing processes, a God who never slumbers or sleeps, but who is in every part of His creation, and actively at work in every part of the creation.

NO ABSENTEE DEITY.

Now the old theology, so far as I was brought up to understand it, conceived of a God who built the world externally in seven days of twenty-four hours each, and then retired; henceforth, so far as His creation was concerned, He was an absentee Deity. Now I claim that an absentee Deity is no Deity so far as we are concerned. I claim that an absentee God is no God. The God who cannot do anything for me now, the God who has gone out of business, the God who has built His world and then left it, the God who has created man and then retired when the struggle was just beginning and the agony was just beginning to come on, leaving him without the inspiration of the Divine presence in the mighty struggle of life, that to my mind is an atheism which is not at all intended to be atheistic, but which none the less is logically atheistic. Atheistic evolution has saved God to the church; it has brought God down to the present hour, and it has declared that from the first atom unto the building of the last world, this God has been at work. It brings to us the thought which Jesus Himself enunciated when He said, "The Father worketh hitherto, and I work." A continuation of the Divine work goes on through the ages and the centuries, on through all of the processes of human history and human nature.

DEFINITION OF PRACTICAL ATHEISM.

I hope that thought is clear, because it does mean so much to the battling, struggling human soul. As between the two thoughts, or the two conceptions, the one thinking of God as once creating the world and then leaving it, and the other as an ever-present God, in His world, right here and now, still working, still creating, still showing the might of His strong right arm, still varnishing the heavens, as He is said to have done in the long ago.

Now out of this old theology which gives to us an absentee Deity has come another logical atheistic conception in the church, namely, this: inspiration or the Divine Spirit working in and through humanity exhausted itself when the last chapter of the Bible was written. There has been no inspiration of seer or prophet, of poet or general, of leader or thinker, since then. God exhausted Himself when He inspired Abraham and Isaac and Jacob and Moses and Peter and James and John, and since then the dew is no longer on the grass, and the heavens are brass, and no voice comes from within, and no voice comes from above. Life is dull and dead and sodden and commonplace.

We are driven to think, in the light of this conception of God's inspiration, that while it was God who inspired Moses to bring the children of Israel out of bondage God had nothing whatever to do with George Washington when he set free the colonies and gave us the republic of America.

It was God that inspired those mighty writers of an elder time, but there was no inspiration in the transcendental advance of Shakespeare's art. We turn over to inspiration whatever is contained through personal uttering itself in the literature of this book, and then close the book an inspiration becomes an airtight compartment; outside of this airtight compartment there is no inspiration; there are no vibrant wings that fan our cheeks, there is no glory that comes from any shekineh; there are no longer Cherubim and Seraphim; the world is dead, and God has gone out of business.

DENIAL OF PRESENCE OF GOD.

To my mind, that is practical atheism. For myself, I believe that there are prophets yet to come who shall speak some other Word of God—needed Word of God; needed for the present hour, needed for the immediate emergency. Men shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. I grant you that the Bible contains germinally, contains seminally, all that is necessary to send forth inspired leaders and inspired thinkers, but why should I limit Him to the reading of the specific utterances contained in the book and thus pinion Him, as it were, and bind Him, as it were, so that He shall speak in no other way, or enter into the human soul through no other door? I believe in an omnipresent God. So does theology; and an omnipresent God means that His presence is at work everywhere, through all sorts of agencies, through all kinds of men, everywhere, to fulfill His purpose concerning humanity.

And hence, to draw a distinction between the secular and the sacred is close akin to atheism in the denial of the presence of God in a certain realm called the secular, and keeping that Presence within a certain limit, a narrow realm called the sacred. Have you not heard over and over again, and do not you yourself say, government is secular, business is secular, literature outside of the Bible is secular, painting is secular, sculpture is secular, and only that which has its being within the narrow limitations of church activities and church pursuits and church endeavor is sacred?

What have you done? You have conducted God out of all of the realms about you save that realm known as the church. You have virtually admitted that the rest of it is atheistic, that God has nothing to do with it. Was it not God that made possible the birth of a republic in China? Was it not God who led the ragged Continentals, the old farmers of New England, to fire that gun which rang around the world? Was it not God who taught Burns how to sing? Was it not God who gave to us the immortal utterances of a Shakespeare? Shall we call the speech of Marcus Aurelius secular and the writings of St. Paul sacred because the one is found in a book called the Bible and the other is not in a Bible, when the same thoughts, in many instances almost paralleling each other, are found in both Paul and Marcus Aurelius?

"SECULAR THAT WHICH IS DEVILISH."

There is no secular, friends, except that which is devilish, and certainly there is nothing that is sacred wherein the presence of God is not manifest. But wherever there is truth, wherever there is beauty, wherever there is goodness, wherever there is noble endeavor, be assured that this working God, this living, active God, is responsible for the achievement.

And so again I would regard pessimism as another name for atheism. Who is the pessimist? The pessimist is the man who believes that we are getting worse instead of better, and that we are moving on, sometimes slowly, sometimes rapidly, toward inevitable doom; that there is nothing to give hope of redemption.

Pessimism is bowing God out of the programme. Pessimism is that vivid, intense lack of faith which does not reckon with God having anything to do whatsoever with the on-goings of society and the world. Optimism is faith, laying hold of infinite resources—faith that says not only has God spoken, not only has God wrought in the world in the past, but He is working, and if He is working, then righteousness is working, and if righteousness is working, then out of the evil will be made to come good, and out of the good will be made to come the better, and out of the better will be made to come the best.

SEES WORLD GROWING BETTER.

One sometimes feels like asking the question, is there any living, vital faith in the living God, when he hears the pessimistic utterance which comes from pen and platform concerning society and the human state. Because I believe in a God Who is in His world, because I believe in an immanent God, because I believe that that God has never ceased working from the time when the morning stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy, unto this present hour, because I believe that there is no instrumentality, good or bad, that He is not using for purposes of His own unto the final victory of righteousness, when all that is wrong shall be made right, and when all that is evil shall be conquered—because that is my faith I am just as sure that every foe will be vanquished and that God shall be all in all, all dominating everywhere, all dominating in everything.

It is a great day in which to live; that is a commonplace. It is a joyous day, for the world is getting better. True we are still in the twilight, and the glory of full moon has not come upon us, but just as sure as the bud gives promise of the flower, just as sure as the dawn is both promise and prophecy of the full coming day, just as sure as babyhood is prophecy and promise of manhood, just as sure as righteousness is stronger than wickedness, just as sure as there is a present God in the present hour doing the present work of the present day, the mighty seer's vision shall come true when every knee shall bow and every tongue shall confess that He is Lord to the glory of God the Father.

PRACTICAL ATHEISM IN CHURCH.

If the church shall ever permit itself to be pessimistic, despite the hard actual facts with which she has to battle, she is simply discountenancing, she is discrediting the Divine presence, she is reckoning without Him, and literally driving Him out of the programme; and therefore, the arm will be limp and the energy will be impotent. Given a living God and you have a fulcrum that could move the world; given a dead God or an absentee God, or a God who is indifferently and in an unconcerned fashion looking upon the work of His hands, and where shall inspiration for poet or prophet or leader come from?

So there is such a thing as practical atheism in the church.

God give us to make true that phrase of our President which has come to be so frequently quoted since he uttered it: God give us forward-looking men—men who catch the vision—not as a result of their own intellectual effort or endeavor, but as a result of their faith in Him who has never gone to sleep, who has never gone on a journey, who has never retired from business.

What is that parable that tells us of the stronger than he binding the strong man by coming into his house in order to set the captive free? What does the incarnation mean except that God has come down among bad people to set those bad people free from the powers of evil, by binding with His mighty strength the strong man, in that he himself is stronger than the strongest power of evil.

PLEA FOR FAITH.

Have faith in God and do not be croakers. Have faith in God, and do not for a moment cast your eye down on the little, weak, fighting, spitting, struggling evil, but rather look up unto the hills with their majesty and their might and their strength, for it is there where God lives. God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in time of trouble, in time of every worthy battle, in time of every human need.

Where Is God?

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE.

"OH, where is the sea?" the fishes cried,
As they swam the crystal clearness through.
"We've heard from of old of the ocean's tide,
And we long to look on the waters blue.
The wise ones speak of the infinite sea;
Oh, who can tell us if such there be!"

The lark flew up in the morning bright,
And sung and balanced on sunny wings;
And this was its song: "I see the light,
I look o'er a world of beautiful things;
But flying and singing everywhere,
In vain I have searched to find the air."

In Old Nanking

With Two Pioneer Missionaries and at the Great University.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

ALTHOUGH PEKIN in the north is the capital of China, Nanking on the great river Yangtse-kiang is much nearer the center of the land, and has distinct advantages over its northern rival. It was at one time the capital of China. The first and second Emperors of the Ming dynasty reigned here, and their tombs are objects of interest just beyond the walls of the Manchu quarter.

When the capital was moved to Pekin, the people of the south resented the fact that they were to be ruled from so distant a seat of government. They have never ceased to cherish the hope that the central power may return to the south, or at least to a place nearer the middle line of the land. Nanking satisfies this condition and it is not too much to believe that should China achieve real nationality in its quest for modern things, the capital will again be placed at Nanking on the Yangtse.

We were naturally interested to see Dr. Macklin and his work as soon as possible after our arrival. He came over to the Sarvis home to take us for a tour of inspection about the mission. The property of the Disciples is located a short distance inside the Drum Tower gate. A portion of it is inclosed in a wall, like most of the mission compounds. Inside this wall are the chapel, some of the school buildings and missionary residences. Near by is Dr. Macklin's hospital and home.

OUR PIONEER MISSIONARY.

He is our pioneer missionary in China. He came out with E. T. Williams in 1886. The work then started with faith and courage has become the most important mission of the Disciples anywhere in the world. Dr. Macklin is a physician and surgeon of note. He was well trained for his work, and might have enjoyed a large and lucrative practice anywhere in America. But he preferred to give his life to mission work. He first went to Japan, but believing that China was a more needy field, he located in Nanking.

Here he has labored ever since, with occasional journeys to America. While on these trips to the home land he has visited conventions and churches, as is the custom of missionaries, in the effort to interpret the ministry of missions to Christians at home. But he has also used much of his scanty leisure time in studies such as would better prepare him for his medical and surgical work.

On two different furloughs he has devoted himself for some weeks at a time to research work in the biological laboratories of the University of Chicago and other institutions. The leading authorities in these schools have recognized at once his ability and experience, and have placed their materials and apparatus at his disposal, welcoming the opportunity to aid so distinguished a worker in his field.

Dr. Macklin explained to us at once that at his home they were in the grip of typhoid fever, with which the younger children were ill. But he gave himself repeatedly to our instruction in matters pertaining to the medical side of the mission. We visited the hospital, and were interested in the wards, the patients, the operating room, and the dispensary. The cost of such an institution is very great. The income provided by our foreign mission board has never been adequate to support it. But Dr. Macklin built up a large practice in the city, and devoted the income thus obtained to the hospital work.

He was for years the local surgeon of the Shanghai-Nanking Railroad, and for a time, of the Tientsin-Pukow Railway. He had also an important practice in the Imperial Maritime Customs, and at the British Consulate. These brought in a large revenue, which maintained the hospital on a fairly adequate basis. But for several years past Dr. Macklin has been more or less of an invalid. On his visits to Chicago he took long walks and submitted to a severe dietary to keep himself in condition for his studies. The result has been a falling off in the outside practice he was able to take, and a diminution of the work of the hospital. On our visit there, the only work attempted was done by native assistants with Dr. Macklin's oversight and direction in serious cases. He lamented the curtailing of the medical work of the mission, but was unable to supply longer the resources for its maintenance.

Chapel, University of Nanking.

"BEGGARS' WARD."

He took us through his "beggars' ward." Here were many men who had come in from the streets, sick or wounded, with no means of paying for treatment or even food. Dr. Macklin believes that some of the best results of his work have been seen in the restoration of such men to health and competence. A Chinese friend, of whom he has many, gave him a few acres of ground adjoining the hospital, and this he has turned into a garden, where such men can work. They are able, in this manner, to make some return for the kindness bestowed, and not infrequently go out to efficient living.

But in all his work the Doctor mingles the gospel with the medicine. Every patient in the wards, every beggar in the refuge, is made a bearer of the message before he receives other help, and daily instruction is given to all who come. The gospel of cleanness, health and work, which is the gospel of Christ, is preached and practiced there. Every one who asks help is taught to render help, even the most helpless. It is in the facing of such need that all the missionaries find their hardest trials. A little money would go so far in providing comfort for the poor victims of disease, or ignorance or cruelty, and a missionary finds himself studying the strictest economies with his meager salary in order to have a little fund with which to help the most desperate cases of destitution.

Before we left Nanking we were able to get a look into the Macklin home, in spite of the partial quarantine maintained. Mrs. Macklin is a true missionary wife and mother. Readers of Mrs. Garst's, "My Little Sister in Far Off China," one of the sections of her book, "In the Shadow of the Drum Tower," know the romantic and thrilling story of that household. We do not usually know much about the wives of our missionaries, except as we happen to know them personally in America, or meet them in the mission stations. But we have to remember that back of every one of these men, save in those cases where death has intruded, there is a woman whose devotion, insight, tact and courage have helped to make his success possible.

ANOTHER VETERAN.

I hope to take you with me on a trip with Dr. Macklin to one of his outstations, and to speak of his work of translation, but that must be another day, and just now I want you to meet the Meigses. They live in a home near the chapel, a big, hospitable home, in which the stranger is always made welcome. F. E. Meigs, though still a young man in years, is one of the veterans of the Nanking mission. His has been the work of developing the educational side of the mission, and more recently of bringing to consummation the most unique and impressive union of educational forces ever realized in any of the mission lands.

Nanking is perhaps the most renowned seat of learning in China. Its Examination Hall, with its long rows of cells for students, was one of the most celebrated in the Empire. It was natural that the missionaries of all bodies should recognize the fitness of establishing Christian schools at this seat of Confucian culture. In 1888 Mr. Meigs opened a boys' school, and about the same time similar work was started by the Methodists and Presbyterians. It was the feeling of Mr. Meigs that these foundations ought to be united for more effective service. He was able to secure the co-operation of his colleagues in a plan of union, and in 1906 the "Union Christian College" began its work, with himself as president. Later on the organization was more fully perfected, and the three Christian bodies united in "The University of Nanking." This institution is directed by a board representing the different bodies at home and on the field, and is carrying forward with enthusiasm the work of preparing young Chinese for leadership among their own people. The property of the University is splendidly located, within the walls of the city, but in a spacious, open section, near the mission compound of the Disciples.

THE UNIVERSITY BUILDINGS.

The buildings of the University are admirable. There is a chapel, a large science hall, a dormitory, a Y. M. C. A., a headquarters, and other buildings. The student body now numbers several hundred, the faculty is an excellent corps of teachers, foreign and native. There is a language school, in which the newly arrived missionaries are trained to use the Chinese language. Bible studies are required of all the students, and Prof. Meigs has been at the head of this department from the beginning. A University magazine is published, the student body is given such advantages, both intellectual and athletic, as American schools provide. Many of the upper class students understand English. We attended one day a class in economics taught by Mr. Sarvis in English. The University of Nanking is a magnificent example of united Christian work, and it is certain to be an example that will find imitation in other parts of China, and in other mission lands. We heard of it long before we reached China, and its work was well understood and approved in India. Its line will go out into all the earth, and its words to the end of the world.

The Disciples have already made notable contributions to this institution, and will make other and even more important ones. The hospital which Dr. Macklin has built up, and whose influence is so wide and significant, must become a part of the University Medical School. Already Dr. James Butchart, a surgeon of eminence, has been called from his medical service in Lu-Chow-fu to take the burden Dr. Macklin has been compelled in part to lay down. The addition of Dr. Butchart to the University staff will greatly strengthen it, and be a worthy contribution by the Disciples to so notable a union work. We have reason to be proud of these representatives, and the services they are rendering in our name.

But if union has been consummated in academic work with splendid results, even more remarkable is the enterprise of the Nanking Bible Training School and the Affiliated Theological Seminaries. In 1904 the Presbyterian Missions in China established the Presbyterian Union Theological Seminary in Nanking. The Methodist Episcopal Theological School was begun there in 1892. In July, 1908, the Mission of the Disciples voted to establish the Disciples' Bible College and Training School. Mr. A. E. Cory, now in America at the head of the Men and Millions Movement, was placed at the head of the school.

RAPID PROGRESS IN EDUCATION.

The first year's work was done in rented buildings. The next year the school was moved into new quarters, erected near the Drum Tower. The third year there was a graduating class of nine. A gift of $6,000 gold by Miss Mary M. Warren, for the erection of a more suitable building, led to the consideration of a still better location, and the possibility of uniting the three institutions for ministerial training. In accordance with this idea, the new building has been erected in the same compound with the structures of the Presbyterian Seminary, and the work of the united faculties has gone forward in perfect harmony.

This faculty is made up, in part, of Rev. J. C. Garrett, President, Prof. P. F. Price, Prof. H. F. Rowe, Prof. J. Leighton Stewart, and Rev. Frank Garrett, the latter the representative of the Disciples, and Professor of Old Testament Literature. Mr. Garrett is one of the most accomplished masters of the Chinese language connected with any mission in that land. His recent journey to America in the hopes that Mrs. Garrett's life might be saved, and its unsuccessful issue, are facts of recent history. No message brought to the Toronto Convention more deeply touched the hearts of the Disciples than that from Mrs. Garrett and her devoted husband, waiting by her side in Des Moines, and hardly had the convention closed when it became known that her sufferings were over.

In the published statements regarding this splendid co-operative work of three Christian bodies, the school is described as "interdenominational in character, thorough in intellectual processes, evangelical in doctrine, reverent in spirit, pedagogical in method, and practical in aim."

AT THE SERVICES.

The student body, both in the University and in the Bible College is such as to inspire the visitor with confidence in the future of China under such leadership. The chapel services at the Bible College were attended by an alert, eager minded company, many of whom are already doing the work of evangelists. The services of public worship held by the University filled the chapel building completely. Frequent lectures are given by members of the faculty and visitors. During last winter a series of evangelistic services was held by the members of the faculty, with admirable results. Pres. Bowen of the University is a man of fine culture and excellent leadership. He is now in this country, and was in attendance at some of the sessions of the Toronto convention.

The Disciples may well be proud of the part they have taken in these union efforts at educational work in Nanking. They are the prophecy of still further steps toward Christian unity. They prove that our missionaries on the field take seriously our historic mission as advocates of the unity of all God's people. Such an example, so admirably conducted and so successful, must prove of value as an object lesson to the schools and churches at home. It may be that China will yet teach us what Christian unity really means.

Foot Ball Team, University of Nanking.

To teach us the necessity of growth in believers, they are therefore often compared to things that grow; to "trees planted" in fruitful growing places, as "by the rivers of water;" to "cedars in Lebanon," where they are tallest.—Robert Leighton.

I will govern my life and my thoughts, as if the whole were to see the one and read the other; for what does it signify, to make anything a secret to my neighbor, when to God (who is the searcher of our hearts) all our privacies are open.—Seneca.

Church Federation in Practice

A Narrative of How Federation Has Actually "Worked" Among the Chicago Churches.

BY W. B. MILLARD, Executive Secretary.

UNITED PROTESTANTISM in Chicago is an accomplished fact. Its possibilities in the line of growth and achievement are almost beyond imagination. In a conversation with my friend, Rev. Dr. Gardner, Pastor of the New England Congregational Church, he himself having but recently come to us from the old mother country, England, he told me that they find it exceedingly difficult to bring about church federation in England. He said, with his soft, pleasing, English accent, "The Island is so small, the lines so sharply drawn, and the competition so keen that it seems impossible at present to bring the denominations together in friendly co-operation." I want to say that in my work thus far I have found absolutely none of this sectarian jealousy. I have found among the clergy and, if anything, even more among our laymen, an utter contempt for anything that savors of schism, division, rivalry or self-seeking. I find absolute agreement in the belief that we are one in spirit and in aim, and that we ought to be brothers here as well as hereafter. Men seem to be possessed with a perfect passion for unity and Christian brotherliness.

POWER IN UNION.

We are just getting to the point where we realize that when Protestantism really does get together it forms the mightiest force in the Christian world. Last June at a meeting of the Good Citizenship Committee the great importance of the nomination of a good school board was brought up. Our public school system, with its budget of $17,000,000.00 per annum and its army of 7,000 teachers, offers a most inviting field for corrupt politics and graft. Acting under the direction of the Good Citizenship Committee I waited on his honor, the Mayor, to assure him that the United Protestant Churches of Chicago, representing 600 churches and a constituency of about a quarter of a million, were greatly interested in the nomination of a School Board which should be composed of our most representative citizens. I pointed out the fact that the Church Federation Council is not a self-appointed and self-perpetuating body, but that we are elected by the churches and officially represent them. I assured him that we had no favors to ask and no nominations to suggest, but that we were greatly concerned as to the maintenance of the high standard of the School Board. The Mayor listened most attentively and respectfully, and when I had finished he seized me warmly by the hand and thanked me for the message which I had conveyed to him from the churches, and assured me that that was exactly the kind of a School Board which he intended to name. That he kept his word is seen in the fact that the first act of the new board was to decline to accept the resignation of our splendid School Superintendent, Mrs. Young.

THE MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE BILLS.

An illustration of the power of United Protestantism was found in the case of the Marriage and Divorce Bills which were introduced into the last Legislature by the Illinois Commission on Marriage and Divorce. I went to Springfield and interviewed some of the Senators and Assemblymen regarding the chance which those bills had for passage. I was assured emphatically that they had no chance whatever. One Senator in a burst of frankness gave this as the reason; he said, "Most of us men here are lawyers. These bills would cut off a lot of law business. We don't like bills which interfere with our business. Therefore these bills won't pass." I returned to my office and, after a conference with our Social Betterment Committee, I addressed a letter to the 5,000 Protestant ministers of every denomination throughout the length and breadth of the great State of Illinois. Those of you who are ministers remember that that letter made an appeal for the observance of Mothers' Day with some reference to those pending bills. One thousand replies came to our office saying that the request would be complied with. And it goes without saying that, if one thousand would take the time to write a reply, perhaps an equal number would comply with the request without taking the trouble to write. Certain it is that on that particular Sunday the pulpits of our great State rang clear and true on the subject of the integrity of the home. Immediately after our honorable representatives in the Legislature began to hear from their constituents, and behold, they saw a great light. On several preliminary test votes it appeared that a good majority for the bills had been secured and their passing seemed a foregone conclusion. At almost the last moment, by a bit of legislative jugglery, Speaker Wm. McKinley consigned the bills to some committee from whence it was impossible to withdraw them before adjournment. The bills were thus defeated by the political trickery of the speaker, but the fact was notably emphasized that when the United Church speaks it is the most potent power in our civilization.

THE BOXING BILL.

Another illustration of the power of the protest of United Protestantism was seen in the defeat of the so-called Boxing Bill. When in Springfield I was assured by Senator Magill, Senator Cornwell and others of the leaders of both House and Senate that the Prize Fight Bill seemed to have an overwhelming majority in its favor. On my return, at the suggestion of the Good Citizenship committee, a special union meeting of ministers was called to meet in the First Methodist Church. At that meeting ringing resolutions were adopted denouncing the proposed bill. Dr. Boynton, Chairman of the Good Citizenship Committee, was sent to Springfield to present the resolutions and to voice the protest of the united churches before the committees of both House and Senate and to his Excellency, the Governor. Letters were also sent from our office to every member of the Legislature and to every Mayor, Sheriff and Chief of Police in the State of Illinois, pointing out the way in which the proposed bill violated the fundamental principle of home rule. Leading laymen and ministers also were induced to send letters and telegrams of protest. The effective element in this campaign was that it became clear to our legislators that this was not the protest of a group of individuals, but was the voice of United Protestantism. The result has gone into history. When the bill came to a vote, instead of receiving the 77 votes necessary for passage, it could command but 44, and was therefore overwhelmingly defeated. In the State of Wisconsin the same bill had just become a law and that state is now disgraced by open prize fighting, simply because they were not so effectively organized there to fight the bill.

LIQUOR AND DANCING.

At our last Union Ministers' Meeting in the spring, Mrs. Virginia Brooks-Washburn and Judge Mary M. Bartelme told us of the demoralizing influence which the sale of liquor at the public dances of the city has upon our young girls. They assured us that this evil has caused the downfall of more girls than low wages and all other causes combined. Resolutions were passed at once directing our Committee on Social Purity to draft an ordinance forbidding the sale of liquor anywhere in the vicinity of a public dance hall, and to demand of our City Fathers the enactment of such a measure for the protection of the girls of the city. It is a difficult thing to get anything which looks like temperance legislation in the city of Chicago, but the united churches can get it if they are insistent enough. Our Committee is now at work on that proposition.

UNITING CHURCHES.

The combining of two or more little struggling churches into one strong church is a movement which embodies the very genius of our organization. A number of such federated churches already exist and are both successful and happy. Three different groups of churches have sent representatives to our office asking for help in the matter of getting together. I have assured them that if they will call a meeting I will appear with model constitutions, rules of procedure, and letters from churches which have effected similar federations, and show them how to get together with what business men call one set of "overhead expenses." Then they will be brethren in truth as well as in name, worshiping side by side, and will no longer be guilty of the ecclesiastical crime of sustaining two little, rival, competing institutions, which differ in nothing but name. Such unions require patient negotiation and involve many delicate questions, but we are working along that line and that is one of the things for which our Federation Council is strong.

THE WAY TO FELLOWSHIP.

In the New Testament order repentance always preceded baptism. When the church, my church, your church and every other church has repented of its bigotry, its sectarianism and its self-righteousness, it will be found that baptism, the order of the ministry and every other matter that has to do with Christian life will right itself. Then with the open Bible we shall be willing to trust each other to do that thing which he believes is right without breaking fellowship with him if he dissents from our interpretation. —Peter Ainslie, at Congregational Council.

Mrs. Pankhurst Comes and Goes

Telling How the English Militant Converted Chicago.

MRS. PANKHURST, the soul of the militant movement in England, and in fact throughout the world, has come and gone, so far as Chicago is concerned, and the city is still doing business. No buildings have been dynamited, no trains held up.

In fact, Mrs. Pankhurst seems to have converted Chicago!

One of the Chicago papers is responsible for the following rhyme. It was no doubt written before the subject of the attack had waved her wand before the city's hosts:

TO MRS. PANKHURST.

If you would not
  Try out our jails,
Please drop no acid
  In our mails.

Please throw no bombs
  And yield no sticks,
Also forget
  The stones and bricks.

Here you won't need
  Those weapons, prized,
Because, you see—
  We're civilized.

The same paper atoned for its breach of courtesy by printing in a later issue some lines written in a different spirit:

EMMELINE PANKHURST.

Before you came we had a notion
That your labors 'cross the ocean
Were, at best, a vain commotion.

Now we see conditions Stygian;
All our sneers were sacrilege; and
What you preach is world religion.

Will our sympathy give fruit?
No longer are our heartstrings mute
In your brave battle 'gainst the Brute.

Mrs. Pankhurst won her effects by letting her statement of facts and ideas speak for themselves. She did not plunge at once into explanation of those militant acts which have been made familiar by the press. She began by telling the conditions that had driven the women to revolt. She named the three main reasons thus:

The present English laws upon all the relations between man and woman.

The laws dealing with moral offenses against women and children.

The laws safeguarding girls (marriageable at 12 years with the age of consent at 16 years).

This militant leader with the dispassionate aloofness of those who deal with truths that speak for themselves gave instances of the terrible injustice which English law and administration of law work upon women. The low sigh of horror all over the Auditorium that greeted her most cruel story told how true was the foundation that she was laying.

"A great deal of the opposition which we have met," said Mrs. Pankhurst, "is due not to evil hearts, but to misunderstanding."

One of the reporters for the Chicago Evening Post interviewed the Queen Militant, and reports the following "findings" as a result of his interview. They concern chiefly her personality:

"She's a little woman. Her face is lined and wrinkled. Every line's a story, every wrinkle a premature reminder of her battle against odds. When she smiles it makes you sad. The smile excites pity. It's a brave smile, but it doesn't beam or clear up her tired countenance.

"When she talks you listen; you dare not miss a word. Her command of the English language impresses you. She never pauses for a word, and her words are pearls of wisdom. When she discusses persons and affairs, national and international, they impress you as being insignificant to the woman talking. She's dynamic, but not nervous; she's explosive, but not affected, and her earnestness brings heartfelt admiration from you. She's a tired little woman, and looks it; but, greatest of all, you realize she has something wonderful, a great mission, and you feel genuinely sorry when she looks chagrined as she attempts to instill her enthusiasm into other persons—and fails.

STRIKING IN APPEARANCE.

"She's small in stature and frail. Her hair is gray and her forehead high. She is intellectual and looks it. Her cheek bones are prominent and seem to emphasize the sunken and heavy appearance of her eyes. Her eyebrows arch, but her eyes are mere slits and appear like splits in round marbles. The eyes themselves are dark and soft; they seem to seek sympathy as they focus themselves on you, yet to an enemy the very essence of contempt could gleam from them.

"Her personality isn't of the magnetic sort, and yet you feel drawn to her. When you first gaze at Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst you feel sympathetic, but after you talk to her a few minutes you have added admiration to the sympathetic feeling, and you are inwardly hoping that you'll see the day when her mission is fulfilled.

"Don't picture Mrs. Pankhurst as cruel, for she isn't. She only strikes when she is struck at. When you hear scoffers scoff at her, remember that there were scoffers in the days of Christianity's dawn.

HER MISSION.

"When you hear women gaily discussing the voting privilege ask them if they know what it means. If they do not, tell them to hear Mrs. Pankhurst. If they cannot, tell them that—

"Mrs. Pankhurst wants to clear up politics by equal rights. She wants the feminine good to force out the corruptness and greed. When the corruptness and greed go, with them will go vice and immorality. And with that go disease and misery. And when disease is divorced from this world there'll be no need of a fight on quack doctors, and the undermined and weak physical mortals that crawl today will become Adams and Eves and life will be lived hundreds of years.

"Mrs. Pankhurst has a wonderful message. The evils the public is attempting to exterminate by teaching sex hygiene to school children Mrs. Pankhurst is wiping away by seeking to give the women the vote. Both are good methods, but hers is the better.

BATTLE IS FOR MEN, TOO.

"Mrs. Pankhurst's mission may never be fulfilled, but she's laying down her life for it, and by doing so is teaching every person the greatest lesson to be had if they are only willing to learn it. Her battle is for men. Don't think it is only for women.

"As Mrs. Pankhurst teaches, men are the weaker sex, and not women. When the day comes that men set for themselves the same standard that they expect a woman to keep, that day will see the birth of a new world, and a divorce from the misery, greed, horrors and corruption."

As Little Children

BY THOMAS CURTIS CLARK.

AS little children playing along the wide seashore,
  Gathering pearly shells, turning them o'er and o'er,
  Tiring of each in turn but to seek a brighter one,—
So play we, children all, till life's play hour is done.

As little children playing along the wide seashore,
Building their houses of sand where the wild waters roar,
Then, when the waves devour, crying out to the heedless deep,—
So play we, children all, and are left on the shore to weep.

As little children playing along the wide seashore,
Launching their fragile barks freighted with precious store,
Tracing their wayward course till the waves their treasures spend,—
So play we, children all, and shall unto the end.

UNION CHURCHES.

THE CAUSE OF Christian union goes forward in many directions. The quiet movement to unite the churches in fields where such union is economical and impressive proceeds. Disciple ministers ought to welcome the opportunity of ministering to such union churches, whether they are combinations of Baptists and Disciples, or include other Christian bodies as well. It is by this method that the cause of union is to be most effectually advanced.

And to this end the Disciples have come into existence. No congregation ever need fear the loss of its life by accepting a place in a union church where the principles for which our Lord prayed are given place. We hope to see the number of such union churches greatly increase. They are sure to be object lessons in economy and efficiency.

CAN YOU SPELL IT?

LAST summer a company containing a number of rather prominent people had assembled for an outing, and as they sat about after luncheon, one of the members of the party produced the following typewritten sentence:

"It is agreable to view the unparalleled embarrassment of an harassed saddler or peddler sitting on a cemetery wall, gauging the symmetry of a skillfully peeled potato."

He requested each member of the company to write that sentence and it was done. Then one by one, the group spelled it out as it had been written. There was not one person present who had not misspelled at least one word, and some had misspelled as many as five.

The man who wrought this mischief in that company added to the merriment of the occasion by saying that there was an unconfirmed rumor to the effect that President Eliot had given that sentence to President Lowell and that the latter had distinguished himself by misspelling seven of the words.

None of those words is difficult; none is unusual. Perhaps you would like to try this sentence on your friends, and afterward make up your own mind whether we need any such thing as spelling reform.

THE WILL TO GET UP IN THE MORNING.

THE "Will to Believe" has been discussed thoroughly and the psychologists have indulged in no end of study and debate over this matter of making decisions. The practical problem, however, is the will to get up in the morning. A distinguished French professor says that the readiness to get up promptly and go to work in the morning is the real test of character. To dawdle under comfortable blankets one minute after it is time to get up indicates a diseased will and a weak character. . The test comes very regularly every twenty-four hours. What spiritual state are we in? It's time to get up.

NO CHANGE OF NAME.

WE HEARTILY congratulate the Episcopal Church on the vote adopted at its General Convention, requiring a two-thirds majority to amend the Constitution. The effect of this amendment is to settle for years to come the vexed and divisive question of a change in the name of the Protestant Episcopal Church and of the title page of its Prayer Book. The High Church party has been urging this change with great vehemence. Had it taken place it might easily have produced a disruption in the Episcopal Church. It certainly would have turned the clock back, so far as any progressive action of that communion is concerned, and would have given aid and comfort to that body within the Episcopal Church which curries favor with Rome. The proposal to call the Episcopal Church "the American Catholic Church" was one, which if adopted, would have poured contempt upon the most glorious thing the Episcopal Church ever did, and the other name proposed, "The American Church," would have been resented, and rightly so, by every church organization in the United States.

Whatever hope there is of union or comity between the Episcopal Church and other Protestant organizations has been greatly strengthened by this amendment. We heartily commend the Episcopal Church, and felicitate it on this outcome of what threatened to be a very serious crisis.

BRUTALITY REVIVED IN FOOTBALL.

THE deliberately brutal practices which threatened a few years ago to cause the abolition of college football have reappeared. In some western games this season men have been sent from the field for using tactics disgraceful both to themselves and to the institutions they represent. Many similar but less flagrant violations of true sportsmanship have passed unpunished by over-lenient officials. Unnecessary roughness in tackling—quite a minor evil in comparison with the tricks of low ruffianism especially referred to—has been the rule in crucial games rather than the exception.

More or less concerted attempts have been made to disable star players, while a more or less general practice of "kneeing," "neck-wringing," and similar expedients well known to the "hooligans" of the game has characterized the play of some teams. Two western athletic directors have voiced public protest. It is to be hoped they will be heeded. Already good sportsmen differ as to whether or not even clean football is too dangerous a game to be allowed to continue.

Brutal and demoralized college football must not be tolerated.

FATHER AND SON.

OUR recent introduction of Mr. Floyd Price Willett to the readers of The Christian Century on the occasion of his departure to accept a professorship in the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut should now be modified by the substitution of the name Herbert L. Willett, Jr., in place of the one given then. The eldest son of the Contributing Editor of this paper has long persisted in the desire of wearing his father's name. Lest this wish might prove a mere youth's caprice it was not encouraged by his parents. But with the attainment of his majority—and some years besides—his graduation from the University of Chicago and his professorial appointment in the leading Christian college of the near East, Mr. Willett has reached the conclusion that he is competent to decide a matter of this sort for himself! The faculty list of the Beirut institution, consequently, contains the name, "Herbert L. Willett, Jr.," and his articles promised to The Christian Century will appear under his new appellation. Mr. Willett has chosen his distinguished father's field—Old Testament—as his special scholarly interest, and by the adoption of his father's name has revealed in an act as delicate as it is unmistakable the affectionate respect in which he holds him. From a private letter to his father written from Aley, in Lebanon, on Sept. 27, 1913, we have asked permission to use the following informal paragraphs to suggest to our readers something of the circumstances of Mr. Willett's new situation and also, by his style, to whet their appetites for the articles he is presently to send.

"As I sit in the cool breeze on a soft divan decorating the spacious porch of a most hospitable home which overlooks the valleys, hills, villages, fields, and air between Aley and Beirut I am almost moved to tears to think of my poor deserted family probably sweltering under the torrid rays of a desecrating sun in the realms of Ohio and Illinois.

For a sea-tossed soul with longings for friends and relatives very close to his heart this is a haven of rest, second to none but Pentwater, Michigan (after the Pere Marquette is safely left behind). Of course the railroad here covering twelve miles in two and a half hours (if lucky) is not much faster than our snail-like acquaintance of fifteen years' receivership. But then it has more to contend with since it travels up and down about as much as it does to and fro. It got us here, and what more can we ask in the Orient.

"I am here with Professor Porter, head of the History Department of the Syrian Protestant College, and acting head of the institution during the absence of President Bliss.

"This is probably in virtue of his years, which number nearly seventy, and his services of nearly fifty years' duration. He's no fossil, I might add, and cleaned me neatly at croquet this afternoon, after walking my shoes into shreds all over the hills this morning. He will probably keep me up to the limit in the history work for, as I wrote you before, I am to take one of the vacant places in the history department for this year, as instructor in ancient history. Along with this I have a course in physiology (as if I knew a cornea from a cranium!)

"We rounded into sight of our future home about 3:00 p. m., Wednesday, and for an hour or more pandemonium reigned. I never saw people so pleased to get home, and as the ship passed the college grounds and the bell was rung and flags were raised, the enthusiasm of our party belonging to the college knew no bounds. While the quarantine inspection was proceeding, small boats laden with money-seeking Syrians and friend-seeking collegians were kept in a line some distance from the boat, and the passengers exercised their lungs to the fullest extent. Finally they were permitted to come aboard and we had a great reception. Then we all went ashore and by various means arrived at the college. I had enough coin to ride on a tram. Some walked!

"Today we walked most of the morning, seeing much of the country from the high rocky hills behind Aley, and jumping over stones and prickly bushes in our path. It is now eight o'clock and we have just had Arabic prayers with the servants. I am going to see if Hoffman or some of the others wants to go to Baalbek with me for a day next week. We will have several days before it is necessary to be back at the college, and that would be a good journey.

"I spent most of the morning in the company of Townsend MacCoun and Major Condor in roaming through the mountains and valleys of this ancient land, and find that if I could ever get a word in edgewise I would sometimes like to contradict or correct some statements of the former at least."

THE CHAUTAUQUA CIRCUIT.

THE severe criticism of Secretary-of-state Bryan has accomplished at least one good thing, in that it has brought out in clear light the true character of the Chautauqua assemblies which have been identified by overzealous critics of the Commoner with cheap vaudeville and other similar forms of entertainment. Just as the lyceum flourished east of the Alleghanies in the middle of last century, giving to towns and villages remote from the large cities and academic centers the best talent procurable in music and literature, so has the Chautauqua assembly at a later period been equally effective throughout the growing West. As a democratic form of popular education it has never been equaled, and no study of the social evolution of the United States during the past quarter of a century and more can fail to recognize the part it has played in national development.

What Emerson and Beecher were to the older lyceum, Bryan is to the more modern Chautauqua. Many of the great newspapers of the East, with characteristic provincialism, in the bitterness of their attack upon the secretary of state have brought into question the Chautauqua institution. Whatever one may think of Mr. Bryan's politics, we fancy there is little sympathy on the part of the average man with the evidently inspired assault upon a man who with one exception has a stronger hold upon the popular imagination than any other American. Only recently, an audience, only a comparatively small portion of which had probably voted for the party represented by Mr. Bryan, cheered his name to the echo.

Probably this is a most frequent occurence, and is a surer indication of the real feeling of the American public about Mr. Bryan's relation to the Chautauqua circuit than an editorial in the Boston Transcript, whose Brahmanism is so seriously offended by the shirt-sleeve philosophers of the tent.

MEXICO AND CHRISTIAN STATESMANSHIP.

PRESIDENT WILSON and Secretary Bryan are engaged upon the attempted solution of well-nigh as difficult a task as conceivably could confront Christian statesmen. Without doubt, the very fact that these men are true Christians as well as statesmen, and that they represent a Christian nation, causes the greatest of the difficulties they are facing. President Wilson, in his dealings with Mexico, is standing upon a principle more advanced than has ever before formed a basis of international diplomacy. He is demanding that justice and freedom shall be established in a neighboring nation.

A decade ago such a policy would have been deemed an impertinence, and probably would have caused foreign diplomats to smile at its naivete. Today, statesmen of the most enlightened nations, while recognizing the immense difficulty of applying such a principle, stand aside with respect and admiration, though probably with more or less incredulity, awaiting the issue. As to Great Britain, the later and more reliable among the conflicting advices indicate a hearty sympathy on her part. Her own Gladstone was a pioneer in Christian statesmanship, and her people can understand. Meanwhile the task is an heroic one, and increasing criticism at home makes it no easier.

Even from quarters where strong faith might have been expected, early rumors of foreign dissatisfaction and possible complications with Great Britain have brought expressions of grave doubt as to the wisdom and capacity of the president. Later news is more reassuring, however, tending to silence the faint-hearted and critical. It is a noble policy. The president should be given a fair chance to work out the great task he has set himself, that the nation may be worthy of its motto, "In God We Trust."

BEECHER ON HUMOR.

WHEN Henry Ward Beecher was lecturing on preaching in Yale College, one of the students interrupted him, saying: "Is it a proper thing to make an audience laugh by an illustration?" Mr. Beecher replied: "Never turn aside from a laugh any more than you would from a cry; but never try to raise a laugh for laugh's sake, when you are preaching on solemn things. But if mirth comes up naturally, do not stifle it; strike that chord, and particularly if you want to make an audience cry. If I can make them laugh, I do not thank anybody for the next move; I will make them cry."

At another time, Mr. Beecher gave his estimate of the power of humor as follows: "Nothing on earth can smile but man! Gems may flash reflected light, but what is a diamond flash compared to an eye flash and a mirth flash? Flowers cannot smile; this is a charm that even they cannot claim. It is the prerogative of man; it is the color which love wears, and cheerfulness and joy. It is a light in the windows of the face by which the heart signifies it is at home and waiting. A face that cannot smile is like a bud that cannot blossom, and dries up on the stalk. Laughter is day, and sobriety is night, and a smile is the twilight that hovers gently between both—more bewitching than either."

THE NEW AMBASSADOR TO HOLLAND.

DR. HENRY VAN DYKE has been appointed United States ambassador at The Hague, and has taken up his residence in the capital of Holland. It is one of the encouraging signs of the times that men of letters are having due recognition at the hands of the administration. Other nations have long made it a point of honor to send scholars to their diplomatic posts, on the general principle that they will bring to foreign capitals a better type of representation than the ordinary politician. More than this, it is one of the beneficent results of such recognition of scholarship that the work of research and inquiry into fields of archæology and history receives fresh and merited attention from men of scholarly habits.

The value to America of a diplomatic and consular service prepared to appreciate the values of historical and literary investigation would be very great. The appointment of Dr. van Dyke is a recognition of scholarship and literature, and at the same time an act of tact and wisdom on the part of the administration.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I should like to see in The Christian Century an editorial discussion of the causes and significance of the withdrawal from the Disciples' pulpits of so many of our most capable and devoted ministers to enter the ministry of other communions. If one is to infer from the frequency with which this change of affiliation has recently taken place it would seem, Mr. Editor, as if this is about the livest subject to which I refer, and I am prompted to set out my reflections

In an evening's conversation with a well-informed friend, himself a Disciple minister, he counted the names of fourteen strong preachers who had within the past three or four years accepted calls to pulpits of Presbyterian, Congregational, Baptist and Episcopal bodies. Some of the names mentioned were very well known, conspicuous names, representing pastors of some of our best churches, a former college president and a divinity teacher or two.

It seems that the Congregational communion has received a majority of these ministers, although it is reported that a considerable number of younger men have passed quietly out of the eastern seminaries in which they were studying into the Presbyterian and Episcopal ministry without their departure being noticed in the public prints.

This procedure is becoming all too frequent not to deserve notice at your hands, Mr. Editor, and at the hands of the best interpreters of our church life and our plea for unity. I have been thinking much upon it since the conversation to which I refer and I am prompted to set out my reflections before your readers. If I may have your permission I think I shall use more than one issue in which to do so.

DOCTOR GARRISON, I notice, has something to say on this subject in a recent article of his. Perhaps his words afford as good a text as I shall find with which to begin. He says:

> Recently a fellow-minister was speaking to the Easy Chair Editor concerning some young ministers who had been connected with us, but had taken pastorates in another religious body, whose aims and ideals are quite different from those of the Disciples. He said that these men felt that their condition was much improved by the change; that they had less criticism and received larger salaries. One cannot but regret that anyone should entertain this idea of the ministry. If men are seeking easy places, large salaries and freedom from criticism, the ministry is about the last calling they should enter. Christ wants men who can "endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ." If there has been a change of conscientious convictions on the part of these young men, they did the proper thing in making the change, but it cannot be justified on the ground stated. One has never caught a worthy vision of the possibilities of this young and aggressive movement that is pleading for the unity of Christendom through a return to Christ and to the simplicity and catholicity of New Testament teaching, who, because of some nagging or criticism of persons who may be narrow-minded, is willing to forsake its ministry and its high calling for an easier task elsewhere. The men who have made this movement what it is—a movement that is attracting the attention of the religious world—were made of sterner and more heroic stuff. These men saw a heavenly vision and like Saul of old were not disobedient unto it even in the days of persecution and social ostracism.

I do not now recall a paragraph in my venerable friend's writings in which he so failed to sense the inwardness of a human situation—such as this is—as he has done in the above quotation. Many of these men who have left our ministry are personally well known to Dr. Garrison. For an understanding of their motives in crossing the line into other communions he could hardly be dependent upon information imparted by the fellow-minister with whom he was conversing..

ONE can hardly imagine that so just a man as Doctor Garrison seriously believes that sordid motives entered into the decision of these men to accept Congregational and Presbyterian pulpits. The truth is that in the case of every one whom my friend and I discussed the change was not made without deep agony of soul. In not a single case could it be said that the step was taken as the result of petty criticism or of a selfish desire for larger salary.

The important fact to bear in mind is that these men—barring now the student ministers whose mettle had never been tested—were among the most devoted and self-sacrificing of our entire ministry.

The financial and ease-loving explanation of their step does injury to some of the purest and highest-minded men who have ever stood in Disciples' pulpits, and I am surprised that the sympathetic discernment with which Dr. Garrison usually interprets the actions of his brethren has so completely failed him here.

For myself, I find a certain element of satisfaction mixed with my regret when I reflect upon the thing which Dr. Garrison without qualification deplores. There is something to be said for the new point of view which allows men to make trans-denominational movements like these without exciting great emotion either in the denomination left or in the one entered by the minister.

THE time was when the Congregational body would have felt a distinct sense of conquest over their Disciple neighbors at receiving in one state alone in a period of less than three years, three of the best known ministers of the latter communion. But I have not heard or read any allusion to the matter at all, on their part, save a bare statement of the fact. It does not now seem so extraordinary a thing as it once did.

Nor has a great stir been made among the Disciples over their loss. These men who have left the Disciples, many of them, still fraternize easily with their former brethren. They suffer no mark of ostracism at the hand of those with whom they formerly affiliated.

Surely the sharpness of denominational feeling has been wonderfully softened in our times! I derive a substantial grain of comfort when I reflect on that. None of us feels that our erstwhile co-workers have gone over to the "enemy." These Congregational churches and Presbyterian churches and Episcopal churches are not "enemies," but churches of Christ, we all nowadays frankly concede, and to be pastors of them is to do Christ's work and to win his blessing.

This feeling of appreciation and co-operation among the various Christian bodies is one which Disciples of Christ should foster. It is the only atmosphere in which the purposes they most passionately cherish can be wrought out. The differences and distinctions among the various sects have always been minimized and even ridiculed by Disciples. The basic presupposition of the plea for unity is that the essential things, the things wherein Christ's gospel consists, are the things upon which all of us are united; sectarianism consists in this, that we have allowed non-essentials to separate us into mutually exclusive groups between which no—or but little—ecclesiastical interchange was possible.

I can hardly imagine how Doctor Garrison's pen, which has pleaded earnestly for Christian unity so long, could let itself slip into writing that the "aims and ideals" of a Congregational church, for example, were "quite different from those of the Disciples." To me such a statement betokens the sorriest kind of provincialism, of sectarianism. It overlooks the great Christian "aims and ideals" which a Disciples' church and a Congregational church share in common, and it prompts one to unduly magnify the significance of the step taken by the ministers who have accepted the pastorates of these churches.

EASY trans-denominational exchange of ministers indicates the passing of the old exclusiveness, the old sectarianism, and the emergence of a new feeling of catholicity, of co-operation and unity.

My mind dwells upon this aspect of the matter, not in order to justify the step taken by these ministers—for this I do not do—but to keep myself from shrinking into a sectarian state of mind wherein I may make as egregious a blunder as I conceive our good Dr. Garrison has done in his unsympathetic judgment quoted above.

My thoughts have gone somewhat farther into this subject than I shall have space to indicate at this time on this page. We shall have to postpone to the end of another day the consideration of the more intimate significance of the departure of these ministerial brethren. This I will try to do on this page next week.

Meanwhile, Mr. Editor, I would suggest that a very instructive and pertinent thing for The Chistian Century itself to do would be to secure from a number of these brethren statements of their reasons for leaving the Disciples' pulpit and accepting appointments with other communions.

Such statements would, I venture to guess, be suggestive, if not illuminating.

METHODIST MEN ADVANCE!

As an example of efficiency in convention activity to be set over against the late Episcopal General Convention in New York City, stands the meeting of the Methodist men, held in Indianapolis, Oct. 29 to 31. That things were actually done at this meeting may have been due to the fact that the laymen seemed to have control. To the fact that the Bishops ruled in the Episcopal convention was undoubtedly due the little accomplished there. For the deputies, representing the parish clergymen and laymen, voted through several important advance measures, but the Bishops straightway squelched progressive action.

Bishop MacDowell Praises Convention.

Five hundred officers, 1,000 ministers and 1,500 laymen constituted the Methodist assembly, which was in fact "the Methodist extension of the Laymen's Missionary Movement." The significance of the convention is well stated by Bishop W. F. McDowell, of Chicago: "The vision of the total task of the church at home and abroad, the sense of our very partial fulfilment of that task, the new consciousness of the used and unused power of the church, and, above all, the quickened consciousness of fellowship with God and the power of God were the outstanding features of the convention. The convention was saved from doing anything small and immediate by its resolute and sane and firm purpose to hold steadily to the thing that is large and permanent. The outcome of the gathering will not be fully seen for long years yet. The men who attended the convention can never be the same men again. They will go a long way toward leading the church to a larger and better fulfilment of the task Jesus Christ has put upon us."

The "mood" of the convention was different from most Methodist conventions. And yet, remarks the Northwestern Christian Advocate, there has probably never been a more representative Methodist assembly in the history of the church. Every state was represented by ministers and laymen. The personnel was considerably different from that which meets quadrennially at General Conference time. There was apparently an utter absence of personal interest or political aspirations, says the Advocate. There were no officers to elect, no positions to maintain. There was apparently only one mind and heart in the great assembly, and that was one of expectancy. For the first day or two the questions were asked: "What is to come of this convention?" "What do the leaders have in mind?" To these questions, it is said, there was a negative shake of the head. Everyone seemed to be in the dark, but all were apparently receptive. There was that undercurrent of confident expectancy which induced men to wait before the Lord to receive whatever he might send.

A Significant Report.

But just what was done at the convention? Principally, a committee on policy, consisting of fifty-four members, made a significant report, which was enthusiastically adopted. In this report the convention of Methodist men commits itself and calls the entire church:

"1. To a program of personal evangelism at home and abroad which shall enable the church to reach effectively the last man with the message of redemption; and that we set as a goal an annual minimum gain of 10 per cent in the full membership of every local church.

"2. To the principle of social redemption in all lands and the application of the spirit and teachings of Christ to the total relations of man.

"3. To the bringing of our youth everywhere into real Christian life and to their training for effective Christian service by all those agencies which the church has created for this high purpose.

"4. To the practice of the principles of stewardship by every member of our church as defined by our discipline. This recognizes God as giver and owner of all things, man as a steward, holding as a sacred trust all he has, the systematic application of a portion of income to the advancement of God's kingdom, and the dedication of one-tenth of income as a minimum.

"5. To the universal introduction of every-member canvass and the weekly offering by every man, woman and child of our church, with these two principles always in view:

"(1) The standard apportionments met in full as a minimum achievement.

"(2) At least as much for others as ourselves as our near goal.

"6. To the hearty and full support of those boards which are created by the church as the proper instruments for the application of benevolence of the church to the world's need. And we emphasize the paramount claims of those regular causes established and proved by the authority of the church.

"7. To the loyal and loving support of all those forms of Christian activity, in all lands, as expressed in our educational, philanthropic, and evangelistic institutions, looking everywhere toward the care of the sick, the aged, the orphan, the unfortunate, and toward the training of our youth in the spirit of Christ.

"8. To an inspirational and educational campaign having in view our full relation to the civic, industrial, social, educational, philanthropic, and missionary problems of our age—and to the enlistment of the unused energies of the men of the church under the leadership of the Son of Man.

"9. To an emphatic reaffirmation of the action of the General Conference on the subjects of higher Christian education and the imperative need of vastly larger funds for our schools, colleges and universities; the necessity of more liberal support for our ill-paid ministry, especially in view of the increased cost of living; the supreme claim of the retired veterans for an adequate support in their old age; and we commit ourselves with heartiness and devotion to the well-known attitude of the church on the subjects of temperance, social purity, and Sabbath observance.

"10. To the support and circulation and the faithful reading by ourselves and in our homes of that Christian literature in book and periodical created by our church for the training, instruction and inspiration of our people.

"11. To a program which shall bring to districts and local churches the principles, ideals, and methods which have found expression in this convention. And we ask all our boards to set aside their secretaries and other officers, as far as possible and necessary, for the service of the districts and area groups in a unified campaign for all these approved causes.

"12. To the utmost co-operation of our church with all other 'churches which exalt our Christ' in a common and united effort in all lands to bring in Christ's kingdom."

That twelfth recommendation sounds better to the church at large than any of the final results of the New York convention, above mentioned!

The Chief Result.

Of course the chief result of the Indianapolis convention was the inauguration upon a large scale of the "every member canvass," and this plan will undoubtedly be adopted in thousands of churches during the coming year. The program launched will mean greatly increased prosperity to the church.

WHY EPISCOPALIANS CANNOT FEDERATE.

Probably the disappointment of sister churches—if we are, indeed, "sister churches"—is deepest because of the refusal of the General Convention to vote the Episcopal church a constituent member of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, as proposed in resolutions passed by a majority of both orders in the House of Deputies, and rejected by the House of Bishops.

In looking through the exchanges for some really vital matters to report, we find that the leading editorial of the Living Church (Milwaukee) is given to explaining why this step was not taken. We quote the heart of the editorial:

The basic proposition of the Federal Council—that of "the essential oneness of the Christian Churches of America"—is directly opposed to the principle of one Catholic and Apostolic Church, in the sense that that term has always been used in the historic church. Its implications are the common ones of American pietism of a generation ago, when religious animosities were first becoming allayed and when multiplied sectarianism was first beginning to be deprecated. They were that "one church is as good as another;" that "we are all on the same road to heaven;" that "it doesn't make any difference what a man believes so long as he is sincere." These platitudes or half truths are directly implied in the acceptance of the principle of the "essential oneness of the Christian Churches." They are intended to be so implied. They are the principles that are held by the Protestant churches generally. In adopting that platform, the Federal Council has distinctly, if not deliberately, excluded from its body those churches that stand on the Catholic platform of the Nicene Creed, historically interpreted. If there is "narrowness" in the position that we cannot work together on that platform, it is the narrowness of those who drew up a platform on the basis of their own views, and then expect other Christian people who hold contrary views to waive them for the sake of coming into their federation. The only way to practice seriously the principles of friendly conference and co-operation is first to refrain from trying to commit other people to one's own point of view.

The Book World

BY ARTHUR GORDON.

THINKING BLACK, by Dan Crawford. You probably read Dr. Barton's graphic story of Crawford's years in Africa. It was printed in the Christian Century of Aug. 28th. If you did not read it, get out your copy of that date and do so. It will tell you of this remarkable "successor of David Livingstone" much more fully and interestingly than I can take space to do now. But when the big 500-page book came to my table for review, I promised myself a trip through the jungle in the best of companionship. Nor is the reading any disappointment. From the beginnings of that "boring in" process, which started on the west coast twenty-three years ago, straight through the three thick sections of the book you are kept in the grip of the subject. To be sure there is little method about it. You rarely have a date given, and when the author wants to add some new impression to a section already completed he heads it merely with the date "Later." Moreover the style is elusive and at times incoherent. Crawford is fond of proverbs—as are the black people he is trying to interpret—and in many instances the facts you are anxiously trying to elicit from his narrative lose themselves in by-paths of metaphor, word play and exclamation. He speaks of himself constantly as "the Missionary," yet he started in as a victim of tuberculosis, seeking relief in the tropic atmosphere, continued without support of mission board or committee, and came out without recording anything in the form of definite work undertaken in behalf of missions. But no one can doubt that such a man as he shows himself to be would lose no chance to preach his gospel, and from other sources we know that he has rendered a large part of the Bible into the Bantu language. The book is not a travel document, in spite of constant allusions to the trail and a few place names. It is not a biography, though there are places where for a moment one catches sight of the author himself. It is not a mission journal, though one hears fragments of sermons spoken to nameless and elusive natives, and there is much Scripture phrase. It is not a scientific study of Africa or the Africans, though it is full of half-told bits of folk-lore, fleeting scenes of horror or revelry, characteristic of the tribes, and glimpses of elephant droves, lurking lions, serpents coiled in the huts one seeks as places of refuge from the terrors of tropical storms, birds of wonderful plumage, and flaming sunsets across the levels of Lake Mivern. It is rather a book of impressions, and done from start to close in the impressionistic style. Some pictures of cruelty, lust, sub-human indecency and vileness a more practiced pen would have left unrecorded. Some scenes of heroism, suffering, beauty, a more restrained pen could not have set down. The smell of the jungle, the glimpses of the vanishing trails, the familiar sight of imminent and frightful death, the gnaw of starvation, the grip of agonizing thirst, the food of vile and abominable things, the courts of aboriginal despots, the orgies of villages, naked and beyond shame, the horrors of the slave trade, with its unspeakable vileness and its fearful waste, and now and then a white face in the enfolding blackness of African crowds, these are the things that keep one going on through the many pages, till the last word. A follower of Livingstone, Dan Crawford surely is. For he is returning, as he says, to live and die among his black people. "Thinking Black" has been his daily habit for a score of years, and he will go on thinking black to the end of the day. (Doran, $2.00, net.)

SOCIAL PROGRAMMES IN THE WEST, by Charles Richmond Henderson, Ph.D. When Mrs. Caroline E. Haskell of Chicago endowed a lectureship to interpret Christianity to the non-Christian peoples of Asia, she named it the "Barrows Lectureship" in honor of her pastor, the Rev. John Henry Barrows, who later became the first incumbent. At that time she wrote, "I cherish the expectation that the Barrows Lectures will prove, in the years to come, a new golden band between the East and West." There have thus far been four lecturers,

Rev. Newell Dwight Hillis.

John Henry Barrows, Andrew D. Fairbairn, Charles Cuthbert Hall and Charles Richmond Henderson. The last of these visited India, Burmah, China and Japan last winter, and delivered his lectures in the chief cities of those lands to large audiences of University instructors, students, professional and business men, and many women. In every instance the lectures were received with the greatest favor, and in many cases Dr. Henderson was induced to deliver additional addresses, and to visit points not originally included in his itinerary. The purpose of the lectures was to make clear to the oriental mind, in a region where Hinduism, Parseeism, Jainism, Buddhism, Shinto and Confucian teachings prevail, the practical workings of Christianity in the lands where it is best known. Former lecturers dwelt on the philosophy and literature of Christianity. Dr. Henderson wished to describe what it is actually doing to realize the brotherhood of man and the Kingdom of God. He pointed out the Christian conception of mutual relationship and responsibility, public and private relief of dependent and abnormal members of society, the treatment of criminals, especially the growing recognition of the principle of redemption rather than mere punishment, the methods used in preventing disease and promoting the health of the community, efforts to improve the economic and cultural situation of wage earners, and the attempts now making to provide for the progress of the nation and humanity. A syllabus was provided the hearers, giving an outline of the theme and suggestions regarding literature. Dr. Henderson went to Asia not only as the Barrows lecturer, but as an official representative of many social agencies of betterment and reform, with which he is connected. He also bore the credentials of the three French organizations, the International Associations for the Legal Protection of Workmen, for the Combat with Unemployment, and for Social Insurance. The book is the latest and best compendium of information regarding social progress in America and Europe, under the guidance of the Christian spirit, and is an ideal presentation of the theme to non-Christian readers. THE QUEST OF HAPPINESS, by Newell Dwight Hillis. One of the oldest subjects of human inquiry, and one of the latest, is here considered in nearly a score of chapters by one of the most popular preachers of our age. Dr. Hillis brings to the discussion freshness of spirit, the wisdom of experience, a wealth of illustration, and a genuine desire to render service to the multitudes who are trying to find happiness in impossible ways. He is convinced that it can be found by any one, the most unhappy, the most unfortunate, the most sinful. The story of Comfort as runs through the book like a golden thread, a revised reprint of a valuable volume. (Macmillan, 50 cents, net.)

LITERARY NOTES.

DAN CRAWFORD, AUTHOR OF "Thinking Black," who has been a missionary in Africa for twenty-two years and who is now lecturing in the United States, says that he translated the Bible into the Bantu language, which has nineteen genders. Don Marquis, commenting in the New York Evening Sun on this statement, thinks that astonishment at this "language having nineteen genders" will vanish upon reflection. "Everyone," says Mr. Marquis, "admits that there are three genders in English —masculine, feminine and neuter. And everyone has felt the need of more genders to indicate shades of personality which actually exist, but for which there exists no direct medium of expression. There is a Minor Poet type, for instance, which you would scarcely call masculine. Neither is it feminine; nor yet neuter, in the same sense that a tree is neuter. There is a certain Militant Suffragette type, which you would scarcely call feminine; neither is it masculine. Varieties, almost endless in number, will inevitably occur to serious students of our modern civilization."

PROFESSOR HENRY DRUMMOND is not usually thought of as a figure for fiction yet in Keith Fraser's recently published "Garden of Spices" his well-known love for children is delightfully pictured in a garden scene wherein a little child, fallen upon trouble, comes unexpectedly upon the great man, only to discover the outgoings of his deep sympathy to a little one in distress.

Of Human Interest

Longfellow as Rhymster.

Among the many glimpses of Longfellow to be found in the recently published "Letters of Charles Eliot Norton" is one illustrating his knack of writing nonsense verses. When Norton was a boy of 14 he and a cousin printed—with a pen—four copies of a little magazine. In the first number a "subscriber" challenged any reader to find an English rhyme for "assafoetida," and in the second the challenge was accepted under the signature, Mr. Grimes, H. W. L., as follows:

I once fretted a
Friend with assafoetida.
Which I regretted a Great many times;
I send you this answer
To show you I can, sir,
As well as any man, sir,
Tag together rhymes.

The editors of the Norton letters vouch for Longfellow's authorship of this bit of fooling, and say that it may safely be placed beside his more familiar doggerel lines about the little girl who, when she was bad, was horrid, and Mr. Finney, who "had a turnip, and it grew behind the barn."

Holding Up America.

James J. Hill on the occasion of his seventy-fifth birthday talked of the marvelous speed of American trains.

"Three men," he said, "a Frenchman, an Englishman and an American, were once praising their respective railroads—for an American will praise his railroads abroad, though at home it's usually a different story.

"Well, the Englishman said:

"'Our express trains go so fast that the telegraph poles along the line look like a high board fence.'

"'Our rapides,' said the Frenchman, 'go so fast that the stations along the line seem continuous, like a city block.'

"The American puffed at his cigar thoughtfully.

"'Once, on an American express,' he said, 'I passed a field of carrots, a field of potatoes, a field of cabbages and a cow, and the rain, gents, was going so fast I thought I saw an Irish stew.'"

He Administered Till It "Took."

Norman Hapgood, the editor-reformer of New York, was talking about a political mutineer.

"Such fellows," said Mr. Hapgood, "ought to be served as Dr. Steenthly served his congregation.

"Dr. Steenthly, on a sultry September morning, preached with sincerity and vigor a sermon that he had prepared with great pains.

"But, for all the force of his argument and delivery, the good doctor was much vexed to see that a large part of his congregation slept. Several of his leading parishioners even snored.

Dr. Steenthly at the end of his discourse, pounded on the lectern, and, when all were at last awake, he said, very firmly and mildly:

"'My friends, this sermon cost me a great deal of trouble, and I don't think you have paid it the attention it deserves. I shall, therefore, repeat it. My text I take from—'

"And for a second time Dr. Steenthly preached his sermon from beginning to end."

Vanderbilt on Railroad Passes.

Cornelius Vanderbilt used to tell a story about the pass evil, of which the railroads are now happily rid.

Mr. Vanderbilt said that a man once called and asked him for a pass over the New York Central to Albany.

"Why do you ask for a pass?" said Mr. Vanderbilt.

"Because I'm so sensitive," the man answered.

"So sensitive? What's that got to do with the matter?"

"Well, I'll tell you, Mr. Vanderbilt," the applicant explained. "I went up to Albany on your line last week and I was the only man on the whole train that paid his fare. The other passengers guyed me about it, and, as I'm so very sensitive, I don't want to go through such an unpleasant experience again."

A Prophet Without Honor.

Two boys of Emporia, Kan., ran away from home to seek their fortune, after reading a biographical sketch of Dick Whittington, according to Collier's. They got as far as Kansas City, where the centurions encompassed them and took them to the police station. There the captain questioned them closely, and, having drawn forth much useful information, finally asked:

"Why did you boys run away from Emporia?"

"Well," replied the elder of the pair, thoughtfully, "there's nothing there but William Allen White, and we got tired of hearing of him."

Big Tim's Bowery Boy Story.

The late Timothy D. Sullivan had a great fondness for the Bowery boy, and used to tell a story to illustrate the Bowery boy's gameness.

"A newsboy"—so he would begin—"lay bedridden in the hospital. A friend of his, a bootblack, called:

"'How be ye, Jimmy?' said the visitor.

"'I'm mighty sick,' groaned the newsboy. 'Mighty sick, I tell ye; I got to lay flat on me back. The doc says if I turn over on me side I'll kick the bucket.'

"'Oh, rats!'

"'That's wot he says. If I turn on me side I'll kick the bucket straight off.'

"'I'll bet ye $2 ye won't. Try it and see.'

"'I'll take that bet,' groaned the sick newsboy.

"Wincing, he turned upon his side, and, sure enough, it killed him instantly.

"His friend, the bootblack, laid $2 on the small corpse's chest and departed solemnly on tiptoe."

John Purroy Mitchell's Story.

John Purroy Mitchell, recently elected mayor of New York, was talking about a new defense of Tammany.

"It is a ridiculously naive defense," he said. "It reminds me of Paint Rock.

"A visitor to the retired village of Paint Rock remarked to a native:

"'Mr. Scribbler was charmed with Paint Rock. In his book he calls it the quaintest, sleepiest town——'

"But here the native, biting viciously into a plug of chewing tobacco, growled:

"'Wall, Paint Rock may be quaint, all right, all right; but I don't see nothin' sleepy about a place whar everybody's up at 4 o'clock in the mornin', rain or shine.'"

OUR PREMIUM STORY.

Why the Big Ones Were on Top.

The old farmer was making his usual weekly call on Mrs. Wiggins, says The Chicago Daily News.

"P'taters is good this mornin', madam," he said, casting an admiring look at the basketful he had brought.

"Oh, is they?" retorted Mrs. Wiggins. "That reminds me. I wants to have a word with you about them you sold me last week. How is it that them at the bottom o' the basket is so much smaller than them at the top?"

"Come about like this," replied old John, a knowing look on his face. "P'taters is growin' that fast now that by the time I get a basketful dug the last ones is about twice the size of the first!"

From Near and Far

Joseph E. Choate, former ambassador to England and head of the New York State Charities Aid Association, affirms in his annual report that the nation is making headway in its fight on the white plague. He states that the reduction in the number of fatalities from the disease is proof that the nation is fighting a winning battle in its endeavor to stamp out tuberculosis. In the state of New York, where Mr. Choate is a leader in this battle, the success is notable. The decrease in the number of tuberculosis deaths in the first seven months of this year, as compared with the same period last year, is 183, and this is most promising in view of the fact that the population of the state has increased.

During December and January the Christian Endeavorers of Chicago are to have a "help our church" campaign, when a special effort will be made to assist the church and denomination to which the individual society belongs. The plan has ben outlined by the union officers and will at the same time be put into operation over Illinois through the state union. The standards of the campaign include attendance at the evening service of all the members in a body, and a systematic effort to invite others to that service. The prayer-meeting committee is charged with obtaining attendance and participation at the midweek meeting.

In harmony with the Atlantic City resolution of two years ago, "A saloonless nation by 1920, the three-hundredth year from the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth," and as the next step toward that great consummation, the United Society of Christian Endeavor has declared for national prohibition with an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The Young Women's Christian Association at the University of Illinois dedicated their new $60,000 building with impressive services November 9. The principal address was delivered by Bishop Wm. F. McDowell of Chicago.

Five Governors, five ex-Governors, five United States Senators, six members of the National House of Representatives took part on the programme of the National Anti-Saloon League Convention, just closing at Columbus, O.

Disciples Table Talk

I. N. McCash Highly Honored.

The high regard in which I. N. McCash, retiring secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, is held by his co-laborers and friends in Cincinnati, was earnestly expressed at a dinner given in his honor, Friday, October 31. The resident members of the Board of the American Christian Missionary Society, the members of the Executive Committee of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society and the Cincinnati preachers met to bid Mr. McCash godspeed as he leaves Cincinnati and the society he has so honorably served for the four years past. The informal speeches sincerely expressed the sentiments of the thirty men who were present. A. McLean presided; A. M. Harvuot was spokesman for the Home Board; F. M. Rains represented the Foreign Society, C. L. Waite, the Cincinnati Ministerial Association; Grant K. Lewis and R. M. Hopkins spoke as office associates and President C. T. Paul and T. W. Grafton, of Indianapolis, paid tributes to the work of Mr. McCash in the brotherhood. Mr. McCash is soon to enter upon his new work at the university in Spokane, Wash.

Lexington Church in Educational Move.

"One of the chief faults of the old system of Sunday-school work was the inability of the Sunday-school to obtain trained teachers," declares Prof. W. C. Bower, at the head of the new "Department of Religious Education," at Central Church, Lexington, Ky. "This we are endeavoring to remedy in part by a series of lectures by some of the foremost educators in the country, men who hold a recognized position in educational work and who are abreast of the times in the development of new educational methods. These lectures are held once a week, and while they are intended for the better preparation of our own teachers, we are anxious that the workers of all the denominations should have the full benefit of them, so we are inviting clergymen, official boards, teachers and superintendents of other churches and Sunday-schools to attend."

The first lecture of the course was given by Dr. Charles Fordyce, dean of the College of Education, of the University of Nebraska. Dr. Fordyce lectured upon "The Art of Teaching." Dr. J. T. C. Noe, of the Department of Education of the Kentucky State University, delivered the second lecture on Nov. 6, his subject being "Mental Development." Prof. McHenry Rhoads, state supervisor of high schools, will deliver the third lecture of the series on "School Supervision," which is expected to touch one of the weakest spots in the religious education of children and adults as practiced in the Sunday-school. There will be two other lectures on Nov. 18 and 25, one on the History of Education, and one on the Correlation of the Secular School and the School of Religion. Dr. R. H. Crossfield, president of Transylvania University and of the College of the Bible, will lecture on Dec. 2 on "The Philosophy of Religious Education."

C. S. Medbury on Church Divisions.

"The glory of the church is its unity. The shame of the church is its division. Unity carries with it strength while divisions involve us in weakness," said Dr. Charles S. Medbury of University Church of Christ, Des Moines, in a recent sermon, which was a plea for unity of the Christian people in organization, life and work, and a commendation of the work of the inter-church council. Three stages of interdenominational relationships were noted. In the first place the fighting stage when the followers of the Prince of Peace were actually at war. In the second place was an era of toleration—a sort of live and let live day. "And now has come the era of good fellowship in which all devout men and women rejoice unspeakably," said Dr. Medbury.

"But beyond these—a fourth step—is the actual unity of the people of God—not a dreamy, sentimental unity, but a oneness of organization, life and work. For this consummation the greatest men of practically every communion are pleading and it is the brightest promise of the present day. Conservation is the word everywhere else. It must be made to apply also within the kingdom of God. The need of the world demands a conservation of means and forces. Waste is sin. In the face of nations that do not even know the name of Christ and in the light of unbearable social conditions here at home the present dissipation of the forces of righteousness is intolerable. And still beyond is the cry of the day for the true culture of men and women of God. Everybody recognizes that the atmosphere of division does not grow big men. And great souls are in rebellion against restraints put upon them. They are unwilling to have their love hemmed in by denominational walls and their interests narrowly bounded by ecclesiastical lines. Hence the clear cry of the day for the oneness of God's people to the end—and this is the preëminent motive after all—that great life may be given to the cause of Christ and that through the incessant propaganda of this great life, the world may be brought to believe in Jesus as the Son of God.

"But, even though the strength of unity and the weakness of division are recognized, the way out from denominationalism into the oneness for which the Master prayed is not so clearly seen. We are dealing with historic institutions, with revered traditions and with names and forms almost as sacred to many as life itself. It takes time, and we all have to grow, that right adjustments may be made."

Sane Revivals Proved Best.

As a result of a three weeks' revival conducted on the "educational" and "sane" plan, which has just closed at First church, Sioux City, Ia., Rev. J. R. Perkins, who conducted the revival, declares that he is thoroughly convinced that the "sensible" plan which he pursued is of much more value than "sensational" evangelism. "When I began this series of social meetings," said Mr. Perkins, "I explained to my audience that I was departing on new lines in revival work, and that my preaching would be much the same as at usual services and devoid of demoniacal and duck decoy methods. In these services I have absolutely refrained from preying upon the fear instinct of people to gain converts, but have aimed at educational preaching, in such a way as to get at the heart of problems that confront us in every day life. As a result we have had two baptismal services and will hold yet another this week. There have been about twenty additions to the church, and doubtless more conversions than this number. I firmly believe that these new members will be staunch supporters of the church, and earnest Christians, because they were won in a fair and open manner. The church has been well filled and often packed to its capacity during these meetings and the attitude of my audiences has led me to believe that common sense preaching is much more wholesome than flashy and sensational evangelism."

Great Disciples Library Planned.

B. A. Abbott, pastor at Union Avenue, St. Louis, has planned to establish at that church a library, which will be unique in the brotherhood, and may bring to St. Louis many students of religious movements. The collection will consist entirely of works bearing on the origin and development of the Christian church, especially those written by leaders of the denomination in the 104 years since the church was organized. A valuable nucleus has been provided in the ecclesiastical library of the late F. E. Udell, an elder at Union Avenue.

Among the works already obtained are volumes by Barton W. Stone, Walter Scott, the Creaths of Missouri, Moses E. Lard, John ("Raccoon") Smith of Kentucky and others well known. The library probably will be enlarged by works of earlier times, giving intimations of the principles taught by the church. Among these will be included the literature of the Haldane movement in Scotland, with all other leaders looking to the development of the democratic idea of religion. As the library becomes larger a librarian will be appointed. Dr. Abbott started the plan about January 1 and contributions have been made only through his personal request from the pulpit. "St. Louis is the best city in America for this purpose," declares Dr. Abbott, "and it is time that our church placed in permanent form its history and records."

Some Notable Sermon Lectures.

The following is a list of month end sermons, being preached at First Church, Bloomington, Ill., by Edgar D. Jones. Books of modern fiction with a moral bearing have been chosen as topics: October 26—"The Inside of the Cup," by Winston Churchill. Matt. 23:26. "Cleanse first the inside of the cup and of the platter, that the outside may become clean also." November 30—"John Barleycorn," by Jack London. Prov. 20:1. "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is a brawler, and whosoever erreth thereby is not wise." December 28—"V. V.'s Eyes," by Henry Sydnor Harrison. Ps. 18:35. "Thy gentleness hath made me great." January 25—"My Little Sister," by Elizabeth Robbins. Joel 3:3. "And they have cast lots for my people and given a boy for an harlot and sold a girl for wine, that they might drink." February 22—"The Price of Place," by Samuel G. Blythe. 1 Tim. 6:10. "For the love of money is a root of all kinds of evil." March 29—"The Great Adventure," by Louise Pond Jewell. 1 Cor. 15:55. "O, Death, where is thy sting." April 26—"The Iron Woman," by Margaret Deland. Prov. 22:6. "Train up a child in the way he should go and when he is old he will not depart from it." May 31—"Cease Firing," by Mary Johnston. Isa. 2:4. "They shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

E. L. Powell Says "Vote!"

E. L. Powell, at First Church, Louisville, last week, upheld the right of the preacher to participate in politics. "Rather than resign my political rights," he declared, "it would be incumbent upon my conscience to resign my pulpit." There are not two sets of duties for the preacher, Dr. Powell said. His duty to God and his duty to Caesar are one, the latter implied in the former. Dr. Powell said that he was prompted to state this principle by an erroneous announcement in the press, giving the subject of his sermon as "The Preacher on Guard, or the Sacredness of the Ballot." The subject as it had been phrased by himself, he said, was: "The Citizen on Guard, or the Sacredness of the Ballot."

Before beginning his prepared sermon, Dr. Powell said, and speaking from the subject as announced from the press, he desired to state three principles dealing with the ethics of the pulpit in politics. These principles were:

First—That rather than resign his political right it would be incumbent upon his conscience to resign his pulpit. Second—It is not for the pulpit to declare partisan politics; the preacher, in choosing his party, must not speak as a representative of the church or of his fellow ministers. Third—Civic duties must be discharged outside of the pulpit.

Referring to the local situation, Dr. Powell said: "I think some evidence of the mood of this community has already been evidenced by the grand jury of certain men against whom have been brought charges of corruption in connection with the Democratic primary. Now, my friends, let me say this, as I expect to stand before the judgment bar of God: That above all party considerations, whether you be supporters of one party or another party, above all party considerations is the sacredness of the ballot, the foundation of civil liberty, the ark of the covenant of our Government. I may be wrong in my decision. My right to make it is mine, and my responsibility is to God. You may be right in your decision, and your responsibility is to God, and your right is absolutely unquestioned. We are both agreed that whether right or wrong, the vote which we cast on election day is so sacred a thing, so holy a thing, so fundamental as the basic principle of self-government, that to touch that vote with unholy hands is to loot the sanctuary; to steal as sacred a thing as the Bible from the pulpit and to sell it for gain!"

F. W. Burnham Resigns.

"Seeking to advance the cause of Christianity by accepting a call to a small congregation in Los Angeles, Cal.," is the way a Springfield daily puts F. W. Burnham's resignation from First Church, Springfield, Ill., where he has served for seven years. Mr. Burnham will accept the pastorate of a church of 150 members at the Wilshire Boulevard church, Los Angeles. This congregation has only a small frame building, but it is believed by the California people that the coming of Mr. Burnham will mean the rapid growth of the work. The change will not be made until Jan. 1. Mr. Burnham has worked in Springfield under ideal conditions. This congregation has reluctantly acceded to his wish to resign.

Budget Committee Report

Some recommendations presented to the convention at Toronto by the committee appointed to recommend an equitable percentage of distribution of missionary budgets.

First: That the Executive Committee secure from each society and board at least one month prior to the general convention each year, a carefully prepared estimate of the amount each society or board will need from the churches for the ensuing missionary year, together with reasons for these estimates and a general statement concerning how and where the money will be used. This estimate is to include only what is expected from the churches directly and is not to include amounts expected from individual gifts, annuities, legacies, income from permanent funds, income from foreign fields, or membership dues in those societies and boards having a local membership.

We recommend that an Advisory Committee be constituted of one representative of each society and board sharing in the budget, said representatives to be selected by the respective societies and boards. This Advisory Committee is to meet with the Executive Committee in an advisory capacity.

After considering with the Advisory Committee, and, if need be, revising the estimate of each society and board, the committee shall then add all these estimates together, thus making a general missionary budget. This budget shall then be submitted to the general convention for its consideration and when adopted by the convention it shall become the General Missionary Budget for the Disciples of Christ for the year.

It is estimated that the total income from all regular resources of all the societies last year was in round numbers, $2,000,000. On this basis the offerings from the churches, as such, for 1913-14, should reach $600,000, exclusive of offerings for state work.

We have secured the estimates from the various societies and boards for the coming year, have carefully considered them, and recommend that the following be adopted by this convention as the General Missionary Budget for the churches as such, for the coming missionary year:

	Received from Churches Last Year, 1911-12.	Amount Recommended for 1913-14.
National Benevolent Association	$25,881	$ 45,000
C. W. B. M.	106,791	110,000
A. C. M. S.	87,605	125,000
Ministerial Relief	8,680	35,000
Church Extension	24,881	45,000
F. C. M. S.	122,174	150,000
Christian Union Commission	75	10,000
Education	not known	75,000
American Temperance Board	975	5,000
Totals	$377,071	$600,000

Second: That after the General Missionary Budget has been adopted by the convention, the Executive Committee, in conference with the Advisory Committee, shall, immediately following the adjournment of the General Convention, make a suggestive apportionment of this budget to the various states and shall send these apportionments to the various State Boards and ask them to estimate and report back to the Executive Committee the amount to be raised by each church in their respective states for each of the above-mentioned interests. Leaving the principles of apportionment to be worked out by the Executive Committee, we recommend that in suggesting the apportionments to the churches, each church be given its total budget, the amount for each interest, and also the percentage in the state for the distribution of its offerings, and also that a copy of the apportionments be furnished to each society and board.

Third: That we recognize that any attempt to limit benevolence, to make arbitrary distinctions or to present consideration of other than "recognized" interests, would work injury and be out of harmony with the independence and autonomy of the local churches. On the other hand, we also recognize that the local churches are often imposed on by unworthy calls on their liberality. In view of these facts, we recommend that the Executive Committee give careful consideration each year to any and all causes desiring to share in the missionary offerings of the churches, and then recommend to the General Convention the interests which, in the judgment of the committee, should share in the offerings. We further recommend that when the General Convention has passed on this recommendation the local churches be requested to give preference to the interests thus suggested for their offerings.

Fourth: That the committee seek to devise some plan by which the fiscal years of State and District Missionary Societies and of local churches shall coincide with the fiscal years of the General Missionary Societies, in order that there may be uniformity in all our co operative work.

Fifth: That the committee conduct a campaign of publicity in advocacy of the adoption and use of the budget plan by publishing and distributing carefully prepared literature concerning the work of Budget Apportionment, Christian Stewardship, Financial Plans for Local Churches, and statements concerning the work of our Missionary and Benevolent Societies and Boards. It is understood that the various Boards will continue to publish literature concerning their own work, but the joint literature is to be used by the Executive Committee. We recommend that the committee present the plan before General, State, District and County Conventions, Ministers Meetings, Colleges and other assemblies, in order that our people may become well acquainted with the principles of the plan. To this end we would recommend that the committee be empowered to select a secretary, who shall devote all or part of his time to leading in such a publicity campaign, and that his salary be fixed by the committee. We recommend that the expenses of the committee be borne by the societies and boards, each being liable in proportion to its share in the total budget.

It fell to the lot of C. H. Hilton, Healdsburg, Cal., to preach the funeral sermon of the world famous athlete, Ralph Rose. Mr. Rose died in San Francisco and was brought to Healdsburg and buried by the side of his mother. It was the most largely-attended service of the kind ever held there, not less than one thousand people attending. Mr. Rose was a giant, weighing 350 pounds, and was but 29 years of age.

On Sunday, Nov. 23, the American Missionary Society is calling for contributions from the Bible schools with which to further the gospel of the Christ in America. This should be hailed by our schools as an opportunity. Last year this society received almost $38,000 from 2,390 Bible schools. This year it hopes to receive not less than $50,000 from a greatly increased number of schools.

Teach Christ

TO YOUR ADULT AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSES. The Uniform Lessons for 1914 are based upon the life of Christ. This means that the emphasis in the year's work will be placed upon that matchless study. The best book on that theme published for young people's and adult classes is Dr. Loa E. Scott's

"LIFE OF JESUS"

Why You Should Use This Text:

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There is not a skeptical question in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus." A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study.

Our New Weekly For Adult and Young People's Classes

A Striking Serial Story!

This will begin in a January issue. Its title, "Out of a Chip Basket." It is written over an assumed name by a famous story writer much of whose work has appeared in the Christian Endeavor World.

Here is the Story: A band of young people find a lost baby in a basket under a seat in a street car. They decide to adopt it. The career of this child, cared for and educated by this philanthropic "Help Somebody Club," is trained to manhood. And he grows into such a man as to make his kindly caretakers proud of him. Here is social service taught in story form, so that young people cannot help but receive its lessons. Since the famous Sheldon stories appeared, there has not been published a finer character building story than "Out of a Chip Basket."

Our special Introductory Offer will bring this live, gripping weekly to your adult or young people's class during the First Quarter at 10 cents per quarterly subscription.

WRECKING RAMPARTS WITH RAM'S HORNS.*

By A. Z. Conrad.

PERCEIVED BUT NOT POSSESSED.

Forty years of wilderness worry. What next? Water and war. Once more the water question. Too much or too little water had been the bane of the pilgrim life. The Red Sea, Marah, Elim, Rephidim, Meribah and now the Jordan. From the Accacia Plateau the tented host could see the rich Jordan Valley which was the gateway to the Land of Promise. But they saw something far less welcome. Stretching in front of the gateway was a sign, tortuous and terrifying, two hundred miles long and from eighty to five hundred feet in width with the significant words, "Positively No Admittance." It defied but did not dishearten the new Deliverer. The man who had heard, "Be strong and of a good courage, the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest," was neither disturbed nor depressed. The turpid, angry challenge rolled between promise and possession. The swollen Jordan, swirling and surging its bared breast five hundred feet wide, masked in foam, told of inward fury and dared the invader to attempt transit. It could neither be bridged nor barred by any human instrumentality. Boats there were none, and bold was the swimmer who could breast its swift current. It seemed to mock every promise of advance. It is a mighty faith which can face a force like that without a tremor of fear or a change in purpose. Unhurried and untroubled the newly appointed Commander-in-chief proceeds with preparation for the great campaign of conquest. Leagued with the Infinite he knew there was a way on and through. He believed that the God who sent the river on its course could stay it at his own sweet will. While yet the flood was at its height he gave command to fold the tents, break camp, and meet the challenge of a raging river with advance to the very brink. (Joshua 1:11.) He risked his reputation by a definite declaration that Jordan would be passed within three days.

GLORY AND THE GOAL.

God's plan for man is progress. It is more. It is possession! The privations of the pilgrimage had been passed. If progress were to end at the Jordan's brink, had the march been worth while? Approach is not arrival. To perceive is not to possess. "At" is not "Into" and "To" is not "Through." A view is not victory. Desert difficulty and disaster fail if they fall right at the point of possession. The voyage is not worth while if the ship is to be wrecked in sight of port. Even the wrath of an angry sea can well be faced if disembarking in a safe harbor is granted at the end of the voyage. It is the goal that makes the race worth while. Does it pay to struggle and strive through trouble and trial and then stop just short of success? Exactly that is just what multitudes are doing who are seeking to maintain a relatively high moral standard of living, yet stop on the Moab side of the Jordan. Such a life pushes up, presses on, prevails in peril and pursues in pain and then—then stops on the Accacia Plateau and—dies! Does God intend this? Could his plan be so wasteful? Watch Israel and see.

PURPOSE AND PROMPTITUDE.

Joshua 3:1. "And Joshua arose early in the morning, and they removed from the Accacias and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel." Profiting by previous experience he had sent spies, not to discover the dangers of the land, not suggesting the difficulties, not even resting his cause on their report, but he secretly commissioned them to view the land and Jericho. He showed his generalship in selecting two, rather than ten, and in requiring them to report to him direct. They gave their reports which included an enthusiastic description, the details of a narrow escape, the conviction that possession was immediately possible. There was every reason for delay, until the waters subsided. From a human standpoint it seemed like presumption to attempt advance. Yes, if alone, but not when Joshua could say, "God and I." He made his preparation as though the waters were already divided. He proceeded with an utter disregard of impossibilities which confronted him. He had only to do with the possible. The impossible was God's business. It was his business to undertake and God's to consummate. This is only true when the commandment is clear and the requirements unequivocal. Had he taken as his slogan, "Nothing beyond the natural order," the bones of the children of Israel would have bleached on the hillsides of Moab. The most momentous movement since the first passover was now to be undertaken. It was sufficiently important for Divine intervention.

THE FLYING WEDGE.

The officers went through the midst of the camp and they commanded the people: "When you see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then shall ye move from your place and go after it." Have you watched the flying wedge on the gridiron? It is a mighty obstruction that can stand before the athletes pushing toward the goal. It is the picture before us. The sharp point of the wedge, the ark, behind it the priests and after them the people. This tells the story of human progress. The ark was the mysterious chest which proclaimed the presence of Jehovah. It had taken the place of the pillar of cloud and of fire. It symbolized a communicating deity. In it the wand of majesty and mystery, Aaron's rod, had been placed. Also the sacred tables of the Law. Manna was carried in it, symbolic of the bread from heaven. Upon it was the Mercy Seat, proclaiming the Christ of redemption. It stood for the Law and the Gospel of Grace. But more than this, for the actual contributing presence of Infinite love, majesty and might. The obedient might follow it without fear of failure. In the largest sense it represents religion. This has ever been the pioneer in human progress. The Cross precedes the flag. Behind the ark the ministers of religion, to be followed so long as and only as they followed the Ark.

REVERENTIAL REGARD.

"There shall be a space between you and it about two thousand cubits measure;" Joshua 3:4. Is it possible to be unduly familiar with sacred things? That depends upon the nature of the familiarity. It is possible to treat sacred truth triflingly. Prayer may lose its power through presumption and assumption. Levity and listlessness are intolerable when life is at stake. When will we learn that Christianity itself is a question of life and death? There can be no superficiality in matters of salvation. The sublimities and sanctities should not be treated sacrilegiously. God gives us of himself just as much as we are willing to receive reverently. The burning glass may collect the rays of the sun to such a degree that it will destroy and not bless. Fire is our best friend until we become unduly familiar with it, then it consumes. In a great power house where both light and power were electrically generated a man carelessly placed his hand on a bit of steel. It nearly cost him his life. He said, "I took it for granted a thing not concealed might be touched." Immediately afterward there was posted in the establishment, "Take Nothing For Granted Here." Is there anything more demanded in America right now than the inculcation of a spirit of reverence in young people? With a carelessness which cauterizes conscience the Temple of Truth is too often profaned.

PREPARATION FOR THE EXTRAORDINARY.

"Sanctify yourselves: for tomorrow the Lord will do wonders among you." V. 5. The way was a new and an untried one. They were not to trust to human guidance. Extraordinary things demand extraordinary preparation. Ceremonial cleansing emphasized the necessity of holiness of life. You can only get the full results from battery or dynamo when the contact points of connecting wires have been cleaned. Impurity can never come into contact with holiness. God does not and cannot communicate himself through uncleanness. Confession and repentance clean the contact point and make possible communications of grace.

THE CREED FOR LIFE'S CRISIS.

Joshua's creed explained his courage. In verses 10 and 11 we read, "The living God," "The Lord of all the earth." It was enough. Not an absent deity, but a present personal power would prepare the way through the foaming flood. Whoever actually realizes the presence of God is neither appalled nor unbalanced by manifestations of deity called "Miracle." A personal presence, with purpose to bless, is Joshua's thought of the Infinite. But more than this, "He is the Lord of all the earth," having full control. His power of manipulation is measureless. Whatever he wills he works. It is needless to exercise ourselves unduly as to how God accomplishes his purposes. It is enough to know he does it. In undertaking the supernatural is it bravery or bravado which leads man to undertake the work of super man? It depends upon his motive, his call and his command. The supernatural is not contranatural. Joshua was simply undertaking to perform a superhuman task in Divine strength. He was revealing the possibilities of partnership. "And Joshua spoke unto the priest saying, 'Take up the Ark of the Covenant and pass over before the people.'" "And they took up the Ark of the Covenant and went before the people." It was a call, not for speculation, but demonstration. The same call exists today.

SECURITY AND CERTITUDE.

The priests stood firm in the Jordan River bed, literally, "were caused to stand upright." The ark was symbolic of the security and the certitude of the leader who knows. Their act awakened confidence in the people who followed unafraid because their leaders knew whom they believed. Encouraged by example, in obedience to command the entire nation "passed clean over Jordan, right against Jericho." There was no retreat. The walled waters rushed once more on their course. They were now finally and fully committed to conquest. In this lies the guarantee of ultimate success. There will be no more talk of the fish and the leeks and the onions and the melons of Egypt. Now it is fight or die.

LIVING LESSONS.

The Jordan symbolizes the barriers to the higher life.

To believe the Bible, to believe in the church, and even to believe that Christ was and is, is not salvation.

The tragedy of life is a wilderness wandering which stops short of the Promised Land.

Follow the minister only so long as he stays with the ark.

Where the ark goes, follow, and the mercy seat of the ark was a token of Christ. Jesus said, "Follow me."

It is as natural for God to act supernaturally as for us to sow seed and reap a harvest.

Nothing could be more irrational than for God not to act supernaturally when the good of his children requires it.

It is a shriveled faith that will not follow the ark into the Jordan channel.

No current of evil is so swift and so broad that God cannot stop it in the interests of human progress. The best leadership is ineffective until the people are willing to follow. What the pulpit proclaims the new must prosecute.

Crisis-faith is never given until crisis-event.

Jordan-grace is unnecessary and indeed impossible until we make the Jordan-journey.

God's barriers hold until the church passes the danger point.

Do not expect the waters of opposition to retreat until you wet your feet in the forbidding flood.

Faith to undertake invariably means power to achieve.

The Mid-Week Service

CONSERVING FOR CHRIST.

Nov. 19. John 6:12; Matt. 16:5-12; 18:10-14; Luke 16:9-16; 17:1-4.

Christianity is unalterably committed to the policy of conservation. The ministry of Jesus was distinguished from that of the popular religious teachers of his day by the attention he gave to rejected human material. Men and women whom the religious leaders had pronounced unfit and who had accepted this estimate of themselves discovered that they were capable of heroic service that placed them by the side of the great benefactors of the race.

Many of us have the anti-Christian habit of thinking that when we have seen the defects of a man and assigned him to an inferior place in life we have reached the limit of our obligations to him. Christianity begins with a man's possibilities. It endeavors to overcome his weakness. It offers him a reasonable basis for hope. It furnishes motives for self-control and sacrifice. It assures him of help from God and from man.

PROTECTING THE CHILD.

Juvenal formulated a principle of education in words which Christians may adopt when he wrote, "The greatest reverence is due the child." Children are not brought into the world for the profit of factory owners. They have a right to be happy, to play, to grow strong in body, to learn what life is at its best, to be trained for efficiency in the economic and social world. The cities must be built for the child as well as for the manufacturer and the merchant. The amusements that are tolerated must be examined with respect to their influence on the children and recreation must receive as much attention as the curriculum of the school. The school is a place where the life of the child is increased, its vigor of body, its intelligence, and its sympathies. The studies are to be chosen because they minister to life.

RESTORING THE OUTCAST.

"Come and be as good as we are," is the meaning our invitation to unite with the church has for many persons. The Pharisees whom Jesus condemned thought they were good because they avoided certain gross sins of which the outcasts were guilty. Being pleased with themselves, they were unsympathetic toward those whom they designated as sinners. We are quite successful, often, in imitating the Pharisees. Instead of making it easier for others to do right, we make it harder. We throw over certain sins—our own—the sanctity of religion, and we exaggerate the guilt of those whose sins we are not tempted to commit. If we really desire to help the outcast, we can do nothing better for him than to get rid of our Phariseeism and learn from Jesus how to treat with respect a man because a human being and not merely because of past success in living.

SAVING OUR INFLUENCE.

The spoken word is powerful if it comes from the mind and heart of the right person. We cease to care for what the scold says. Such a person annoys us, it is true, but we accept no warning from a source of that kind. When we speak in the name of the church, we ought to be exceedingly careful to measure our words. The influence of the church is a matter of concern for every Christian. It therefore becomes his right to be indignant and to express his indignation when men speak folly in the name of the church. Much has already been lost through the attacks of ignorance on the work of science. The impression has been created that the church shuts its eyes to the light. The intemperate advocacy of temperance harms the church. Militant speeches in favor of peace strengthen neither the hands of lovers of peace nor the power of the organization that lends its influence to the effort to abolish war. The sensationalism that amuses the people today and leaves them in cold indifference tomorrow is a serious menace to the influence of the church. And what about the methods we adopt for raising money? Perhaps we get the money, but what does the community think of the church? And what will be the condition of the church ten years hence?

Is your school dissatisfied with its literature? Perhaps it is not using the right kind. Read what some of our Sunday-school leaders are saying about

The Bethany System

"Nothing Could Pry Us Loose"

We began using the Bethany Graded Lessons at their first issuance and have increased the supply from year to year as the literature for all grades was published. There is nothing in the series that is not now used by our school. Nothing could pry our superintendents and teachers loose from these lessons. They meet the needs of pupils of all years and make the teacher's work a joy. We have no word with which to express our satisfaction with the series.

H. H. HARMON,
First Church, Lincoln, Neb.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teachers' text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN,
Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va.

"Thoroughly Edited"

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upon the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday-school pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned.

L. J. MARSHALL,
Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

"We Would Not Turn Back"

We are using the Bethany Graded Lessons. We would not turn back. The service our Sunday-school specialists are giving us as represented in this course is making a new day in religious education.

FINIS IDLEMAN,
Pastor Central Church, Des Moines, Ia.

"Unanimously the Bethany Series"

After a campaign led by Miss Eva Lemert of Kansas City, Mo., resulting in the thorough grading and departmentizing of the school, we had to decide the matter of graded helps. A committee of three was appointed, consisting of the pastor, superintendent and one member of the Executive Committee. This committee made an individual examination of lesson helps and decided unanimously in favor of the Bethany series, arriving at their decisions independently and solely upon the merits of the literature. So far as I know these lessons are giving entire satisfaction.

EDGAR DeWITT JONES,
Pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

"Nothing to Compare With Them"

We have been using the Bethany Graded Lessons from the time you began to publish them and we are very highly pleased with them. We have often had occasion to compare them with the publications of other houses and thus far can say we have found nothing that compares with them. I am teaching a young men's class in the course, "The World a Field for Christian Service," and am glad to say that it seems to me the best adapted for young men of high school age of all courses I have ever seen. My class is becoming very enthusiastic over it.

P. J. RICE,
Pastor First Church, El Paso, Tex.

"Have Created Enthusiasm"

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers. I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

T. E. WINTER,
Pastor First Church, Fulton, Mo.

"Delighted"

Our Sunday-school, which has lately begun the use of the Bethany Graded Lessons, seems to be delighted with them. I have heard no word of unfavorable criticism and very many words of appreciation. Our teachers like the form and material of these lessons.

GRAHAM FRANK,
Pastor Liberty, Mo.

"Best on the Market"

We consider the Bethany Graded Lessons for the Beginners and Primary department the best on the market of our own brotherhood and second to none of other communions. Congratulations!

J. J. TISDALL,
Pastor Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O.

The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade

It Does Not Cost You One Cent!

OUR main difficulty in this Crusade for twenty thousand names has been to get folks to realize that it is a STRAIGHT-OUT GIFT OF THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY FOR ONE FULL YEAR that we are arranging to make. It seems too liberal to be true! Here is a note from a reader who hesitates to send in his list until he knows how much it will cost:

H. E. Merritts,
Circulation Manager The Christian Century,
Chicago.

My dear Brother:

What are the monetary returns we are required to make for a list such as you ask or permit us to send? Such a list without any money value returned looks too liberal for your good. Fraternally, WM. ROSS LLOYD, Flemingsburg, Ky.

P. S. So far as enlarging The C. C. is concerned, I doubt the advisability of it because it is all one can read and digest in a week. And as to improving the quality, I doubt your ability to do it.

It will not cost you one cent, Brother Lloyd! Neither will it cost the persons whose names you send one cent!

Nor will it cost The Disciples Publication Society one cent! It isn't our gift! We simply put the price of these twenty thousand subscriptions down to one dollar—just the mechanical and material cost of printing the paper—and we ask every friend of The Christian Century to contribute to a fund of twenty thousand dollars to pay for them. The Disciples Publication Society could not afford, of course, to send the paper free. And our Uncle Sam would not allow us to do so even if we could afford it. Our subscriptions, according to the law, have to be paid for by some one—if not the one to whom the paper goes then by some friend who sends it to him as a present.

We are asking our friends to make a great Christmas present of twenty thousand Christian Centurys for one year to twenty thousand persons who do not now receive it. We are expecting men and women of means to give large sums, and we expect many gifts of smaller amounts. We have had tentative assurances of several good-sized gifts if we could collect the twenty thousand dollars. We have faith to believe that there will be a generous response in money when we have rounded out the list of names. It all depends upon our getting the names—selected names, of church workers and Christian-minded people.

And we are getting them. As our readers come to understand the plan their imagination catches the purpose in it and the mails are loaded with lists.

Pastors in all our churches see the far-reaching possibilities of putting The Christian Century for one full year in the hands of their interested homes.

One pastor sends eighty-eight names, with the desired information about each one. Another—with a membership of 800—goes to the trouble to draw off 140 names and adds the desired information about each one. It must have taken him more than a full day to do it. But think what inspiration will come to his church during the year as a result of it! It will make his work easier! There will be more intelligent response to his preaching! He knows that, and so he takes pains to send us his list.

But here is a pastor who is altogether too modest. He sends in nineteen names out of a membership of 900. He does not realize how generous our offer is! We would like more than 100 names from that church. How many more it would be left to him to determine. We trust his judgment in making the selection as we trust the judgment and good-will of every reader who sends a list.

Twenty thousand new names—that is a tremendous list! Do you take in the magnitude of the undertaking, gentle reader? Do you, gentle friend who can afford to make a liberal donation, do you take in the magnitude of this opportunity to serve the greatest cause among us?

Thousands of names are already bursting the Circulation Man's desk-drawers and additional filing space has to be found! But we can find it! Let the names roll in!

Salient Data in The Christian Century's History

Established as The Christian Oracle in 1884 by Rev. F. M. Kirkham and Gen. F. M. Drake, at Des Moines, Iowa. Attained a high degree of popularity as organ of Iowa churches. Removed to Chicago in 1891. Became a national organ, though featuring especially the Iowa work and the local parishes of Chicago. Mr. Kirkham continued as Editor and owner of The Christian Oracle, until 1889, when it was purchased by Dr. J. H. Garrison, whose son, Mr. Arthur O. Garrison became Managing Editor. For a short time Rev. George A. Campbell was Editor.

In 1900 the stock of the Oracle Publishing Company was purchased by a group of men headed by Rev. Charles A. Young. The name of the paper was changed to The Christian Century and that of the company to The Christian Century Company. During the next seven years the paper was edited by a group of writers, including Rev. J. J. Haley, Rev. Frank G. Tyrrell and Prof. Herbert L. Willett.

In September, 1908 The Christian Century was purchased by the New Christian Century Company, a new corporation. Charles Clayton Morrison and Prof. Willett became associated as joint Editors.

At the beginning of the year 1913 the Disciples Publication Society, a corporation without capital stock and operating not for pecuniary profit, was chartered under the laws of Illinois. Its membership was constituted of representatives of the churches and Sunday-schools of the Disciples of Christ. This Society purchased The Christian Century and all other assets of The New Christian Century Company, and is now publishing The Christian Century in the unselfish interest of the cause of religious education and progress.

On Sept. 1, 1913, Mr. Morrison became sole Editor, Dr. Willett continuing as Contributing Editor in a no less vital relation to the paper than before.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON, EDITOR HERBERT L. WILLETT, CONTRIBUTING EDITOR

The Naming of the Church

The Church of the Lord Jesus Christ began without a name. It was years before it had a name. No one thought of naming it. The first disciples had no realization of their need of a name. No prophetic vision of the future of the Church gave them a suggestion of what must surely come to them and to the world by their possession of a name. The Church began in anonymity. Jesus did not name it. The word "church" was not a new name, nor at the first was it distinctive. It was a name applied to many gatherings both in the Old Testament and in the usage of Greek and Roman politics. Twice Jesus referred to "the church," but those references did not name the movement.

The early Christians called themselves "brethren," "disciples," "saints," but that was all. They spoke of their religion as "the Way." So far as we know they had no other name for it. They gave themselves no name. At first their enemies did not name them. They called them impostors, fanatics, insurrectionists and perverters of the people. It has never required much wit to invent names like these, and the early enemies of Christianity were not lacking in such ingenuity as was necessary for the invention of them. But none of these rose to the dignity of a proper name. They are the cheap and ready epithets which the world has for those who do strange new things which it has not time or inclination to investigate. They were not intended as names. They were scornful epithets. Even so the world has condemned more than one great movement because some one had the skill, such as it was, to select from out the rather meager list of vulgar epithets one that caught the popular fancy, and with it slew a great cause. But it was not so with Christianity. None of the opprobrious names had sufficient distinction to attach itself to the new faith. Christianity went for years nameless. Neither its enemies nor its friends addressed themselves seriously to the task of selecting a name for the new heresy.

It would have waited long for a name had its friends been compelled to name it. Nor would it have fared much better had it waited for a name from its enemies. No one in Jerusalem, whether friend or enemy, had any serious thought of naming the religion of Jesus.

It was in Antioch that the new religion found a name. Antioch was a heterogeneous city, which tolerated all faiths and professed none. It was a new, bustling, commercial city, about as unlike Jerusalem as two cities in the same region could well be. It was not a religious city. It was a big, cosmopolitan, polyglot town where a man might have any faith or none. In popular parlance it might be said that "everything went" in Antioch. It was in that town that the discovery was first made that Christianity was something more than a mere sect of the Jews.

Is it not pathetic first that Christianity should have gone so many years unnamed, and that at last it had to come for its baptism to a heathen font? Yet it is not wholly inappropriate. There is a certain felicity in the fact that the new religion waited till the world decided by what name it ought to be called.

Jesus had never been in Antioch, but when the heathen heard Paul preach they never thought of naming the religion after him, but after Jesus. Well will it be for us if we thus preach our Lord so that the world shall see not us but Jesus.

The disciples came very slowly to use the new name. Paul never used it so far as we know. The name appears in none of his epistles. Once it occurs in a conversation in which the king Agrippa flings it at him in sarcasm, "With a very little persuasion thou wouldst make me a Christian!" Paul assented. Yes, he said, he would the king and all others were as himself, except for his bonds. He was not ashamed of the name. But he did not use it. Peter used it once. He said, "If any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God on this behalf." It is the one time in the whole New Testament that the name appears on the lips of one of the disciples. It shows that it had become current; that the Disciples had come to use it among themselves and of themselves. They had adopted the name which the world had given them in scorn. Even so they adopted the cross, and made it something glorious.

All the time, and inevitably, the world is looking at us and endeavoring to discover by what name it shall call our religion.

The world is not always just in the names it gives. But the world has a rough and ready way of making up its mind as to what seems to it the vital thing in what we profess. It had no doubt what to call Christianity as it beheld it in the early disciples. What would the world name Christianity today if it judged by us?

The world is judging, and in its own rough way is naming. It cannot displace the old name, but it is giving others.

Let us see to it that our lives suggest to the world the one great and holy name and that we honor the name Christians.

Fellowship With Christ

Vital Relation With the Master in Prayer for World-wide Evangelization.

BY J. H. GOLDNER.

THE MASTER IS praying. His disciples say, "Lord, teach us to pray." This must have been to him the most encouraging request they had ever made, because it revealed a sincere desire for fellowship with him in prayer. We are not fit for fellowship with Christ in anything until we have fellowship with him in his prayer life. Not until we have gone with him into his Gethsemane of prayer, are we prepared to go with him to his Galilee of service, his Golgotha of self-giving, his grave of self-effacement, his reward of a world redeemed. Christlike prayer is the simplest, saintliest, Christliest art of a cultured soul.

I will mention four items involved in fellowship with Christ in prayer.

1. First of all we must really pray. Christ never stopped to theorize about prayer. He prayed. In his life prayer was a fact, a force, a necessity, a divine reality. Such he sought to make it in the life of his disciples. When they said, "Lord teach us to pray," he did not stop to explain the mystery of prayer; he told them to pray. He did not give them a talk about prayer, he gave them a model prayer.

WHERE CHRIST PLACED EMPHASIS.

If there was one thing about prayer that Christ emphasized above everything else, it was that when we profess to pray we must really pray. "And when ye pray ye shall not be as the hypocrites, for they love to stand and pray in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets that they may be seen of men." "And in praying use not vain repetitions."

A devout old army officer said to me: "I never prayed more than two or three times in my life." Then he quickly added: "Do not misunderstand me. I say my prayers every day; but I am learning that it is one thing to say a prayer and quite another thing to pray." All of us say prayers; but how many really pray? At the Edinburgh Conference a committee submitted the following: "We would lay special emphasis upon the fact that the real problem is not the increase or the improvement of the aids to prayer, or the multiplication of exhortations to pray; but the securing of a body of people who by earnest and sustained effort have become proficient in the practice of prayer." The pressing need in our brotherhood is not more prayers, but more actual praying.

THE PRICE OF FELLOWSHIP.

2. In order to have fellowship with Christ in prayer we must be willing to pay the price. It costs more to have fellowship with Christ in prayer than to have fellowship with him in giving, or serving, or suffering or dying. The kind of praying Christ did costs much. No Christian experience is as expensive as real prayer. On being asked to give money, or time, or service to a missionary enterprise we hesitate, we wish first of all to count the cost; but when we are asked to pray for it we instantly respond, never stopping to count the cost, thankful that so little is required of us, not realizing that the most exacting and exhausting expenditure of self takes place when we really pray.

We are allowed to look at our Lord in prayer. "In the days of his flesh he offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears." A holy, a costly experience. Is it possible that during such praying his disciples dared to say, "Lord, teach us to pray?" Did they desire fellowship with him in that kind of praying? Look again; "And being in an agony he prayed more earnestly and his sweat was, as it were, great drops of blood falling to the ground." Would we have fellowship with Christ in prayer? Then the ravishings of his soul in passions of intercession must become the actual prayer experiences of our souls. His Gethsemane must become our Gethsemane; his Calvary our Calvary.

Who is fit to unite with Christ in prayer for a lost world? Not he who hates a brother and is unforgiving; not he who is malicious and entertains evil designs against God's fellowworkman; not he who is envious and jealous, seeking only his own; not he whose heart is foul and hands stained; not he who is indolent and penurious. The price of fellowship with Christ in prayer is a continuous course of unsparing spiritual discipline, resulting in a heart that is pure and loves steadily; eyes that are clear and see far; a mind that is sober and thinks wisely; hands that are clean and skillful in service; a life with "Holiness unto the Lord" written everywhere.

PRAYER TO BE PUT FIRST.

3. To have fellowship with Christ in prayer we must, like him, give prayer the preeminence. In the beginning, at his baptism, he prayed. Before choosing twelve students for his college of missions he devoted a night to prayer. Before going to his rest at evening time or his toil in the morning he prayed. Before his ascent to Calvary he stopped in Gethsemane to pray. Before dying he prayed. In all things prayer had the preeminence.

Such is his desire for us. "And he spoke a parable unto them to the end that they ought always to pray and not to faint." He was touring the numerous villages, towns, and cities of populous Galilee. "When he saw the multitudes, he was moved with compassion for them, because they were distressed and scattered as sheep not having a shepherd." Then said he to his disciples: "The harvest is truly plenteous but the laborers are few." What, under the circumstances, is the first thing he suggests? A collection? No. Sending out missionaries? No. "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest." It was after he had said, "Pray ye" that he said, "Go ye to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Before giving, or sending, or going comes praying.

MISSIONS BORN IN PRAYER.

Missions were born in prayer and can prosper only in the prayer atmosphere. Our missionary work moves forward and upward no faster than we pray. We regard it an occasion for widespread rejoicing when a five thousand dollar pledge to missions is announced. There is a reason for infinitely greater joy when a righteous man pledges himself to a life of prayer for missions. No matter what a man's contribution of money, time or service may be, he has not given his best and most needed gift until he has dedicated himself to a daily programme of intelligent, specific and importuning intercession.

From every mission station we hear the insistent appeal of the workers. It is not an appeal for money or men. Louder than the imploring call, "Come over and help us," is the passionate cry, "Brethren, pray for us." God knows that we sadly need money and men, but deeper lies our need of a continual stream of intercession. That is fundamental to all else. Back of our money and methods, back of our missionaries and missions, back of our mission boards and churches, back of everything must be the prayer-life of a consecrated brotherhood. If we do not have fellowship with Christ in his intercession we cannot hope to have fellowship with him in his gospel conquests and victories. Omit prayer and we have a perfect machine, but no power. Neglect to pray and we have a superb body, but devoid of the vital breath of God. There is but one place from which to approach our world task and that is from above. There is but one way to approach it and that is upon our knees.

POWER THROUGH PRAYER.

4. To have fellowship with Christ in prayer means power. The missionary task is not so much a question of men and money, of methods and machinery, as of power. The power problem is hardest to solve. The power problem is another name for the prayer problem.

When Christ prayed there was power. At the time of his baptism he prayed; the heavens opened and the Holy Spirit descended upon him. After this he returned to Galilee "in the power of the Spirit." In one of his prayers he said, "Father, glorify thy name in me," and God answered, "I have both glorified it and will glorify it again." At the grave of Mary's and Martha's brother he prayed and after praying he spoke the words of power, "Lazarus, come forth," and the dead man arose. He prayed in the Garden, "and there appeared unto him an angel strengthening him." There is a vital connection between Christ'.

prayers and power.

God's reserve of power is unlimited and accessible. Prayer is the process of tapping it. When Christian people have fellowship with Christ in prayer they have power, for whenever they really pray something happens. Every missionary advance, every religious awakening, every victory in a time of crisis has been preceded and accompanied by prayer. A small group of persons met for intercession. In the summer of 1886 a larger group met at Mt. Hermon for a month of intercession. Out of those periods of spiritual travail was born the Student Volunteer Movement. A little company of men waited on God in prayer in New York, and later at Silver Bay, and the Missionary Education Movement was conceived. In November, 1906, fifty business men and ministers spent six hours in the chapel of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York prayerfully waiting for the leadings of God's Spirit and the Laymen's Missionary Movement was launched.

WHAT PRAYER CAN ACCOMPLISH.

Our Million Dollar Campaign began, continued, and triumphed, not in the wisdom and cunning of the holy men in charge; but in the wisdom and power of God released by prayer. All over our land that company of believing, praying, venturesome spirits has left a trail of intercession. Wherever they went they revived the low-burning altar fires. Their most valuable service to missions was not in securing ten hundred thousand dollars but in teaching us to set free the irresistible energies of God by means of prayer.

PRAYER BEFORE PLAN.

We are to engage in a Men and Millions Campaign. Before the exercise of our cleverness must come the exercise of our faith. Before there is any planning there must be passionate praying. Create a church-wide contagion of prayer and there will be a deluge of giving. In the words of another, "Prayer is the only element which can quicken information into inspiration, transmute interest into passion, crystallize emotion into consecration, and coin enthusiasm into dollars and lives."

The last persons we pray for, if we ever pray for them, are the members of our missionary boards. They ought to come first on our list. We have no right to charge them with the sacred responsibility of administering so much money and precious human life unless we support them with unceasing intercession, that they may have constant access to the source of wisdom and of power.

As a result of our giving, talented men and women are in foreign lands, often at the mercy of an inhospitable climate and under the influence of a depressing heathen environment. Only, when in addition to our financial support, we assure them of our spiritual support in prayer, have we fully met our obligations. We can double our efficiency and effectiveness in non-Christian lands without the addition of a single missionary, by doubling our prayer force at home.

Through our missionaries God is leading men and women out of heathenism into the Christian fellowship. How radical this transition is, God only knows. If we would have fellowship with Christ in prayer what must we do for these tender, untutored babes in Christ? Listen to the Master; "Neither for these only do I pray, (that is, his missionaries) but for them also that believe on me through their word."

LOVE THROUGH PRAYER.

That God should condition the generosity of the rank and file of our churches, the wisdom of our missionary boards, the effectiveness of our missionaries, and the faithfulness of the native Christians upon our praying is at once a mystery and a reality. When Christian people enter into fellowship with Christ in prayer, his love will become their love; his life their life, his death their death, his victory their victory, and his crown their crown.

"Lord, teach us to pray."

How a Hero Died

Story of the Tragic Death of R. Ray Eldred, Missionary on the Congo.

BY STEPHEN J. COREY.

SEVEN WEEKS AGO the cablegram came telling of the accidental drowning of R. Ray Eldred in Africa. Letters have just arrived telling the particulars concerning his death. Mr. Eldred and Mr. H. C. Hobgood were on a long journey, preaching the Gospel in the native villages when the sad accident occurred. They had traveled hundreds of miles through the forest visiting missionary outposts and preaching in many new places where the Word of God had not gone before. The letter from Mr. Hobgood was written to Mr. and Mrs. Hedges, who are located at Lotumbe Station, from which point the long journey was begun. We are giving the whole letter so that all the details may be known. Added words are unnecessary—indeed our hearts are too heavy to add them. One needs but to read Mr. Hobgood's letter and those from the others to know of what material our Congo missionaries are made. Brother Eldred died at his work while he was in brave self-forgetfulness carrying the message of God's love into the remote regions. The experience which resulted in his death was not an unusual one in the experience of our American missionaries. Brother Hobgood, with aching heart, wrote the letter that the other missionaries might know the sad news, and then stayed bravely at his post in the lonely forest village, that the work might not be hindered.

The steamer Oregon is too long to turn around in these small, swift rivers. We must have a smaller, auxiliary launch to navigate in these places. The words of Mr. Hedges about the need of such a boat are all too true. Bert Wilson, Herbert Smith, of Africa, and Dr. Dye are now among the West Virginia churches people are responding gladly and the sum needed, $5,000, is nearly subscribed. The launch will be sent to Africa at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Hobgood's Letter.

Tumba, Sept. 4, 1913.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Hedges:

With a heavy heart I write at this time. Yesterday at noon Mr. Eldred was drowned in the Lokolo River. We had come over a very bad path, the last half hour of which was black mud, when we reached the river. We wanted to cross to the town of Eyengo, but the town is a half hour back from the river and there was no canoe close. The men tried to call some of the villagers, but couldn't make them hear, so my washboy and across, intending to go hunt a canoe. In talking about the men crossing, we both expressed confidence in our ability to swim over. I said I wouldn't mind trying it in the morning or late in the evening, but that I didn't guess it would be wise to try it in the heat of the day when we were hot from our journey. He replied that we had cooled off till our journey wouldn't hurt us.

In a minute we had decided to swim across. The river is something like 125 feet deep there, and very swift. To allow for the current, we went out the distance of the crossing above the beach where we intended to land. I removed my shoes and outer shirt to escape their fearful drag on me. Mr. Eldred removed only his trousers, keeping on his light rubber soled shoes. I told him he could swim better without them, but he thought he didn't need to take them off.

We struck out and being the faster swimmer, I passed on some distance ahead. We found the water unexceptionally cold and the current swifter than we had thought. I swam pretty fast, taking care only not to overexert myself. I was just getting out of the current, and was some thirty feet ahead, when I heard him speak. I looked around to hear what he had to say, when he repeated, "Hobgood, don't get too far away." He spoke very quietly and showed no sign of fear. I hurried back to him for he was still in the swiftest current. As I came up he said, still very quietly, "I suspect you had better help me a little." I had already caught him under the armpit with my left hand, which left me only my right hand and feet to swim with. He was still swimming pretty strongly, but I saw that I couldn't get him out alone if his strength failed, so I called sharply and help. One of them grasped the situation and plunged in, but he had put on his shirt after crossing and this entangled him a little so that he stopped. I called sharper and he came on. When he was still ten feet away, I saw Mr. Eldred's mouth go under, and he drew in a little water. I made a hard effort to raise him and we both started under. My strength was about gone, so I saw the only chance was to get him to Bosako in a hurry, so as we started down I shoved him forward as hard as I could, drinking in a big gulp of water as I did so. Bosako reached him. They were now in fifteen feet from the bank, but the water was yet deep. As Bosako pulled him forward, Mr. Eldred, apparently as his last conscious effort, tried to reach firm footing, but the water was over his head, and he began sinking. Bosako shoved him forward to a strong Longa workman, who was rushing out, and he pulled him to a standing position in shallow water. As soon as I could get out we dragged Mr. Eldred out, and immediately placed him face down and tried to force the water from his lungs. I don't think he had ever gotten more than a half foot under water, so I at first thought he had very little water in his lungs.

THE FIGHT FOR LIFE.

After trying to get the water out, I turned him over and began working his arms to try to start artificial respiration. Four times I tried to force out the water, following each trial with an effort to start artificial respiration. I got out only about a teaspoonful of water. After half hour I got artificial respiration started. I ascertained that his heart was still beating freely. Then for about two hours we kept respiration going, I working one arm, and the workman following my movements with the other. When we got respiration started, I thought we would win the fight, nor did my hope begin to wane for an hour and a half. But not till his pulse had stopped entirely and his respiration failed, did I give up the fight. In the meantime one of the workman had found a canoe and the rest of the workmen had crossed with the goods. All the time we were praying help from the Heavenly Father.

We wrapped the body in blankets and placed it on a boanga in the canoe. A little before four we started down because I wished to bury the body here at our mission. Last night we slept in the woods. From the strain of those hours of effort to restore life I was a little sick, but am about to get straightened out again. We buried the corpse here this afternoon. We had no boards to make a coffin, so had to use a covering like the boanga, wrapped around the body.

I am sending this by two strong men overland and they will reach Lotumbe in six or seven days. I wanted to send a small canoe to make the trip in three or four days, but couldn't get one. Entonge you will know, the other is one of Mr. Eldred's men. I am keeping all the others back to paddle the big canoe down.

I think it best that I stay here and finish the work with inquirers and helpers. That will take me until Sunday, the 14th. Then I will cross to Wafania and come on down river, perhaps reaching Lotumbe by Monday, the 22nd.

Up here the state is pressing the people for tax, so many of them are in the forests hunting rubber. One chief who had 50 wives has put away all but one, and will be baptized. There may be as the last time, so you see I have lots of work to do. I can't leave without doing it, in spite of my great inefficiency in the language. The work here is growing marvelously. Except for Mr. Eldred's untimely death, this trip would have made an impression which years could not efface. But it has already done great good, and has strengthened our work in this locality, both in its appeal and in its dignity.

Let us pray the tender watch care of the Father over the little Eldred children, and that someone may speedily come to take up the work which Mr. Eldred has left. In the Longa and Lotumbe fields he was loved and greatly respected. He has been a strong man in our work. I pray that I may be able to close the work here so that there shall be no great loss. I cannot hope for as great advance as we would have had.

It is late, so I must retire, for I got little sleep last night.

With prayers and affection,
H. C. Hobgood.

Mr. Hensey's Letter.

Bolenge, Sept. 14.

Dear Brother McLean:

Letters have just arrived from Lotumbe, telling us of the death of Brother Eldred. I am sending a cable tomorrow, and Brothers Hobgood and Hedges are writing you the details.

No words can tell how heavy and sad are our hearts at this cruel loss. Our senior missionary, he was to all us younger men as a father and friend. Since 1907 we have been very closely associated with him, and Mrs. Hensey and I held him in high respect and affection. A tireless toiler, an enthusiastic preacher, a missionary statesman, a friend to the oppressed, a pure-hearted Christian man—all that and more was Ray Eldred.

He was of the pioneer type, and belonged to Livingstone's class. Ever before his eyes was the vision of the "Regions Beyond." After spending five years at Bolenge, and seeing the church here grow strong, in the fall of 1908 he went to open the new station at Longa. But still the unentered fields impelled him, and he died on the banks of the Lokolo river, nine days beyond Lotumbe station, and fifteen days beyond Longa. There in a lonely native village, far from the grave of his beloved wife at Longa, far, far away from his three boys at Hiram, Ray Eldred sleeps in peace.

A SORROWING PEOPLE.

The news came to us today just as we came out of church and a sadness came upon all. As I write, the people are gathered in sorrowing groups, talking of the teacher who helped to found the church, and who baptized so many of them. And at Longa and Lotumbe and Monieka it is the same.

I cannot help but think today of how fine and strong this athlete and football player of Kentucky University looked when he came to the Congo in 1902, and of how wearied and worn he was when I saw him the last time—two days before he started on this last trip. He literally wore himself out for his Christ and these people.

Pray for us in this hour of loss and sadness. Other hands must carry on the work he loved so well, and other hearts will try to bear the burdens he bore so gladly, but our hearts will be sad and lonely.

Your in the Master's service.
A. F. Hensey.

Mr. Hodges' Letter.

Lotumbe, Congo Belge.
Sept. 12, 1913.

A. McLean,
Cincinnati, Ohio, U. S. A.

Dear Bro. McLean:

Sad news comes in just now from one of our outposts on the High Lokolo river. Mr. Eldred was drowned while crossing the river. Brother Hobgood says the journey thus far was very successful and he will continue the trip a few more days, but with a heavy heart. O, Brother McLean, heavy hearts are here now. Africa's salvation comes high but by the will of our Heavenly Father we will give the children the "Words of Life."

While sore of heart we must still plan our work. Longa has always been undermanned as well as Lotumbe and Monieka. Now as new workers were coming out we were hopeful. I suppose now, that we will go to Longa and leave Hobgood and Dr. Frymire up here. Brother McLean, send us another man at once. We will be heavy-hearted because of Brother Eldred's death and because of our condition so undermanned. Brother Eldred's little boys twice and thrice orphaned. Don't forget those boys.

"Let no one think the price too high," are the words Brother Eldred used many times in conversation and in his correspondence after his wife's death last November. Now the price is greater and were we to hear from him he would say again as confidently as ever, "Let no one think the price too high."

LIFE LOST IN SERVICE.

Brother Eldred lost his life in service. To him it was a beautiful life that was spent in service. We, his fellow-workers, honor him for his devotion. His wife's grave is at Longa and shows the care of a loving husband's regard. His grave is four or five hundred miles beyond, at a lonely outpost, Tumba, where seldom a white man places his foot. This grave will soon be covered by dense and tangled vegetation of the relentless tropical growth. It may be lost to the memory of human knowledge. In a few years, even, Brother Hobgood who so tenderly and lovingly laid the body in its last resting place, may not be able to find it. The body will perish and its retreat be forgotten, even his name will gradually die out on the lips, except at times the older people will talk of past days and recall him. But his influence here in Congo is permanent. He helped make Bolenge so that it is as widely known as Bethany. He gave of his time, strength, and prayers to Longa, Monieka, and Lotumbe. And it was in helping us of Lotumbe at our outposts that he lost his life.

I have heard Brother Eldred say, "For fame I have no wish, I am here to serve my Master and if my work is unknown, but helps to make Christ known, I am content." But, dear brother and friend, your work is known! The Congo Mission is yours as well as ours! Your influence will not die!

Brother Eldred was pacific. His motto was to think carefully before speaking. He was painstaking, going into the minute details. This is manifest to all those who associated with him. He was patient and devoted much time in helping these folk. He was prayerful, and neglected not to read daily from the Book.

We shall miss from our Committee meetings his counsel. We shall miss his kindly smiling face. We looked up to him as some one better than ourselves. We looked to him as father, and many times we used the endearing name instead of his own. We nearly always referred to him as Brother Eldred, while "Mr." or "Dr." was the title for the rest.

The last time Brother Eldred preached here at Lotumbe he made such an impression on the people that those who heard him will always remember. His manner was so simple. He knew the nature of the people and so he knew what they needed. The people here always liked to hear Is'ea Mpela preach, and they will miss him.

Last Sunday as I referred to some of the other missionaries that have given their lives for the Congo, when I told of Is'ea Mpela the sorrowful hearts poured forth tears. They will miss their Is'ea Mpela.

Very truly,
Chas. P. Hedges.

P. S. Had we a launch of the type Brother Smith suggests to get, Mr. Eldred had not been drowned. Don't let us go another year without one is the prayer of your sad stricken fellow-workers for the Christ of God.

"The Best Society"

Some Facts About Some Doings of Some So-Called "Best People."

BY SYLVANUS STALL.

THERE IS SOMETHING which many people call "Society." In almost every community there is what the public denominates the "best Society." Sometimes the people who compose it are called the "leaders in Society," the "hoi aristoi," the "upper ten," the "four hundred." It is oftentimes an exclusive set, and because it is exclusive, many people otherwise informed who do not understand what this "best Society" really is, desire to get into it and become a member of it. They are like the flies that are struggling to get into a trap which has been set with a savory smell. Poor, deluded ones, they do not know that the thing they crave is the thing that kills.

Sometimes this "Society" is spoken of as being composed of "the best people." That does not mean that they are righteous, that they are pure and clean, or even outwardly moral in their conduct. The fact is that the "best Society" may be and often is the worst society in the community in which its members reside. The people who compose it may be wealthy, may be thought cultured, may even be members of some "fashionable church," but the fact is, that the influence of that "best Society" is often baneful to the last degree.

The "best Society" is often composed of the leaders in every extreme, extravagant and vulgar fashion. When a dance more obscene than the rest is devised, they are the first to welcome and adopt it. If the saloon invents a new form of evil and introduces into it indecent, degraded and prostitute women who serve drinks to besotted and degraded men, moving up and down among the tables only half clad, exciting the basest passions, and by their very bearing inviting the vilest suggestions and engagements for the most immoral purposes—I say, if the saloon introduces a thing of this kind, and calls it a "cabaret," then these people who call themselves the "best Society" introduce a cabaret party, and appear in costumes which simulate the costumes of the girls in the real cabaret, and whose appearance cannot do other than excite in the men vile passions and, indeed, in some considerable measure at least, the same moral degradation and the same social and physical ruin as the real cabaret. These "best people" instead of imitating the best things and setting the best example, imitate the worst things and exert the worst influence upon the community at large of any people who reside within its bounds. The dastardly doings on the first floor of a "house of shame" are not more disgraceful than what these "best people" of the "best Society" often pride themselves upon in many of their fashionable public gatherings. And even then, if they were ashamed of their doings, it would not be so bad; but, in their cabaret attire, they have pride and pleasure in posing before the camera to aid in the penny-policy of the editor who is willing to use the pictoral pages of his Sunday issue to debauch the public at large by giving the indecent exposures of these "best people" of the "best Society."

When you come to analyze the character of the "best people" of this "best Society," as judged by their entertainments, their cigarettes and the effects of their champagne, a sane and sensible person cannot but be forced to the conclusion that as for himself, his wife and his children, their social and moral well-being is greatly advanced, and their happiness greatly increased by contentedly dwelling without the pale of the "hoi aristoi," the "upper ten," the "four hundred," the "best Society."

In the small towns "the society people" may not be able to frame their entertainments upon the basis of an outlay of from $15,000 to $20,000, spending as much as from $6,000 to $8,000 for plants and cut flowers for use in a single evening. Champagne, cigarettes and indecencies may not constitute so prominent a feature in their entertainments, but too often these "people of the best Society" are nevertheless the leaders in the very worst that the public sentiment of the community in which they live is willing to tolerate.

Roosevelt as "Confessor"

A Human Interest Story About the Ex-President.

A CERTAIN MOTHER wrote to Roosevelt, confiding to him the fear that she was becoming commonplace to her husband, and her belief that because of the care of her large family she had "gotten behind the times," according to the Chicago News. Mr. Roosevelt wrote the following letter in reply to hers:

"New York, Jan. 11, 1913.

"My Dear Mrs. ——: Most certainly your letter will not go into the waste-paper basket. I shall think it over and show it to Mrs. Roosevelt. Will you let me say, in the first place, that a woman who can write such a letter is certainly not "hopelessly dull and uninteresting?" If the facts are as you state, then I do not wonder that you feel bitterly and that you feel that the gravest kind of injustice has been done you. I have always tried to insist to men that they should do their duty to the women even more than the women to them. Now, I hardly like to write specifically about your husband, because you might not like it yourself. It seems to me almost incredible that any man who is the husband of a woman who has borne him nine children should not feel that they and he are lastingly her debtors.

"You say that you have had nine children, that you did your own work, including washing, ironing, house-cleaning, and the care of the little ones as they came along; that you sewed everything they wore, including trousers for the boys and caps and jackets for the girls while little; that you helped them all in their school work and started them in music; but that as they grew older you got behind the times, that you never belonged to a club or society or lodge, nor went to any one's house, as you hardly had time to do so; and that in consequence your husband outgrew you, and that your children look up to him and not to you.

"If these facts are so, you have done a great and wonderful work, and the only explanation I can possibly give of the attitude you describe on the part of your husband and children is that they do not understand what it is that you have done. I emphatically believe in unselfishness, but I also believe that it is a mistake to let other people grow selfish, even when the other people are husband and children.

"Now, I suggest, that you take your letter to me, of which I send you back a copy, and this letter, and then select out of your family the one with whom you feel most sympathy, whether it is your husband or one of your children. Show the two letters to him or her, and then have a frank talk about the matter. If any man, as you say, becomes ashamed of his wife because she has lost her figure in bearing his children, then that man is a hound and has every cause to be ashamed of himself. I am sending you a little book called 'Mother,' by Kathleen Norris, which will give you my views on the matter. Of course, there are base and selfish men, just as there are, although I believe in smaller number, base and selfish women. Man and woman alike should profit by the teachings in such a story as this of 'Mother.'

The Mind of Christ

How His Mind Differed From Others, and Some of Its Qualities Considered.

BY JOSEPH FORT NEWTON.

"WE HAVE the mind of Christ." Perhaps never since St. Paul was martyred have these words echoed so persistently in the minds of men as they do today. When men think about religion in our day, it is about the mind of Christ that they think, his life and words—his attitude towards life and death, and all that lies between. If they read the Gospels, it is not to illustrate a creed, but to listen to a Voice that "spake as never man spake." Still as of old he speaks as one having authority, and it is his words that men are eager to hear.

Since this text offers just what our age is seeking, we may well ask its meaning. In the context the Apostle makes mention of three types of mind. There is the carnal mind, swayed by passion and prejudice, to which divine things are foolish and unreal. Then there is a higher mind, described in our version as a "natural mind"—an unfortunate term because it implies that the highest mind, the spiritual, is unnatural. The exact word used is "psychical," but for us that term is linked with processes and associations equally misleading. If we use the word "intellectual" we are not far from what St. Paul means, and, oddly enough, he anticipated the reigning thought of our day.

JESUS AND THE GREAT THINKERS.

Somehow we feel that it is incongruous to speak of Jesus as a great thinker. Not timidity, but a certain wise instinct makes us aware that there was that in him above and apart from what we mean by the term intellect. We have only to think of him alongside a great dialectician like Socrates to see that he belongs to a different order. Keen, restless, logical, Socrates pricked the bubbles of ignorance and vanity, and laughed to hear them explode. Jesus could do that, too, as we see in His debates with his critics—parrying their thrusts and so outwitting them that they dared not ask him any more questions. But what was a supreme power in Socrates was only a by-play with the Master. Kant was a great metaphysician, undermining one by one the presumptions of common sense and the axioms of the intellect—leaving only the moral imperative undissolved in his analysis. Yet when we turn from the Critique of Pure Reason to the Gospels, what a different world it is. Jesus might have had a curious interest in the argument of Kant, but he would have been unmoved by it.

SCHOLARS ADORE JESUS.

Or let us imagine Jesus reading the Darwin thesis on the Origin of Species. There he would find a great and patient mind, bringing together a bewildering mass of data, microscopic and macroscopic, seeking a law of unity and growth. How unlike the two types of mind! The same feeling comes over us, again, when we pass from the many-mirrored plays of Shakespeare to the simple parables of Jesus. Shakespeare makes it easy for a man to believe in miracles, so fertile is he, so like a printed edition of the universe are his dramas. Who else has fathomed the human soul with all its flaming and chaotic passion? Yet Shakespeare humbly bowed before Jesus as one who knew what he would have given everything to know. Lamb said truly that if Shakespeare were to enter the room all would rise in admiration, but if Jesus were to open the door even Shakespeare himself would kneel.

Surely, it may be thought, we find something akin to the mind of Christ among the great religious geniuses. Yet even in that shining company our search is in vain; so much so that we feel that to call Jesus a genius at all is inapt. Take Pascal, with his abject faith, his sense of "that unbearable need which disturbs the heart of man, and will not be comforted;" take Newman, with his unearthliness of intellect, and his awful vision of the unseen—yet how far they are from Jesus, though they were seeking him day and night. In her new book, "The Mystic Way," Evelyn Underhill calls Jesus the Master-Mystic of the ages; and yet we find in his life none of the agonies and ecstasies of classic mysticism. The introspective method of Boehme, the passionate quest of Teresa, the deep, still quietism of Molinos—beautiful as these experiences are, we do not find them in Jesus. His fellowship with God was direct, simple beyond analysis, open and unobscured. All those angelic souls confess that Jesus was what they sought so earnestly to be.

It is indeed strange. The whole world of scientific knowledge, of esthetic culture, of practical achievement, which we think so essential, Jesus seemed to ignore. And true, how tawdry, how unsatisfying all that vast and noble world seems beside what Jesus knew! He did not write a poem, or paint a picture, but he knew how to take a poor, knotted, twisted, bespattered, sinful soul and make it straight and strong and lovely! He knew how to heal a broken heart, and how to set a besotted mind at liberty! There is a center from which all truth can be surveyed, and Jesus lived at that center. As someone has said, he throws light on everything, and everything throws light on him. How wonderful beyond words he is, how unique and supreme above all who have ever walked this earth.

THE MYSTERY OF THE MIND OF CHRIST.

The better to feel the mystery of the mind of Christ, let us look for a moment at some of its qualities. He did not learn from books; he drank from the fountain of which books are the spray. It was a powerful mind, amazing in its depths and scope and grasp, projecting its ideas and visions through thousands of years, giving lovely and enduring form to the faith and hope of humanity. It was a positive mind. He did not grope and guess; he knew. Insight, not logic, was his guide, and his words are a series of grand affirmations. There was no mist in his mind, no film over his eyes, but the lucidity and poise of God-like sanity. It was a seer-like, prophetic mind, over which the future cast its light and shadow. Much of his sadness may have been due to this deep prevision, and much of his joy also—for he saw the far-off victory of his spirit and his truth in the world. Yet he was no mere predictor, and set no dates when his dreams are to come true; he was greater than all the prophets.

It was a practical mind, in no sense speculative. One who sees and knows has no need to argue or conjecture. His insight was as clear as sunlight and as sure as the order of the world. He dealt only with the truth which is vital, usable and makes for faith and the conduct of life. One may cull from the sayings of Jesus a body of homely wit and wisdom, unequaled anywhere. Yet he was no maker of maxims, no purveyor of paradoxes. The proverbs of Bacon are wise, but cold and glittering with gem-like hardness—nor did they make him a good man. Men must have something more than sagacity; something higher than cunning; they must have spirituality. Always the truest worldly wisdom comes from the most unworldly minds. If Jesus had common sense, he also had an uncommon sense rare in this world and precious beyond price. He was so wise that he was simple, and so simple that he was wise.

ARTISTIC QUALITY.

It was an artistic mind to which truth was beauty, and beauty truth. Of a great Greek it was said:

"Our Euripides the Human
With his droppings of warm tears
And his touches of things common
Till they rose and touched the spheres," but those lines are even more true of him who walked in Galilee; he loved flowers; he mused over seeds; he knew the birds and the brotherhood of the winds. In his sermons lilies grow, sparrows fly to and fro, the sower goes forth to sow, the housewife is busy at her toil, suns rise and set. At his touch little familiar things are lifted and become teachers of ultimate truths. There is an air of out of doors about his words, as if a sky full of stars were his chamber of meditation and prayer. His words are the acme of art that is artless in its felicity of simplicity. The parables were not made; they grew.

Yet these traits, so rare and beautiful, were only minor qualities in the mind of Jesus, only the foothills of a mountain range. Far above them towered that awful clarity of vision whereby he walked through the world undeceived and unillusioned, knowing what is in man. He lifted "the painted veil, which those who live call life;" and saw behind it. No glitter of rank or robe or caste dazzled him. No disguise of hypocrisy, no fictitious sanctity, no solemn make-believe deceived him. His all-seeing everywhereness of mind reversed the ideals and ideas of the world, making the first last and the last first. His swift divination of motives, his sure perception of values, brought hidden things to light. Truth swayed him, ruled him, and he uttered it with a freedom, a fearlessness which no flattery, no threat, no venerable and consecrated authority could deter. He was the one free spirit of all time, bound only to know the will of God and to do it.

The first great rule is that we must do something—that life must have a purpose and an aim—that work should be not merely occasional and spasmodic, but steady and continuous. Pleasure is a jewel which will only retain its luster when it is in a setting of work; and a vacant life is one of the worst of pains, though the islands of leisure that stud a crowded, well-occupied life may be among the things to which we look back with the greatest delight.—Lecky.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

CONDUCTED BY MRS. IDA WITHERS HARRISON

MILITANT METHODS IN WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The lecture tour of Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst in this country has brought the question of the use of militant methods in woman suffrage campaigns sharply before us. Mrs. Pankhurst is a woman of pleasing personality and refined manners, with unusual gifts as a public speaker, and seems to be commanding a good hearing wherever she goes. While one can hardly doubt that she champions and practices her peculiar methods from real devotion to her cause, and from convictions that they are the best means to be used in her own country, yet we must remember that she represents but a small fraction of English suffragists.

At the convention of the International Suffrage Alliance, held in Budapest last summer, the National Union of Suffrage Societies was the only English association regularly affiliated, and one of its delegates introduced a resolution to the effect that in a country enjoying free speech, free press, and freedom of organization, constitutional methods were best adapted to gain the enfranchisement of women. Mrs. Pankhurst's society, the Women's Social and Political Union, was only allowed representation by fraternal delegates, and the sentiment of the convention was strongly opposed to the use of militant methods.

Just before Mrs. Pankhurst came to this country, the Woman's Liberal Federation, of which the Countess of Carlisle is president, passed the following resolution:

"The executive committee, on behalf of the Woman's Liberal Federation, records that it has for six years consistently deplored and condemned the lawless methods of the militants which have so grievously set back the cause of woman's suffrage, and it recognizes that the outrages which are at present daily shocking the moral sense of the community are laying a serious obstacle in the way of those who are striving to carry this reform into law; nevertheless, the executive committee trusts that the wrong-doing of a mere section will not be unjustly visited upon thousands of conscientious, patient women who have for so many years striven by law-abiding methods to win the franchise for their sex."

The opinion recently expressed by Miss Jane Addams on militancy is doubtless that of the thoughtful, intelligent American woman. She is quoted in the Chicago Inter-Ocean as saying:

"The ballot represents the substitution of public opinion for force.

"Women want the vote because it means equal consideration for their opinions, irrespective of the fact that they are physically weaker.

"When women go back to the use of force, they break the very principle they are endeavoring to establish.

"When men and women use force against each other, there can be but one result: Men with their brute force will win.

"Militancy is therefore a great mistake, both fundamentally and politically."

While in this land of free speech, we may go to hear Mrs. Pankhurst without in any way endorsing her methods, yet suffer our word of caution and exhortation from a plain, practical person:

Do not let Mrs. Pankhurst take any of your good American dollars back to England with her, to promote a line of conduct that is working a serious injury to the good cause of woman suffrage!

SUFFRAGE BABIES LEAD.

A heavy blow has been given to the doctrine that equal suffrage for mothers means destruction for babies. The world's record was broken at the Better Babies contest lately held at the Interstate Fair in Spokane, Wash. There were more than 1,400 babies entered. So many of the youngsters were nearly perfect that, after the preliminary tests, an additional competition had to be held to settle the relative merits of the babies who came up to 98 per cent or over. At the close, the winning babies and their mothers were put into seven big touring cars and taken around the Fair grounds amid the enthusiastic cheers of the great crowds that had been waiting patiently to see them.

This news will please Miss Julia C. Lathrop, head of the Children's Bureau at Washington, D. C., who is a strong advocate of equal suffrage. In her address at the last National Suffrage Convention, Miss Lathrop said: "Instead of being incompatible with child welfare, woman suffrage leads toward it, and is indeed the next great service to be rendered for the welfare and ennoblement of the home."

MISS WILSON'S WEDDING CAKE.

Miss Jessie Wilson's wedding cake was baked last week. It is said to have cost $500.

The first layer of the cake is four inches thick and twenty-two inches across. When ready for the knife the cake will weigh 135 pounds and will be two and one-half feet tall, if one counts the vase of white orchids to be placed on top. It will contain nineteen ingredients. In 2,000 dainty white boxes, tied with satin ribbon, the cake will be distributed, each box the proper size to go under one's pillow to dream upon.

"Then," to quote the artist who is making it, "there will be a design for the initials of the bride and bridegroom. It will be done in silver. And then there will be lilies of the valley in white sugar on the sides."

CHICAGO CHRISTMAS FUND.

A public appeal for funds for the "Chicago's Own Christmas Tree" celebration, which will be held in Grant Park Christmas eve, was issued last week by Charles L. Hutchinson, president of the Municipal Christmas Festival Association.

The appeal asks for small contributions to defray the expense of the large tree, which will be illuminated and put in Grant Park and the decorations which will be made along Michigan avenue and in the park.

In order to make the festival a celebration of all the people of Chicago small gifts from a large number of people are being asked in preference to a few contributions from wealthy men.

Mayor-elect Mitchel, of New York, is going to recognize women in politics. It was announced at the city hall last week that he intends to appoint a woman as a deputy charity commissioner and will appoint several of them as deputy tenement house commissioner.

A Column of Verse

A SONG PRAYER.

By Reuben Butchart.

All that I long to be,
  That Lord, me make;
All that I ought to be,
  Though my heart break.

Welcome the toil and stress,
  Cherish the strife;
Griefs that may heavy press
  Purge but the life.

Calm thou my coward soul,
  Steady my heart;
Fill me with strength, till whole,
  Bear I my part.

Through my vain thoughts reveal
  Thyself, divine;
Make me to see, to feel
  Love like to thine.

Save from my selfishness
  Brothers that be;
Fold thy dear tenderness,
  Christ, over me.

Clad in the garb of faith,
  Shriven by prayer;
Armed by the Spirit's breath,
  May I, then, dare,—

Dare to be true to God,
  Serving my brother;
Whether on sea or sod,
  This world, or other.

GUIDANCE.

By Alanson Tucker Schumann.

Upon the corner of a village street,
Close to the limits of my homestead lands,
An unpretentious upright firmly stands,
In workmanship plain, commonplace and neat:
To make its purpose clear, its form complete,
Below its top, like fingerless still hands,
A lettered board, transversely placed commands
To the right path the stranger's doubting feet,
And when the vision widens, and the stars
Majestically move across the night,
And God seems near in their eternal glow—
When no harsh voice the sacred silence mars,
I see, beyond the structure's slender height
The shadow of a cross upon the snow.

TODAY.

This little strip of light
'Twixt night and night
Let me keep bright
  Today!

And let no fumes of yesterday
Nor shadows of tomorrow
Bedim with sorrow
  Today!

I take this gift of heaven
As simply as 'tis given;
And if tomorrow shall be sad,
Or never comes at all, I've had
At least
  Today!

MINISTERIAL INSURANCE.

ONE of the valuable suggestions made in the report of the committee on Ministerial Supply at the Toronto Convention was in reference to the wisdom of an adequate insurance protection for ministers. No vocation demands more in the way of financial sacrifice than the ministry. This does not mean that it involves penury, but rather that the minister from the first faces the high probability that his income will always be modest. He has not much opportunity to accumulate a competence for advanced age, and cannot hope, fortunately, to lay up much money for his children. But he ought at least to make wise provision for his immediate family so that they will be absolved from anxiety at the end of his life.

It seems certain that life insurance affords one of the simplest and most efficient provisions for this emergency. The purchase of a reasonable amount of life insurance at as early an age as is practicable makes such provision, and relieves the minister and his family of no little anxiety regarding the future.

Whether the ministy of our own churches desires to adopt the suggestion involved in the recommendation of a particular ministerial insurance company, is a matter for individual choice. But the principle of preparing for advancing age by the purchase of life insurance is thoroughly sound and commendable.

REALITY IN THE CHURCH SERVICE.

THE public services of the Church are useful just in so far as they minister to the actual religious life of those who attend. The danger is always that they may fail in making upon the minds and souls of the worshipers the impression of reality in religion. No point needs to be guarded with greater care than the peril of merely passing through a form of service, either of prayer, music, or preaching, and especially the celebration of the ordinances, without an impressive sense of the significance of every step of the service to the people who attend.

It is sadly true that the sense of reality is lacking in not a little of the church service of the present time. Forms are adhered to because they have seemed worthful in the past, whereas they are no longer actually vital in their values. The minister and those who advise him must be constant students of this question of a really worthful meaning in the things which are done in the house of God. The difference between an inspiring and a wooden ministry is precisely this. Nothing can more quickly deaden the religious interests of any individual or group of people than the perfunctory and unalert performance of customary religious functions, such as prayer, the conduct of the Lord's Supper, or even the notices of church worship and work.

Only an eager sense of the vital nature of every word spoken and every act performed can make the services of the house of God worthful and inspiring.

THE INLETS AND OUTLETS OF POWER.

GREAT sources of power are not utilized by the activities of men. Behold with what difficulty we produce power for use in manufacture. We dig deep in the earth. We employ labor and gunpowder at great waste in digging out coal. We expend more power in hoisting the coal to the surface, and more in hauling it hundreds of miles to where it is to be utilized. We shovel it into a furnace, by hand, and amid great discomfort; we pump water and boil it and make steam, and then with shafts and belts and other cumbersome devices we transmit the power to where it is to be used. If we subtract from the power which the coal produces for the turning of the machinery, the labor which from the beginning has gone into the production of the coal, we have a pitifully small return for our pains. All the time the winds are blowing over the surface of the earth, and save for an obsolete sailing vessel here and there, or a farmer's wind-mill pumping water, the wind bloweth where it listeth, and we let it go by. The energy of the sun's heat, centuries ago, under the skill of Themistocles, set fire to a Persian fleet. But we do not generate power through the direct rays of the sun. The tides are gradually lengthening our days by acting as a brake upon the motion of the earth; but we have few tide mills. The inlets of our power are accompanied by great waste.

We talked this summer with an electrical engineer who is supplying power to many small manufactories from a central plant. He told me that it is not uncommon in small factories running their own engines, not only to waste enormously the power they might generate, but that which is actually transmitted often suffered a loss of 50 per cent in the friction of the machinery, the belts and shafting. So both in the inlets and outlets of power there is a great waste. It is the problem of economics and of religion as well to conserve the waste, and utilize it. There is no inlet of power without an outlet. You cannot perpetually charge a Leyden jar. It has its short limit, and is a peril all the while.

Every water-wheel, to turn at all, must provide an outflow as well as an intake. Every steam cylinder must provide a space into which the piston may be pushed and an exhaust for the steam. Every electric circuit must provide its ground wire and its current.

Christian activity must result or power above is paralyzed. God cannot do many mighty works unless we provide both an inlet and an outlet for his power.

THE WOMEN NEEDED.

RECENT elections in Illinois resulted in no gain for the liquor forces, and wherever the issue of "wet" and "dry" was on in territory hitherto "wet," the victory in a large majority of cases was on the "dry" side. The women helped in the achievement of this great victory. If woman's suffrage shall continue to register this kind of a verdict at the polls it will justify the hopes of its advocates and go far toward dispelling the forces of those who have opposed it. Let the good women remember, however, that this is only the beginning and they must keep it up.

BILL BOARD RELIGION.

THE following twice-clipped clipping is from the Poster from which it was copied into Printers' Ink:

At a meeting of the Educational Committee of the Poster Advertising Association held September 29 it was resolved that the religious and inspirational posters that the organization decided to post in every plant in the country should be made at once and that they shall be exploited everywhere December 1 and run through the holiday season.

The religious poster will be a composite of the two world-famous paintings of the birth of Christ in the manger of the Bethlehem stable and the wise men of the East led by the star to the place where the young child was. The caption, addressed, of course, to the rising generation, will be as follows: "Ask your Sunday-school teacher to tell you the story."

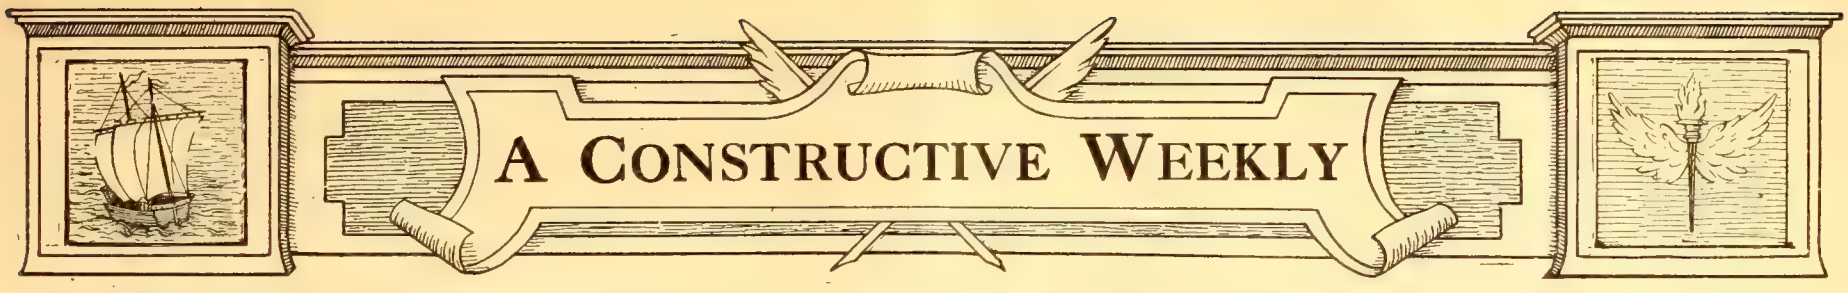
General Grant has been selected as the subject of the first inspirational poster. There will be an eight-sheet panel of the humble birthplace of the soldier; the middle section will present General Grant at the zenith of his career, showing the surrender of General Lee at Appomattox, and the third panel will show General Grant in the White House.

The significance of this combination will be pressed home upon the minds of those who see the poster with this question: "What are you doing with better opportunities?"

Across the top of the poster will run this caption: "What one poor boy accomplished."

A series of these religious and inspirational posters will be run during the month when the plants are not filled, so that the vacant space may be used to some advantage and in the interest of humanity.

Is not this a sign of the religious spirit of the age? Let the gospel story be so proclaimed that he who runs may read.



WHAT ABOUT MEXICO?

THE relations of the United States toward Mexico are, and for some time have been of an exceedingly critical character. American interests in Mexico have been increasing. Vast sums of American capital are invested there, and the number of Americans residing south of the Rio Grande has been growing year by year. These people and their interests, financial and otherwise, deserve and demand the protection of the government. The assurance of such protection is not mere "dollar diplomacy," but, on the other hand, powerful interests have been at work to exploit the political power of America and make it the instrument of selfishness and greed. In Mexico itself, Roman Catholicism on the one hand clashes against powerful and secret influences contending for the control of the government.

The past week has seemed to bring a crisis perceptibly nearer. Huerta's government, baptized in blood and having little apparent right to call itself republican, appears to be tottering to its own fall, and the question of the duty of the United States is a serious one. Under the Monroe Doctrine the United States stands answerable to the nations of the world for the good behavior of the American republics. We have undertaken to be their "big brother" in that perilous experiment of self-government. It was this which took us into Cuba "for better or for worse," and Cuba's problem is by no means yet a solved one. What we yet shall have to do in Mexico is not yet revealed.

It is a good time for Americans to keep calm. It is a good time for the press to be very temperate in its expressions of opinion. We have been hurried into at least one war, if not two, in response to a demand from men who showed more ability to shout than to exercise good sense. President Wilson and Secretary Bryan are men who are disposed to do the right thing, to protect American interests without bluster or belligerency. Let us be calm and wait the issue with a fervent hope for peace.

A MANIAC'S PRAYER.

THERE are many men living in Chicago who would remember, if someone were to mention it, that twelve years ago, a prominent business man had a breakdown brought on by worry and overwork, and that for a few months he was out of business, and for a shorter period away from home for his health. But this is not frequently thought of, because for more than eleven years he has been at work, rugged and strong and successful. A much smaller company of intimate friends could supplement the narrative with very interesting and somewhat remarkable details.

The nervous break-down was nothing less than violent insanity, and his place of retirement was to an asylum in the outskirts of the city. There one night he broke from his room, tore out a window and bars—how he did it no one could imagine—and ran across an open space to the lake with full intent to end his life. He was overtaken by the attendants and, fighting all the way, was borne back to the asylum.

They pushed him into the padded cell, and locking the door securely, left him alone; and he threw himself beside his cot and tore his hair with rage and disappointment.

"O God," he cried, "why didn't you let me die? O God, why didn't you let me die?"

After a time his shrieks died down, and he prayed without fury but with even more of grief.

"Why should I live?" he asked. "My career is ended; I am a burden to my family; why could I not have died?"

And still another spirit came as he knelt there by his cot. He had not been accustomed to prayer. When he realized that he was really praying the fact came to him with a strange sense of comfort. In such an hour it was a relief to think God cared, and that he could tell God his disappointment. God cared! What a comfort in his loneliness to believe that!

Before morning he was praying, "O God, who hast forbidden that I should die, help me to find the purpose for which Thou dost will that I continue to live."

Part of the history of that night's experience is lost to the man who passed through it. There are intervals which he remembers and others that have slipped away from him. But the certain fact is that he began to pray a maniac, and finished his prayer a sane man. When morning came he met the suspicious looks of his keepers with a calm and intelligent look in his own eyes, nor did he ever again become violent.

A few days later they sent, at his request, for his wife. "I know the doctor will think it premature," he said, "and I am content to wait. But I am ready to leave when you think best."

The doctor advised against it, but the wife believed that her husband was well, and took him home. A few months' rest in his own home, and a restful journey with his wife, and he returned to work, and remains to this day a sane man, trusted with large responsibilities.

"Nothing so very remarkable about it," says the doctor. "There was the violent reaction from the attempt at suicide, and the mind recovered its equilibrium in the sense of trust which came with the prayer. About the supernatural, I don't pretend to know; but for nervous troubles there is no better remedy than the faith and repose which accompany sincere prayer."

STRIKERS AND THE CHURCH.

NEWS of labor agitation and strikes grows more ominous every month. In recent weeks the street railway system of Indianapolis seemed to be almost completely paralyzed by one of these periodical disturbances. In every one of the labor disputes which has resulted in strikes and the consequent damage to the public interest, the non-participating observer is sure to ask himself the question, Is it necessary that these strikes, ruinous in their consequences and barbarous in their methods, should continue?

Up to the present time Christian leaders have seemed to take the attitude of non-interference, under the impression that such industrial misunderstandings must be worked out to a satisfactory conclusion by the laborers on the one side and their employers on the other. Has not the time come for the Church of Christ as the great instrument for the realization of an era of good will in the world, to take a vigorous hand in such conflicts, and demand by the right of its unselfish love of human rights that the strife shall cease and that an equitable ground of adjustment shall be found.

The Church has never assumed this right.

We believe that it is not only a right but a duty, and that our disturbed industrial life will not regain its composure until a higher factor is involved in the problems at issue. The leaders of the Church in almost any community could have an influence with both disputants in labor controversies which no other factor in the community possesses.

THE PRAYER OF ONE GROWING OLD.

WRITTEN FOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY.

BE with me Lord! My home is growing still,
As one by one the guests go out the door;
And they who helped me once to do thy will
Behold and praise thee on the heavenly shore.

Uphold my strength! My task is not yet done,
Nor let me at my labor cease to sing;
But from the rising to the setting sun
Each faithful hour do service to my King.

Show me Thy light! Let not my wearied eyes
Miss the fresh glory of the passing day;
But keep the light of morn—the sweet surprise
Of each new blessing that attends my way.

And for the Crowning grace!—O Lord, renew
The best of gifts Thy best of saints have had;
With the great joy of Christ my heart endue,
To share the whole world's tears, and still be glad.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

IN TALKING with men who have recently left Disciples' pulpits for those of other communions I find that their own frank explanation of their course consists usually of three parts. They were unfortunate in the practical matter of securing a field in which to work; they felt themselves called and equipped to work at a special task which they found the Disciples' mind slow to support; and they were disillusioned as to the sincerity of the Disciples' talk about Christian unity.

This is my diagnosis, Mr. Editor, of a condition which I think it is very important all of us should just now dispassionately study. Harsh condemnation of those who are leaving our communion not only gets us nowhere but may prove to be highly unjust. At any rate, before we express a judgment of any sort it is plainly our duty to study the specific facts in the case. To say, as has been said, that these men are leaving our pulpits because other pulpits pay them better salaries is to betray a gravely inadequate understanding of the situation.

But a more grave injustice is done when the question of the minister's livelihood is treated by his accusers as if it were with him a sordid question. Every minister has to earn a livelihood. It is neither selfish nor sordid for him to do so. He owes it not alone to himself but to society to support himself and his family, and to educate his children so that they may in their turn be fitted for lives of the largest usefulness.

THERE is a pious falsehood in the speech of many men who are called from one pulpit to another with a larger salary. In their resignation of the old charge they usually take care to impress on their parishioners that the increased salary has nothing at all to do with their change. It is the wider field and the vague "call of God" that impels them.

My own conviction is that this salary matter need not be so sensitively left out of our talk. It does enter into the minister's thought. It does enter into his motive. And it ought to enter into his motive.

If it is the whole of the motive, or the chief element in the motive he is a hireling, and has no place in the true ministry of Christ.

But if a man feels that his ministry in a small town in Missouri will count as much for Christ's enterprise as his ministry in his present church in St. Louis, or New York, or Chicago, then the fact that he is offered one thousand dollars more per year by the rich church in the small town may become not only a legitimate but an important consideration in making his decision. The larger salary may enable him to educate his children, or pay off the still surviving debt incurred in securing his own education, or own his own home, or take out adequate life insurance, or lay by something for the rainy day.

All such considerations are as important for the minister as for the layman, and his ministry should suffer not the slightest discount in the public estimate, if in their proper relation to the chief end of his ministry they are given their due place.

IT IS not inconceivable nor by any means unprecedented that a situation might arise in a minister's life where questions of preference or duty as to particular fields might be wholly swallowed up, and that without taint of sordidness, in the sheer question of securing a livelihood. The doors which he might wish to enter are closed to him. The fields in which he feels especially called and equipped to work may be full of other laborers, or the owners may be prejudiced against employing him. Meantime his family suffers, just like a merchant's or a carpenter's family would suffer under like conditions.

Finally a door opens toward a parish. He sees that it will afford him but little scope for the kind of service he yearns to render, but it will afford him a livelihood, perhaps a better livelihood than the field where he desires especially to work. There is nothing left for him to do but enter it and faithfully minister to the needs of that parish. And he does so, not with sordid satisfaction at his good salary, but with pangs of regret that the task to which he had consecrated his life and in preparation for which he had spent years of discipline has to be done by other hands than his.

If it seems to you, Mr. Editor, that I am allowing my reflections to wander far afield I beg you and your readers to keep in mind the occasion of these particular reflections. I quoted last week the statement of a very influential and unusually discerning leader among us Disciples in which he imputed a desire for ease, social prestige and material comfort to the ministers who have recently left our pulpits to enter those of our neighboring communions. They were criticised because they could not "endure hardness as good soldiers of Christ." Men who have made our movement what it is, it was said, "were made of sterner and more heroic stuff."

THIS interpretation I conceive to be not only unjust and ungracious but unbecoming. The three men who more than any others have "made our movement" are Alexander Campbell, Isaac Errett and J. H. Garrison. The first named lived and died a rich man, a very rich man for his time, and not a particularly generous man. The second built up a flourishing business on the patronage of his brethren, and at his death left a large estate. The third recently received a large fortune in cash for a similar business which his brethren's patronage had produced for him.

I do not believe that the men who have made our movement were made of sterner or more heroic stuff than some of these men who have recently left our movement for other pulpits. They never felt the pinch of necessity where some of these men have felt it. They knew nothing of the economic pressure upon their home-life due to the widespread sowing of suspicion among the churches by wanton and relentless hunters of heresy. These heroic men—Campbell, Errett, Garrison—were, true enough, accused of heresy, but they were in a position to make capital out of the accusations. Their accusers were never able to touch their bread and butter.

But these later men have had to face their duty to their children, to their wives, as well as to the special ideals to which they had consecrated their talents. In the face of many closed doors they have had to ask this question: Will I make my life serve Christ better by remaining with the Disciples or by accepting this call to another church which, though it wears another name, is still a church of Christ?

FOR my part, I believe this question has been answered on their knees by nine out of ten of the men who have recently left us. I personally know of the anguish with which some wrestled with it before they could make their decision. They sought Christ's answer. It is not for me to judge them.

What would you do, Mr. Editor, or you, gentle reader, if, having prepared and educated yourself for the Christian ministry and finding your present pastorate unhappy or unfruitful, you should seek by the usual ways to find another where you could continue your work for Christ? In some parishes where you appeared as a "candidate" you would gain the enthusiastic response of the congregation, but two, or perhaps only one, office bearer of the congregation having seen your name branded in his church paper as a heretic would threaten to make trouble if the church called you, and just to keep peace in the congregation you would be told to pass on. This procedure would be repeated many times. At last you would find a small parish which could afford you neither stimulus nor room to exercise the special talent which had been cultivated in you, and the pulpit of this parish you would accept. What would you do if with this experience behind you a call came from a Congregational or Presbyterian or Episcopalian church? I do not ask you what in a moment of weakness you might do, gentle reader, but what in the moment of your greatest strength would you do?

The question is not easy to answer. I do not intend by appealing to this sympathetic side to suggest that the course chosen by those who have left us is the wise course or the strongest course. I intend simply to suggest that it is no case in which I can judge for my brother. And when he has chosen I cannot judge him.

But my reflections take me in a much more practical direction. They bring me face to face with my own duty, with our duty as a movement, as a brotherhood, in respect to the condition that makes possible the loss to us of these men of light and leading, these men who in leaving us suffer more, perhaps, than do those who stay.

I shall have to continue my reflections on this subject to another issue, Mr. Editor, if I may have your continued indulgence.

HUGH MACDONALD.

Baptist Paper Sounds New Note.

Can the Disciples represent the principles for which the Baptists stand, thus making it unnecessary for the latter to enter a field where the former are established?

"The Watchman and Examiner" (Baptist) of New York City so thinks. Speaking of Honolulu as a city so strategically important in the political and religious world it says:

"Many of our people have been troubled because we have no work there. It would seem that a Baptist church is needed in every community. . . . And yet it is fairly open to question whether it is wise to start another church in Honolulu. There is a vigorous Christian church there led by a pastor who is alert and capable. Baptists have here an excellent opportunity to demonstrate the genuineness of their belief in the essential oneness of these two great Christian bodies. Perhaps the best way for us to discharge our responsibility to Hawaii may be for us to do our utmost to strengthen the Disciples there, to advise the Baptists in Honolulu to unite in fellowship with it and perhaps add to its staff of workers, a pastor's assistant."

General Secretary for Congregationalists.

The appointment of Dr. Herbert C. Herring, of the Congregational Home Missionary Society, to be the general secretary of the entire denomination was one of the important advances made by the Congregationalists in the National Council at Kansas City. The cry of "Bishop" has already been raised, but as Doctor Herring's work will be advisory rather than executive the opposition to the new office will doubtless pass.

The Congregationalists have felt the need of more unifying forces within, just as the Disciples feel, and the appointment of a man beloved and trusted who can create enthusiasm and at the same time help the church to a common understanding in times of crisis will lessen the friction that is usually found in communions where democracy is sometimes construed to be a sort of unbridled freedom. Any democratically governed religious body could do what the Congregationalists have done in this instance without either sacrificing principles of polity or of endangering the church in any way through vesting power in a person.

Doctor Herring has hitherto served as general secretary of the Congregational Home Missionary Society. He is described as a man who has displayed a keen and comprehensive insight into the entire work of home missions, which has given him the confidence of the churches in thorough measure. His personal influence among the secretaries, the superintendents and the pastors on the field, it is said, has been of even greater worth than his administrative efficiency, although he is by no means lacking in the latter quality. A true spiritual leader, and of an evangelistic temperament, he is depended upon to perform with earnestness and power the heavy work he has before him. Doctor Herring began his pastoral service in Chicago, in the Presbyterian fellowship; later he served as a Congregational pastor in Omaha, from which he was called to serve as secretary of the Home Missionary Society.

Doctor Capen Pleads for Co-operation.

Samuel B. Capen, President of the American Board of Congregational Foreign Missions, gave a notable address at the assembly in celebration of "one hundred years of missions," which met in the Town Hall, at Bombay, India, November 7. In this address Doctor Capen pleaded for a closer co-operation with the boards of other fellowships than his own: "We want to work in closest co-operation with our brethren of every name. Let us be the first to propose joint work, wherever possible. Minimizing our differences, let us present a common front againt every form of evil." These are inspiring words, revealing a spirit in full sympathy with twentieth century ideals.

Dr. Robert A. Hume, Senior Missionary of the Board, reported in his address at the assembly that ten millions of dollars has been expended by the Congregationalists in India.

Reducing Crime Through Missions.

A very interesting experiment in reducing crime in India has been reported recently to the American Baptist Foreign Missionary Society, as the novel method was first attempted in a Baptist mission station on the foreign field.

The government of India turned over about two hundred people of notorious criminal character to this mission to see if anything could be done with them. The missionaries accepted a task the government had failed in, and set to work to reform and to educate. A labor colony, as well as a reform school, was established, and so successful was the experiment that the crime in that section was reduced 75 per cent.

The older people were put to work on farms, but accorded sympathetic treatment in every instance; those younger were placed in a school of reform that actually reformed—a school wherein they did not have to associate with others of like criminal tendencies. They were allowed to mingle with more normal children and the results have proved most satisfactory, doubtless suggesting both to the government and the missionary societies a possible point of closer contact.

Of Human Interest

Tim Sullivan on Human Nature.

The charities of the late Timothy D. Sullivan made him beloved in New York's East Side.

But these charities also gave Mr. Sullivan an insight into human nature, and he would sometimes say with a wry smile:

"Give a poor man help and he'll love you for a week. At the end of that time he'll hate you because you don't give him more help."

The Point of View.

Judge Curtis Dunham, Milwaukee's Prohibition leader, said of Tammany Hall the other day:

"Your typical Tammany politician looks at every political movement from the single viewpoint of extortion and graft. Direct primaries, police reform, the social evil—these things mean graft, and graft only, to him.

"He's like a tramp to whom a farmer said:

"'Looking for work, my man?'

"'Wot kind of work, boss?' the tramp asked cautiously.

"'Well, my man,' said the farmer, who was very short-handed, 'what can you do with a pick?'

"'I could brile a pullet on it,' said the tramp, his dull eyes brightening a little."

A Bryan Story.

An old negro went into a drug store in Richmond and said: "Boss, will you please, suh, call de Colonel on de telephone?"

"Yes," and he called the Colonel. The old darky said: "Colonel, dat ar mule done stall right in de main street right out here in front of de store.

"Yaas, suh; I done tied strings round his ears, but he didn't budge.

"What's dat? What's dat? Yaas, suh, I build a fire under him, but it didn't do nuthin' but scorch de harness.

"Yaas, suh; yaas, suh; I took de things out, but he wouldn't budge.

"No, suh; no, suh, Colonel, I didn't twist his tail.

"Yaas, suh; yaas, suh, another gemman twis' his tail; he looks like a Northern gemman.

"What's dat, Colonel? Yaas, suh, dey tuk him to de hospital.

"No, suh; no, suh; I ain't heard yit."

John Burroughs on Woodchucks.

John Burroughs contributes to a recent Century "In 'The Circuit of Summer Hills,'" in which we find the following characteristic passage:

"I tried to dine on a woodchuck once when I was a boy, but never have felt inclined to repeat the experiment. If one were born in the woods and lived in the woods, maybe he could relish a woodchuck. Talk about being autoesthonous, and savoring of the soil—try a woodchuck! The feeding habits of this animal are as cleanly as those of a sheep or a cow—clover, plaintain, peas, beans, cucumbers, cabbages, apples—all sweet and succulent things go to the making of his flabby body; yet he spends so much of his time in pickle in the ground that his flesh is rank with the earth flavor."

Would that "John of Birds" might give us an American "Jungle Book!" But perhaps, by entering the field of fiction, he would risk a counter attack by the "nature fakers" still writhing under the assault led by him and by his fellow-naturalist, Theodore Roosevelt.

Jack London Tells Cannibal Story.

Jack London, preparing to embark on another cruise around the world, told in Santa Barbara of the strange experiences of his last cruise.

"But we had no such hair-breadth escapes as that of a missionary we met in Samoa," he said. "This good fellow was preaching in one of the islands in which cannibalism is practiced. While trying vainly to make converts he was captured by a cannibal king. To his surprise he was immediately released. His release, however, was made on the condition that he carry a small sealed packet to a neighboring king.

"The missionary was so grateful that, meeting unexpectedly a detachment of English sailors, he refused to accompany them to safer territory. The sealed packet from his benefactor would be delivered, as he had promised. But an officer, in the midst of the decision, opened the packet.

"Therein, beside a number of pungent little onions, was a letter containing these simple but significant words:

"'He will be delicious with these!'"

It Seemed Rather Inconsistent.

Beerbohm Tree once related an amusing story about a boisterous voyage from New York. He was having a "rather bad time of it," when suddenly there was an extra special lurch, and Mr. Tree was knocked to the ground by a heavy weight and lay half stunned.

On recovering his senses he looked to see what it was that felled him. It was a splendid affair, and on it was painted in bold letters: "Life Saving Apparatus."

The Sentimentalist.

William Travers Jerome said recently, at the Union Club in New York:

"The Canadian people in their admiration of Harry Thaw showed a mawkish and hysterical sentimentality.

"A visitor to the Coaticook jail passed down the corridor with a bouquet of violets in her hand. She was young and pretty, and she knocked at Thaw's door.

"A head appeared at the grating and a hoarse voice said:

"'I guess them vi'lets ain't for me, miss. I'm only in for stealin' a ham. The feller wot murdered the New York architect has been shifted to No. 17.'"

A Cruel Tale.

A story is in circulation about Richard Harding Davis, author.

Mr. Davis, as everybody knows, is a wit. He was therefore terribly annoyed the other day to hear that a brother author had spoken unfavorably of his witticisms. Coming upon this brother author at the Ritz Carlton, he said:

"My boy, I hear that in a house where other people were kind enough to consider me witty you declared that I was not so. Is this true?"

"No, not a word of truth in it," the other answered cheerily. "I was never in a house in my life where anybody considered you witty."

OUR PREMIUM STORY.

Thoroughly Competent!

A man who had been troubled with bronchitis for a long time called on a rather noted doctor. After a few questions the doctor told him he had a very common ailment that would readily yield to treatment.

"You're so sure you can cure my bronchitis," said the man, "you must have had great experience with it."

"Why, my dear sir," confided the doctor, "I've had it myself for over twenty years!"—San Francisco Argonaut.

From Near and Far

A review of the election of last week show substantial gains for anti-saloon forces. In Illinois the wet and dry issue was fought out in some thirty towns, and with the assistance of the enfranchised women, the temperance forces won 90 per cent of the battles. The political struggles in other parts of the country resulted quite favorably to the Wilson administration, though Tammany, ostensibly a Democratic organization, received a decisive beating at the hands of the Fusionists. John Purroy Mitchel, whose kinsmen have been foes of Tammany, was elected mayor of New York by the largest vote ever given by that city for that office.

The churches of Los Angeles, led by Rev. Baker P. Lee, of Christ Church, Episcopal, have launched a movement for the erection of a great "Peace Cross" on the summit of Mount Hollywood. It will be 250 feet high; lighted with 200 electric lights; and a powerful searchlight will be added. This cross will be seen from passing steamers, and the plan is to hold Easter and Christmas services at the foot to promote peace and mutual helpfulness among the people of Southern California.

Prof. Hurgronje, a Dutch scholar, will give the Lowell Lectures the coming year. The subject of the course will be "Mohammedanism." Dr. Hurgronje is perhaps the best authority on Moslem life in any country, as he has made a particular study of the relation of Islamism to the life of that region. At the present time he is an adviser to the Dutch Colonial government concerning Arabian affairs.

The family home of George Washington's ancestors in England will remain for the present on its original site in Northamptonshire. Negotiations recently opened by Sir Thomas Lipton with the idea of purchasing the house, which is known as Sulgrade Manor, for $40,000, with the idea of having it moved to Washington have been rejected.

The appointment of Officer Gleason as new police chief for Chicago has given hope to some who long for a cessation of vice and crime in the big city. But others seem to have grave doubts.

Six per cent a year is made the legal rate of interest in the Panama Canal zone by an executive order promulgated by President Wilson.

The Book World

A Page of Reviews and Literary Notes.

BY ARTHUR GORDON.

THE HORIZON OF AMERICAN MISSIONS, by Isaac Newton McCash. Archibald McLean, the former secretary, now the president, of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, has written several works bearing upon that important work, and thus helped to interpret the enterprise of universal evangelism to the Disciples and their neighbors.

It is gratifying, therefore, to have some representative of our home mission field speak of his theme in a more permanent and authoritative manner than can be done in convention addresses or newspaper paragraphs. This, Dr. McCash has undertaken to do in the eight chapters of this book.

We have the right to expect our missionary specialists to give to us and to others such interpretations of their causes as shall set them in proportionate worthfulness with the other activities of the church. This includes a statement of the most outstanding facts. But it involves as well the arrangement of the ideals of the subject in convincing perspective. It is well worth while, now and then, to play up some arresting detail of the enterprise of missions, but that incident must be thrown against a background of balanced information to have any vital significance. It takes a leader-like mind to be able to gather and arrange material in this comprehensive manner. But it is really the only method which contributes permanent additions to the store of missionary literature.

Dr. McCash, as one of the secretaries of the American Christian Missionary Society has had admirable opportunities for the study of the theme. It is perhaps a misfortune that he is not to continue in this work, after the years he has spent in mastering many of its problems. But it is fortunate that he has prepared these chapters, first as addresses, and then in this more enduring form. His survey of American religious propaganda is excellent, though brief. A regional inspection of religious needs is almost wholly concerned with the western portion of the continent, following the findings of the Home Missions Council in 1911. One would like to have had a much fuller and more discriminating treatment of immigration than chapter three presents. That is really one of the most vital elements in the entire problem of home missions. The chapters on Loyal Church Efficiency and Supply and Location of Preachers do not really belong to the subject of the book, but are very useful statements of present conditions.

It is difficult to tell whether Dr. McCash intends the volume for Disciples alone, or for the larger reading public. In nearly all regards it is well adjusted to this latter audience. Yet he includes the weekly communion service among the essentials of an efficient church and in a reference to "the Year Book" on p. 147 he apparently uses statistics limited to the Disciples. These are not blemishes so much as the result of a rather loose arrangement of material. The book must be judged entirely on the grounds of its undertaking. It does not claim to be a survey of American missions, for that valuable material, and its study is certain to result in a more adequate sense of responsibility for American populations on the part of the church. Its wide circulation should be promoted. There is a reference to "F. W. Robinson" on p. 168. Who was he? Pres. Paul of the College of Missions, where the addresses were first given, furnishes an introduction. (Revell, $1.00, net.)

THE WAY HOME, by Basil King. Do you remember that story of A. C. Benson's, about the literary man who after the publication of a book suddenly discovered that he had no more strength or will to write and that the altar fire was quenched? Something of that loss of power is set out in this story by the author of the "Inner Shrine." But here it is not intellectual, but moral power that gives way. Charley Grace, the son of the rector of St. David's Church in New York, was a shy, observant boy, whose mother was a second wife, not quite the equal of her position. That fact wore her out, and Charley's first real vision of the world was at her funeral. Then came his father's dismissal (polite, but imperative) from his pulpit, and the boy, coming back from Harvard on the news of the event, denounced the church to his father, and threw away his own religious faith. Then came long years of successful work, but with a cynical, hard spirit. The woman he thought he loved he married, against her protest, only to discover that she had been right, and they were unsuited to each other. Nothing he did pleased her exacting nature. Even his best intentions were misconstrued, and his doings were wrong. Worse than all, he felt himself actually going wrong. One night, after an evening with an old friend, a half sweetheart of the early days, an evening that had begun quite innocently, he came out at midnight to face the facts and call himself a "rotter." How love, disillusionment, a renewal of moral purpose, and an awakening of the old religious motive of his childhood set him on "the way home" is the climax and justification of the story. The funeral of his old friend Remnant in the later St. David's the mystery and sorrow of life has become the vision of its mystery and hope. (Harper's, $1.35, net.)

NOTES.

The different way in which life is regarded in the East and in the West is one of the many interesting contrasts which Albert Edwards brings out in his new book, The Barbary Coast. The following conversation which Mr. Edwards had with Abd Allah, the Shareef illustrates this: "I wonder," said Abd Allah, "if you Christians ever realize how strange, how inexplicable, you seem to us. We cannot understand your interest in mere matter. It is wonderful, your science. How you have weighed the air and measured the sun, how you have traced the genealogy of all living things, how you have classified the microscopic vermin which live on fleas. But all this seems irrelevant—irreverent—blasphemy against the sovereignty of man. All these centuries, when we have been thinking about ourselves you have been thinking about things. Your scientists spent these centuries in their laboratories to find the truth. La Verite, that is the God of the Franks. Did you find it? How could you? You sought it in inanimate things, in stones and dirt and filth, in things you could stew in your little glass test-tubes, in things you could dissolve in your acids, things you could dissect with your knives. Your heat will never be great enough, your acids will never be strong enough, nor your knives sufficiently sharp to reach the Master Truth. For it is not in these dead things, but in living man. Truth? Man wants to know what he should do; your science tells him what he is made of. Man asks what he should believe—your science tells him what he can know."

Professor George A. Reisner, author of "The Egyptian Conception of Immortality," has spent the last year excavating in Egypt in behalf of Harvard University. Last week Mr. Reisner shipped a collection of Egyptian objects of art of great archæological value, including a number of historic skeletons and pottery, and word has just been received by the authorities at the university that the collection was damaged by fire at sea. The ship took fire shortly after the departure and was forced to put back into port.

Mr. Lawrence Beesley, who was one of the survivors of the Titanic, and who subsequently wrote what has come to be regarded as the most graphic and authentic account of the greatest ocean tragedy of modern times, "The Loss of the S. S. Titanic," has again come to our shores. Mr. Beesley doesn't seem to be able to avoid ocean disasters, for it is a strange coincidence that while the steamer which brought him was still on the high seas, only a few miles away the ill-fated Volturno slowly went to her doom.

On the testimony of the British Weekly we learn that an American editor who started about twenty years ago with only fifty-five cents is now worth $100,000. His accumulation of wealth is owing to his frugality, good habits, strict attention to business, and the fact that an

A "Christian Union" Tour.

Peter Ainslie has just concluded a four thousand mile journey through the West, lecturing on behalf of the Christian Union Commission of the Disciples. He addressed the National Council of the Congregational Church at Kansas City, sharing the time with Dr. Newman Smyth, of New Haven, Conn., and Dr. Oliver Huckle, of Baltimore. This was the first time that any one outside of the National Council of Congregationalists ever addressed it on the subject of Christian union. After delivering lectures at Texas University, Dr. Ainslie went to Little Rock, Ark., and addressed the Missionary Union at the Second Presbyterian Church. On Sunday evening, at Trinity Episcopal Cathedral, he and Bishop Roots, of China, spoke to a great audience. On Monday, a platform meeting was held at the First Christian Church, and was attended by Bishop Roots, several Episcopalians and Presbyterians taking part. "A great influence went out for Christian union," says Dr. Ainslie. "I wish it were so that I could go out often for this work. I believe the times are ripe for a great educational move in the interest of union."

A Service to a Shut-in.

The Ever Ready Circle of King's Daughters, of J. H. Goldner's congregation, Cleveland, has rendered a valuable and a beautiful service to J. Z. Tyler, who for the past fourteen years has been an invalid. For eleven years this society has sent some of its members to read to Brother Tyler two hours a day, five days in each week. And they have read six hundred volumes on theology, philosophy, biography, history, sociology, the drama, books of travel, and the best fiction. This explains Brother Tyler's freshness of thought and the fact that he has kept abreast of the life of the world. Fourteen years ago he was stricken, and his condition at this time is not encouraging at all. His power of speech is nearly gone, and he is unable either to dress or feed himself. Quite recently he dictated, though with great effort, a beautiful letter to the Euclid Avenue Church on the occasion of the celebration of its seventieth anniversary. J. H. Goldner writes: "When we look at Brother Tyler we wonder, but when we consider Sister Tyler we are puzzled. She is a heroine without medals, but the glory of the Highest overshadows her."

Larger Meaning of the Church.

"The church first must teach every man what he is, disclose to him his spirit self and lead him to give his spirit preëminence over both body and mind," declared George B. Van Arsdall, in a recent sermon to his congregation at Denver Central. "The church is too often judged by the passing doctrines that cease with the using, and not enough by the larger place which it supplies as the shaping force in the life of the race. The larger function of the church is to discover to man the reality of things. It is when man sees himself as a spirit being that he begins to estimate himself and his fellows in terms of things that can not be seen with the human physical eye." Mr. Van Arsdall feels that it is a besetting fault of the age to estimate forces and agencies by the superficial and transient, because the surface thing is so evident; so inescapable. The church does not show well on the material side, and men forget tnat the very greatness of our civilization is dependent on the spiritual forces the church has generated.

What the Church Can Not Afford.

In the opinion of H. D. C. Maclachlan, pastor of the Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va., the church can not afford a cheap preacher, nor cheap music, nor "slip-shod" services.

"The church can not afford to quibble about a thousand dollars or two." Mr. Maclachlan declares that its bible school was one of the most efficient that had come under her observation. Mr. Jones' work for the year is interesting. Aside from officiating at sixty weddings and conducting more than fifty funerals, he has managed to deliver forty sermons and addresses out of his own city, filling his own pulpit most of the time meanwhile. Department rooms have been made to accommodate the large Bible school. The church for several years past has kept the building open from morning till late afternoon, and will continue this policy. There was a net gain of sixty to the membership during the year.

to his congregation. "The man of today is not interested in little things; it is the big thing that catches his imagination; that taps his pocket-book. It is the little business that is hardest to finance. It is the 'stand-pat' church that does not even 'stand-pat.' It is only vision that begets liberality." Mr. Maclachlan is leading his people in a splendid social vision, and has plans for extending the work of the congregation in a more definite and practical way, using the new annex of the building to further the social, educational, and moral life of the immediate community.

"Ancient Gospel in Modern Fiction."

Under this caption, Edgar Dewitt Jones, pastor at Bloomington, Ill., is preaching a series of month-end sermons that will extend through the year. The past twelve months have been very fruitful. The Bible school averaged 45 per Sunday, and during the summer there was no slump in attendance, though no "high pressure" methods were used. Death of Two Prominent Disciples.

News comes of the death of two Disciples, known throughout the brotherhood. Dr. F. M. Kirkham, for many years editor of the Christian Oracle (later the Christian Century), passed away at his home in Los Angeles, Cal., the first of the month. Brother Kirkham was a brother-in-law of the late Governor Drake, and for many years preached and edited his paper in Iowa. He had attained to a good old age, and was spending the evening of his life in Southern California.

J. H. Smart, of Decatur, Ill., started last week, in company with his wife and niece, to California, with the intention of spending the winter there. While on his way, at Clovis, N. M., he passed from this life, with a sister of Mr. Smart's, and while there he was taken fatally ill. His wife returned with the body to Decatur, where the funeral services were held and the body interred. For many years, it will be recalled, Mr. Smart has regularly presented at the Illinois conventions, the report of the necrology of the Illinois ministry. This service was always performed with touching fidelity and sympathy. This task will fall next year to other lips, but Mr. Smart's name will be mentioned with deep emotion when the list of departed preachers is read.

$50,000 Edifice Dedicated At Richmond, Ky.

Ellis B. Barnes and congregation of Richmond, Ky., are now worshiping in a beautiful church home that cost $50,000 and that was dedicated by F. M. Rains, Sunday, Nov. 16. The week was rounded out with special addresses by President Crossfield of Transylvania; Prof. Fortune of the chair of Biblical Theology, Lexington; and Henry C. Garrison, pastor at Danville, Ky. An organ recital, dedicating a $4,000 instrument, by Mr. Bert Williams of Columbus, Ohio, assisted by Miss Marion Noland of Richmond concluded the first week of special program. Beginning the week of Nov. 23, a series of special services will be conducted by William E. Ellis of Paris, Ky. With a seating capacity of a thousand; with sixteen class rooms and a primary department that are above ground; and with a fine pipe organ, the joint gift of the women of the church and the Carnegie Corporation of New York City, this historic congregation enters on a new day of larger usefulness. The church was organized in 1844, and the old building was razed in 1912 to make room for the present structure, which was used as a hospital during the war between the states. Many of the first families of Madison County have belonged to it, and it has been ministered unto by some stalwart preachers of another generation. The present pastor, Ellis B. Barnes, is among the foremost Disciple ministers of today, and with this modern church building he will be able to lead his people to social, religious and educational achievements in this fine city of the South.

No Longer An Experiment.

Word comes from Prof. H. H. Guy of the Pacific Theological Seminary that H. H. Loken's congregation at Berkeley, Cal., is in the period of its greatest growth. Those who predicted that the church would fail and be destroyed if the unimmersed were admitted to fellowship should make note of the present condition of the work. The Berkeley church, almost within the shadow of the University of California, has always been more or less a problem. The more liberal policy that was inaugurated more than a year ago has resulted in the congregation coming to its own. Dr. Guy writes: "I am sure that you will be interested to know that the Berkeley church is making remarkable progress. The membership is increasing steadily and unity prevails. Mr. Loken is preaching sermons that strike bottom. In the city of Berkeley he has an enviable position, with few equals for a broad, scholarly presentation of the truth of Christianity." It will be recalled that the Berkeley church was a storm center in a controversy to admit the unimmersed into its fellowship, provided they came with the proper credentials from other religious bodies. As the opposition to the policy has been persistent, though small; and as there has been some interference from the outside, the victory of the Berkeley pastor and congregation is all the more notable.

Gives $35,000 For New Church.

Announcement has been made by the First Christian Church of Danville, Ind., of a gift of $35,000 to the congregation by Edgar W. Shirley on condition that the church raise a $10,000 endowment fund. This is one of the largest single gifts to a local church that has been made among the Disciples. Mr. Shirley is the only son and heir of John N. Shirley, a wealthy merchant, who died recently. It is said that he made the donation in compliance with a request of his

Chicago Disciples in "Retreat."

What bids fair to become an established institution among Chicago Disciples is an annual "Retreat" which was held for the first time a year ago at Memorial church and repeated with even greater success last week at the same place. The suggestion originated in the mind of Rev. E. L. Dakin, pastor of Memorial church, who invited ministers and office-bearers of our Chicago churches to spend a whole day in conference and prayer. The invitation this year was extended so as to include Sunday-school officers and teachers to whose work the evening sessions were devoted, with State Superintendent Clarence L. Depew and National Superintendent Robert M. Hopkins leading in conferences and speaking at a large public gathering. The ministers met in the forenoon and spent the hours until lunch time in prayer and intimate conference on the minister's personal religious life. In the afternoon they were led by Rev. O. F. Jordan in a study of their parish problems such as advertising, pastoral calling, church finances, sermon making, etc. Prepared talks and free discussion of these practical aspects of the minister's life continued for three hours. During this time, in another room a large company of women led by Mrs. Sarah J. Russell, was praying for the deepening of the spiritual life of our churches and for the success of the Men and Millions Movement in the brotherhood. At five o'clock both these sessions adjourned and the entire company, augmented by a number of elders, deacons and Sunday-school workers who had just arrived, sat down in a large upper room where the Lord's Table was spread. Rev. C. C. Morrison presided at the supper; Rev. C. G. Kindred made a mystical and deeply moving interpretation of the passion of Christ; Rev. Austin Hunter and Rev. A. R. McQueen offered thanks for the bread and wine and the emblems were passed to the congregation by Mrs. H. L. Willett, Mrs. C. C. Buckner, Rev. E. M. Haile and Rev. Asa McDaniel. A closing prayer was offered and the benediction pronounced by Rev. E. S. Ames. Following the communion service dinner was served in the church dining room by the members of Miss Frantz's Sunday-school class of young women and the company divided into two groups, one of Sunday-school workers, the other of church officers. Dr. P. L. Prentis, of Austin, led the church officers' conference, Dr. H. L. Willett making the chief address which was an interpretation of the dignity and a plea for the earnest functioning of the lay offices of the church. At the close of Doctor Willett's address one elder was so moved by his words that he offered to start a fund with a gift of ten dollars to secure the delivery of this message in the various churches of the city. With the close of the general meeting in the auditorium the company went home carrying a new sense of strength and vision and divine guidance in the work of Christ's Church.

The next union minister's meeting, to be held as usual under the auspices of the Chicago Church Federation Council, will be held Monday, Nov. 24, promptly at 10:30 in the auditorium of the Y. M. C. A. A great meeting is being planned. Some of the most successful pastors of the city will address the meeting on the subject, "The Dominant Note in My Preaching." Among those who have been invited to speak are Drs. Frank W. Gunsaulus, Chas. Bayard Mitchell, Herbert L. Willett, Melbourne P. Boynton, John Timothy Stone and Wm. T. McElveen.

A farm, worth $8,000, has been given the National Benevolent Association, a Missouri couple making the bequest. This annuity gift of course guarantees a dependable and regular support for this couple the remainder of their lives, and it will also bless through the years the people under the care of the association. There is no safer investment than this for Disciple men and women of some means, and no better way to serve the orphan and the aged destitute. The society is to be congratulated on this fine gift.

The Disciples Union of Cleveland will erect a new church and "Social Center" building on Engle avenue, near Broadway. In addition to the auditorium and Bible-school quarters there will be a gymnasium, club rooms, domestic science room, and shower baths. It is to be a building for the people of the neighborhood and open house will be kept. Close co-operation will be made with the Y. W. C. A. F. D. Butchart will have charge of the religious and social settlement work.

The leave-taking of J. H. O. Smith from Oklahoma City was the occasion of an interesting program in the auditorium of the First Christian Church. The president of the chamber of commerce, and representatives from the ministerial alliance and the Provident Association made addresses of appreciation. The mayor, the judge of the supreme court commission, the governor, and members of the carpenters' union were in the receiving line at the reception tendered Mr. Smith and wife.

The First Church of Galesburg, H. A. Denton pastor, is to erect a beautiful edifice—a modified type of English Gothic, but adapted in every way to modern needs. An open baptistery of beautiful design will be a feature; also "Mizpah Chapel," that will adjoin the pastor's study. There will be a "Brotherhood Room," and a Boys' Club Room." The capacity for church services will be about 1,000, and for the Bible-school the same.

The Eureka Church has been very happy in the calling of V. W. Blair of North Tonawanda, to become its pastor. A Butler College and Yale man, Mr. Blair will be a valuable addition to the religious and educational life of Eureka. His resignation at North Tonawanda occasioned profound regret both in the city and in the church. He will begin work at Eureka about the first of the year.

New Building at Richmond, Ky.

The Sixth District Convention of Christian churches that was held at Markle, Ind., was largely attended. Great enthusiasm was created when State Secretary Cauble announced that a friend in Columbus had offered to give $5,000 to the State work, provided the churches would raise a like amount. He outlined new plans for district work; each will be under the supervision of a superintendent.

The Men's Club of the First Church, Davenport, Iowa, heard B. W. Garrett of Des Moines, clerk of the supreme court, in his lecture, "Man Plus God," on the evening of November 4. C. A. Moses, president of the club, presided; J. T. Houser gave an address of acceptance of a large American flag to be used at the west side settlement—a present from the W. R. C. of Davenport.

One hundred and fifty Denver churches observed "Church Attendance Day" the first Sunday in the month. Fifty thousand people, in the different churches, bowed in prayer at a given time; distinguished officers of state and citizens laid aside personal cares and duties and joined in the services. The Central Christian Church was among the leaders in the movement.

Graham Frank accompanied E. E. Elliott from Kansas City to Birmingham; at Atlanta they were joined by Hill M. Bell and entered at once into a conference with the church leaders to make preliminary arrangements for the general convention. Mr. Frank writes that the auditorium will seat 10,000 people. It has a $90,000 Austin organ.

W. H. Hampton, pastor of the Central Christian Church of Fairmount, W. Va., says that he caught a splendid vision at Toronto, "Not of my church, but of Christ." He writes that he has met many splendid people in Fairmount who have been driven from the principles the Disciples plead for because of a reactionary element in the community.

The church building at Rensselaer, Ind., has been remodeled and on Sunday, Nov. 9, was dedicated by Dr. I. N. McCash. The pastor, W. G. Winn, and the congregation rejoice in this new edifice valued at $30,000. A church efficiency campaign has quickened the spiritual life of the entire church and added to its membership.

B. L. Wray has closed a very successful meeting with the Dover Place Church, St. Louis, Mo., Chas. E. Dugan, pastor, Thos. Moody, singer. There were sixty additions, and the Sunday-school was quadrupled. Mr. Wray has removed from St. Louis to Kansas City, but will continue his work for the A. C. M. S.

A Decision Meeting lasting a week at the High street Christian Church of Akron, Ohio, of which L. N. D. Wells is pastor, resulted in sixty-five being added to the congregation. The meeting was preceded by a Bible-school institute conducted by E. W. Thornton, E. J. Meacham, and Miss Lillie Farris.

More than one thousand people attended the Sunday-school rally at the First Christian Church, Davenport. The pastor, J. T. Houser, taught a class of 226 men. There were 341 women in another class. The Orphan's Home band attended and furnished music. The new building easily accommodated the large school.

The Georgia Christian Missionary convention met in Macon, Ga., Nov. 10-13. Two hundred delegates were in attendance. E. E. Elliott made a Brotherhood address and F. M. Rains told of his missionary travels.

The First Christian Church of Fort Worth, Texas, has decided to erect a building that will cost $100,000. The edifice will be three stories high, of brick and stone, and will be modern in every detail. L. D. Anderson is pastor.

B. L. Wray has been in a highly successful meeting with the Dover Place Church of St. Louis; Chas. E. Dugan, pastor; Thos. Moody, singer. The Bible school has been quadrupled, and there have been sixty additions to date. As an evangelist of the A. C. M. S. Mr. Wray is doing a notable work.

Isaac Bussing, pastor at Adrian, Mich., is leading the religious forces of his city in an attempt to prevent the theaters from running on Sunday. He appeared before the city council and declared that Alderman Koehn should be recalled for his activity in campaigning for Sunday theaters.

B. H. Bruner, pastor at Erie, Pa., addressed the Young People's Federation, the Business Men's Bible Class of the Central Presbyterian Church, and represented Ohio in the Inter-state oratorical contest of the inter-collegiate Prohibition Association at Columbus on Nov. 11.

The Northwestern Christian Home of Walla Walla, Wash., was dedicated Nov. 4. This institution will care for the homeless children and for the aged of the Christian church of Washington, Oregon, Idaho, and Montana. J. A. Lord and C. E. Sanderson gave addresses.

The Federated Religious Work Committee of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, has secured Newton Riddell to lecture at the First Christian Church. Mr. Riddell insists that he who serves best profits most. He makes a strong plea for honesty in selling and in advertising goods.

At the Kansas State Convention the proposition to establish a college was discussed. The particular thought in the mind of the convention delegates was the founding of a school that would pay more attention to the training of preachers for rural communities.

Forty Bibles have been sent to the State Penitentiary at Huntsville, Texas, by the Good Literature Club of the Central Church at Dallas. W. T. Lawrence, the chairman, will endeavor to supply all the inmates with copies of the Scriptures.

The Queen Anne Christian Church of Seattle, Wash., W. E. Adams, pastor, has cleared a current expense indebtedness of $1,300; organized a Teachers' Training class of fifty members, and started a mission study class.

The officers and members of the Kansas City Mission Board, representing twenty-six churches and missions, met at the First Church, November 9, and planned the work for the coming year. Fletcher Cowherd gave the main address.

Teach Christ

TO YOUR ADULT AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSES. The Uniform Lessons for 1914 are based upon the life of Christ. This means that the emphasis in the year's work will be placed upon that matchless study. The best book on that theme published for young people's and adult classes is Dr. Loa E. Scott's

"LIFE OF JESUS"

Why You Should Use This Text:

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There is not a skeptical question in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus." A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

RISEN WITH CHRIST.

Nov. 26. Rom. 6:4-11; Phil. 3:8-11, Col. 3:1-4.

That we must die in order to live is a belief that is widely held. "In the religions of the East," says T. H. Green, "the idea of death to the fleshly self as the end of the merely human, and the beginning of a divine life, has not been wanting; nor, as a mere idea, has it been very different from that which has been the ground of Christianity. But there it has never been realized in action, either intellectually or morally. The idea of the withdrawal from sense has remained abstract. It has not issued in such a struggle with the superficial view of things, as has gradually constituted the science of Christendom. In like manner that of self-renunciation has never emerged from the esoteric state. It has had no outlet into the life of charity, but a back-way always open into the life of sensual license, and has been finally mechanized in the artifical vacancy of the dervish or fakir."

THE OLD THAT IS DEAD.

The applicant for admission into the church used to be asked to renounce the devil and all his works. There is at the present general dissatisfaction with the form in which the demand for surrender was for centuries stated, but we can hardly call the church Christian if it ceases to insist upon the doctrine and practice of renunciation. It is true that we gain vastly more than we lose by choosing the life of discipleship. This is no reason for denying that the choice is often difficult or that the sense of loss is real. Bad habits that are of long standing are not always seen as bad. Associates who corrupt our morals are apt to be very agreeable companions. Paul's connection with Phariseeism was a matter of conscience. When enlightenment came and his conscience bade him join himself to the disciples of Jesus, he did not hesitate, but he felt keenly the loss of friends, who had known him from his youth, and he put away with reluctance ambitions fostered by parents and teachers. The old that must die is not all vile and repulsive. It may be very good; it falls short of the highest good.

THE NEW THAT LIVES.

The good that was in the old reappears in the new. Paul's knowledge of the sacred writings was turned to the uses of Christianity. His sense of duty was as serviceable to him after he became a Christian as it had been in the days when he was a Pharisee. The wise men of the gentile world who accepted Christianity brought their learning and their skill in debate to the defense of of the new faith. Eloquence that has been at the command of the highest bidder may be employed to make attractive the principles of righteous conduct. Personal charm that has caused men and women to forget honor and duty may be consecrated to the task of quickening the sense of loyalty to home and native land. Physical vigor and intellectual strength are needed by the disciple. The new life is one in which all human values are recognized and respected. It sacrifices neither the future to the present nor the present to the future. The rights of both are acknowledged. The things of sense retain their power to please, but they are kept within due bounds.

THE THINGS ABOVE.

The things above, where Christ is, are close to every one of us. Knowledge of mathematical astronomy is not required of those who enter upon the search for them. David Livingstone found the heavenly life in Africa, General William Booth was able to render exalted service in the neglected quarters of great cities and in the prisons to which states send those whom they pronounce failures. Frances Willard was living with Christ when she went about teaching that men ought to be sober and that nations through their laws should encourage sobriety. The thousands who believe that cleanliness is next to godliness and who live up to their creed are exhibiting a part of the life from above. Those who at great cost to themselves are maintaining churches for the holding forth of the word of life show us how close Christ is to his people.

RAMPARTS WRECKED BY RAM'S HORNS.

By A. Z. Conrad.

The odors of leeks, onions, and garlic of Egyptian gardens lingered with the Israelites for forty years. They were finally weaned from Egypt when the terrifying tide of the Jordan forever stopped them looking backward. If it took four decades of wilderness wandering to wean them, let us not be impatient with the young convert who occasionally glances backward. It was the Jordan that gave the final jolt to flesh-pot folly. The walled waters had waited the bidding of God. The ark in the midst of the river had encouraged them until they passed over. With a returning flood which forbade their retreat, at last they were committed to a campaign for possession. It is the irreversible that leads to the irresistible. Twelve stones were placed to witness forever to the wonder-work of Jehovah. Memorials mark the miracle. Food from the fields now took the place of the miracle manna. The bread from heaven fell no more. A self-indulgence which enervates is never encouraged by the Infinite. Exigency enlists the Eternal. When the emergency passes the burden is placed once more upon human pillar. A new life was opening to the invaders. They were moving forward under Divine mandate. The struggle was now on in earnest. They were irrevocably committed to conquest. They must blaze and blast the way in and on. Only the committed life conquers. Divided interest invites defeat. To look two ways is to go neither. The burning glass focuses the light and heat until it blazes. Only concentration compels. The element of finality in any decision is what gives it its force. Put yourself beyond alternatives and barriers are banished.

CONFIRMING THE COVENANT.

After commitment, consecration. There is no consecration without covenant. The broken covenant was confirmed. Only this would make possible communion. Nowhere else but in the circle of the covenant is cooperation with God possible. The Holy Partnership depends upon mutual promise. Three miles from the Jordan straight toward Jericho the tents of the new nation are pitched and they wait for a new revelation. Right well the leader Joshua had learned the secret combination whereby the treasury of God would afford them resource for their righteous cause. Through religious ceremonial he fixed the attention of the people on the source of their power and the hope of their progress. Josh. 5: 2-9. Just forty years to a day since the fateful night in Egypt when they sprinkled blood on the door-posts and lintels and partook of the Paschal lamb; and now at Gilgal they commemorate their redemption and dedicate themselves to the impossible task to which Providence has called them. It was the fourteenth day of the first month of the forty-first year of their emancipation life. Two miles distant was Jericho, a walled city whose inhabitants watched the invaders and waited attack. The feast, then, was one less of jubilation than of supplication to Jehovah to relieve their jeopardy. Religious ceremonial fixes attention, calls to obedience, awakens courage, and prepares program. Covenant restoration and renewed consecration were the completest preparation for progress Israel could make.

THE SWORD AND THE ANGEL.

General Joshua knew "the race is not for the swift nor the battle to the strong," but he also knew that Divine intervention can only be expected when human prevision and provision have reached their limit. Unattended he proceeds to survey the situation with the earnestness of a man who knew that in the next move were the issues of life and death. Jericho was the "Key to Palestine." Defeat here would mean permanent disaster. Suddenly he was confronted by a soldier with a drawn sword. He remembers his great commission; "Be strong and of good courage." He challenges the stranger: "and Joshua went unto him and said unto him, 'Art thou for us, or for our adversaries.'" Josh. 5:13. Right well he knew that in great issues there are only two sides. There was no middle ground. There never is in matters of principle and of the two sides one is right and one is wrong. The unaffrighted heroic leader was overawed and humbled when he heard these words, "I, the captain of the Lord's hosts have now come." It was a declaration that the struggle was now imminent and that Divine relief was offered.

COMMISSION AND CAUTION.

Then and there the commission from the "captain of the Lord's host" was received by Joshua. Victory was not only promised but was declared to have been already accomplished. When a human cause is identical with the plan of God that cause has already won. "I have given into thine hand Jericho," was the glad word which re-enforced and re-encouraged the valorous knight who was to lead the hosts of Israel in their siege of the city and their strange attack. From a military point of view the detailed direction was utterly absurd. The investiture of the city for six days and seven times on the seventh day, with a shout of triumph before a stone was displaced or a brick shaken seemed the height of folly. How can we justify the requirement of utter destruction and annihilation? What constitutes a forfeiture of the right to life? The deliberate, persistent, unremitting and incurable prostitution of sacred power to unholy uses, "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." The inhabitants of the land of Canaan had become so self debased, so brutalized, their degeneracy so disastrous, that the continuance of their occupancy of the Land of Canaan would have been a curse to themselves and to all the world. The Israelites were the appointed agents for the overthrow of unspeakable abominations. They were to supplant the unworthy inhabitants of the land and reveal to the world the results of righteousness in national and individual life.

THE DOOMED CITY.

In the annals of time no more inspiring scene has been presented to humanity than the silent siege of the doomed city on the plain of the Jordan. A few years ago, standing at the ford of the Jordan, I followed the course of Joshua to Gilgal and thought of the solemnity of ceremonial when only two miles from Jericho the people of God waited the word which began the war of conquest. Low, dust-colored Bedouin tents were pitched on the site of ancient Jericho. The undulating plain reaches out toward the Dead Sea at the South and near at hand are the mountains at the North. Rivulets were flowing here and there from the springs. The flood of the Jordan had overflowed its banks, as in the olden time. But the most impressive thing about all the scene was the picture of that weird procession which for six successive days had passed about the city whose ancient walls have been brought to light by the German excavator, Sellen. Eleven hundred and ninety feet long at their greatest length and five hundred and twenty feet wide at their broadest point, the walled city frowned on the foe whose weapons were worthless against obstructions of brick and stone. The people of Jericho had seen the smoke from the Gilgal altars which symbolized saving supplication. Already they were overawed by the mystery of the parted waters of the Jordan. In obedience to the command of "the Captain of the Lord's host," the program and procedure had been fixed. Following the armed men is the sacred ark and the seven priests with the "trumpets of jubilee," blowing the instruments as they advanced. Following them, all the men of strength proceeded. The circuit of a mile was made, since they moved at some distance from the walls, and they returned to their tents. From a human standpoint, how utterly foolish, and to their enemies it would have seemed absurd save for the recent miracle. The significant thing about the siege was the sovereignty of silence. Not a word was uttered. This in itself gave an air of mystery and of majesty to the procedure and for all time it brings to us the truth that the majesty of the Infinite is too great for noise and that the sublime realities of life are behind the visible and the audible.

MILLENNIAL MOMENTS.

There are moments in life in which millenniums are determined. A familiar phrase today is, "The psychological moment." It is a good one. It tells the story of the tremendous meaning of a single second when direction is determined and destiny fixed. All through life there are times when instantaneous action is all that can save the day. Such came to Paul at the moment of his conversion; to Philip when he was commanded to join himself to the passing chariot; to Jesus in the moment of his temptation when he said, "Get thee behind me, Satan." The supreme moment was at the conclusion of the seventh march about the besieged city when the command was given to "shout." Joshua said unto the people, "Shout, for the Lord has given you the city." So the people shouted and the priests blew the trumpets and the walls fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him and they took the city. The literal translation would be, "And the wall fell down in that place." The simultaneousness of the shouting and the falling of the wall constitute the mircle. It is not to be supposed that either the blast of the trumpets or the shouts of the people in themselves could have in the slightest degree upset the walls. Whether by wind or earthquake it does not matter. The miracle is the same. No human being would have anticipated the exact moment of any natural action which would result in the demolition of the ramparts of Jericho. The ram's horns played their part simply in the declaration of the faith of the people in Jehovah, who himself accomplished the delivering of the city into the hands of God's chosen people.

THE SCARLET CORD.

What the ramparts of Jericho could not do a single scarlet cord accomplished. It afforded protection and secured preservation of one household. Rahab had declared her faith in Jehovah. She had doubtless repented of her sin. She had protected the spies whom Joshua had sent into Jericho. In the day of retribution she had been promised deliverance, but only on condition that she should manifest her faith in the word of the servants of the Lord and in Jehovah himself by binding the scarlet cord which she had employed to save the spies, in the window. It stands forever as the symbol of faith in the sacrifice of Christ. Vain are the dependencies upon human instrumentalities.

LIVING LESSONS.

The strongholds of evil can never stand against the persistent assaults of righteousness.

Iniquity must not be merely controlled, it must be eliminated.

Compromise with sin precludes the possibility of conquest.

God's manifestation is in accordance with human requirements; to the reformer, a partner; to the lonely, a friend; to the weak, strength; and so on through all human requirements.

Consecration is more effective than strategy in great undertakings.

There is no protection comparable with that afforded by the sword of the captain of the Lord's host.

Invisible battallions are ever enlisted in the war against entrenched vice.

Secondary motives and world ambitions paralyze all holy purpose.

All the earth is made holy ground through the Incarnation.

All defilement is disastrous to both duty and delight.

The alternative to victory today, as then, is annihilation. Only the aggressive life can become the possessive life.

MAKING NEWSBOYS INTO MEN

A Story of the Work of John E. Gunckel, "the Newsboys' Friend."

"Make bad boys good. Never give up a bad boy"—that is the motto of the Toledo Newsboys' Association and of the National Newsboys' Association both of which are the husky children of the big brain and heart of John E. Gunckel, "The Newsboys' Friend."

A minister of the gospel, looking over a pamphlet containing the history of this wonderful movement said: "When I read stories like that, it makes the ordinary preacher's work look small!"

But the "ordinary preacher" must consider that Mr. Gunckel began this work back somewhere in the last century—in 1892, to be accurate; and only in recent years has he come to his own. He is now being recognized as one of the world's philanthropists, in deed and in truth.

The Toledo Newsboys' Association, organized on Christmas Day, 1892, with 102 boys, today has developed into the National Newsboys' Association, which has an enrollment of 8,851. A thousand towns and cities have chapters. The Newsboys' Building, costing, with equipment, $112,000, was dedicated February 22, 1909.

The early history of this marvelous work is of intense interest.

An early rule was that no boy was eligible to membership unless he had a bad habit, acknowledged or discovered. The newsboys had a self-earned reputation of being bad, with formed habits of stealing, swearing, gambling, drinking intoxicating liquors, smoking cigarettes to excess, and many other minor moral failings. Notwithstanding there were Ohio laws forbidding all these, no one seemed to assume the responsibility to enforce them. Out of a membership of one hundred and two, twelve boys, leaders of "gangs," bold, daring, unscrupulous, impulsive, thoughtless little fellows, were chosen as officers. These boys were given the entire charge of the association work, with no financial responsibilities. They had authority from the President to enforce the laws of the association. They made the rules governing the punishment of a boy. They gave no quarters. They punished a bad boy in their own way, wherever they found him, any place, any time. After several years' trial as a result of this method, of a bad boy finding and punishing a bad boy—bad habits were knocked out of the boys, and it had a lasting effect upon them.

The self-governing plan proved to be successful, even beyond the expectation of the President. It was surprisingly wonderful in producing good and lasting results. Lasting, because good was always cultivated in every boy.

Some members of the Newsboys' Business Men's Club of Toledo. These young men were picked up off the street, as newsboys, by John E. Gunckel, "the Newsboys' Friend."

The citizens of Toledo were not slow in recognizing the new self-governing plan of making bad boys good by using the raw material. On April 6, 1905, The Toledo Newsboys' Association was incorporated, and an active board of trustees in charge, the most influential and prominent business men in Toledo, whose untiring and persevering work made it possible for The Toledo Newsboys' Association to be the most successful, of its kind, in the world. In fact, it stands alone in the peculiar work of managing bad boys.

As a result of the work the trustees by a general popular subscription, six thousand subscribers, erected the Toledo Newsboys' Building, the only one of its kind in the world, and all paid for.

It has one of the finest Auditoriums in the country, library, reading and reception rooms, large modern equipped gymnasium, swimming pool, game and billiard rooms, association hall, and play grounds adjoining.

It need not be stated that one of the most popular features of the Newsboys' Home is the swimming pool. During one year 21,000 members take advantage of it. About 110 cakes of soap are used each month by the boys.

That the newsboys have been thoroughly trained in honesty is evidenced by the fact that there have been $51,000 worth of articles found by members of the association in five years, and these have been returned!

The Newsboys' Business Men's Club was organized October, '11, for the purpose of keeping alive the hustling abilities of the ex-newsboys—boys of yesterday, men of today—and conserving to the benefit of Toledo, of cultivating a greater civic pride, of boosting and assisting. In fifteen years 2,760 positions have been secured for the boys through the agency of the Association.

Believing that every boy should speak well of his native town and become familiar with the locations of prominent places, public building, amusement places, hotels, streets, depots, on Sept. , 1912, the "Ask Me About Toledo" Auxiliary was started, with a membership, limited, two hundred. The boys are being educated and trained for conventions and all public gatherings where guides are needed. Each member wears the badge: "Ask Me About Toledo"—and are furnished with city guide books from which they can find any place in the city.

It has ever been Mr. Gunckel's wish to develop the principle of self-government in his boys, and with this in mind for many years have been elected at a stated time the Association's officers. Here is "Article 9" of the Constitution

Is your school dissatisfied with its literature? Perhaps it is not using the right kind. Read what some of our Sunday-school leaders are saying about

The Bethany System

"Nothing Could Pry Us Loose"

We began using the Bethany Graded Lessons at their first issuance and have increased the supply from year to year as the literature for all grades was published. There is nothing in the series that is not now used by our school. Nothing could pry our superintendents and teachers loose from these lessons. They meet the needs of pupils of all years and make the teacher's work a joy. We have no word with which to express our satisfaction with the series.

H. H. HARMON,
First Church, Lincoln, Neb.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teachers' text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN,
Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va.

"Thoroughly Edited"

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upon the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday-school pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned.

L. J. MARSHALL,
Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

"We Would Not Turn Back"

We are using the Bethany Graded Lessons. We would not turn back. The service our Sunday-school specialists are giving us as represented in this course is making a new day in religious education.

FINIS IDLEMAN,
Pastor Central Church, Des Moines, Ia.

"Unanimously the Bethany Series"

After a campaign led by Miss Eva Lemert of Kansas City, Mo., resulting in the thorough grading and departmentizing of the school, we had to decide the matter of graded helps. A committee of three was appointed, consisting of the pastor, superintendent and one member of the Executive Committee. This committee made an individual examination of lesson helps and decided unanimously in favor of the Bethany series, arriving at their decisions independently and solely upon the merits of the literature. So far as I know these lessons are giving entire satisfaction.

EDGAR DeWITT JONES,
Pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

"Nothing to Compare With Them"

We have been using the Bethany Graded Lessons from the time you began to publish them and we are very highly pleased with them. We have often had occasion to compare them with the publications of other houses and thus far can say we have found nothing that compares with them. I am teaching a young men's class in the course, "The World a Field for Christian Service," and am glad to say that it seems to me the best adapted for young men of high school age of all courses I have ever seen. My class is becoming very enthusiastic over it.

P. J. RICE,
Pastor First Church, El Paso, Tex.

"Have Created Enthusiasm"

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers. I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

T. E. WINTER,
Pastor First Church, Fulton, Mo.

"Delighted"

Our Sunday-school, which has lately begun the use of the Bethany Graded Lessons, seems to be delighted with them. I have heard no word of unfavorable criticism and very many words of appreciation. Our teachers like the form and material of these lessons.

GRAHAM FRANK,
Pastor Liberty, Mo.

"Best on the Market"

We consider the Bethany Graded Lessons for the Beginners and Primary department the best on the market of our own brotherhood and second to none of other communions. Congratulations!

J. J. TISDALL,
Pastor Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O.

THANKSGIVING NUMBER

"WHEN THE FODDER'S IN THE SHOCK."

The Christian Century's Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Crusade

More Good Words From Our Readers!

JOHN P. LONDON, Marietta, Okla.

I am sending you seven names—the perfect number. And my prayer to God is that they all may become permanent subscribers to The Christian Century, and be edified and uplifted as I have been by reading your excellent, sweet-spirited paper for the last ten years.

Dr. F. E. LUMLEY, College of Missions, Indianapolis.

I must congratulate you on your great campaign and its certainty of success. No doubt The Christian Century has a great future. May you have every good thing according to your desires.

Rev. T. A. LINDENMEYER, Bridgeport, Ill.

I have gone through my membership list and carefully selected the enclosed list of our workers. We have some others that I might have sent and there is a country congregation near here that has some choice workers, but I thought I had made this list long enough. I had intended sending you this list when I first read of your announcement in the Century, but was hindered from so doing until now. I am also sending you herewith my draft for $1.00 together with the enclosed bill for my subscription, which you will kindly receipt and return to me. I have greatly enjoyed reading The Century the past year and if it is to be as you say "far ahead of the present Christian Century as the present Christian Century is declared by its readers to be ahead of any paper published for the Disciples," it will surely be an easy matter to retain and increase your present subscription list. As a friend of former years, I would say that so long as you will keep the paper free from fads and destructive criticism, you can count on my co-operation in lending my influence to assist you in retaining your subscribers and securing new ones.

Mrs. H. F. REED, Fiske, Saskatchewan, Can.

Words cannot express to you the value of The Century to us out here on the western prairie where we have but little Christian activity. We are glad to view the work in general and The Century helps us not to be too self-centered. The subscription campaign which you have begun is unique. I wish that I might belong to team three instead of team two for I think it quite probable that team two will outnumber team three. But I shall not cease to pray for team three that it may be large and that The Century may be powerful in its mission to the world.

Mr. JOHN C. GATES, Princeton.

I append below list of names of prominent members of the congregation of Disciples at this place, to whom I suggest that you send The Christian Century for one year under the terms of your inspiring anniversary subscription crusade. I have only been taking The Century since my visit to the Toronto Convention, and unhesitatingly say that it fills a place in religious journalism hitherto unfilled by any Disciple publication.

Rev. W. H. TRAINUM, Crystal Lake, Ill.

You are giving us a great paper, not only the best in our brotherhood but a stronger paper than any other I have seen.

Rev. C. M. CHILTON, St. Joseph, Mo.

I trust you may realize all your hopes in the Crusade.

Rev. CHAS. A. LOCKHART, Canton, Mo.

You and the brotherhood are to be congratulated on the issuance of the announcement of the Thirtieth Anniversary Crusade for subscriptions for The Christian Century. It is a periodical which has made itself a place among us by its frank and fair attempt to meet the needs of a reconstructive thought and life. Perhaps it has not always voiced the sentiments of the majority of its readers, but it has done that which is still more important. It has accentuated a phase and treatment of our position as a people which must be regarded as an actual contribution to our times and a help to our ministry. It has stimulated thought along new avenues of approach when former subjects and methods were becoming hackneyed and threadbare. You have a great constituency who are not demanding that you agree with them in all things but are anxious to hear a voice in the direction of progress and the best scholarship of our times. Such brethren are pleased with the strong note of appeal you are urging, and will be glad to be counted friends in this campaign.

TOLBERT F. WEAVER, Pendleton, Ore.

I greatly appreciate The Christian Century because of its broad vision, its rich supply of spiritual food, and for its reports on world-wide questions. I wish you great success in its publication, notwithstanding I do not always agree with all it advocates. Neither do I agree with other papers in all they advocate. But we are after the truth and more bread for the soul.

LOUIS D. RIDDELL, Fayetteville, Ark.

I am enclosing you today a list of names for The Christian Century for free subscription for one year according to your generous proposal. I have tried to send you a good list. I believe it will be a rich blessing wherever it goes. I enjoy it more and more and find it ever increasing in helpfulness.

R. P. INGLES, Chicago.

I had thought I could not take The Christian Century this year, but begin to think I cannot do without it. So I enclose $1.50 for subscription. I shall try to find some new subscribers, but fear most or all my friends take it. However, I shall try. If all knew its worth, none would be without it.

Mrs. PERSIS L. CHRISTIAN, Eureka Springs, Ark.

I cannot express my appreciation of The Christian Century. It is a great thing to stand for intellectual freedom in the fellowship of Christ, and for the universal human relation and brotherly kindness as The Century is doing. It should be generously sustained.

EDW. L. BAIRD, Shelbyville, Ind.

I will always put in a good word for The Christian Century when I have opportunity. It certainly deserves the support of all our people. I have been sending my papers, after reading them, to a friend in Lafayette, Ind., who is an instructor in Purdue University. He writes: "I received your bundle of Christian Centurys. Thank you. I have read most of them. I always find out more about what is going on religiously there than anywhere else. When I am through with the papers I am going to take them to the Y. M. C. A. reading room."

Send Your List!

Hundreds of our readers are sending in their lists of persons to whom they wish The Christian Century sent, as a free gift. Have you some friends for whom you wish this favor? Remember, it does not cost you a single cent, even if you send in a list of a hundred names. Send the list, and the financial side of the mattter will be taken care of. There is no danger of your getting your foot into something. This proposition is entirely above board. We have made it clear that we hope the persons receiving The Christian Century as a gift for a year will become permanent subscribers. But you do not object to that, do you? We repeat it,

Salient Data in The Christian Century's History

Established as The Christian Oracle in 1884 by Rev. F. M. Kirkham and Gen. F. M. Drake, at Des Moines, Iowa. Attained a high degree of popularity as organ of Iowa churches. Removed to Chicago in 1891. Became a national organ, though featuring especially the Iowa work and the local parishes of Chicago. Mr. Kirkham continued as Editor and owner of The Christian Oracle, until 1889, when it was purchased by Dr. J. H. Garrison, whose son, Mr. Arthur O. Garrison became Managing Editor. For a short time Rev. George A. Campbell was Editor.

In 1900 the stock of the Oracle Publishing Company was purchased by a group of men headed by Rev. Charles A. Young. The name of the paper was changed to The Christian Century and that of the company to The Christian Century Company. During the next seven years the paper was edited by a group of writers, including Rev. J. J. Haley, Rev. Frank G. Tyrrell and Prof. Herbert L. Willett.

In September, 1908 The Christian Century was purchased by the New Christian Century Company, a new corporation. Charles Clayton Morrison and Prof. Willett became associated as joint Editors.

At the beginning of the year 1913 the Disciples Publication Society, a corporation without capital stock and operating not for pecuniary profit, was chartered under the laws of Illinois. Its membership was constituted of representatives of the churches and Sunday-schools of the Disciples of Christ. This Society purchased The Christian Century and all other assets of The New Christian Century Company, and is now publishing The Christian Century in the unselfish interest of the cause of religious education and progress.

On Sept. 1, 1913, Mr. Morrison became sole Editor, Dr. Willett continuing as Contributing Editor in a no less vital relation to the paper than before.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

The Temple Without Toil

In the deep forests that covered the slopes of Mt. Lebanon, 40,000 men were hard at work. The hillsides echoed and re-echoed to their stroke. The ring of the axe, the crash of falling trees, the shouting of teamsters, the labored creaking of carts through mountain roads—all these broke in upon the silence and turned the forest into a place of loud and conflicting sounds. The voices of men mingled discordantly, for many of the working men were foreigners, and Babel was not more polyglot than the confusion of tongues that disturbed the woods of Lebanon. The workmen of Judah were too few and too little accustomed to the tasks of the lumberman. Their thinly wooded country had afforded them no sufficient experience in forestry to make possible so vast an enterprise. Solomon's temple was no mere local achievement. Its building was an event of international significance. It called for the united efforts of all Judah and Israel. But more than that, it necessitated the employment of a vast army of men from the neighboring kingdoms to the north. It was an enterprise that called for international negotiation. The King of Tyre, who sometimes had been an enemy, became an ally of Israel in the furnishing of material and the employment of workmen upon the Temple of Solomon.

Within the quarries were scenes of like activity. There was sound of drilling and hammering and the rending of rock; explosives were unknown, but they knew the art of driving in great wooden wedges and wetting them so that their expansion split off great slabs available for transportation. Between the forest and the little mountain city, 200 miles to the south, were toiling teamsters and hardy mariners laboring with their skill to transport the rafts of rocks and the carved woodwork and place it within the city of Jerusalem. Solomon, as we are told, employed 10,000 burden-bearers, and it required the united efforts of all of them to transport the material of the Temple from the forest and quarry to the place appointed for its erection.

So much for the quarry and the forest, but in Jerusalem the scene was one of startling contrast. Everything moved forward with quiet and simple dignity. Here and there among the workmen moved the architect, the superintendents of the various departments, and the shaped stones were quietly lifted into place and the carved pieces of woodwork rose quietly and were fitted securely into position. What a contrast! Yonder the forest with sound of axe and falling trees; the quarry with its din of drill and rending rock; here the calm dignity of the wall rising stone upon stone, upward toward the heaven.

The eternal contrast goes on between Lebanon and Zion. There is a necessary place for toil and traffic. The church has its physical side, its business side, its material side, its necessity for the raising of money, the erection of buildings, the organization of societies, but the true Temple is the temple of the heart. The hewer of wood and the hammerer of stone pause at this sacred portal and within there is a holy calm.

When a church edifice is under course of construction, we see about us on every side the litter of the building material, and we hear the noise of the men at work, and we talk of bids and estimates and questions of construction and finance. All this is necessary, all this is something to be thankful for, but all this belongs to Lebanon. The life of Zion must be developed in the silence. Each member of the church, upon his knees before God, morning and night, must pray God for guidance and strength that his part of the work of the church may be faithfully performed, that he may find some task in addition to that which he has been performing by which he may make the life of the church more effective.

It was only by co-operation that the superb results of Solomon's Temple became in any wise possible. It was only because a vast number of people, working each at his own task but each also in harmony with one superbly guided plan, that Solomon's Temple did not end in the disaster of the Tower of Babel. It was too great an enterprise for a little nation, too great an enterprise for any people, save as they wrought in the spirit of co-operation and under the enthusiasm of a common ideal. Even so shall our work prove a spiritual disaster unless we to the end of our task maintain that fine spirit of loyalty to Christ and the Church in which it has so happily begun.

Lebanon and Jerusalem, the two stand in fine and beautiful contrast. The church in its material relations and the church as a spiritual ideal, these two present the same fine and harmonious antithesis. So, too, stands the church militant in its relation to the church triumphant, for we are building on the foundations of the apostles and prophets, building as the walls of Jerusalem were built, with hammer and sword, and the trumpeter standing near, but we build that spiritual habitation, the church of the Living God, and we build for that heavenly abiding place, which is "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

Thanksgiving for Poets

BY EDWIN MARKHAM.

Author of "The Man With the Hoe" and Other Poems.

I THANK THEE, Father, for my books!
Each is a friend with kindly looks;
Each a peculiar treasure brings;
Each is a messenger of kings:

Homer, the high, melodious source
That gives all lyric streams their course;
The mighty Florentine, with soul
All tears and fire, and aureole,
Who on the fateful circles saw
Love is the final name of law;

Chaucer, whose golden gossip runs
With color of the April suns
And the wild freshness of the rose
In that frail hour before it goes;
Spenser, whose magic brings the feel
Of lilies and the loves that kneel.

Next Moliere, the heart's best friend,
Who keeps us laughing to the end,
Tickling the ribs of life with fun
To let the sweeter wrinkles run;
Cervantes, too, called unto earth
To medicine the mind with mirth;
Rare Ben, so great his plunderings,
He has a place among the kings;

Shakespeare, who comes alone, aloof,
Looking on all without reproof,
Without offense, his soul at one
With the large tolerance of the sun—
He leans to neither good nor ill,
But whispers out each separate will;
So the vast fabrics of his rhyme
Seem only parts of earth and time.
A chorus of archangels high
Against the ardors of the sky,
A gulf of darkness beyond sleep
Where chafe the anarchs of the deep,
A beamy world of elfin art,
Blown thro' by sylvan pipes apart—
This is the Milton of my heart.

Now, Wordsworth, separate and austere
Telling the world that God is near,
And kneeling where His feet have stood
By the green altars of the wood;
And Coleridge too: some elfin king
Draws round his soul the magic ring,
The realm of spell and whispering.

Not Hybla hives more honeyed sweets
Than this heart-kindling book of Keats.
He drank earth's beauty with a thirst—
A gust the young gods felt at first;
And Shelley, on his sky-way lone
Sends back a far æolian tone;
And earth is sweeter for the light
Shook downward from his starry flight.

Browning, who probed the world to find
Some truth to prop the mortal mind,
And found earth one of many goals,
A place where God is making souls;
And he, the bard, whose music bore
King Arthur to the deathless shore,
Who called a kingdom from the dust,
Knights from their tombs, swords from their rust,
And by the magic of a rhyme
Gave them to splendor and to time;

Poe, the earth-baffled, he that held
Converse with Love and Death and Eld,
Shaken by harmonies that shine
Thro' Euclid, Kepler and the Nine;
And, last of all, the winged one—
Gray Wisdom fluting in the sun—
Our Emerson with shell so thin
It let the starry music in:—

I thank Thee, Father, for these friends,
Trustworthy to the end of ends—
For all their high-erected rhyme
Exempted from the spite of time.
They come to shorten the long day
With boughs of warbling on the way.

First Thanksgiving and Later Ones

BY WILLIAM E. BARTON.

THANKSGIVING is an American institution. Nations with a state church have their appointed days of praise; but America, with its free church in a free state has no calendar of holy days established by law, and no accredited form or ceremonial appropriate for their observance. Yet there has grown up in American usage an annual celebration at once free from all danger of bringing church and state into organic relationships, but finely illustrating their reciprocal obligations.

That delightful writer, Mrs. Agnes Morse Earle, in her "Old New-England" asserts that Thanksgiving "was not observed by either the Plymouth Pilgrim or the Boston Puritan," but that "Giving God thanks" for the safe arrival of the ship and for other blessings "was first heard on New England shores on August 7, 1607, from the lips of the Popham Colonists at Monhegan in the Thanksgiving service of the Church of England."

This is partly true. Such a service was held, and the date was earlier than any associated with Pilgrim or Puritan history in America. Yet the Monhegan Thanksgiving was in no sense the historic source of our annual custom. It was an isolated act of worship, as far as the subsequent history of New England was concerned, and was in no way differentiated from ordinary worship, as far as the Monhegan Colony was concerned. It was a regular Sunday service, and of course had in it an element of thanksgiving. The Colonists tell us that their ship the Mary and John, having come safely ashore after a good voyage, on a succeeding Sunday, August 9 (not 7), "we heard a sermon delivered unto us by our preacher, giving God thanks for our happy meeting and safe arrival." They used the prayer-book, and followed its forms for the day, as it was a regular service. The Puritan Thanksgiving, and the one which has made for itself a place in American life, was always a week-day affair, distinct in character and form from Sunday worship.

If we trace our American Thanksgiving back of 1621, a more significant event and one only recently come to light is that recorded in the family Bible of William White, a "Breeches" Bible, like those of most of the Pilgrims, who thought too little of King James to take kindly to his new version—in which it is recorded: "William White married on ye 3d day of March 1620 to Susannah Tilly. Peregrine White Born on Board ye Mayflower in Cape Cod harbor. Sonne born to Susannah White December 19th 1620 yt Six o'clock morning. Next day we meet for prayer and thanksgiving."

This meeting for prayer and thanksgiving was not the regular Sunday service, for it occurred on Tuesday. The Mayflower had dropped anchor on the previous Saturday, just a week after her exploring company had entered the harbor. They had rested on Sunday, explored on Monday, and on Tuesday, December 19, as this old record newly discovered shows, by previous appointment, held a service of thanksgiving. We know no more about it than this. We may be sure that there was no feasting, and we know that labor did not cease. On that same day one company of the Pilgrims went by land to Kingston and another by boat to Clark's Island, and when they came back there were three opinions as to the place in which to settle the colony. "So, in the morning [of Wednesday, December 20, as they reckoned, or 31 as we count] after we had called on God for direction, we came to this resolution, to go presently ashore again, and to take a better view of two places which we thought most fitting for us; for we could not at this time now take time for further search or consideration, our victuals being much spent, especially our beer; and it being now the 20th of December." So Mourt tells us in his narration, and it shows that there could have been no feast on the previous day worthy of special mention.

But this was not the origin of our Thanksgiving. This was a morning prayer-meeting before work began, and for which the passengers on the Mayflower rose an hour earlier, to thank God that at last they had found a place where they might settle, and leave the ship; for, to quote Captain John Smith: "After having been pestered nine weeks in this leaking, unwholesome ship, lying wet in ye cabbins, most of them grew very weak, and weary of ye sea." And to those nine weeks of sailing had now been added five others since the Mayflower reached Cape Cod Bay. No wonder they were thankful, even though the lack of bread and beer cut short their prayers and discussions, and left room for other labors after their thanks were uttered!

But the festival from which our custom has been derived, with modifications, occurred in the following autumn. We have a record of its festivities in a letter written from Plymouth to a friend in England by Edward Winslow. He said:

"Our harvest being gotten in, our governor sent four men on fowling that so we might after a special manner rejoice together after we had gathered the fruits of our labors. They killed as much fowl as with a little help beside served the company about a week. At which times among other recreations we exercised our arms, many of the Indians coming amongst us, and among the rest their greatest king, Massasoyt, with some ninety men, whom for three days we entertained and feasted and they went out and killed five deer which they brought and bestowed on our governor, and upon the captains and others."

It will surprise many good people to know that this occasion was not primarily a religious festival. We find no record of any religious observance whatever. It is doubtful whether there was any other religious service than the daily worship—the Pilgrims had their daily prayers before breakfast—colored with the glad spirit of the time and place. There were athletic contests and military feats, and the five deer killed by the Indians were supplemented by plenty of game killed by the four good shots from the Colony, and the festivities continued altogether for a week. Doubtless they played at "stool-ball" and "pitch-ye-bar," games we find mentioned in Bradford's journal a few weeks later. It was a Thanksgiving Day to delight the heart of the modern football lover, difference in time being allowed for.

The year 1622 was one of repeated misfortune. The Pilgrims sorrowfully recorded that if any people on earth needed to pray for "dayly brade" it was they. In six weeks after the third week in May hardly a drop of rain fell. The corn withered and appeared dead, and other crops seemed as if parched with fire. The hopes of the Pilgrim Colony were set on the expected arrival of a ship from England, but they had tidings from a fishing vessel that it had been lost. In that extremity "a day was appointed by publick authority and set apart from all other employments," to pray for the mercy of God on the ill-fated Colony.

When the Colonists began their service of prayer in the morning, the skies were clear and the run rose hot to the zenith of a brazen sky; but before the meeting closed (and it continued for nearly nine hours) the clouds were gathering from all sides. Next morning the Pilgrims wakened to the patter of the rain.

For fourteen days the rain continued, with such "soft, sweet, moderate showers, mixed with seasonable weather, as it was hard to say whether our withered corn or drooping affections were most quickened and revived; such was ye bounty and goodnesse of God." During the period of these rains Captain Miles Standish, who had gone northward in hope of securing provisions, returned with some, and also with the report that the supposed lost ship had been sighted, having escaped the storm in which she was supposed to have sunk. "Having these many signs of God's favour and acceptation, another solemn day was set apart and appointed, wherein we returned glory and honour and praise with all thankfulness to our good God, who had dealt so graciously with us."

This was the first religious festival called for the definite purpose of thanksgiving, set apart by authority of the civil government by previous proclamation, in New England and America. The exact date is not known; but it was near the last day of July, 1623, for the Anne arrived in the end of July, and the Little James about the first of August, and only the first ship was known to be near when the thanksgiving was provided for. It was held on a Wednesday, probably July 30, the day before the Anne arrived.

Our modern Thanksgiving has inherited something from this occasion, and something from the harvest festival nearly two years earlier, to which reference has already been made.

The first Thanksgiving proclaimed in Boston was on February 22, 1630. It is the one often referred to erroneously as the experiences of the Plymouth Pilgrims. Here is the true story of it:

The winter had been a hard one. Food was nearly gone, and hunger and scurvy abounded. Cotton Mather tells us of one man who invited guests and had no food for them except clams, but without apology gave thanks to God "who had given them to suck the abundance of the seas, and of the treasures hid in the sands." Nearly all Boston set itself to fishing, and at low tide the women hunted the shores for clams. Pitiful are the stories (of which fragments are recorded by Mather) of the hardships of that winter. It was a winter in which the prosperous shared with the unfortunate, and if there were any deeds of selfishness they are not on record. Governor Winthrop was in the act of giving away his own last handful of meal to a needy man at his door when a ship was sighted in the harbor, bringing supplies to the distressed little city.

This was in February, and just before the fifth of the month, a day that had been set for fasting and prayer. The day of fasting was not kept. Rather the citizens counted that they honored God more by making good use of his blessings. They had done fasting enough. But no one was permitted to make merchandise of the cargo of the ship. It was bought entirely from the public funds, and distributed according to every man's need. There were meal, oatmeal, flour, wheat, peas, beef, pork, cheese, butter and suet, and best of all lemon-juice for scurvy. The famine was over, and the people rejoiced and ate their food with gladness of heart.

But something more than this seemed fitting. On February 22 they met in their meeting-houses and gave God solemn and heartfelt thanks for a deliverance from famine such as New England happily never faced in any subsequent year.

The first Thanksgiving Day in which feasting was a marked feature in combination with previously appointed religious solemnities was observed in Plymouth County, in old Scituate, and it may have been observed also in Plymouth, on December 22, 1636. Here is the church record of that day's service and the feast that followed.

"In ye Meetinghouse, beginning some halfe hour before nine & continuing until after twelve aclocke, ye day being very cold, beginning wt a short prayer, then a psalme sang, then more large in prayer, after that an other Psalme, & then the Word taught, after that prayer —& then a psalme. Then making merry to the creatures, the poorer sort being invited of the richer."

The next year they did the same on October 12, 1647, the services being "performed in the manner aforesaid," that is, as had been done the previous year, with a service in the meeting-house, and a dinner afterward. The particular occasions for gratitude on this year, besides the harvest, were: "1. Ffor the victory over the pequots ye. 2. Ffor Reconcilation betwixt Mr. Cotton and the other ministers." Two years later the Colony divided into three companies to feast, and the festal character of the event grew more marked.

In the thirty years beginning 1630 there were ten Thanksgiving Days in Massachusetts. They were held at irregular intervals. The year 1742 had two of them proclaimed by Governor Shirley, of Massachusetts, and there were other festivals in other colonies. There were thanksgivings for deliverance from pirates, for victories over Indians, for the cessation of epidemics, and—for New England was loyal—for the birth of princes.

A fast-day broke spontaneously into one for thanksgiving in 1746, when Boston had assembled to supplicate for deliverance from the French fleet, and Thomas Prince stood up in the Old South to pray when the storm

> Came with mighty power,
> Shaking the windows and walls,
> And tolling the bell in the tower
> As it tolls at funerals.

In that storm the people saw their deliverance, and before the service closed it changed to one of gratitude. It was no festival, but a solemn thanksgiving for a great and awful deliverance. Thomas Prince described the storm in his Thanksgiving sermon, and Longfellow wrought it into verse. The great storm sank the hostile fleet and it is said that when the sea is clear the wrecks may still

THANKSGIVING PROCLAMATION.

The season is at hand in which it has been our long respected custom, as a people, to turn in praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God for his manifold mercies and blessings, to us as a nation.

The year that has just passed has been marked in a peculiar degree by manifestations of his gracious and beneficent providence. We have not only had peace throughout our own borders and with the nations of the world, but that peace has been brightened by constantly multiplying evidence of genuine friendship, of mutual sympathy and understanding and of the happy operation of many elevating influences both of ideal and of practice.

The nation has been not only prosperous, but has proved its capacity to take calm counsel amid the rapid movement of affairs and deal with its own life in a spirit of candor, righteousness and comity.

We have seen the practical completion of a great work at the Isthmus of Panama, which not only exemplifies the nation's abundant resources to accomplish what it will and the distinguished skill and capacity of its public servants, but also promises the beginning of a new age, of new contracts, new neighbors, new sympathies, new bonds and new achievements of co-operation and peace.

"Righteousness exalteth the nation," and "Peace on earth, good will towards men," furnish the only foundation upon which can be built the lasting achievements of the human spirit. The year has brought us the satisfaction of work well done and fresh visions of our duty which will make the work of the future better still.

Now, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Thursday, the 27th day of November, next, as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, and invite the people throughout the land to cease from their wonted occupations and in their several homes and places of worship render thanks to Almighty God.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the City of Washington, this 23d day of October, in the year of our Lord, 1913, and of the Independence of the United States of America, the 138th.

(Signed) WOODROW WILSON,
By the President.
W. J. Bryan, Secretary of State.

be seen off the coast of Cape Sable. This event impressed Boston as the destruction of Sennacherib's host impressed Jerusalem, or as the sinking of the Spanish Armada moved England with a sense of a divine interposition.

For a long period Thanksgiving Days were proclaimed at irregular intervals and for special purposes. Sometimes they served other ends than those for which they were designed. A perfunctory day of thanksgiving for the birth of a British prince in 1765 was more commonly used in New England "for preserving our invaluable privileges" threatened by the Stamp Act. Bells tolled and funeral processions were organized, and the opposition continued until the act was repealed. In 1771 Governor Hutchinson issued a proclamation in which among other things thanks were expressed for "the continuance of our civil and religious privileges;" but some of the ministers commented severely on the phrase, and some denounced it as false, and only two in Boston would read the proclamation of the Tory governor.

The first national Thanksgiving Day was November 18, 1777, by act of Congress, expressing gratitude that God had been pleased to smile on us in the Prosecution of a just and necessary War, for the Defense and Establishment of our unalienable Rights and Liberties.

After the adoption of the Constitution a day was set apart by resolution of Congress and by proclamation of George Washington, though there was not a little discussion in Congress about the propriety of the President asking people to give thanks for a constitution for which some of them were not thankful. But the last Thursday in November was so set apart, and it came to be the day chosen when no marked event indicated another day, and the thanks of the nation, united under the constitution, were expressed on November 28, 1789.

Not a few odd events have occurred in connection with Thanksgiving proclamations, particularly when the governor has been unpopular with the ministers. This happened in the case of Ben Butler, who, anticipating criticism, borrowed a proclamation from an old volume of executive documents, and laughed later when he told the ministers that they were criticising, not him, but Governor Gore, of happy memory. But he admitted that he had added one sentence, advising ministers on that day to preach the gospel and not politics. However, some of the best politics has been preached in Thanksgiving sermons.

The evolution from a local to a national and from an occasional to an annual Thanksgiving was gradual, slow and of recent consummation. In course of the Civil war there were days of thanksgiving following victories. That of 1863 made a marked impression on the nation, for it followed immediately on the victories of the July 4 of that year: the surrender of Vicksburg to Grant, and the defeat of Lee's invading army at Gettysburg. That year brought other victories and a good harvest, and President Lincoln issued another proclamation calling for a day of thanksgiving on November 26. Every northern state joined in this, the first national harvest thanksgiving. The next year Lincoln issued another proclamation setting apart November 24 as a day of praise.

Here the custom might have dropped, had not the First Congregational Church in Washington sent a committee the next year with its pastor, the Rev. Benjamin F. Morris, reminding President Andrew Johnson of the precedents established by the now martyred Lincoln in the two preceding years. Mr. Johnson heard the request, and in response to popular affection for the memory of Lincoln issued a proclamation.

Since that date the custom has never been omitted. Once or twice another day has been added, as in 1876, when General Grant proclaimed July 4 as a day of thanksgiving for our hundred years of national life. But increasingly the harvest feature has become prominent, and is referred to with more of emphasis in the proclamations of the president and governors.

Some of us regret that Thanksgiving Day is so largely given over to sport, and are glad that the day still retains a religious flavor; but it would be foreign to the spirit of the day to make it too rigidly a day of religious solemnity. It is a day of homecoming and good cheer, a day of joyful gratitude. The sermon has its place, and so has the turkey, and possibly also the football game. The spirit of the day is that laid down by that rigid old Puritan and radical reformer, but sane and benevolent governor, Nehemiah: "Go your own way, eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and send portions unto them for whom nothing is prepared; for this day is holy unto our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the Lord is your strength."

The proclamations of our presidents, establishing these annual days of festivity and of thanks, are interesting reading. Some of them have been perfunctory and have been chiefly conspicuous for what they tried not to say. But in general they have been the reverent expressions of earnest Christian men, feeling a high sense of their responsibility to God and the people; and they have been listened to with interest by the many thousands of congregations to which they are annually read.

Thanksgiving is here to stay. Each year it brings us new reason for gratitude. We can say with the psalmist of old, "God hath not dealt so with any nation."

The Hymns of Heaven

BY ARCHIBALD HADDEN.

ARE we ready to discard the heavenly hymns? Shall we lay them, as some suggested, with "Pilgrim's Progress" and "The Saints' Rest" among the relics on a back shelf?

This question arises in view of the criticism frequently made, of the otherworldliness and pessimism of so many of the hymns that have had a great vogue, but which do not chime with the optimism and spirit of service and energetic purpose to clean up the earth that characterize so much of present-day Christian activity.

The feeling is strong that the hurry to get to heaven suggests cowardice rather than the spirit of the Christian soldier. Gladden's "O, Master, Let Me Walk With Thee," and Goethe's "Purer Yet and Purer" are more in tune with the modern spirit. The call is clear for militant and inspiring songs of brotherhood and service; and such are coming. This note is sounding strong and clear in modern Christian praise.

A heavenly hymn is one that sings of heaven—perhaps of longing and anticipation, such as "My Ain Countree," or that tries to picture the joys and delights of heaven, like the medieval "Jerusalem the Golden." Some hymns begin on earth and end in the "New Jerusalem" as Newman's "Lead Kindly Light," or Palmer's "My Faith Looks Up to Thee." There are all sorts and qualities of such hymns from the revival and Salvation Army type, as "When the Roll is Called Up Yonder I'll Be There" and "The Glory Song" to the choicest hymns of the churches, as "Oh, Mother Dear Jerusalem" or "The Home Land."

The heavenly hymns have had three origins. They have come down to us from the darkest hours of history; they have been born in the fervor of evangelism; and they have been the cry of souls hard pressed and shut in, to whom heaven was the only hope.

From periods of darkness and despair have come some of the great hymns of heaven. As Augustine wrote his "City of God" when Alaric and his Huns were at the gates of Rome, and Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress" came from the reactionary days following the restoration of the Stuarts in England, so "Jerusalem the Golden" and "Safe Home in Port" came from the confusion and despair of the Middle Ages. Out of the misery and darkness of African slavery came "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and "My Lord Says There's Room Enough." When injustice and wrong are triumphant Christians will sing of heaven.

When people, whether through age, or misfortune, or illness have come to the point of utter hopelessness they will turn their faces to the Father's house and "the city that hath foundations." Lyte's "Abide With Me" was written when he was in the last stages of tuberculosis, and Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar" was his swan song written after his eightieth year.

In the first fervor of the Christian life, whether of young people in the adolescent idealism as they realize themselves as God's children, or of older people who have wandered far from God and come back as prodigals, nothing will satisfy but the gladness and greatness of heaven itself. "The Soul's Leap to God" finds expression in the anticipations of heaven. It wishes to sing not of the starting point but of the goal. Hence the great eras of evangelism have seen plentiful harvests of heavenly hymns.

So came the hymns of Charles Wesley, as "Let Saints on Earth With Concert Sing With Those to Glory Gone," and of Watts, as "There is a Land of Pure Delight" from the eighteenth century revival. So also the "Gospel Hymns" with frequent heavenly strains came from the Moody and Sankey campaigns. So the Salvation Army and the Rescue Missions are steadily using and producing the hymns of heaven.

We make no deference to heavenly hymns, poor and weak in spirit and bad in workmanship, of which there are far too many, that cumber the hymn books. The best hymns of all sorts are none too good for daily use by all Christians, and better hymns in poetry, spirit and music are yet to be written.

But so long as Christians anywhere are oppressed and seem to fight a losing battle, so long as sorrowing and suffering saints look out on this world and see no hope, so long as youth finds itself in God and prodigals seek the Father's house, there will be the use of, and call and need for, the so-called hymns of heaven.

Anti-Saloon Convention Achieves

Story of the Notable Meeting at Columbus, O., November 10-13, 1913.

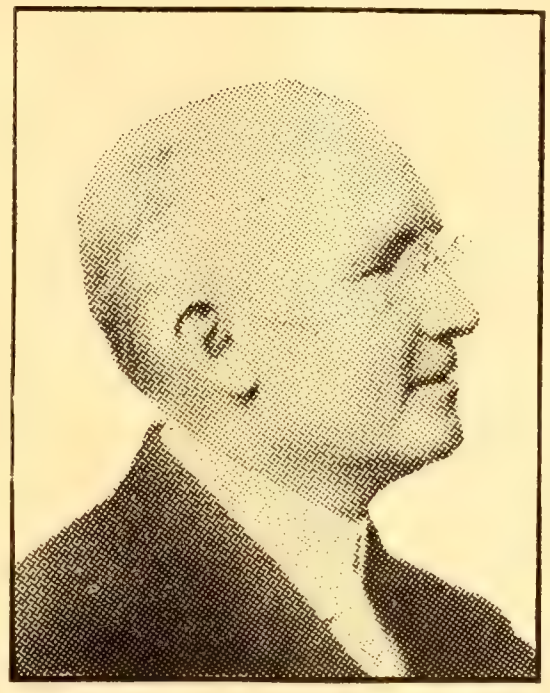
BY E. J. DAVIS.

One of the most remarkable conventions ever assembled in this country has just adjourned at Columbus, Ohio. Full of dramatic incidents, deeply religious, it has made history in the war on the liquor traffic. Catholic priests clasped hands with Methodist bishops; Republicans, Democrats, Progressives, Socialists and Prohibitionists, all spoke to the same program—Constitutional Prohibition. The union of the North and South, the fraternizing of the people of all Protestant faiths, no longer attracts comment, but when statesmen, men prominent in party movements, recommend the abandonment of party when necessary to further the cause of prohibition, it sounds a new note in American history.

GOVERNOR PATTERSON'S CONVERSION.

Since Saul of Tarsus, has there been a man who has occupied high positions of confidence and trust among his fellows, who yet in the vigor of life has repudiated the positions he held in the days of his power on moral questions? In humility and in words of evident sincerity, M. R. Patterson, former governor of Tennessee, did this very thing. Before the vast concourse of people gathered from every state in the Union, he poured out his story and showed where he had been mistaken—mistaken in his moral point of view. We believe the incident is without parallel in the history of this country. It was a great demonstration of the vicissitudes and changes in life, when a great audience cheered him that a few months before held him as one of the leading enemies of the things it stood for.

Another dramatic incident was that when J. B. Merwin, of Connecticut, told the story of his talk with Abraham Lincoln. Mr. Merwin, who is a man eighty-six years of age, told how Lincoln said, "Merwin, we have cleaned up one big job, the next thing that must be done is to exterminate the liquor traffic." Mr. Merwin said that he realized the importance of what Mr. Lincoln said and asked him if he could make public this statement. Lincoln's reply was, "Yes, publish it as wide as the daylight." He told also of his being present when Mr. Lincoln and Secretary Chase discussed the act levying revenue on the liquor traffic. Mr. Lincoln said to Mr. Chase, "I would rather sever my right hand than sign a bill which would perpetuate the liquor traffic for a single day." Secretary Chase, whom Mr. Merwin characterized as one of the finest men the nation had ever produced, turned to Mr. Lincoln and said, "We must have the revenue in this crisis, we must levy revenue on good and evil until the war is finished." Mr. Lincoln finally very reluctantly consented to sign the bill with the statement that he would bend every energy to its repeal as soon as the war was passed. The statement of the incident of Lincoln signing the revenue act was brought out under cross question by Dr. Howard H. Russell, the founder of the league. During the colloquy between Dr. Russell and Mr. Merwin the silence in the great audience was impressive and the moments were filled with great and intense interest.



Dr. Howard H. Russell, founder of the Anti-Saloon League, who told of his experiences in founding the League, at the Columbus convention.

On Tuesday, November 11, the program was filled with much of interest, including the report of the Legislative Superintendent, Rev. E. C. Dinwiddie, a great address on "The Voter of Tomorrow" by Marion Lawrance, the report of General Superintendent Purley A. Baker. Dr. Baker gave a graphic account of the accomplishments of the league and the affairs which led up to the call of the convention for the adoption of a resolution to push forward for nation-wide prohibition.

On Wednesday morning Rev. Howard H. Russell, D. D., gave the anniversary address on "Our League, God's Plan." It was replete with human interest, touching the personal experiences of Dr. Russell in the founding of the league. One of the splendid moments of the convention was when three hundred boys were marched onto the platform, the advance guard of the Lincoln-Lee Legion, the total abstinence department of the league. In comment on this scene one of the daily papers in Columbus said:

"The presentation of the Lincoln-Lee Legion, led by a drum corps and all carrying staves with the American flag at one end, was dramatic in many of its aspects, and very effective. Every man and woman in the audience arose and the organ and congregation rolled forth the hymn, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," as the boys responded to the questions propounded by Rev. Dr. Russell. The curtain which had been drawn on one of the west windows in the balcony to shade the eyes of the men on the platform was blown aside by the breeze and a brilliant shaft of light, like a flood of gold, fell across the stage and the little men upon it."

No name in the convention received a greater ovation than the Woman's Christian Temperance Union. It was applauded to the echo whenever it was mentioned and its part in the program was a conspicuous one.

EX-GOVERNOR HANLY'S REPORT.

On Thursday afternoon, November 13, Ex-Governor Hanley read the report of the Committee on Resolutions, setting forth at length the reasons for the step which the convention was about to take. The resolutions called for passage by Congress of an amendment to the National Constitution providing for the extermination of the liquor traffic in all its phases. It was adopted in the midst of scenes of tumult. The audience broke out in songs and finished its demonstration of approval by singing the Doxology.

There was an air of finality about the convention. There was a deep undertone of religious feeling running all through its session, and a feeling of great soberness as of an army marching into action.

From this day forward the temperance people of the entire nation will carry the contest into every one of the Congressional districts of the country and fight for the nomination and election of men to Congress who will vote for the Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution.

NOTE. Next week's issue of The Christian Century will contain ex-Governor Patterson's address.

Concerning School Hygiene

A Review of the Report of the Recent Congress Held in Buffalo.

The report of the Congress on School Hygiene held in Buffalo last August has just been published. It states some very startling facts. It declares that "fifteen million school children in the United States are in need of immediate medical attention." Of the twenty million school children in the United States at least fifteen million are handicapped by some defect of vision, hearing or breathing. Dr. T. H. Wood of the Teachers' College, Columbia University, of New York furnishes us with this classification of our school children.

About 5 per cent, or 1,000,000 have spinal curvature, flat foot, or some other moderate deformity, serious enough to interfere to some degree with health.

About 5 per cent, or 1,000,000 have defective hearing;

About 25 per cent, or 5,000,000 have defective vision;

About 25 per cent, or 5,000,000 are suffering from malnutrition, in many cases due in part at least to one or more of the other defects enumerated;

Over 30 per cent, or 6,000,000, have enlarged tonsils, adenoids, or enlarged cervical glands which need attention;

Over 50 per cent, or 10,000,000 (in some schools as high as 98 per cent) have defective teeth which are interfering with health.

From this report we learn that this congress was the first gathering of its kind held in the Western Hemisphere.

and that it was attended by about twelve hundred physicians, educators and social workers. The congress had two purposes —the conservation of child life through health instruction and disease prevention. Twenty nations were represented. The congress was divided into four sections. One group considered school buildings, open air schools, ventilation, and the physical vitalization of the school children. Another group considered courses of study, the increasing of mental and moral vigor, and the introduction of play as a method of education. A third group considered medical inspection, the practical value of school nurses, and the cleanliness of school rooms. A fourth group considered mental and sex hygiene. No sectional congress aroused greater interest or was more largely attended than this section.

VENTILATION.

It was frequently asserted that the problem of properly ventilating school rooms was now an easy one to solve. Instead of warming cold air from the outside, it was an easy thing to wash the used air without lowering its temperature, and to re-circulate that washed air through the rooms and halls of the school building. But it was just as frequently asserted that the child's mind needed to be ventilated. Not only in the schools of great cities, but in the schools in rural communities, it was absolutely necessary to give some instruction in physical and mental hygiene. Dr. McLaughlin had wonderfully increased the efficiency of the children of the Philippine schools by a very sane, yet thorough-going course in hygiene. Many states have found it economical to have not only frequent medical inspection, but to have a school nurse in constant attendance at the school. Upon the question of giving sex instruction there was a wide variety of opinion. That considerable blindness, paralysis and insanity were due to ignorance of, or to playing fast and loose with sex laws, is made very apparent by this report. That the race is in danger of deterioration is also made evident. How should this necessary information be given? All the experts agreed that it should be given first of all to parents. The minister as well as the physician and the school teacher should give this information. There should be in every town lecture courses that would be limited to parents. The majority of the delegates of this conference felt that this sex infomation should be given in a very indirect way in the graded schools, and that even in the high schools information on sex matters should not be given with too blunt a frankness. All were agreed that it was useless to give instruction on sex facts unless you gave the children and youth splendid ideals about purity, temperance, truth and honesty. Facts don't save our boys and girls from going wrong. Ideas have no regenerative power. Ideals have. Almost every speaker emphasized the need of moral instruction. The establishment of a wholesome, strong character in the boys and girls was again and again declared to be the one thing needful.

THE CONCLUSION OF THE MATTER.

The report declares that the physical and moral health of our children is more important than their mental education. Delegates from Mexico, Japan and Argentina spoke this truth just as frequently and as forcibly as did the delegates of England, Germany and America. All declared that we must have not only moral but religious instruction in our public schools. This congress declares that its purposes are:

To bring together men and women interested in the health of school children;

To organize a program of papers and discussions covering the field of school hygiene;

To assemble a school exhibit representing the best that is being done in school hygiene;

To secure a commercial exhibit of practical and educational value to school people;

To publish the proceedings of this congress and distribute them to each member.

Lincoln's Gettysburg Address

How it came to be born. Story told by man who was responsible for its delivery.

THERE was in Chicago last week a man to whom the world is indirectly indebted for Lincoln's Gettysburg address.

It was just fifty years ago last Wednesday that Abraham Lincoln, the emancipator, in dedicating the Gettysburg National cemetery delivered his immortal address.

Probably no one recollects that event more vividly than Colonel Clark E. Carr of Galesburg, Ill., who sat directly behind Mr. Lincoln while the President delivered the address. Colonel Carr has a better reason than this for remembering that incident, for he was the man who insisted that Mr. Lincoln be invited to speak when other members of the arrangements committee were trying to decide on another orator. Colonel Carr inadvertently dropped this bit of historical information while talking over old times at the Hamilton Club, Chicago, where he was a guest and main speaker at the Lincoln memorial banquet given there. He had just told how he happened to be a member of the Gettysburg cemetery commission. One story which he then told of experience as a member of the commission is of intense interest:

VISITED BATTLE SCENE.

"I was a young man then, only 27 years old, and was living at Galesburg. Governor Richard Yates honored me by appointing me colonel on his personal staff. Lincoln asked the Governors of all the loyal states to appoint one person to be a member of the Gettysburg cemetery commission. The Governor appointed me.

"I was the younger member of the commission that met on the battlefield shortly after the battle to gather the dead. They had been buried wherever they fell in the battle, and were scattered over a radius of several miles.

"It was our duty to collect the bodies and rebury them in divisions according to states. I found only six fallen brave men to bury in the Illinois division."

Here the Colonel made it a point to set his hearers right on the proposition of what important part Illinois soldiers played in one of the world's decisive battles.

"It was the Illinois boys who started the battle," he gave his listeners to understand. "Troops of the Eighth Illinois Cavalry fired the first shots at General Hill's division. Then the battle was on. Colonel Gamble, Colonel of the Eighth Cavalry, told me this himself.

"Well, after we collected the dead, the commission concluded that the ground ought to be appropriately consecrated. We invited to be present on this occasion the President and Cabinet, foreign diplomats and Army and Navy officers.

"As a speaker the committee decided upon Edward Everett, who then was the greatest American orator.

"'What's the matter with having President Lincoln talk?' I suggested.

DIDN'T WANT POLITICAL SPEECH.

"Lincoln hadn't struck them as the right speaker for this occasion. They admitted he was a great political speaker—the debates with Douglas were classics, they conceded—but something different from a political speech was wanted for this occasion.

"Well, they finally yielded to my insistence and the President was invited to speak—only two weeks before the services. Mr. Everett, however, made the big address of the day.

"Lincoln's speech that day was a disappointment to the commissioners. It was so short that they wondered at its early conclusion. It was not until they read it in newspapers afterwards that they realized what a classic it was."

"The Brightest Gem in American Literature"

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that the nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we cannot dedicate—we cannot consecrate—we cannot hallow—this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note or long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they, who fought here, have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people, shall not perish from the earth.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

EUGENE BRIEUX.

This French dramatist has only been known to the English speaking public for about three years. While he is fifty-five years old, and has been writing since he was twenty, yet most of us had never heard of him before that time. His play, "La Robe Rouge," was "crowned" by the French Academy in 1900, and subsequently he was made a member of that august body. But while he is so much in the public eye just now, there are widely different views of him as a dramatist. Bernard Shaw, who wrote the preface to the first translation of his plays into English, says:

"Brieux is incomparably the greatest writer France has produced since Moliere," and would place him, "among the great dramatists of the world, by the side of Euripides, Aristophanes, Shakespeare, and Ibsen."

Adrien Bertrand, a leading French critic, says of him:

"Brieux has only written when he had an idea to propagate, a social grievance to set in the light of day, an injustice to repair, or a social problem to solve."

Against this high praise, we have the adverse judgment of such a clever critic as Mr. Ashley Dukes in his recent book, Modern Dramatists; he calls Brieux's plays "sham social dramas," and says that he is a reformer without being an artist, and that his plays are made up of "ill digested scraps of blue books, charity organization leaflets, manifestoes against race suicide, and of tracts on feminism."

A SOCIAL REFORMER.

It is easily seen from this, that Brieux is a social reformer, and belongs to that increasing class of writers that we call "social dramatists." He is the son of a carpenter, and in his father's shop he came to know the life of the working man—that life which he has reproduced in his plays with such sympathetic fidelity. His plays deal with the problems of social service, that are pressing so hard on the consciences of good men and women today.

He is a champion of womanhood, and it is this which suggests mention of him in this department. In "Blanchitte," he deals with young womanhood, and protests against a society which safeguards the education of young women, but does not concern itself with their future. In "Maternite," and "Les Trois Filles de M. Dupont," he presents the wrongs that are inflicted on women in marriage and motherhood.

But Brieux has been brought most prominently before the American public by the recent presentation of his play, "Damaged Goods" (Les Avaries) in our principal cities. It was first produced in New York last March, under the auspices of the Medical Review of Reviews, and its sociological fund, but so general and profound was the impression it made, that this fall it is making a tour of the whole country. His other plays deal with poverty, and with various forms of social evils, but in this drama he faces disease—that terrible black plague for the ravages of which mankind is responsible, and of which society is so ashamed, that the very mention of it has been tabooed in the past. A recent bulletin issued by the United States government on "National Vitality" brands syphilis, "as the most powerful of all factors in the degeneration and depopulation of the world."

The opening scene of the drama introduces a young man, on the eve of marriage, consulting a physician about the disease from which he is suffering; it is carefully explained that he is not a profligate, but is typical of the average man. The doctor tells him that his disease is syphilis, and that a four years' course of treatment would probably cure him; he is warned that to marry before he is cured would be to subject his wife, and the children that may be born to them to infection. The doctor plainly tells him, that the marriage of men in his condition is "child murder, a fresh massacre of the innocents. Children born of such marriages are subject to every kind of affliction—hump-backed, deformed, club-footed, hare-lipped, rickety, with heads too big, and bodies too small, with congenital hip disease," and others—all the results of the disease from which he is suffering.

TEACHING OF FAMOUS PLAY.

In spite of this, George Dupont marries the lovely girl to whom he is betrothed—and the rest of the play shows the fulfilment of the physician's words—the effect of the disease on the child, the mother, even the nurse, who is in danger of contracting it. The last scene introduces other victims of the plague—among them, the prostitute, the pitiable source of it all.

Many critics say this is too shocking a theme for stage presentation, but Mr. Shaw asserts that it is a fit subject for drama in memorable words. He says:

"If murder, destruction, seduction, pestilence, famine, cruelty, robbery, jobbery are fit subjects, so is this. We may and do parade prostitution before the young people who attend the theater, and who read current literature—why then, may they not hear of the diseases that follow it, and avenge the prostitute to the third and fourth generation of them that buy her?"

EARLY AMBITION TO BE MISSIONARY.

It is said that in his youth, Brieux desired to go as a missionary to the foreign field, but later decided to follow literature as his profession. Who shall say that the work he is doing does not fall within the domain of religious teaching and living! When the now extinct French censorship condemned "Damaged Goods," we are told that a Swiss clergyman invited Brieux to read the play from his pulpit. A parallel case to this was an exhibit and lecture series at the Young Men's Christian Association in Louisville last week, by the Kentucky Society of Social Hygiene; in opening it, Dr. John D. Trawick, secretary of the society, stated that the bringing of this exhibit to the city was planned to follow the production of "Damaged Goods."

Brieux's idea of the function of the theater carries us back to the time when the drama was the adjunct to the church, and expressed itself in the Mysteries and Moralities of the Middle Ages. He says:

"The theater must devote itself to the great current problems. Let us put into our dramas some one thought from the life around us—from the sufferings of our fellowbeings."

It is easily granted that Brieux's message does not embrace the whole of life—that it shows the shadow, without revealing its beauty and splendor—that he paints a Dante's Inferno, without giving a Paradiso—that he opens a Bunyan's Pit before us, and gives no vision of the Celestial City—yet, let us be thankful for the superb courage of the man who dared write these dramas, and for the great and tender heart that prompted him to plead the cause of the poor and needy of our difficult and complex times!

"THIS THAT THESE WOMEN HAVE DONE."

A very interesting story is told of the very early days of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions when the cottage built for them on the Bethany Park assembly grounds was finished and ready for dedication. Two of the brethren entering the assembly room saw the letters C. W. B. M. in a very prominent place, and one remarked to the other, "I suppose that means, Can Women Be Men." "Oh, no," replied the other, "it means, Can Women Beat Men." That was many years ago, and the history of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions with its quiet, steady growth in numbers, knowledge, influence and gifts shows that its ambition has been truly worthy; to love and serve and give as the women of old, in gratitude to the great Teacher, who first taught the world by word and example that womanhood was worthy of love and respect. And in all of these years there has been most hearty support and encouragement from the ministry for the work. This we wish to acknowledge with gratitude, for it has been a strong factor in its growth. In more and more of the pulpits of our land as the annual C. W. B. M. Day returns with the beautiful Christmas month, our ministers tell the story of the work of the women and their earnest helpers, the children of the Mission Bands, Junior and Intermediate Christian Endeavor societies, Little Light Bearers and Triangle clubs. Yes, and we must not fail to mention that beautiful work of our girls who will so soon be women, the Young Ladies' Circles. It is a comprehensive teaching and training in missions, and while not by any means perfect in method and detail, it is a "reaching after," and many of our men and women, active in missionary work either on the foreign field or at home can trace back their interest in missions and first visions of service to Mission Band or Junior Endeavor days. Every year sees a growth in our numbers and gifts, and we are earnestly hoping and praying that in many churches of our land where the story has never been told before, this message of our woman's work may be told this year, either by our ministers or our women themselves. We believe that through study, prayer, consecration and personal service, we shall be able to win our women and children and the gifts so necessary to provide for the carrying forward of this work we love for the sake of Christ, our Redeemer.

FIRST THE CROSS.

Life is a burden—bear it;
Life is a duty—dare it;
Life is a thorn-crown—wear it.
Though it breaks your heart in twain,
Close your lips and hide your pain;
First the cross and then the crown.

THANKSGIVING.

THE history of the United States has proved the wisdom of those Puritan forefathers of ours who early in the first period of Colonial life set apart a day of thanksgiving and prayer to Almighty God. It was a custom which implied the response of the entire community to the call of the divine Life for recognition and gratitude. Never since that day has the chief executive of the nation departed from the venerable custom of calling the people of all the states and territories to unite in recognition of the divine mercy at the close of the year. And the years have brought their added meaning to the custom. That first Thanksgiving was proclaimed in days of famine, sickness and danger from savage beasts and still more savage men. These dangers have all passed away. Though they may fall upon some of the frontiers or outposts of our life, they can never affect the great body of our citizenship. But new dangers, far more numerous, more subtle and more portentous have come. Some of them have been conquered, and some still confront us. But through them all have we kept our covenant of thanksgiving with God. If our fathers in the dark days of privation and suffering had cause to lift up their hearts in thankfulness to God for his mercies, how much more have we? If Washington in the midst of the struggle with Britain, depressed in spirit and surrounded with his famished and stricken forces at Valley Forge, had reason to send out a call to thanksgiving for the blessings they still enjoyed, how much more have we? If Lincoln in the gloomy days of the War for the Union, when friends were disheartened and foes seemed triumphant, had cause to summon his people to the recognition of Almighty God and his unnumbered mercies, how much more have we? In the memory and the spirit of these and other great souls who have made our history illustrious, not alone by deeds of heroism, but as well by acts of faith, let us keep this latest Thanksgiving Day.

LOVE AND ITS GIFT.

GOD so loved that He gave. He is capable of loving. He is capable of giving. These are two of the most wonderful of all truths, and God having given Himself for us, has rights in us.

This was not the beginning of God's claim upon us. We must never suppose for a moment that we have ever belonged to anyone else, or that God began to love us after Christ had died for us. The sacrifice of Christ was only a symbol of God's love, a visible, mighty, compelling expression in time and in terms of human pain and self-denial of an infinite love and the assertion of a permanent claim. It shows us again what we knew before, that we are not and never were our own.

It is rather a startling thing to discover that we are not our own, but it is also a very beautiful thing. The finest qualities in human life grow out of this discovery. This is the beautiful fact in the experience of young lovers. The glad, willing, self-surrender, not in terms of reluctance but of joyful affection for each other's sake—this is one of the sweetest, holiest experiences in life. This is the holy joy which consecrates the pain and toil of motherhood and glorifies its fretting cares and makes all true mothers sisters of the Blessed Mary, and every cradle song a sweet Magnificat. This is what puts the quality of heroism into all true fatherhood. Men grow strong and truly manly in the hard work performed, not for the sake of adding dollar to dollar, nor acre to acre, but of providing for home and loved ones. Everything sweet and beautiful in life is in some sort a recognition of the fact that we are not our own.

A very large part of the world has discovered this truth. It is quick to detect selfishness and to hate it. It is quick to discover generosity and to applaud it. The world has not defined its faith very closely, but it knows just as well as the Bible knows that we are not our own.

The beautiful thing about the Christian life is not merely that it makes this discovery, but that it adjusts our whole life to it. It makes it the fundamental fact in life to gladly recognize the God who loved us and the Saviour who died for us. It responds to this in a love which is not merely the love of God but a love of all mankind. It says to the servant that he is God's free man, and it says to the master that he is his brother's servant. It exalts the man of low degree to a position of high dignity and it teaches the man of large responsibility to be humble in the sight of God and faithful in the use of opportunity.

It grows upon the mind of the world that the Christian philosophy of life is the true philosophy. It is not mere rhetoric or metaphor. It is the fine, true, logical interpretation of the world and the rational way of adjusting ourselves to it. It is the sweetly reasonable cure for selfishness. It is the nobly beautiful illustration of the end for which we were created, and it exalts life into a fine companionship with the God who made us and the Lord whose sacrifice redeemed us, and with all the great and gracious souls whose living has blessed the world.

THE DESIRE FOR RELIGION IN THE CHURCHES.

IT WOULD perhaps surprise many preachers and church leaders if they knew how many people are abandoning the practice of church attendance and all participation in church work because they are in need of religion. It is our first and most easy-going assumption that because the church exists in the name and for the work of Christ in the community it must be religious, and that abandonment of its services and a slackening of interest in its work is a sign of declining religious concern. Such is not necessarily the case. There are many churches in which there are excellent preaching, satisfactory music, Sunday-school organization of a high order, and church activity of many kinds, and yet in all of these features there is an astonishing absence of anything that can be properly called religion. Is it strange that in such circumstances people leave the church in quest of some response to their deeper religious needs? Is it strange that a multitude of new religious experiments are being tried under many names in all our cities today? And the cases are not a few of men and women who are trying one experiment after another in the pathetic search, not for a new doctrine or ritual or organization, but for a message with the breath of life in it, and a group of worshippers who are actually finding God and are realizing some of the spiritual values of our Christian faith. It is useless to rail at the desertions from church membership unless the church has a vital message and the air of reality in its practice of the Christian life. It would be well if some of our churches that complain of the loss of members to Christian Science, New Thought and other experiments in the search for spiritual values, would try the effect of such an enrichment of the testimony and the life of the church itself as to make unnecessary these researches in the realm of the spirit.

MISSIONARY COMMISSIONS.

MENTION has been made of the three commissioners sent out by the American Board representing the foreign missionary work of the Congregational Board. These commissioners are to visit India in this its centennial year of missionary activities. They will make a study of the fields and forces under the direction of the American Board. They will confer with the missionaries in every station where that society has representatives. They will be able thus to understand the problems which only the missionaries know, and equipped with this knowledge they will return, bringing to the Board itself and to the churches a first-hand and authoritative, at the same time a sympathetic, statement of the changes that should be made and the enlargements that should be planned. Such a commission does not supercede the Board itself, but it is able to render very great assistance by its knowledge of the field and the men and women who make up the body of missionary workers. Such a visitation cannot fail to be of incalculable good to the missionaries themselves and to the churches at home. The American Board is glad to pay all the expenses of such a commission, realizing that the money is well expended and that the inspiration brought back and communicated to the churches will more than compensate for the funds employed. This is a lesson which the Disciples have not as yet learned. Perhaps our first commissions will have to go out as voluntary bodies meeting their own expenses. But it is not too much to hope that some such commissions may soon be sent with the official sanction of the Foreign Christian Missionary Society. We predict that when the plan is once tried in some of our important mission fields it will be adopted as a regular and essential factor in the promotion of the best missionary interest and administration.

THE DECLINE OF WAR.

THE temper of the American people is well illustrated in the present attitude toward our neighbor, Mexico. In an earlier and cruder period of our national life the irritations to which we have been compelled to submit at the hands of Huerta would have been resented with a clamorous demand for armed intervention. That was the temper of the American people in the days preceding the beginnings of the Spanish war. It is still possible that an event such as the destruction of the "Maine" might so far inflame popular resentment as to force the hands of the president into overt hostilities. But it is improbable. The nation has learned much concerning the cost of war, in life, in money and in self-respect. The money cost we still have to support, in the equipment of an army and navy for which there is an ever decreasing use, and yet an increasing demand for enlargement. But fortunately the people are gradually learning that the demand for greater armaments on land and sea proceeds chiefly from a very small circle, either of thoughtless or of deeply self-interested people.

There is of course the jingo press and the pingo public, clamorous for war or any trifling pretext; and there is the selfish and interested demand for war and war equipment on the part of the big concerns, like the Krupps, Armstrongs and Maxims, whose business it is to supply arms and armament. With them stand hand in glove the money lending class, without whose aid no country can ever go to war. There is also the natural military and naval sentiment of the officers and the rank-and-file of the military class, whose promotion depends upon action and whose life is monotonous save in days of conflict. But the public is learning rapidly its lesson of peace and of economy, and the temper in which it is taking even the provocation on our southern border proves an increasing poise of judgment and sanity in the treatment of matters that were once likely to bring on serious entanglements. The days of war are numbered.

"LADIES FIRST" IN FIGHT FOR LIVING WAGE.

THE MINIMUM wage for women, one of the most recent of social economic reforms to come to the front, is making rapid strides toward general realization. Already eight states have responded to the demand growing out of the country-wide agitation recently precipitated by the baring of Chicago conditions through the efforts of Illinois' young lieutenant-governor, Barrett O'Hara. These states did not, however, await the example of Illinois, which, as regards definite action, is now lagging behind. The greatest progress has been made in Oregon, where the Industrial Welfare Commission has issued three important orders which definitely fix the legal minimum wage to be paid to women and girls employed in the city of Portland. Two of these orders have already gone into effect. The first established a minimum of $1 a day for girls between sixteen and eighteen years of age. The second fixed the sum of $8.64 a week as the lowest lawful wage for women employed in factories. The commission declares this amount the least upon which they can meet the cost of living. The third order went into effect Nov. 23. It places at $9.25 the minimum weekly wage for women employed in mercantile establishments. Thus a good beginning has been made in Oregon, and results in Portland will be studied with intense interest by leaders in this movement throughout the country. The other states which have minimum wage boards are: California, Colorado, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, Washington and Wisconsin. How about your state? Women and children have in the past fallen an easy prey to that heartless commercialism which, in its exploitation of human labor, has naturally followed the lines of least resistance. The working man, with wages growing less in purchasing power, has gradually found that his daughters' labor, after all, has not increased the family income. Their services have been "thrown in."

THE NEWER PHASES OF WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

IT was perhaps the early expectation of the friends of woman suffrage that its forces would move with unity and harmony to the accomplishment of the tasks that seemed so obvious and easy, with woman's help. One of those objects is the banishment of the saloon, and the signals are already abroad that promise a victory in the overthrow of the liquor traffic. There are many other reforms that await woman's initiative or assistance. But it is already evident that the suffragist ranks are not united any more than the forces of male voters. We are not sure that there is any urgent need that they should be, provided there are common purposes toward which all right-minded women can direct their energies. In the State of Illinois a partial attainment of woman suffrage was won by many years of persistent effort on the part of trusted and able leaders, like Mrs. Ella S. Stewart and Mrs. Catherine Waugh McCullough During the past year a change of leadership has come about, and Mrs. G. W. Trout and her co-workers gained a partial suffrage bill in the Legislature at Springfield, which brought great joy to all the friends of the movement. Unfortunately, however, diversities of sentiment have appeared in the ranks of the suffragists. Questions have arisen as to the steps taken, and it seems not unlikely that Illinois may find itself in possession of two different bodies of suffragists, conservative and radical respectively. It may be that the women of Illinois who believe in suffrage will not be able as a body to follow the present leadership, and may demand another organization. If such should be the case, it might mean no loss of interest in the cause but only natural differences in judgment and method. The only serious menace to the cause of suffrage is the frantic effort which is now being made by the whiskey forces to secure a verdict of unconstitutionality against the suffrage law.

THE FOOTBALL SEASON.

WITH these days of late November the football period of 1913 comes to its close. This fact will bring relief to those parents whose boys are members of teams, and who feel nervous over the danger from accidents in this game. That there is danger no one doubts, and though that danger appears to be reduced to narrow limits in the games which are carefully officered and for which due preparation has been made, it is of course true that these games constitute only a small fraction of the total number participated in by the youth of America. It is usually the "prairie lot" game in which the damage is done. But with all of its dangers, football has proved a most valuable factor in educational athletics. It has put thousands of boys and young men into a training that prohibited smoking and other forms of dissipation, and demands proper care of the body, a sportsman-like temper, and the development of qualities of courage, judgment and loyalty such as no other game inspires. Its contribution to the morale of student life has been notable. It is the great school and college game, even as baseball is the popular American sport. We hope that it may long continue to hold this place.

A CREED.

I care not what his temples or his creeds,
One thing holds firm and fast—
That into his fateful heap of days and deeds
The soul of man is cast.

—Edwin Markham.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

MY reflections last week on the men who have recently left the Disciples' ministry for pulpits of other religious bodies dealt with two of the three reasons which usually underlie their departure and explain it. These reasons were, first, practical difficulties in securing a pulpit with a living salary, and, secondly, lack of support for the special kind of work for which they had prepared and consecrated themselves. Concerning reason number two I made only a general statement, and I cannot take space now to go into specifications.

These are days in which students for the ministry are guided by their teachers into special fields. Social service and religious education are two departments in which some of these men seem to have found difficulty in securing the support of Disciples' churches. If a man has prepared himself, for instance, to organize and carry forward the quiet and substantial enterprise of true religious education and finds that his congregation has a contrary conception of its work and will not respond to his endeavors to render this kind of service, but measures his success by other standards, it is inevitable that discouragement and the dissolution of that pastorate will ensue.

If such a minister, looking abroad among the churches, sees, or thinks he sees, that congregations in other communities are more hospitable to such a type of ministry than Disciples' congregations he will be strongly tempted to cross the border into that communion in order to render there the service for which he has prepared himself and which he feels he is denied opportunity to render in his own communion.

I MAKE no apology for his decision to go. But I do not feel that I have a right to condemn him harshly. I am trying now, Mr. Editor, to understand him, and to have your readers understand him. If he remains with the Disciples he feels that he will have to adopt a type of ministry unlike that to which he has by choice and discipline consecrated himself. If he leaves the Disciples he will have to compromise in a degree the particular ideals to which as a Disciple he has consecrated himself.

Now my observations have convinced me that those who have left us on account of either reason number one or reason number two, or both, have been able to salve their conscience on account of reason number three, which I suggested last week was a sense of disillusionment as to the sincerity of the Disciples' talk about Christian unity. This is the root reason of their going.

There has come to prevail, much more widely than many of us let ourselves admit, the feeling that the Disciples of Christ do not mean what they say when they talk of practicing Christian unity, that we are an ecclesiastical denomination—as much so as the Congregationalists or Presbyterians, and that, after all, there is just as much sentiment for union and just as good a chance to promote union by belonging to another denomination as by remaining with the Disciples.

These men see the tendencies within our movement to integrate our churches into a well-defined ecclesiastical body, and to segregate us quite as completely from other churches of Christ as any avowed denomination segregates itself.

They feel the inconsistency of pleading for Christian unity and refusing to practice it in our local churches.

And they observe that other communions lead in many practical endeavors toward unity while Disciples follow, and follow too often reluctantly and suspiciously.

The way is opened easily, therefore, for them to pass into other communions with but slight, if any, prickings of conscience as to the ideals we may feel they have abandoned.

I WANT to make a confession, Mr. Editor. Perhaps the freedom you have extended to me to write out my inmost thoughts on this page will not extend so far as to admit this confession. If I am going too far you may "blue-pencil" this paragraph without offense to me. But for myself I confess that if I believed the Disciples were just another denomination, albeit with a more correct form of local church organization, and a more Scriptural practice on such points as baptism and the Lord's Supper and the creed, it would not take me five minutes to accept a pulpit in the Presbyterian or Congregational or Episcopalian denomination if I found it difficult either to support my family or render the kind of service I desire to render among the Disciples.

Granted that our Disciples' "denomination" excels others in such "points" as we are accustomed to emphasize, I could easily enough find other points, and many of them, in which other denominations excel us. So many of them could I find, indeed, that my conscience would easily enough be satisfied that I was making no moral compromise in passing across the border into another denominational fellowship.

I am convinced that every man who has left us for a pulpit in another fellowship has felt that he was simply passing from one denomination into another. It has not been a matter of changed personal convictions. Practical considerations—unselfish in nearly every case—have determined him to make the change. He has not changed his own ideals as to Christian unity, but has lost faith in the sincerity and purposefulness of the Disciples as embodying those ideals.

THIS sentiment has been expressed to me again and again by leaders of our people: Let us be done with this talk that we are not a denomination—let us accept our place as a denomination and proceed to be as respectable a one as we can!

A denominational conception of our body, Mr. Editor, is the root cause of the losses we are sustaining and of the open-mindedness with which many other ministers, especially our younger men, are able to entertain the suggestion that they could do better work and serve their ideals better elsewhere. As between two denominations they have been taught to believe there is no great difference. They can leave us, therefore, without serious strain of conscience.

Can the idealism of our movement be recovered? Can a truly non-sectarian status be achieved by the Disciples of Christ? Can we really practice Christian unity—ourselves—now—without waiting for World Conferences or Joint Commissions or Federal Councils to show us how?

Unless we can, I for one have no word of criticism to say against those who leave our pulpits.

But I believe we can! And it is this faith that we can that holds me loyal to the movement in which I have invested my life.

HUGH MACDONALD.

Giving Thanks

A little strength was lost each day,
A little hope dropped by the way,
The feet dragged slowly up the road,
The shoulders bent beneath their load,
Courage seemed dying in the heart,
The will played but a feeble part.
  Night brought no ease,
  Day no surcease,
From heavy cares or weary smart;
  Then why give thanks?

Somehow strength lasted through the day,
Hope joined with courage in the way;
The feet still kept the uphill road.
The shoulders did not drop their load,
An unseen Power sustained the heart
When flesh and will failed in their part,
  While God gave light
  By day and night,
And also grace to bear the smart.
  For this give thanks.

Thanks for the daily bread which feeds
The body's wants, the spirit's needs;
Thanks for the keen, the quick'ning word
"He only lives who lives in God,"
Whether his time on earth is spent
In lordly house or labor's tent.
  Thanks for the light
  By day and night
Which shows the way the Master went;
  And he gave thanks.

CANADIAN CHURCH UNION.

The Canadian Baptist thinks that if the proposed union between the Congregationalists, Methodists and Presbyterians in Canada is to be delayed a few years, the deferred consummation will be chargeable to the Presbyterians. It mentions the Christian Guardian as authority for the statement that the Methodists and Congregationalists have accepted the basis of union, and have nothing further to do. Then it quotes the Presbyterian to prove that there is still much for the Presbyterians to do before union will be attained. The following is the quotation from the Presbyterian:

The first steps have already been taken to carry out the instructions of the recent General Assembly with reference to the union movement. Notice has been sent to Presbyteries reminding them that they are invited to submit further amendments to the present Basis of Union or alternative proposals. These may either originate with the Presbytery or be sent through the Presbytery from sessions, congregations and individuals. All such amendments and proposals are to be in the hands of the clerks of Assembly by Nov. 24. Following that date, a meeting of the Presbyterian Union Committee will be called to consider the amendments and proposals that may be submitted. The committee will no doubt use their judgment as to which of the proposed amendments are practicable or desirable, and, having reached a conclusion on that point, will seek a conference with the committees of the other negotiating churches, to decide what changes, if any, should be made in the Basis of Union. It is provided that the findings of the Joint Committee shall be sent to presbyteries, sessions and congregations, in order to secure their final judgment. It is not likely that the final judgment of the people will be sought until after the meeting of the next General Assembly. If any changes are made in the Basis, it will be necessary that it should be re-submitted to Presbyteries under the Barrier Act, and it may probably be re-submitted to sessions and congregations at the same time.

The Canadian Baptist closes its editorial with the following, which is at least interesting: The Anglicans, Disciples, and Baptists remain largely in the state of mind that has generally characterized them—more than willing to have union, provided it is on a basis coterminous with their standards of doctrine and polity. Some would call this bigotry; we would name it the grace of conviction.

UNITED PRESBYTERIANS SEEK UNITY.

The leading editorial in the last issue of the United Presbyterian is devoted to the question of Christian unity. It has the right ring, even if it does wind up by saying, in effect, "However, let's go a little slow!" A part of the editorial follows:

A church with "United" in its name cannot be opposed to the principle of Church union without being false to its name. Such was the substance of a statement made by Dr. J. D. Moffat, president of Washington and Jefferson College, before the United Presbyterian Ministerial Association of Pittsburgh some years ago. The United Presbyterian Church had its birth in Church union, and if the spirit of the fathers is still in the church we must pray and work for that unity which our Master declares is His ideal for the Church.

All the signs of the times indicate that the Lord's prayer, offered when He ate the last Passover with His apostles, "That they may be one, even as we are," is about to be answered by a new unity in the Church's life. The genius of the Church, since the days of the Reformation, has been division. A multitude of denominations have arisen because of difference in creed and administration, but the current seems to have turned, and it looks as if the new genius of the Church would be reunion. Fifty-five years ago men whose names we honor felt the beginning of that current and as the result of their efforts the United Presbyterian Church came into being. The very name they chose reveals their hope and their faith that a far broader denomination would come, comprehending more than the two elements which they had combined, that united Presbyterianism was possible and desirable. We believe the same hope and faith marks the present ministry and membership of our church.

Differences of belief do not make necessary a division into separate denominations. In the Apostolic Church there were antagonistic views, as to the necessity of submitting to Mosaic rites, as to the Christian's attitude toward meats offered to idols, as to the day of the week observed as rest day. Smaller differences than that now divide denominations. But the apostles gave no sanction to separation into different sects. In our own denomination, not many years ago, there were some who opposed and some who approved of instrumental music. In dealing with that situation our Church has shown a conviction that men of different views may work together in the same denomination.

Here is the final word of caution, above mentioned:

We would like to unite with our Southern brethren. We hope that the day is not far distant when such a union can take place. Probably it will be best to spend more time in talking the matter over with ourselves and with each other in order that we may come to the best possible understanding. Our desire that we move with deliberation is not due to indifference, but because we realize that a false move will delay rather than hasten the consummation of our hope for intimate Christian fellowship and unity in the Kingdom of Christ.

CATHOLIC PRIEST PLEADS FOR UNITY.

Rev. William T. Manning, D. D., Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Joint Commission on the World's Conference on Faith and Order, brings to the notice of the papers a letter received from a Catholic priest of Texas, in which is voiced a deep desire for unity. The letter is written to Robt. H. Gardiner, of "The World Conference."

Denton, Texas, October 28, 1913.

Mr. Robert H. Gardiner—

Dear Friend:

The copy "The World Conference" read with much edification; it would be good to send it to every minister and priest in the entire country.

This movement towards Unity has already done great good; recriminations, uncharitable language and actions between different bodies of Christians have ceased. If they agree not in faith, at least they are tolerant with one another. One great cause of scandal in the past which has made 50,000,000 Americans churchless was the uncharitable warfare between sects. God be blessed! This is now passed. The nation is becoming conscious of the need of Unity. Only by a United Christendom can the world see that it is from God.

God hears the prayers said for reuniting the Church, but He is trying us as He did the Jews; then, when our prayer is heard, we will appreciate His gift of Unity more. Our sad experiences now will be a lesson for the future. They will never rend the seamless garment of Jesus Christ again. Christianity once reunited will remain so. Let the chairman's call for prayer be heeded; let the entire world form one chorus of prayer for Unity; then soon will it be realized. There has been too much argument and not enough prayer.

Yours for speedy reunion—

Raymond Verimont, Priest, Box 75, Denton, Texas.

SOUTHERN METHODISTS WANT NAME CHANGED.

We learn from an exchange that the Methodist Episcopal South is going through a Change of Name campaign as well as the Episcopalians. The "progressives" are asking that the obvious sectional import of the name be removed, and that the name hereafter stand Methodist Episcopal Church in America. The "conservatives" are opposed to such a "radical" measure. The proposition has been referred to the various conferences, and has now been negatived by a vote of 567 ayes to 887 nays. The Methodist Episcopal South therefore retains its name—for a time longer.

Among the propositions that are being agitated preparatory to discussion at the oncoming General Conference, is one to strike the words Holy Catholic Church from the Creed, and substitute Church of God, or other language.

The Book World

BY ARTHUR GORDON.

DAMAGED GOODS, by Eugene Brieux. Probably no dramatic work of recent years has awakened so much interest as the play "Les Averies" by M. Brieux which has been rendered into English under the title "Damaged Goods." The scheme of the work was so audacious that it was not regarded as proper material for the stage, but was read in quiet by those whose hearts have been stirred by the awful ravages of the social evil, and were concerned to limit if possible the dangers to youth and innocence from a contagion that flourishes in the atmosphere of ignorance. But there was one bold pioneer who believed that the play had a message for the American public so startling and so needed that it was worth while to pay the price of an attempt to put the work on the stage. The story of Mr. Richard Bennett's long and unavailing endeavor and his final marvelous triumph is matter of public record. The greatest names in the list of moral reformers and teachers of righteousness are appended to the verdict of hearty and admiring approval. The present book is the story of the play translated and adapted as a novel from the text of "Les Avaries." The work has been done by Upton Sinclair. The Doctor is of course the chief character in the story, the wise, faithful physician, who tries to prevent the marriage of his young and tainted client, and who points out to him in the most impressive manner the terrible responsibility he is taking upon himself. The burden of the book upon almost every page is, "If I had only known!" And its thesis is the criminality of ignorance on the part of teachers, parents and youth regarding the terrible facts of life and death which grow out of sexual sin. (Winston, $1, net).

OUT OF THE DARK, By Helen Keller. The story of Helen Keller's life was written by herself some years ago, and to that she has added other books, such as, "The World I Live In" and "The Song of the Stone Wall." But naturally a girl so striking in personality, so gifted, and so remarkable in her achievement of access to a world that seemed to be entirely shut away from her by her singular misfortune, has been solicited to write on many themes. The subjects on which she is most concerned to speak are the efforts now making in behalf of the blind, and the character and progress of Socialism. The present volume is a collection of these more or less fugitive papers. It reveals the broad public spirit of this interesting young woman, and the fact that she has very positive convictions on the subject of woman's work and the possibilities of the social order. There are some twenty-five articles gathered in the book. (Doubleday, aPge & Co., $1 net).

WAR AND WASTE, by David Starr Jordan. Gambetta once described the impoverished yet militant attitude of the European states as "bankruptcy armed to the teeth," which was sure, soon or late, to find its result in "a beggar sitting by a barrack door." A hundred years ago there was published in France a cartoon on the financial situation. A farmer plowed his furrow carrying on his back a dainty noble of the old regime. Today the appropriate cartoon would be an artisan going to his work carrying on his back a soldier armed to the teeth, and on his back in turn a money lender. The annual interest on the war debt of Europe exceeds a thousand millions of dollars. The debt itself can never be paid. Under the interest alone the deluded nations stagger. In America we have a military force which is modest beside that of many other nations, and the war party keeps us an incessant clamor for enlargement of the resources of the war and navy departments. Yet we spend more than two-thirds of our national income on military affairs. The cost of smokeless powder for two days in the government service is greater than the total annual amount available for the suppression of the white slave traffic, the most horrible of evils. And far more expensive is war in manhood and national virility than in money. War always takes the young, the ardent, the courageous, the ambitious, leaving men of lesser sort to breed the future generation. In this fact lies the explanation of many phenomena to be seen in France, Germany, England and the United States today. War always takes the best and leaves the cheaper as survivors. Four millions of men fell in Napoleon's wars. No wonder the life of Europe is impoverished, and France in particular finds her peasant class in the "Man With the Hoe." In this manner the two greatest expenditures a nation can know, that of financial outlay and that of wasted manhood, are poured out with prodigal extravagance at the demand of the war lobby of capitalists and money lenders, who form the "Invisible Empire," which promotes the war spirit and the exhausting investments which support it. The high cost of living can never be brought down till this madness is cured. Dr. Jordan is perhaps the best authority on the cost and waste of war. His pictures of Italian battlefields, where the skulls of French soldiers form mounds of testimony to the shame and ruin of war, are lurid and convincing. His financial arguments are unanswerable. Were it not for the gold lace and tinsel of military life, the world would defy the war lobby and return to sanity and solvency. (Doubleday, Page & Co., $1.25, net.)

ELIZABETH, BETSY AND BESS, by Amy E. Blanchard. Miss Blanchard is a favorite writer of stories for girls. The three chums who appear in this book are lively and interesting enough to hold attention throughout. Of course there are boys, and adventures, misunderstandings and reconciliations, accidents and recoveries, that make an engaging narrative. (W. A. Wilde & Co., $1, net).

THE APOSTLES' CREED AND THE NEW TESTAMENT, by Johannes Kunze, Ph.D. The author of this work is Professor of Practical Theology, in the University of Greifswald, Germany. In recent years efforts have been made to reduce the Apostles' Creed to a lower place in the regard of the German churches, or to omit it entirely from the public services. Against this tendency the author contends by an effort to prove not only that this baptismal symbol is sanctioned by the New Testament, but that it is actually older than any portion of the Gospels, and probably served as the literary basis for New Testament expressions. This he would affirm even in regard to the widely discredited Trinitarian formula, though he is willing to concede that the "descent into hell" clause is as late as the fourth century. The translation is by Geo. W. Gilmore. (Funk & Wagnalls).

THE FIRST CHURCH'S CHRISTMAS BARREL, by Caroline Abbott Stanley. The ladies of the First Church hurriedly and carelessly packed a barrel of old clothes and sent it to a missionary preacher on the frontier. He took his last money to pay the freight, even using some that had been hoarded for the children's Christmas candy. When the barrel was opened and the cast-off, worthless rubbish unpacked, the missionary's wife at first broke down and then, with fine spirit, decided that the thing should be packed up and sent back, with appropriate verses of Scripture attached to each article. What happened when the ladies of the First Church received the plucky woman's letter, opened the barrel, saw the worthless things they had really sent, and read the illuminating texts pinned on to them, makes very interesting reading. (Crowell, 50 cents, net.)

THE ADVENTURES OF REDDY FOX, by Thornton W. Burgess. One of the Bed Time Story Books, for boys and girls of six to eleven. It tells all about the education of Reddy Fox by his grandmother, and his adventures with Bowser, the dog, Peter Rabbit, Billy Possum, the big buzzard, and Farmer Brown's boy. Sure to interest the children. (Little, Brown & Co., 50 cents, net.)

LITERARY NOTES.

"Aren't you ever going to let me write for St. Nicholas?" said Rudyard Kipling one day to the editor of the magazine that he had read and loved as a child. The great English story-writer had already produced the tales and songs that brought him his first fame, but he was eager to write for children, with whom, as the world knows, he has the deepest and most subtle sympathy. The conversation between Mr. Kipling and the editor of St. Nicholas resulted in "The Jungle Books," which first saw the light of print in that magazine. As a well-known writer says, "There are plenty of people who think that the work Mr. Kipling did for St. Nicholas will outlast most of his other stories."

One of the most important books of the autumn is the "Letters of Charles Eliot Norton," published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. The writer of these letters was the last survivor of that unique group of New England men of letters whose names made Concord and Boston the synonyms of culture. The letters present in a charming and intimate manner the acquaintance of Mr. Norton with the most notable men in the world of literature both in Europe and America. The pictures of Carlyle, Tennyson and Coleridge are genuine contributions to their biographies.

Of Human Interest

NEXT SUNDAY.

From Newark Evening News.

Mr. Speeds will clean his auto,
  Mr. Spurrs will groom his horse,
Mr. Gadds will go to Coney
  With the little Gadds, of course.
Mr. Flite will put carbolic
  On his homing pigeons' perch,
Mr. Weeds will mow his bluegrass,
  Mr. Jones will go to church.

Mr. Hett will test his furnace,
  Mr. Feete will mend a chair,
Mrs. Feete will soak her bunion,
  Mrs. Hett will wash her hair,
Miss De Spill, with iron and cleaner,
  Will remove a coffee smirch.
Miss McBird will practice trilling,
  Mrs. Brown will go to church.

Mr. Cleek will drive a golf ball,
  Mr. Tiller steer his boat,
Mr. Popper on his cycle
  Round and round the State will mote.
Mr. Swatt will watch a ball game,
  Mr. Stake and son will search
Through the bosky wood for mushrooms,
  Mr. Wilks will go to church.

Do you ask me what's the matter?
  Do you wonder what is wrong
When the nation turns from worship,
  Sermon, prayer, and sacred song?
Why do people rush for pleasure,
  Leave religion in the lurch?
Why prefer a padded auto
  To a cushioned pew in church?

Reader, well I know the answer,
  But if I should speak aloud
What I think's the real reason,
  It would queer me with the crowd.
You'll be popular, dear reader,
  When you wield the critic's birch,
You'll be safely in the fashion
  If you blame things on the Church.

Edison and His Mother.

"I was always a careless boy," says Thomas A. Edison, in his biography; "and with a mother of different mental caliber, I should probably have turned out badly. But her firmness, her sweetness, her goodness were potent powers to keep me in the right path. I remember I used never to be able to get along at school. I don't know why it was, but I was always at the foot of the class. I used to feel that the teachers never used to sympathize with me, and that my father thought I was stupid, and at last I almost decided that I must really be a dunce. My mother was always kind, always sympathetic, and she never misunderstood or misjudged me. But I was afraid to tell her all my difficulties at school for fear that she, too, might lose her confidence in me.

"One day I overheard the teacher tell the inspector that I was 'addled,' and it would not be worth while keeping me in school any longer. I was so hurt by his last straw that I burst out crying, and went and told my mother about it. Then I found out what a good thing a good mother was. She came out as my strong defender.

"Mother love was aroused; mother pride was wounded to the quick. She brought me back to the school and angrily told the teacher that he didn't know what he was talking about. In fact, she was the most enthusiastic champion a boy ever had, and I determined right then that I would be worthy of her and show her that her confidence was not misplaced.

"My mother was the making of me. She was so true; and I felt that I had some one to live for, some one I must not disappoint. The memory of her will always be a blessing to me."

C. R. Henderson, Prison Expert.

A tall, dignified man, a little past middle age, with a benignant, scholarly face, and a lady, evidently his wife, were passengers on one of the Great Lakes Steamers, when the following conversation was overheard by the gentleman's wife:

"Would you ever take that man," said one of the passengers, pointing to the gentleman in question, "to be a villain?"

"Mercy, no; he looks more like a church elder than a villain," was the reply.

"Well, he has been in more prisons the world over than any man living today."

"You don't mean it," came back in shocked tones. "Pray, who in the world is he?"

"Dr. Henderson, of Chicago University."

It is quite true that Dr. Henderson has for years spent much of his time as a voluntary visitor in the prisons of America, England, Germany and the Orient. He believes that in our present state of society, prisons must exist; but granting that, he wants to see their inmates just as few in number as possible, and more emphasis laid upon reform than on punishing, says the Young People's Weekly.

Dr. Henderson has been identified with Chicago University ever since the time of his graduation from the old University in 1870. Three years later, he was graduated from what is now the Divinity School of the new University. After holding successful pastorates of Baptist churches in Terre Haute and Detroit, he became one of the members of the faculty of Chicago University in 1892. At first, he was assistant professor of sociology, later full professor and in 1904 became the head of a new department of Practical Sociology in the Divinity School. For the whole twenty years of the new university, he has been chaplain of the institution, and in that capacity has been able to exercise a strong spiritual influence over his parish of six thousand students.

In his own department of Sociology, Dr. Henderson is one of the foremost experts and leaders in the United States. In 1909 he was appointed by President Taft as the Commissioner for the United States on the International Prison Commission, and when the Eighth International Prison Congress met in Washington in 1910, he was honored by being elected its president. He has been chairman of the American section of three International Associations: the International Union of Criminology, the International Working Men's Insurance Association and the International Conference on Unemployment.

Keeping the Public Away.

Jack London looks back with something of the pride that apes humility to his youthful experiences as a tramp. Nevertheless, those experiences have not taught him hospitality to the masses.

On the front door of his home in California this legend greets the wayfarer, "No Admission Except on Business. No Business Transacted Here."

The back door is equally forbidding. "Please," so runs the sign, "Do Not Enter without Knocking. Please Do Not Knock."

Mark Twain had a device that was equally inhospitable; but he would laughingly explain it away to his friends. Here are the directions he gave to Cass Gilbert, an architect living in a Connecticut village not far from his own home at Redding:

"Off the high road is a smaller road which turns off at a tree. On that road is a large sign which reads, 'Strangers Are Not Admitted to These Grounds;' but don't you believe it—it's a lie."

TEMPERANCE NEWS NOTES.

The ninth World's Women's Christian Temperance Union convention was held in Brooklyn, N. Y., the last week of October and the following week the National W. C. T. U. convention met in Asbury Park. The world's convention meets every third year, the national convention annually. The Countess of Carlisle, president of the World's Convention, was unable to be present because of illness. She was re-elected president. Resolutions adopted called on steamship companies to prohibit the sale of intoxicants; pronounced for woman suffrage, and against governmental regulation of sexual vice; another, "respectfully and prayerfully requests the House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church of America to consider the propriety of using at the Holy Communion the fruit of the vine, which is non-alcoholic unfermented grape juice, in place of fermented wine, which contains the narcotic poison, alcohol." The national convention re-elected Mrs. Lillian Stevens president, an office she has held by annual election since the death of Frances E. Willard in 1898. The other general officers were re-elected as follows: corresponding secretary, Mrs. Frances P. Parks, of Evanston, Ill.; recording secretary, Mrs. Elizabeth Preston Anderson, of Jamestown, N. D.; treasurer, Mrs. Elizabeth P. Hutchinson, of Evanston, Ill. After the election the president reappointed as vice president at large Miss Anna A. Gordon, of Evanston, Ill., and the recording secretary reappointed as her assistant Mrs. Sarah H. Hoge, of Lincoln, Va.

A campaign to obtain half a million signers to a militant total abstinence pledge by next April has been launched by the Christian Endeavor societies in Illinois. E. P. Gates, field secretary of the Illinois Christian Endeavor Union, has charge of the campaign, which is preparatory to the local option campaign to be waged next April in 300 towns of Illinois.

Nearly 15,000 Sunday-school children in Chicago joined the "Lincoln-Lee Legion" and signed temperance pledges on Temperance Sunday. This day was celebrated in every church throughout the country, and it is estimated that fully 1,000,000 children in the country pledged themselves to abstain from intoxicating liquors.

Disciples Table Talk

News From Mexico.

During the recent trying times in the State of Coahuila, Mexico, and the taking of Piedras Negras, the temporary Capital of the Constitutionalists, the People's Institute there was called on to take an active part in the handling of the thousands of refugees. Both the American and Mexican officials were glad to get the help of our missionaries in taking care of the people who overran Piedras Negras and Eagle Pass. By means of open house, with games, musical concerts, Bible classes, and distribution of food, the distribution of Scripture portions, etc., the Institute was able to sow much seed that will bear fruit later on. During all the strenuous times since the revolution started the Institute has not closed its doors, finding some new line of activities, when circumstances make impossible continuing the old ones. S. G. Inman, of the Institute, has been in San Antonio, Texas, during the month of November, helping with the opening of the "Mexican Institute" there. During his absence, the work at Piedras Negras was in charge of O. J. Cohee, who has recently joined the mission force there with his wife.

Disciples and the Federal Council.

The Executive Committee of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ will meet in Baltimore, Dec. 3, when reports will be received and such plans entered into as finances will justify. Each communion is asked to contribute according to its numerical strength. The Disciples claim 1,300,000 members and so are asked to concontribute $1,300 annually. That is not a large sum. Most of the other communions have paid what they have been asked to contribute. The Disciples are back $1,700. Since the Toronto Convention Dr. Peter Ainslie has received a little over $400 to reduce this deficit. Only a few days remain for the raising of $1,300. In a letter of explanation and appeal Dr. Ainslie says: "We are not asking those Disciples who do not feel inclined to help in this work to stand by it, but we are asking those who are interested in this work to express their interest in a practical way. Individuals can send donations and churches can make offerings, but certainly what is done ought to be done early. It gives us an opportunity to set ourselves right in the eyes of the other communions." Monies should be sent to Peter Ainslie, President of the Commission on Christian Union, Seminary House, Baltimore, Md.

Hats Off to West Virginia!

The sudden drowning of R. Ray Eldred, of the Congo, Africa. made it imperative that the Foreign Society provide a new steam launch for the back rivers of the Congo country. The gift of $1,000 made by a friend at the Toronto Convention started the fund, and one of the Secretaries with two of the missionaries from Africa spent three weeks in West Virginia in completing it. The West Virginian churches and individuals responded promptly and liberally and the amount was raised for the launch. The boat is to be called "The West Virginia," as a number of missionaries in Africa are being supported by the West Virginian churches, some of them being graduates of Bethany College.

Bert Wilson, Laymen's Secretary of the Foreign Society, writes: "The boat will be built in memory of Mr. and Mrs. R. Ray Eldred. The contract for the boat will be let very soon and it is hoped that it will be in operation in less than a year. It will be forty-two feet long and eight feet wide. A canopy will be placed overhead to keep off the African sun. The launch will have a steel deck and hull throughout, with a cabin for the missionaries. This little boat will be able to travel in two feet of water, so that our missionaries may travel far up the rivers of the back country and preach the gospel to thousands who have never yet heard it. God has laid out a great system of waterways in the Congo country and it is ours to put the boats upon them to do the most effective work. This little boat will be equal to sending out a new missionary. The missionaries will be able to travel more than twice as rapidly as in the hollow log canoes, and be able to take provisions enough with them for a month. The West Virginia people are very anxious to have the boat called 'The West Virginia' for the splendid influence it will have upon the churches at home. Did some one say that West Virginia is sometimes conservative? We do not think so. We have found her a most progressive state. Hats off to the splendid workers in West Virginia, both missionaries and 'laymen!' Hats off to the new steam launch, 'The West Virginia,' as she plows up the back rivers to the thousand 'villages beyond.'"

Atlanta, Illinois, Dedicates.

A more than successful appeal for $16,000 indebtedness due on a $30,000 building, a special sermon by W. H. Kindred, of Enid, Okla., an organ recital, and the beginning of a series of evangelistic services,

W. J. Wright, Franklin, Ind., whose church submits good report.

with twenty-eight accessions, were features of dedication day with the church at Atlanta, Ill., where Robt. H. Newton is the able and now happy pastor. G. L. Sniveley secured $5,000 more than sufficient to meet all expenses, and this amount will be used to furnish the basement with a complete gymnasium. The Atlanta church was organized in 1855. The first pastor was W. M. Guilford, who was at the same time principal of the public schools. His successors were: John Lindsey, W. F. Bowles, R. B. Chaplin, J. W. Monser, Leroy Skelton, Samuel and Joseph Lowe, J. A. Seaton, Mr. Berry, T. T. Holton, R. D. Cotton, R. V. Callaway, S. H. Bundy, L. M. Robinson. Ira Mitchell, B. O. Aylesworth, L. G. Thompson, J. P. Davis, Mr. Miller, C. E. Selby, R. F. Thrapp, T. B. Stanley, L. W. Morgan, S. S. Lappin, W. R. Jinnett, Ivan W. Agee, and now, R. H. Newton.

Dedication in Western Kansas.

Goodland, Kansas, called the Iowa Dedicator, Alfred M. Haggard of Drake University for his 142d dedication, on November 2. They sent him home a surprised man. Expecting till the last day to subscribe but $3,000, their bills called for $5,000 to meet all obligations. When the day was over they had almost $6,000 because they subscribed $3,000 in the first fifteen minutes. How is that for drouth-stricken Kansas? The congregation used its former house and over $9,000 in this structure which is worth about $15,000. B. A. Channer, now in his fourth year, is pastor at Goodland. Last year he held a fine home meeting and is now in another with the best of prospects. It goes without saying that this is a missionary church.

Pastor Dies During Revival.

F. B. Thomas, who is holding a meeting at Olney, Illinois, reports that the pastor there, W. S. Gamboe, is dead. The church is heart broken, Mr. Thomas writes. The meeting will be continued as there is a very deep interest. The success of the meeting Mr. Thomas attributes to the conscientious work of Mr. Gamboe as pastor and preacher.

The Tabernacle Christian Church at Franklin, Ind., in its annual report shows 60 added to the church during the year, but nearly an equal loss in deaths and removals. $6,007.85 was raised for all purposes. All old debts paid, parsonage handsomely repaired, offerings sent to all the national societies, two educational enterprises and the state society. They also gave large aid to the Indiana flood sufferers. Sunday-school and church attendance growing under the leadership of its pastor, William J. Wright.

The three missionaries in Manila, Leslie Wolfe, Dr. W. N. Lemmon and J. B. Daugherty, report forty baptisms. They recently conducted a Bible institute for ten days in Manila, in which there were delegates from twelve different towns. The site for the new Bible college has been bought. During the month of September there were 1,015 patients in the hospital in Manila, including 143 surgical treatments. The Government is giving $25 a month in medicines and surgical dressings.

Dr. C. C. Drummond and family of Harda, India, missionaries of the Foreign Society, have just returned on furlough. His health is not good. F. M. Rains says he has worked too hard. The people of Harda gave him a farewell reception. This is something extraordinary, especially for the Brahmins. The church at Maryville, Missouri, supported Dr. Drummond as their Living-link.

George W. Hemry, South Bend, Indiana, whose church helped support R. Ray Eldred on the Congo, writes: "He was of martyr material. His love of the gospel and his devotion to the Congo Mission field was his ruling passion. He and his gentle wife paid bravely the last full measure of their devotion."

In connection with evangelistic services with which both congregations are concerned, the Central Christian and First Baptist churches of Lebanon, Ind., held a joint meeting on Saturday, Nov. 15, to further the interests of this campaign. All the churches of Lebanon were asked to meet with them.

Dean W. F. Barr, of Drake university school of education, has received notice of his election to honorary membership in the Luther Burbank society of America. The society was founded by Mr. Burbank, and membership in it is limited to prominent educators and others interested in scientific agricultural development.

First Church, Sheridan, Wyoming, celebrated its tenth anniversary last week with a large gathering of its members and friends, old and new. Greetings from its former pastors were read. It has a membership of 500. Five young men, members of the church, are preparing themselves for the ministry.

The Sunday-school of University Place Church, Champaign, Ill., still retains second place in the efficiency test which is being waged with the churches of Paris, Jacksonville, Litchfield and Champaign. Points are gained by the attendance, the promptness of the teachers and officers and collections.

First Church, Ft. Worth, Tex., is beginning the second series of get-together meetings. The subjects include: "Our Ability to Do," J. J. Jarvis; "What is the Church For," L. C. Jackson; "Christians With Small Visions," Bacon Saunders; "What Others Have Done We Can Do," Chalmers McPherson; "The Downtown Church," L. D. Anderson.

The Tri-Annual Convention of the Auxiliaries to the C. W. B. M. and the Disciples' Missionary Union of Greater New York and vicinity was held in the Sterling Place Church of Christ, Brooklyn, N. Y., Nov. 11. Dr. J. M. Philputt and Dr. Z. T. Sweeney were among the speakers.

A reception welcoming James Small as the new minister of Hyde Park Church, Kansas City, Mo., was held recently. He was welcomed by his fellow pastors of the city, James C. Armstrong, Louis F. Cupp, George W. Muckley and George H. Combs.

A district convention held in Newton Falls, O., last week was largely attended. I. J. Cahill, Miss Mary Lyons, Myron C. Settle, W. D. Ryan, Mrs. Thomas Phillips, and L. G. Brown were among the speakers.

The hospital at Vigan, P. I., is a new enterprise, but it is doing most efficient service. In June and July there were 1,731 treatments. This work is in charge of Dr. L. B. Kline, who is supported by the church at Houston, Texas.

Through the efforts of R. E. Kinsell, the little church on 15th St., S. E., Washington, D. C., has sent the hospital of the Foreign Society at Vigan, P. I., a fine set of eye instruments to restore sight to the blind.

D. W. Moore, of Carthage, Mo., presided at a district meeting of Christian churches held in Joplin, Mo., last week. There was a good attendance.

The church at Rockville, Ind., held a "Whole Family Day" at their church recently. The largest family present was presented with a Bible.

The Men's Brotherhood of First Church, North Yakima, Wash., was launched recently in an enthusiastic meeting held at the church.

November 22 was observed as Home-coming Day at Drake University. The Drake-Ames football game was a central feature.

Teach Christ

TO YOUR ADULT AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSES. The Uniform Lessons for 1914 are based upon the life of Christ. This means that the emphasis in the year's work will be placed upon that matchless study. The best book on that theme published for young people's and adult classes is Dr. Loa E. Scott's

"LIFE OF JESUS"

Why You Should Use This Text:

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There is not a skeptical question in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus." A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study.

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

EDITED BY GILBERT J. ELLIS AND J. H. FILLMORE

There is no equipment of the church more vitally related to its spiritual development and growth than the kind of hymnal it uses. In other words, a church makes no better investment than the purchase of a good hymnal. It is a serious mistake to buy an ordinary gospel song book for use on the Lord's Day and the Wednesday evening prayer services. Such books cheapen the worship.

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains also what is used by the most advanced churches.

The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested by use. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The New Praise Hymnal is widely used in our churches. We believe it to be the favorite book of the church.

CO-OPERATION WITH CHRIST.

Dec. 3. I. Pet. 4:13-16; Phil. 2:5-8; John 16:9-11; 2 Tim. 2:11-13.

How shall we co-operate with Christ in removing the sin of the world? "The problem of religion," says William DeWitt Hyde, "is to present Christ as the representative of all humanity; so to hold up the cross of Christ as to make every man who is doing wrong feel that he is rolling up the mighty mass of misery which Christ and humanity must bear. It must show that every deed of dishonesty or lust, every word of unkindness or insincerity, every indulgence in sensuality or selfishness, is an addition to the burden Christ came to bear; a crucifying of him afresh in the person of his brethren."

ATONEMENT TO HUMANITY.

In "Biblical Ideas of Atonement," Gerald B. Smith writes: "If God is not separate from humanity, if he is actually bearing the burden of evil done to his children, then atonement made to an outraged humanity is atonement made to God. And God has a right to demand it because it is not a case of God versus humanity, but of God in humanity versus sinners against humanity. To contemplate forgiveness without atonement of some sort would be repugnant to us. We do not wish our criminals to be freed because of sentimentality. The only satisfaction with which democracy can be content is that the man who has been anti-social, who has selfishly wronged others for his own profit, shall actually share and approve the social consciousness which condemns him for his wrong. Mere external punishment does not reach the root of the matter. Democracy demands conversion—a change of heart—as the supreme atonement for the sins of the past. And if this takes place, democracy is willing, nay glad, to take upon itself the consequences of the wrong, to endure the pains resulting from past evils in order to set free the converted soul to devote its energies to the social welfare."

THE ROYAL ROAD.

The note of heroism has always been heard in all true preaching of the gospel of Christ. Sin is a grievous thing and deliverance from it requires heroic measures. Music that puts the worshiper to sleep and sermons that minimize the ravages of sin have no place in a church of Jesus Christ. I quote again from Dr. Smith: "The moral redemption of humanity is God's eternal purpose, cost what it may. In the light of this vision, we may perhaps rise above the delicacy of an age which wants religion to cure pain and may see again, as did the prophets of the exile, that suffering is the royal road by which the elect may lead the nations of the earth to the kingdom of God."

THE REPROACH OF CHRIST.

Respectability covers a multitude of sins. In many places it is a reproach not to be a Christian. The first disciples professed a faith that was foolishness to the wise men of the world. Being firmly convinced that they were right, these disciples accepted the reproaches of the world as evidence that they were about their Master's business. We are in danger of betraying the faith by trying to conform our teaching and practice to the fashions of the hour. We are doubtless right in thinking that the spirit which arouses antagonisms where there is agreement on fundamental principles is a spirit of maliciousness. But we are deceived if we think we can deliver the message of Christ to this age and meet with no opposition from the dishonest, the cruel, the licentious, the scandalmonger, the merciless employer, the careless workman, and the men and women puffed up with conceit over a little knowledge of art and literature and science or the achievements of a remote ancestor. The disciple of Jesus must be morally ahead of his time. He must speak of the age that is to come but in such manner as will direct the attention of his generation to its duty to assist in bringing in the better day.

CONCEALED CAUSES OF CRASHING CATASTROPHE.

By A. Z. Conrad.

INEXPLICABLE DEFEAT.

After Jericho anything seemed possible. If rams' horns could raze ramparts what had the Israelites to risk? If jubilee trumpets could lead to triumph the conquest of Canaan was merely a picnic excursion. It was too easy. Pride and presumption follow after progress without pain. Success without sacrifice is usually short lived. We prize what we pay for. The Israelites accepted the honors of war which had cost them nothing. They assumed that the success of the siege was due to prowess when in reality it was due to Divine power. Wealth without work is wasted. The student whose brilliancy and precocity account for high credit presumes on his wit, quits work, and wastes his life. Promotion through outside influence usually leads to presumption. An over-confidence once encouraged leads to arrogance. Israel had to learn that it was not their parade around Jericho that had planted their standards upon the fallen battlement. In their elation they forgot caution, proceeded with a prayerless program and met with an ignominious defeat at Ai. Repulse was followed by retreat and this developed into an ignominious rout. Like frightened sheep with barking hounds behind them they rushed to Gilgal and called for God. If caution, consecration and commitment had preceded the charge there would have been no retreat. It is easier to prevent the rent than to patch the garment. It is better to foil the thrust than to have to heal the wound. A pre-victory-petition is vastly better than a post-defeat-lamentation.

JEHOVAH CHALLENGED.

The inexplicable defeat resulted in immediate challenge. Amazed, overwhelmed, Joshua turned to Jehovah and hurled his interrogation. Defeat at this juncture seemed to mean permanent disaster. When the purposes of the Infinite are imperiled we know there is a reason. Our best judgment tells us that neither success nor defeat are mere accidents in life. The responsibility for retreat is often placed exactly where Joshua placed it. We are rarely willing to admit that the fault which leads to failure is within. It is as natural to challenge Providence as it is to breathe. All demand of Jehovah, "Why?" conceals a similarly disguised accusation. In the habiliments of sorrow, his clothes rent, dust upon his head. and lament leaping from his lips, Joshua spent the entire day in an attitude of humility and a spirit of despair. Had he not been promised the companionship of Jehovah? Had he not been assured that no man should stand before him so long as he should live? What wonder then that he said, "O Lord God, why hast thou brought this people over Jordan to deliver us into the hands of the Amorites to destroy us?" Yet it was a remarkable manifestation of weakness. The wording of his inquiry indicates it was not a petition but a demand and a demand is never a prayer. It assumed that the responsibility for defeat rested with Jehovah. The inference was clear that the whole purpose of the Jordan and the Jericho miracles was for the greater discomfiture and final disaster of the people. He knew better. It was a most unworthy attitude. It was unsoldierly. It was unfaithful. Complaint is usually cumulative. He continues, "Would to God we had been content and dwelt on the other side of the Jordan."

THE CONCEALED CAUSE OF DISASTER.

There is still a remnant of reason in the collapsed commander. As though conscious of the absurdity of his implied accusation, Joshua, with sanity and sincerity, seeks answer and explanation. The Canaanites would hear of it and cut off the name of Israel from the earth. But that would not be the last and greatest meaning of this castastrophe. "What wilt thou do unto thy great name?" If his favored children suffered defeat what would be the effect on wicked worldlings who knew not his name? Here he speaks like a true soldier of Jehovah. It is right to be jealous for the progress of the Kingdom. We cannot be too deeply concerned for the honor of the Master. We ought to know the reason why the banner of the Cross is taken from any advanced position and the Kingdom of Christ is losing ground. It would be wholesome indeed, if the whole Christian Church today was more concerned to learn why hundreds and hundreds of our churches pass through one, two and three years without a single addition on confession of faith. The languid interest shown in successive defeats today is a sad reflection upon Christian sincerity and Christian zeal. The challenge of Joshua was answered and the answer was short, sharp and sufficient. The defeat was no accident, but the responsibility was placed where it belonged, on the people themselves. Jehovah turned the inquiry toward the source of trouble. He pitied the weakness of the prostrate, pilgrim leader and, "The Lord said unto Joshua, 'Get thee up. Wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face?'" This was no censure of his spirit of supplication. It was a demand for action. God Almighty does not expect us to keep calling on him to do the things we should be doing ourselves. For the cause of most of our disasters we may well look within. A prayer which does not form a positive, progressive program is powerless. No words are wasted in the answer to the challenge.

THE LOST GOD.

A deserted deity invariably means dismal defeat. Interrupted communication is the cause of groping and grovelling when we might be running successfully toward the goal. "Thou canst not stand before thine enemies until ye take away the accursed thing from among you." That is as true today as when the Israelites fled before the enemy at Ai. Our first quest for a sufficient cause of failure should be within the domain of our own soul. Wonderful as is the human intellect and marvelous as is the human volition, the two combined cannot save life from defeat. Satanic cunning is more than a match for the shrewdest human mind. We are bound to go down before the terrific onslaught of some great temptation if we have lost connection with God. While we remain outside the prayer-portal and the penitent portal with no message from God, defeat is sure and disaster is imminent. The Heavens are brass and petition is powerless just as long as any known evil is entertained within. Jehovah said, "Neither will I be with you any more except ye destroy the accursed thing from among you." Here we have the definite declaration that none need expect the favor of God and positively may not have the companionship of the Infinite who indulges in any sin deliberately. You can no more mix holiness and sin than you can combine light and darkness, life and death, sickness and health.

GOD'S DETECTIVES.

One of the most thrilling portrayals in all the Word of God we find in the work of God's detectives among the tents of Gilgal. The lot was employed as the means of discovering the person who was guilty of appropriating to his own uses that which had been forbidden. Someone had taken of the spoil when Jericho fell and had thus immediately changed their holy war into a mercenary campaign for spoil. It was the one thing which had been guarded against. After Jericho it would be necessary for their support and progress that they should appropriate for their own uses much that was acquired through conquest. But for this once it had been positively forbidden. The guilty person knew that he was accountable for the failure of the three thousand at Ai, but he made no confession. With what anxiety and wretchedness he must have spent those days. There is no peace for the wicked. Yet he vainly sought to escape public recognition, but God's detectives worked unerringly. The permanent concealment of sin is an impossibility. It is a self-revealing thing and sooner or later shows itself in all its hideousness. Representatives of the whole nation stood in an attitude of intense anxiety. The lot was cast and the sentence fell upon the tribe of Judah. The heads of the family of Judah stood aghast and ashamed that so great a calamity had befallen one of their number. The lot was cast and the family of the Zerahites was taken. Again the lot was drawn and Zabdi was taken, indicating that from his branch of the great household the guilty one had gone forth. Man by man the household was represented, the lot cast, and Achan held the lot which condemned him. The circles of Divine detection are concentric. At last they narrow to a single point and responsibility is fixed.

COMPELLED CONFESSION.

The sentence of condemnation had already been passed upon the man who should at last be taken. During this process he had the opportunity for repentance and confession, but no confession was made and there was no indication of repentance. At last he is compelled to confess because the guilt is fixed. It is a clear picture of the final judgment where every man must stand before God with no further concealments, compelled to confess his sin. In this compelled confession we see clearly the degeneration inevitable where sin abides. "I saw, I desired, I took, I hid," and we have the steps downward to the low level of permanent despair. This is the history of all declension. We permit ourselves to be arrested by the attractiveness of evil. It appeals to us and we desire it. We linger with it until we partake of it. Conscious of our guilt we immediately seek to conceal it. The most dismal failure in all the world is that effort to conceal iniquity, which is so universal when the soul is guilty of unholy indulgence.

SIN AT THE FINISH.

"Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death." "They took Achan, the son of Carmi, and stoned him with stones until he died." Not upon the guilty alone comes the sorrow for sin. He suffered the penalty and with him his belongings. We find no sufficient reason to believe that the members of his household perished with him, but they were involved in the disgrace and were the witnesses at least to his execution. It is not at all impossible that they may have been participants in the crime and knowing of the concealed treasure were partners in his guilt and suffered death with him. However that may be the lesson of permanent loss resulting from avariciousness and disobedience is applicable to all time and should be contemplated with great solemnity.

POWER REGAINED.

The lost Lord was found through repentance and the restoration of covenant relation. It is not enough to regret. It is not enough to shed tears for our failures. The absolute extermination of evil from the heart is impressed upon us when it occupies first place in life. Not the regulation of evil, but its extermination is a definite command of God in order to his favor. This is true nationally. It has application to all the civic and social problems of our day. Without an honest effort to absolutely eliminate such evils as the liquor traffic and social vice and industrial injustice we may not expect the favor of God. Most pertinent is its application to individual life. Secret sin must be repudiated and eliminated if we are to have power with God. The next four years of conquest continuously reveal the presence of Jehovah with his children. Joshua went from victory to victory. Few were his mistakes and never once do we find him questioning for a moment both the justice and mercy of Jehovah. Nothing can prevent the permanent victory of the church of God but its own deflections and defalcations. The loyal child of the covenant is guaranteed an inheritance.

DEVELOP YOUR BACKBONE.

It is a fine thing for you to get into the way of helping other people, to develop yourself into a regular booster. But it isn't so good a thing for you to get into the habit of having to be helped too much yourself. In fact, it is very bad to get into that condition that you can scarcely get into anything without being boosted into it. It is all right to give a stogy, fat boy a shove up into an apple tree, but for yourself, if you are a boy, it is far better to be alert and active and able to climb up anything without thanks to anyone. That is the worst with this helping business, it sometimes goes to seed or works too much the wrong way. There are a great many young men who do not get along in life because they are waiting for someone to help them into something. There are a great many Christians in the churches who do not get on at all unless someone is continually holding their hands around them, or propping them up with this, or that, or the other. A measure, a good measure of fine, healthy independence is a splendid thing.

THE GREATEST WOMAN.

A question was put to two hundred school-teachers, "Who was the greatest woman in all history?" The teacher who received the prize for her unique answer, passed by Queen Victoria, Frances Willard, Helen Gould, etc., and said: "The wife of the farmer of moderate means who does her own cooking, washing, ironing, sewing, bringing up a family of boys and girls to be useful members of society and finds time for intellectual improvement, is the greatest woman in all history."

TAKE CARE OF TODAY.

A bit of philosophy lately advanced by Dr. Osler, who made a reputation for himself some time ago by saying that a man's usefulness is ended at 60, seems destined to live to bear good fruit. There is no use, he remarks, in worrying about yesterday and tomorrow—today is what we must take care of. When one stops to think of it, most of our real worries come from regrets for misspent yesterdays, or from apprehensions of possibly unhappy tomorrows, little realizing that between the sunset and sunrise of today lie all-important and imperative duties. Dr. Osler insists that when one starts the day with the first two hours going right, smooth sailing for all day is forecasted. This reminds me of the admonition of dear old grandfather, who used to say, "Never get up in the morning without a hearty laugh. If you can't think of anything humorous tickle yourself." In other words, let your day begin with a temperamental sunrise, for cheery words and thoughts constitute a radiant dawn that glows on into noonday brightness, whether the weather outside be indicative of gloom or a threatened tempest. Take care of today!

President Wilson, who believes that "the Sunday-school lesson of today is the code of morals of tomorrow."

KEEP YOUR PRICE UP!

Don't sell yourself too cheap. Your health, strength, intellect, industry, application, morals, principles, and high character—all of these are an asset.

They are worth something if you have any of them. They are priceless if you have them all.

Remember, in this frivolous time, that the one thing you really have as long as you live is your body. That is yours. That stays with you to the end. You must live with yourself. Where you go, it goes with you. When you pass away it is in your casket. There is only the hope of immortality left to friends. If this be true—and it cannot be denied—make the priceless gift of your Creator a sanctuary, clean, sweet, wholesome, spiritual as well as physical, living the life that you know you should live, putting a high value on the human frame in which you make your home.

Beautify it with all the graces of deportment, courtesy, kindness and affection. Do not cheapen it with vice, licentiousness, greed, intemperance, sordidness, unbelief and all the train of sorrow and suffering that follow in the path of sin. Keep yourself worth all that you can. Hold yourself in the world's market at the highest price.

THE MODERN DANCE.

The indecency of the modern dance is such as to make it almost impossible for one to write of it without offending the taste of even the most liberal. To say that the dance today is immodest is not to tell one-tenth of the truth. It is indecent! It is impossible to understand how decent and self-respecting parents can permit their sons and daughters to be subjected to temptations that are simply irresistible, and that are sending thousands of young men and women every night in the week to not only social and moral, but to physical and eternal ruin as well. The doctors' offices are showing an increased number of wrecks of young men and young women who ought to be physically at their very best. The disappearance of formerly respectable young women, and even young girls, under clouds of mystery, some of whom never return to their homes alive, is steadily increasing. The divorce courts are more and more crowded, and the highway of life is being strewn with a wreckage today such as the past has never known. It is the duty of every young man and young woman, of every father and mother, of every patriot and philanthropist, to array themselves in a united and irresistible influence, to turn back the devastating tide of this evil. Only earnest effort on the part of the truth-loving can save the lives of the susceptible youth of our country.

SAYS PRESIDENT WILSON:

No study is more important to the child than the study of the Bible and of the truths which it teaches, and there is no more effective agency for such study than the Sunday-school. It certainly is one of the greatest factors in our lives in the building of character and the development of moral fiber, for its influence begins almost as soon as the child is able to talk and continues throughout life. The Sunday-school lesson of today is the code of morals of tomorrow. Too much attention cannot be paid the work which the Sunday-school is doing.

WEALTH CANNOT BUY IT.

Whatever wealth may be able to do, it is not able to buy happiness. No class is more unhappy than the very rich. When Mr. Pullman, of sleeping car fame, was asked how it felt to be a millionaire, he replied:

"I believe that I am no better off—certainly no happier—than I was when I didn't have a dollar to my name, and had to work from daylight until dark. I had fewer cares; I slept better, and I may add, generally, I believe I was far happier in those days than I have been many times since I became a millionaire."

"The Best, Wherever Found!"

That is the slogan of modern Sunday schools. Superintendents and pastors no longer use a certain kind of supplies because they "have always used it." They are on the alert for the best, wherever found. Note what some of our Sunday school leaders say of

The Bethany System

"Nothing Could Pry Us Loose"

We began using the Bethany Graded Lessons at their first issuance and have increased the supply from year to year as the literature for all grades was published. There is nothing in the series that is not now used by our school. Nothing could pry our superintendents and teachers loose from these lessons. They meet the needs of pupils of all years and make the teacher's work a joy. We have no word with which to express our satisfaction with the series.

H. H. HARMON,
First Church, Lincoln, Neb.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teachers' text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN,
Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va.

"Thoroughly Edited"

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upon the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday-school pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned.

L. J. MARSHALL,
Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

"We Would Not Turn Back"

We are using the Bethany Graded Lessons. We would not turn back. The service our Sunday-school specialists are giving us as represented in this course is making a new day in religious education.

FINIS IDLEMAN,
Pastor Central Church, Des Moines, Ia.

"Unanimously the Bethany Series"

After a campaign led by Miss Eva Lemert of Kansas City, Mo., resulting in the thorough grading and departmentizing of the school, we had to decide the matter of graded helps. A committee of three was appointed, consisting of the pastor, superintendent and one member of the Executive Committee. This committee made an individual examination of lesson helps and decided unanimously in favor of the Bethany series, arriving at their decisions independently and solely upon the merits of the literature. So far as I know these lessons are giving entire satisfaction.

EDGAR DeWITT JONES,
Pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

"Nothing to Compare With Them"

We have been using the Bethany Graded Lessons from the time you began to publish them and we are very highly pleased with them. We have often had occasion to compare them with the publications of other houses and thus far can say we have found nothing that compares with them. I am teaching a young men's class in the course, "The World a Field for Christian Service," and am glad to say that it seems to me the best adapted for young men of high school age of all courses I have ever seen. My class is becoming very enthusiastic over it.

P. J. RICE,
Pastor First Church, El Paso, Tex.

"Have Created Enthusiasm"

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

T. E. WINTER,
Pastor First Church, Fulton, Mo.

"Delighted"

Our Sunday-school, which has lately begun the use of the Bethany Graded Lessons, seems to be delighted with them. I have heard no word of unfavorable criticism and very many words of appreciation. Our teachers like the form and material of these lessons.

GRAHAM FRANK,
Pastor Liberty, Mo.

"Best on the Market"

We consider the Bethany Graded Lessons for the Beginners and Primary department the best on the market of our own brotherhood and second to none of other communions. Congratulations!

J. J. TISDALL,
Pastor Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Working Out Salvation

The theology of the older time fought over the question of the relation of fore-ordination to free will. We have ceased that discussion, and instead are talking about personality and environment. It sounds very different, but it comes to the same thing in the end. It is the attempt of the human mind to make a circle out of an ellipse, and no one yet has ever succeeded in doing it.

We work out our own salvation with fear and trembling; God works out our salvation without any fear, but with the precision of an end certain from the beginning.

Thus far have come all the discussions of the centuries, and here they have stopped, and will continue to stop. But the present is an age of new sciences. We can name without stopping for breath, a full dozen of them, and the morning papers may announce the birth of one or two beside. To begin with, there are Anthropology, Ethnology, Archeology and Sociology. Then follow Historical Criticism, the Philosophy of History, Comparative Philology and Comparative Religion. Then come Social Hygiene, Social Psychology, Social Economics and Social Ethics. We need not speak of the new Astronomy with the spectroscope attached to the lens, nor the new Geology, for Geology itself is new, nor the new sciences that use as their instrument the microscope, which are themselves legion. New also are all sciences using Electricity, X-rays and Vanadium.

How many of these sciences are to be deemed permanent, how far they will shift and change their boundaries and assume new classifications, how far they will be modified by other sciences, we cannot predict. We know that we are in the vortex of thought, caused by these and other new disciplines lately come to being. But in the end we come back to the same problems. Call it the conflict of personality with heredity and environment; call it the clash of fore-ordination and fate, we come back to the same ellipse, and our effort to move the two foci to a common center, and make of the circumference a circle. We have not yet accomplished this. Perhaps we never shall.

Meantime stands the apostolic declaration and injunction. We must work out our own salvation, for God works in us.

Why should we work if God works? We are beginning to realize in terms of the newer sciences that we must work that God may work—that our working is a method of the divine activity—that we are to give hands and feet and heart and brain to the working of that mighty power whereby God is subduing all things to himself.

God never made another world just like this. God never made two leaves alike, much less two worlds. Each blade of grass is a new experience to God. In each leaf or life is expressed some accent of the personality of God not otherwise expressed.

It begins to be certain that God has experience. We begin to see that God's thought cannot be a monotonous dead level. If God has personality at all, if there can be joy in the presence of the angels and God can share that joy, then God is no stranger to anything that is working out through human agency the divine plan. God still beholds his work in progress and pronounces it good.

The thought carries us farther. There must be in the soul of God something which we cannot define better than to compare with the love of adventure. That is to say (and we must remember all the time that when we apply our own words to God, we do so with very different meanings than when we use the same words of ourselves), that God has undertaken the enterprise of human life with a bold adventure, if we may so speak, into the untried. The Book of Job suggests this truth, and Paul affirms it Creation and redemption are a divine hazard—an experiment in faith on the part of God. God is bringing forth in his own experience new assurance of the validity of the cosmic processes. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together. Not only so, but we ourselves who have received of the first fruits of the Spirit, groan in unison with creation. And what is just as certainly affirmed in Scripture, the Spirit of God helpeth our infirmities, helpeth that is by actually sharing them, with groanings that cannot be uttered.

Now if all this be true, then our fear and trembling have meaning to God. Not that God fears and trembles; God does nothing of the kind. But our fear and our trembling are the human equivalents of the divine solicitude; they are the human expression of the tragic love of God that reveals itself in sacrifice.

Do we ask for proof of things so wonderful? We have it in the cross of Jesus, whose bodily sufferings, with those human agonies, were shadows of the sorrow of God for human sin.

So, then, our fear and trembling are the expression, and at the same time the very opposite of the method of God.

Tombs and Temples of Nanking

Continuing the Oriental Travel Sketches.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

ONE of the days of our stay in Nanking we devoted to a visit to the Ming tombs, outside the walls. These tombs are not so extensive or elaborate as those north of Pekin, but they are of the same order.

I have already spoken of the former political leadership of Nanking. Its position on the southern bank of the Yangtse, 200 miles from its mouth at Shanghai, made it central and important. In the early days of the Christian Era, from 317 to 582 A. D., it was the capital, again at the establishment of the Ming dynasty in 1368 it became the capital and continued in that honor till 1403.

Only the first Emperor of this line found burial here. During the reign of the second, the government was taken back to Peking, nearer the Manchu frontier. Most of the architectural and artistic monuments which attract attention today belong to that Ming dynasty, which continued till 1644.

THE START.

We started from the Sarvis home about nine in the morning, and took carriages for the trip. Prof. Meigs went with us as interpreter and guide. We soon left the quieter district of the Mission compound and the University, and plunged into the more crowded and filthy streets of the Chinese city. Traffic of every kind was in progress. Streets and shops were full of people. All sorts of wares were displayed, chiefly meats and vegetables in the quarter through which we passed. The favorite meat of the Chinese seems to be goose. Great quantities of roasted geese were displayed in some of the shops. We had learned that wherever the Chinaman goes he is sure to raise as many geese as he is able. We saw this in Honolulu, Singapore, the Malay States, Burmah, and of course, in all parts of China.

We passed the palace or Yamen of the Viceroy, who was formerly, before the revolution, an official of great power. The province of Kiangsu, of which Nanking is the capital, contains 36,600 square miles of territory, and a population estimated at fourteen millions. One can easily understand how the head of such a division of the empire, probably the richest of all the eighteen provinces, would hold a court of splendor and austerity, thronged by officials, actual or expectant.

SOME POSSIBILITIES.

It is possible that the office of this governor may become of even greater importance under the new regime. For the tie of loyalty to the new republican government at Pekin is very slender. In fact, as is well known, the chief seat of revolt against the authority of President Yuan Shi-kai in the recent rebellion was Nanking. It is not likely that a single tael of the tribute of the province has as yet made its way to the federal treasury.

The governor's Yamen was distinguished by the tall flag-staffs and banners, bearing laudatory signs, and guards stood about the entrance. A short distance further on was the gateway in the wall which divides the Chinese from the Manchu city. Formerly this latter section was the official division of Nanking. As in Pekin, the Manchu city had the place of honor, and in it the native Chinese were not permitted to live. It contained handsome temples, palaces and residences, each surrounded, for protection and additional honor, by its inclosing wall.

When the rebellion broke out three years ago, the uprising that unseated the Manchus, and gave China the beginnings of its republican government, the revolutionary army and the Chinese populace completely destroyed and looted this section of the city. Today not one structure remains in a once extensive and beautiful section of the city. Walled off, as it had been before, it was protected against all ordinary attack. But in the revolution the deep-going animosities of generations broke out in all their murderous fury. Massacre, mutilation, outrage and looting were the order of the hour. In spite of all the missionaries could do, and they did much to mitigate the horrors of the time, the Manchu city was completely ruined.

One unhappy group of officials, hemmed round by revolutionaries, and knowing their fate should they be taken as prisoners, deliberately shut themselves in a handsome building and blew up the place with powder. The shock of the explosion tore a huge hole in the earth, and demolished a considerable section of the wall near by. Through this melancholy district we drove, while Prof. Meigs pointed out different heaps of ruins where great buildings of the older Chinese type had stood. Then he told us of cases in which Manchu refugees, wounded and terror stricken, had found refuge with the missionaries, and been saved from death and worse.

Main Building, University of Nanking.

THROUGH THE GATES.

On we drove, out through the gates that led from the Manchu city to the open country. The walls of Nanking are very extensive, not less than twenty-five miles in circumference, and in normal times the population was fully half a million. Outside the walls the country is rough, hilly, and to all appearance, barren. We drove along the outer side of the walls for some distance, and then out into the open land. There were few signs of cultivated ground here. On the right as we went on were extensive military barracks. Further along were burial grounds, where in many instances the heavy wooden coffins which the Chinese so much admire, were partly or wholly exposed, and often broken into, by storms or prowling beasts.

But presently we reached the end of the long avenue leading to the tomb. It is marked by curious stone images of lions, camels, elephants, priests and warriors, standing in pairs, facing each other across the paved but grass-grown road, and recurring at intervals of perhaps an eighth of a mile on the long approach. Were these supposed to represent sacrificial victims, slain at the tomb of the great emperor? Such figures occur along the approaches to the royal tombs at Mukden, and at Pekin.

AT THE TOMB MOUND.

Then we reached a great gateway with elaborate inscriptions, a further paved court, a second massive gate structure, and behind all the tomb mound, thrown up above the hidden sepulchre. Once there was a subterranean tunnel leading to the royal chamber. Now all is closed and deserted. Aside from the few traffickers who display little Buddhas, seal stones, and other rubbish for sale, and the beggars who hang on so persistently as to make life a burden, the place is deserted, and only the sight and noise of the distant city breaks the solitude in which the first of the Ming rulers reposes.

On the way back to the mission we stopped at the "Temple of Ten Thousand Buddhas." It is a building in extensive grounds. Priests are to be seen in the various halls and courts. In one of the upper rooms is the collection of images of the great Indian teachers. They are of all sizes, reposing in cases or standing on tables. No one cares to count them, but the number may be as claimed. If the priests were to turn industrious for once and dust off the multitude of figures, they would have an extensive task. But of course they do nothing of the sort, and the dust of years makes the collection look like the prophet's imaginary picture of the helpless dust-laden gods of Babylon.

AN INTERESTING VISIT.

One day, with Mr. Sarvis as our chaperon, we visited the old examination halls. Around a disused Temple of Confucius, where a single priest seemed the survivor of a numerous brotherhood, and from the tower of which we had an extensive view over the city, the long lines of little cells extended to the approximate number of eight or nine thousand. They are no longer used. The old Confucian classics have ceased to be the standard of culture. The new government schools, patterned after western, and especially missionary, foundations are opening their doors to the youth of China, and the bricks of the old examination cells are slowly finding their way, by theft or purchase, into the modern structures going up all about.

Another very interesting visit was made to the Chinese Young Men's Christian Association. It was like none of the buildings we had seen devoted to that work. It was, in fact, a Chinese house of the upper class, with almost numberless rooms, courts, halls, and passages, set in a little park of charming character. Mr. W. R. Stuart, the secretary, took us over the place, which had just been acquired through some Chinese people interested in the work. He showed us how well adapted to the plans of the Association such a native house really was, little as it seemed to be at first glance. We noticed elaborate floral decorations about the entrance, and were told of the "welcome" service soon to be held. The young men whom we met as leaders of the association work in all the important places in the Orient have been well chosen for their task. They are well educated, alert, winsome and competent in every regard. The Association may well congratulate itself on their services.

ADDRESSING A CHINESE CONGREGATION.

On the Sunday morning there was a crowded audience in the Chinese church in the compound near the Drum Tower. The congregation was almost entirely Chinese. They were townspeople, students, members of the teaching and mission staff, and several missionaries. The music was familiar in tune if not in words. The sermon was translated to the native members of the audience by Mr. Garrett. The ordinance of baptism was administered to two young men, and the communion service was full of solemnity and meaning.

THE SOUTH GATE MISSION.

That same afternoon a number of us went down into the city to the South Gate. There, just off a very narrow street, along which great throngs of people were hurrying with all sorts of noise and confusion, we found the chapel and other quarters of the South Gate Mission. It is a very desirable location. It is a thickly populated district. Many Chinese merchants live in the vicinity. The good will of the neighbors has been gained by years of friendly treatment.

Miss Kelly and her assistants have worked with the women, and her rooms on the second floor are a clearing house for social fellowship and Bible instruction. When we went down into the chapel the place was already full, as it seemed. But as soon as the music was started, and the sound of the hymns was heard on the street, a crowd gathered at the door and pressed its way in till it seemed that a single addition would push out the walls. Mr. Dannenberg, the missionary in charge, led the service. On the wall were many banners bearing large prints of Christian hymns in native character. Several of these were sung. The address was listened to with the utmost attention, not only the Chinese translations but the English portion. Men, women and children remained long after the close. Many of them were the regular members of the South gate congregation, and many others felt entirely at home in the mission.

Mr. Dannenberg and Miss Kelly pointed out a parcel of land at the rear of the chapel which is greatly needed by the mission. They hope to secure the money to purchase it soon. This mission has no protecting walls. It is very close to one of the busiest thoroughfares in the city. In time of mob violence it would be defenseless. Yet so great is the good will of the people about them that the missionaries go about their work with a quiet fearlessness and friendliness that is itself a wall of fire.

But time and space fail to permit a full recital of the splendid work being done in Nanking by the co-operation missions of the five or six Christian bodies. Miss Lyon's School for girls, and that of the Methodist Board are models of efficiency. The work for women is making rapid progress, in a land where woman's lot has been very hard, and where, apart from the influences of Christianity, she is still a menial. A Union Nurses' School is in operation, a Union Woman's Bible Training School is preparing women for Christian work, and the girls' schools are making possible a new generation and a new order of Chinese mothers.

At a recent commencement of the Nanking Christian Girls' School one of the speakers was a little girl of ten, who explained the purpose of such schools to a large audience. Many of those present were atheists and believers in the old and common custom of destroying girl infants. If that little girl could have told her own story it would have been the best illustration of the need of Christian sentiment and schools.

A SIGNIFICANT INCIDENT.

One day, years before, one of the native Christian women went down to the stream back of her house to wash clothes. On the bank, and partly in the water, she found the body of a newly born child, that had been cast down the slope toward the water, by heartless parents who did not even take pains to see that it rolled into the stream. The poor woman picked up the baby, found it was still alive, and facing the sacrifice it would take to feed another in the family, took it home and reared the little girl as her own. And after years had passed she had her reward as the maiden, the joy of her heart, and the pride of the school, stood before the great people of the town and spoke her message of Christian love. That girl is the representative of the new womanhood of China.

Ex-Governor Patterson's Address

The Tennessee Ex-Governor Tells the Columbus Convention of His Reasons for Turning to the Support of the Anti-Saloon League.

THE Anti-Saloon League and I have not always been friends. They seemed so parallel that it looked incredible they should ever meet. But they have. The path I traveled turned in its course. It ran into the other, and we now find ourselves in the same road, marching in the same direction, under the same flag, actuated by the same desire to destroy the traffic in liquor and redeem a nation from its curse.

The mountain would not come to Mahomet, so Mahomet has come to the mountain.

I am aware that to have suddenly changed the views of mature manhood, which I once asserted and proclaimed from one end of Tennessee to the other, has excited surprise and provoked comment. But this is a world of change. Stagnation is decay, and progress is the command of the age and the hope of mortality. I am neither ashamed nor abashed to stand before this great audience and acknowledge the wrong, when I once advocated policies which would have made legal a trade which I have come to look upon as having no rightful place in the scheme and economy of Christian civilization.

Let me relate some facts and experiences in my life, and leave the causes which have brought this change about to your own opinions. I grew up in the city of Memphis where saloons were numerous, and regarded as fixed and permanent institutions. I cannot remember to have ever heard of any movement to close them or recall any speech or newspaper article attacking them. I became a lawyer, was elected prosecuting attorney of the district and, during my incumbency, saloons were open and licensed under the law, and were without restriction as to number. I was afterwards sent to Congress, where I served six years. At this time liquor was openly sold in the restaurants of both wings of the Capitol. The convenience and comfort with which intoxicating drinks could be obtained often interfered with my own attendance, that of other members, and distracted attention from the duties of our representation.

While serving in Congress, I became a candidate for Governor of Tennessee, and took a position on the liquor question in the first speech I made from which I never deviated throughout my official career. At that time it was pleasing to many of the temperance people of our state, for I favored the right of communities to vote liquor out if they so desired, and pledged myself, if elected Governor, to carry into effect the will of such communities, and this pledge was performed to the letter. I stated that I did not believe in compulsory state-wide prohibition, and if the legislature should pass such a bill, I would veto it; and this promise was also performed. I prepared a careful message and sent it to the legislature, setting forth my views and expressing the opinion that Prohibition as a governmental policy was fundamentally wrong. I thought that such a law would result in multiplying the evils of the liquor traffic instead of correcting them and holding them in check. This message was the product of my best thought and sincerity of purpose. It was the child of my brain in which I took pride. It was published in the press of Tennessee, also in other states, and commented upon, either favorably or adversely, as the writers might differ. It has been circulated as campaign material, published in liquor journals and in books, and used as arguments by those who were contesting the advance of the Prohibition sentiment. I say to you, fully conscious of the meaning and responsibility of the declaration, that if this message has encouraged lawlessness or ever been sought as a refuge for violators of the law, if it had to stand as my last expression on the liquor question, I would consume it in the living fires and erase it forever from the minds and memories of men.

My life has had deep sorrows. My soul has been tossed on the waves of angry seas. My nature has been profoundly touched and stirred.

THE TRAIL OF LIQUOR.

I have seen the trail of liquor in the criminal courts where I have prosecuted crime. I know and have been a participant in its paralyzing and corroding influence in the social and public life of our National Capital. As the Governor of Tennessee, I have seen it a veritable and raging center of storm around which gathered its defenders and assailants, and from which sprang divisions in parties, disputes in families and dissensions in churches.

Going through life I have seen it drag down many of the associates of my boyhood, blasting their hopes and consigning them to untimely graves. I have seen its forked lightning strike my firstborn—the child of my young manhood, and I have borne with him the suffering and tried to help him in his brave but sometimes melancholy struggle for redemption. At last I have felt its foul and stealthy blow as it turned upon me in its deadly and shaming wrath—upon me, who had plead before the people for its very existence. Men have called me strong; and while I could see its harm in others, I thought myself immune, as thousands before my time have thought, and suffered for the thought.

SOME PERSONAL EXPERIENCES.

All this I knew and felt without a revelation of the deep pathos and meaning of it all. I needed help, for I was groping and my feet were stumbling in the dark. Deep in humiliation, tortured and condemned in my own esteem, which is the severest penalty a man may inflict upon himself, I thought of the oft-repeated phrases about personal liberty, of the power of the human will to resist temptation, with which I had beguiled myself, and I found them as unsubstantial as the fabric of a dream.

When logic failed and reason gave no answer, I cast aside all pride of opinion, all thought of what the world might say or think, and went to the throne of Almighty God. There, on bended knees, I asked for light and strength, and they came. The curtains of the night parted, and the way was clear. I arose a changed man. An invisible hand has led me on to where the vision is unobscured, and the purposes of life stand revealed. From a critic of others, I looked within. From an accuser I became a servant in my own house to set it in order. From a vague believer in the guidance of Divine power, I have become a convert to its infinite truth. From an unhappy and dissatisfied man—out of tune with the harmony of life and religion, I have become happy and content, firmly anchored in faith, and ready to testify from my own experience to the miraculous power of God to cleanse the souls of men.

Out of this has come the profound conviction that on the question with which I had to deal in my public career, all my arguments and all my conclusions, so far as they excused or justified the moral right or policy of the state to legalize the sale of liquor, and thereby give sanction to its ravages on society, were only the empty and hopeless statements of propositions which had no verity or application to a thing wholly and essentially evil, and concerning which no principle of right or order or liberty should ever be evoked for its existence.

A MESSAGE TO THE LEGISLATURE.

I do not mean to undervalue character and resistance as elements of personal safety; but I do mean the time will come somewhere in the life of every man who has delusions of his security against the insidiousness and fearful grip of liquor, when the sentinels of duty will sleep and the strongholds of manhood will be invested and captured by the enemy.

In my message to the legislature I said:

"I recommend that no general Prohibition law be passed abolishing the manufacture and sale of liquor, believing, as

Ex-Governor M. R. Patterson.

I have always done, and for the reasons stated, that such a law will prove a failure and be a detriment to the state.

"I do recommend, however, high license, strict regulation and forfeiture of license for violation of law."

If these recommendations had been followed, the result would have been that the open saloon would have been sanctioned by the law of Tennessee, and my idea was that high license and regulation would eliminate the dives and leave the sale of liquor to men of the better class and under respectable conditions. This might have been the result, but the mistake I made was in drawing a distinction favorable to the saloon as against the dive, or to make any compromise with the evil; for there is no such thing as a respectable saloon, and there never can be. As well might one speak of a virtuous prostitute or an honest thief. It matters not how attractive and luxurious the appointments may be, these are nothing but the paint and daub which hide the hideous features of the hag, and the vice which is most deadly is not that which repels, but that which allures.

THE SALOON'S SISTER EVILS.

The link between the saloon and the brothel is a beaten path, and the saloon stands below as the promoter and supporter of the gambling room above. None know the truth of this with as much certainty of information as the saloonkeepers themselves, and none would be more opposed to the liquor traffic if they did not depend upon it, or think they

It is not necessary to treat them as outcasts, for they are the product of conditions, and there are many men in the liquor business who not only possess intelligence but have kindly impulses and, in some other calling, would became respectable and productive citizens, but while engaged in their present occupation they must bear the odium and ill-fame which attaches to it.

The saloon is sometimes spoken of by its advocates as the "Poor Man's Club," and this cheap appeal has been made to the laboring man for his support; but this is a reflection upon his intelligence, his purpose in life and his value to society; for the laboring man's clubs are his lodge and his home, and the laboring man's assets are his health and efficiency, to all of which the saloon is an avowed and open enemy.

THE SALOON INDICTED.

The saloon cannot produce one veracious witness in its favor as it stands indicted before the bar of public opinion. Its guilt has been shown by an overwhelming accumulation of direct and circumstantial proof, which admits of no doubt, and by its own confession.

It stands a convicted felon, and must receive the sentence of the law. It must go never to return, and, with the going of the saloon, liquor itself should go.

I favor Prohibition in any form that will either reduce or destroy the liquor traffic. I favor it personal-wide, town-wide, state-wide, nation-wide and world-wide.

The fear that business men and others sometimes entertain, that legitimate trade will suffer, has not been borne out by other localities, and what splendid results would come in a material way to have a saloonless nation and to divert an unproductive and wasteful force into waiting fields of enterprise. Taxation would fall, property would rise and we would start upon an unexampled growth. If the man of commerce would exercise the same care and prudence in investigating the effect on business by Prohibition that he usually does on other questions which arise, he will be convinced that it will only hurt the business it is intended to hurt, and will aid all others.

The Anti-Saloon League is non-sectarian, and it welcomes men and women of all creeds and races to join in the humanitarian work in which it is engaged. Its purpose is not to punish crime, but to prevent crime, and its accomplishments have surpassed even its own expectations.

THE LEAGUE'S POWER.

I have seen and felt its power in Tennessee, and though it proceeded sometimes over my protest, it finally captured the liquor traffic. In its work in the United States it is fighting a large, compact and powerful organization with unlimited resources—embarrassed sometimes, I am told, by lack of money; and if some philanthropist would lend his aid to the accomplishment of the undertaking so well begun and now under such headway, I believe the Anti-Saloon League would soon capture the entire liquor traffic in the United States. To aid in this consummation would be to use wealth in a way so big and broad that its blessings would diffuse themselves like the rays of the sun to all the people.

The Anti-Laloon League is fighting the saloon and liquor itself, and has the strongest and holiest reasons for its existence.

We who live in the South may have inherited some of the prejudices, but I believe we have many of the splendid virtues of our forefathers which made our section distinguished and great above the rest. A canker was eating into the heart of a splendid civilization, and it was the institution of human slavery. Once we thought of men who inveighed against it as the wilful destructionists of vested rights, and characterized them as intolerants and inter-meddlers; but the tide of public opinion had set in, and its waters were running swift, strong and irresistible in their might. All questions of whether the North was responsible, who had sold the slaves to the South, of local self-government, property rights and personal liberty were swept aside. The figure of Lincoln, majestic and towering, arose—one of the grandest that ever stood against the horizon, and he uttered the words:

"A house divided against itself cannot stand. I believe this Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free."

THE HORRORS OF WAR.

The conflict came. War with all its horrors was upon us. The country was tossed and rocked in the storm of shot and shell, and the end came when valor could no longer cope with valor. The fife and drum were still. A battered flag, the proudest and bravest that ever led a hope, was furled, but not dishonored, and the South stood in the ashes of her woe like Niobe, all in tears, and drank the bitter cup of sorrow to the dregs. But the slaves were freed. We did not despair, and we have splendidly redeemed our land, and today there is not one to be found anywhere on southern soil who would want, if he could, to revive the institution of human slavery.

The contest now is against slavery of another and more dangerous form. Shackles may encircle limbs, but the coil of the still holds in its crushing embrace more human forms than the slave mart ever held, and alcohol is a fiercer and more heartless taskmaster than any slave-driver who ever cracked a whip over a black and writhing back. To free this country from intoxicating drink is a crusade worthy of all the Richards and Ivanhoes of modern chivalry.

War on Gambling

A Report From Joe Beatty Burtt, Consulting Efficiency Engineer in the Nation-wide Movement Against Gambling.

The movement against gambling was started by the Chicago Law and Order League on December 6, 1912. Within thirty days the movement became nation-wide. Some twelve governors entered the campaign. The governor of Michigan issued a proclamation through the newspapers to the people of Michigan.

The attorney general of Iowa wrote a letter to the state's attorney in each county of the state asking them to stop gambling. This method brought good results without having to arrest offenders. The state's attorney of Oceana county, Michigan, sent friendly letters, with copy of the law against gambling to offenders, and gambling was stopped in this county without making arrests. The jail of this county is empty nearly all the time, which demonstrates that crime prevention can be accomplished without keeping the jail full of idle citizens.

Marshall Field & Company wrote the president of the League a friendly letter giving the rule of the company against gambling. Mr. Charles E. Schlytern, president of the Union Bank of Chicago, sent a friendly message with a check for fifty dollars to help the work. Joseph M. Omo, grand chancellor of the Knights of Pythias in Illinois, did his full part in the movement. By the aid of publicity he made an investigation and found that twenty-three lodges, out of five hundred eighty-seven in Illinois, were in the habit of permitting gambling in the lodge rooms. Mr. Omo openly denounced this vice and stated that he would give the names of the delinquent officers of those few lodges to the newspapers unless they stopped it. Inside of sixty days he stopped gambling in the lodge rooms, without expelling a single member or preferring charges against a single lodge.

LODGES PASS RESOLUTIONS.

The Independent Order of Odd Fellows, at the Illinois Grand Lodge Convention in November, 1912, passed a resolution unanimously denouncing gambling and pledged the support of one hundred and twenty thousand members in Illinois in the fight against lawlessness. At the annual convention of the Sovereign Grand Lodge of Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Minneapolis in September, 1913, a resolution against gambling and all other vices was passed and about two million members of the Order were enlisted in the war against gambling and all vices. The Masons took up the work and gambling was stopped in the Order of Eastern Star, which is the woman's auxiliary of the order. Other fraternal orders took up the work and in some states the clubs of women attempted to stop gambling among the women. The members of the churches realized that gambling tolerated in a few churches brings disgrace upon all the churches. It is claimed that gambling has been stopped in all the churches.

THE CHIEF PROBLEM.

The most difficult problem was to get the college men to take up the work and help stop gambling and lawlessness in and outside of all institutions of learning. At the Twenty-fifth reunion of the class of 1888 of Michigan University a resolution was presented against lawlessness among college men and a similar resolution was presented at the annual meeting of the Alumni Association, calling upon upon college men to help stop lawlessness among themselves in and outside of all institutions of learning. This resolution was referred to the advisory council of the Michigan Alumni Association. Some of the Michigan alumni sent a similar resolution to the officers and members of the National Education Association and asked them to take some action in the matter at their annual convention in Salt Lake City in July, 1913. A similar resolution was sent to the Christian Endeavor convention at the annual convention in Los Angeles, California, in August, 1913.

First Assistant Superintendent Herman F. Schuettler, of the Chicago police department, rendered valuable assistance in the fight against gambling in the city of Chicago.

The movement against gambling has developed into a world-wide movement of crime prevention. The same preventive methods which were so successfully used against the vice of gambling can be successfully used against all other vices. Crime prevention methods have been demonstrated to be the most efficient and most successful methods and some people claim that when these methods are thoroughly understood our jails will be for rent.

CLASSES HARD TO MOVE.

It was demonstrated in the gambling movement that the three classes of people who are the last to move in a movement against lawlessness are:

1. Indifferent college men.
2. Easy going church people.
3. Comfortable married women.

SOME RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. Write a letter to the governors of all the states asking them to establish crime prevention departments in the office of the attorney general of every state.
2. Recommend the plan adopted by the attorney general of Iowa. These departments can be established in each state without new or additional legislation.
3. Take up with business men the idea of moral insurance among their employes, as suggested in the message of Mr. Charles E. Schlytern.
4. Follow up the suggestions made by Michigan alumni and get all the college men to follow the Michigan, or some other plan, of crime prevention among college men.
5. Urge the National Educational Association and the Christian Endeavor Association to take some action in the matter.
6. Appeal to those of foreign birth to do as efficient work in crime prevention as they did in the Sane Fourth Movement.
7. Encourage the men in the fraternal orders and the college fraternities to educate their brethren to understand that they cannot hold a job in any well regulated business organization or get their notes renewed at a bank if it is known that they gamble.
8. Prevent crime in its inception in so-called high society rather than give cruel punishment to the finished products of society who are now confined in our penal institutions.
9. Get men to realize that a new and higher standard of citizenship has been established within the last ten years in all races and organizations of civilized men. Send a message to all men, telling them that gambling and drunkenness are no longer respectable any place in the civilized world.
10. Help educate public prosecutors to realize that they are elected to office not for the purpose of getting as many citizens in jail as possible, but that they are elected to enforce the law and thereby keep people out of jail.
11. Help educate the general public to realize that the oncoming generation is solving the three greatest problems of the human race, which are:

(1) Prevention of poverty.

(2) Prevention of crime.

(3 Efficiency in the administration of justice.

The Master and the Garden

JEANNETTE McMILLAN, in Presbyterian Advance.

IT WAS a delightful old-fashioned flower garden, back from the street and surrounded by a high wall, but where blossomed from the first little crocus who was brave enough to force his way out of the chilly earth, flowers rare and common. Although the wall was high, and to the casual observer impregnable, still to the one who really wished to enter there were doors, some large and some small, of all sorts and kinds suited to the tastes of all who came. To be sure the wall was overhung with vines of many sorts, but they all could be easily pushed one side to the touch of the real seeker for the beauty that was hidden in the garden.

Some were too indolent to seek, others too selfish to care, and the Master of the garden knowing that there were such, built the wall so that the real lover of nature should be rewarded with something of value when he came to his own; but the garden really belonged to every one had they chosen to possess it, and there were flowers enough and of rare beauty to satisfy any who came.

The Master of the garden had chosen the flowers and arranged them so as to satisfy the needs of all who entered, and he loved his flower children one and all, but one bush in particular received his choicest care. This bush bore beautiful roses which only opened their beautiful petals wide disclosing a heart of gold when they were touched by a loving hand, and only then did they exhale the most wonderful and exquisite perfume.

There were several things which were strange about these roses. Although the Master of the garden would gladly have had them open this way all the time, it was only occasionally that any one came into the garden who had the power to open them and so get at the golden heart and the sweet perfume. Not even the Master himself could do this alone, and it always grieved him when the one he chose to perform this task failed in bringing it to pass.

Another strange thing about this particular bush was that after a blossom had once felt the influence of the hand that could open it, and yielded to it, after the one who had the power to so touch the flower life had left the garden and passed on the blossom closed and could never again be opened fully, but the power that had opened it first, gave to it still the power to open other blossoms wherever the rose might touch them. Sometimes the shut blossom refused to use the power. This made the Master sad and he would watch the flower gradually wither and fall to the ground. Sometimes the other rose so touched would not yield.

So the blossoms waved back and forth in the summer breeze on opposite stems, but where they occasionally came in touch the shut flower which had never opened sometimes yielded to the other rose, and the petals unfolded and the delicate fragrance came out from the open leaves.

The Master watched. Full well he knew that back of the folded leaves of the flower which had been open so wide, there still remained a power which could transform other flowers, if only the rose would use it; and full well he also knew that if the rose on the opposite stem would only take the beauty of this gift and open its heart, some lives would be the sweeter and happier for its presence in the garden.

And there were those who knew of the garden and would not enter because they cared not for its Master, and there were others who knew but would not lead others to it because they were selfish, and there were still others who entered, yielded to the flower, and to the Master whose name was LOVE.

Wilson's Democracy

The President Expresses His Belief in the Common Man.

WHEN I look back on the processes of history, when I survey the genesis of America, I see this written over every page—that the nations are renewed from the bottom, not the top; that the genius which springs up from the ranks of unknown men is the genius which renews the youth and energy of the people. Everything I know about history, every bit of experience and observation that has contributed to my thought, has confirmed me in the conviction that the real wisdom of human life is compounded out of the experiences of ordinary men, says the President in the Chicago News.

The utility, the vitality, the fruitage of life does not come from the top to the bottom; it comes, like the natural growth of a great tree, from the soil, up through the trunk into the branches to the foliage and the fruit. The great struggling unknown masses of the men who are at the base of everything are the dynamic force that is lifting the levels of society. A nation is as great, and only as great, as her rank and file.

So the first and chief need of this nation of ours today is to include in the partnership of government all those great bodies of unnamed men who are going to produce our future leaders and renew the future energies of America. And as I confess that, as I confess my belief in the common man, I know what I am saying.

"MAN ON THE MAKE" THE JUDGE.

The man who is swimming against the stream knows the strength of it. The man who is in the melee knows what blows are being struck and what blood is being drawn. The man who is on the make is the judge of what is happening in America, not the man who has made good; not the man who has emerged from the flood; not the man who is standing on the bank looking on, but the man who is struggling for his life and for the lives of those who are dearer to him than himself. That is the man whose judgment will tell you what is going on in America; that is the man by whose judgment I, for one, wish to be guided.

Two Poems

By Thomas Curtis Clark

CAESAR AND CHRIST.

PROUD Caesar came in strength of steel;
The panoply of war was his,
At his command men poured forth life,
The cities perished, nations fell.
He left as heritage a blood-stained tide;
He came, he scorned, he slaughtered,—
And he died.

The meek Christ came, His strength the true,
A heart of love His panoply.
At His command men found their life,
The cities flourished, nations grew.
As heritage, the reign of Peace He gives;
He came, He loved, He pitied,—
And He lives.

THE VOICE OF THE DEEP.

OUT of the darkness born of the night,
Above the billows which over my bark
Relentlessly sweep,
Comes to my spirit, weak with affright,
Calming its tumult, borne from the darkness,
The Voice of the Deep.

Out of the darkness born of my night,
Above the sorrows which over my life
Relentlessly sweep,
Comes to my spirit, weak with affright,
Calming its tumult, borne from the darkness,
The Voice of the Deep.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

WOMAN'S INFLUENCE.

From a Sermon Delivered by Jenkin Lloyd Jones, Chicago.

"In order to discover her place in the state and her part in present civilization, it is necessary to trace woman's growth from primitive conditions to her recent acquirement in Illinois, her place by the ballot box in a democratic government.

"That is most effective pedagogy that deals in concrete illustration; so I propose to study in successive sermons the following typical women: Rizpah, primal motherhood; Boadicea, the woman militant; Hypatia, the woman sage; St. Monica, the woman saint; Joan of Arc, the woman inspired; Susannah Wesley, the modern woman.

"Rizpah occupies but a few sentences on the Biblical pages, but she is an unforgettable figure, standing there in the dim and grewsome gloom of the legendary period in Hebrew history, valiantly guarding the dead bodies of her two sons, who had been murdered by the vicissitudes of war—cruel and barbarous in all ages. This humble concubine of the half-barbaric king, Saul, who won his coronation because his physical stature lifted his head above those of his comrades, challenges the admiration and inspires the genius of poet, artist and moralist.

PRIMAL MOTHERHOOD.

"Here motherhood stands out in the primal potency of the ultimate passion of woman at her best in all ages and all climes. This motherhood of Rizpah is based upon a law that reaches way down to the lower branches of the biological tree. Mother love is so fundamental that it was in the world long before man came.

"Mother courage and devotion seem to find perfection in the bird's nest, the beaver's dam, the jungle where the mother elephants guard their babes, and on the plains, where the mother cows corralled their little ones and joined together in the guarding of this primitive creche, thus permitting mother cows to go off in search of nourishment in relays while their companions stood guard over the baby calves.

"This fundamental motherhood has a social significance which the scholars are enforcing. The new sociology reveals the fact that there was a matriarchate in the world long before there was a patriarchate. The unit of society is not the man with the pike, still less the man on horseback—the leader of the militant clan, but it is the woman with the babe at her breast, the guardian of the hearth; the original priestess was she who kept the fire burning in the hearthstone.

"There was motherhood in the world long before there was fatherhood. There are periods in the life of man, as in the life of the lower animals, where the father is a negligible quantity in the social compact, when it is, indeed, a wise son who knows his own father.

RULE OF WOMANHOOD.

"But low and rare are the kingdoms of life when motherhood is not supreme. The books tell us that even yet in certain species, mother-kin determines the descent and not father-kin.

"But woman does not rule supremely or exclusively in the parental realm. Marriage has its rise in the pride and the attendant responsibilities of fatherhood as well as of motherhood. The birds build their nests in pairs. The highest of them are paired for life. As the scientist finds realms of life where sex is not differentiated, so in the higher realms of spirit we find sex fading into the common humanity. The absence of the common gender is a lamentable defect in the English language, for there is a vast realm of life where sex does not obtrude.

"Profound as are the differences between man and woman these differences are but surface scratches on the human globe. Says Von Humboldt: 'Never can the ideals of beauty, either physical or moral, be reached, until the characteristics of sex are lost in the concept of the purely human.'

"Brave Rizpah was a noble member of primitive society when she valiantly stood guard over the dead bodies of her sons through the long watches of the night and the dreary stretches of drought, but the modern woman has a wider range. She can become a member of the body politic, a councilor of the nation, but not by the sacrifice or the neglect of motherhood. The woman who votes must rise to the superfeminine humanity as the man must sink his masculine arrogance.

"The sex consciousness disturbs both man and woman in their higher functions. The vulgarity and coarseness of man has no place at the polls, no more has the coquettishness and display of woman. It was a depressing column in the newspaper that gave elaborate description of the costumes worn, and as elaborate of the costumes that were to be worn by the delegates at the Peoria convention held recently.

"'Trunks filled with French frocks,' the contents of which must have been divulged by the owners thereof, were unpromising accessories to the processions of voters, as are the extra supplies of cigars and the bottled goods that are provided for the male attendants upon caucuses and conventions."

FIGHT NEW YEAR'S ORGY.

Resolutions urging the strict enforcement of the saloon laws, especially the 1 o'clock closing law, on New Year's eve in Chicago have been adopted by the ministers of the city's churches. Similar resolutions were adopted at a meeting in the City Club attended by forty representatives of civic organizations.

The resolutions follow:

Whereas, For many years there have been earnest protests made to the mayors of this city asking that the laws and ordinances be upheld on New Year's eve, and especially that saloons and cafes where intoxicating liquors are sold shall be closed at 1 o'clock, and

Whereas, An attempt was made last year to make a formal protest to the mayor of this city, and as he declined to receive a large delegation of clergymen and other persons representing different organizations in this city, and

Whereas, The evidence obtained by the Chicago Law and Order League and the Anti-Saloon League resulted in the conviction of several persons for the sale of intoxicating liquor after closing time, 1 o'clock in the morning, last New Year's eve.

Whereas, The general conditions in the city as regards the drinking of liquor, the debauchery of young people, was carried on to a fearful extent on last New Year's eve.

Resolved, That a most earnest request be made upon the mayor of this city to enforce the laws and ordinances regarding the sale of intoxicating liquor on New Year's eve, and that a committee from the Church Federation be appointed to co-operate with young people's organizations of the church and with such organizations as the Chicago Law and Order League, the Anti-Saloon League, the Young People's Civic League, the Citizens' League, the Citizens' Association, the committee of fifteen and other organizations interested in reducing crime and debauchery in the City of Chicago, and that this committee forward these resolutions to the mayor and do whatever is possible to prevent these debaucheries on New Year's eve.

MISS PANKHURST'S BOOK UPHELD.

Anthony Comstock, secretary of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, has announced that he will take no action to prevent the sale in New York City of Christabel Pankhurst's book, "Plain Facts About a Great Evil," unless ordered to do so by District Attorney Whitman. "And I don't anticipate such orders," he added.

"The book came into my hands today," said Mr. Comstock. "After examining it I am able to say that all the objectionable features of the articles in the Suffragette are eliminated from the volume, which is not, as has been alleged, a compendium of those articles. I am satisfied that the sale of the book is clearly within the laws of this state.

"The book makes plain statements of facts about a great evil which is sapping modern life, bringing disease into the home and handing a heritage of disease and imbecility to posterity. Of course the subject is not nice, but I am convinced that it is handled with no desire for exploitation or sensationalism, and in such a manner that it would not excite improper thoughts in the mind of the young."

THE SECRET PLACE.

BY JAMES MANNING BRUCE.

He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide (or lodge) under the shadow of the Almighty.—Ps. 91:1.

The safe and secret place,
Where power and love enfold,
Where souls may lodge secure
From storm and heat and cold.

The secret place of rest,
The brooding shade of God;
There lead the paths of pain
Our aching feet have trod.

The secret place of joy;
The heart bides there and sings,
Loving and trusting, knows
That all to all good brings.

Lord, in thy secret place
And in thy shadow's guard
Keep Thou my soul at peace,
Thou, shield and Thou, reward.

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY

EDITORIAL

A RECIPROCAL RELIGION.

DID you think you were only to receive from God, and had nothing to give Him in return? Then you have something to learn of the spirit of religion! The heavens rain upon the earth, and the earth, parched and thirsty, drinks down the gift of the clouds; but the earth is no mere sponge. All that the earth receives in rain it gives back in mist, but receiving, it buds and blossoms, and smiles back at the blue heaven in its own robe of green. The earth receives light from the sun, but it does more than merely absorb the light. While it has light it rejoices in it, but it reflects it back into the sky, and all the nearer planets view it and are glad. As the earth and moon, facing a common sun, shed light each for the other, so you and I receiving the truth and the love of God walk both in the direct light of love divine, and each also in the reflected light that first belonged to the other. And giving it to each other we give it back to God, not only undiminished, but even the more beautiful. For the light of God is never more His own than when it shines through human character.

NOBEL PRIZE TO BENGAL POET.

MISSIONARIES and American universities have been steadily rectifying original misconceptions entertained alike by Oriental and Occidental regarding each other. We are finding we are not so different, after all. And now comes the awarding of the Nobel prize for literature to an Indian poet, Rabindranath Sagore, of the province of Bengal, the simple musical beauty of whose style and the fine humanity of whose thought and emotion, as expressed in his own English renditions of his work, have strongly stirred lovers of the best in literature the world over. Kipling gave us our first vivid impressions of India and the Indian mind. The impression he left, as one writer expresses it—"an effect of harsh, bright colors, vast spaces, hardness and treachery, suttee, bombs and plague"—was no doubt a faithful impression, but largely of externals and the temporalities of strife. There was genius in it. But in the light of more intimate and deeper mutual understanding, and as we read the words of this new world poet, Kipling's "East is East and West is West, and never the two shall meet" must give place to the older and truer saying, "One touch of nature makes the whole world kin."

THREE CURES FOR WORLD ILLS.

CHICAGO, a city where more important conventions meet, possibly, than any other in the United States, welcomed recently three groups of men and women whose deliberations concerned the welfare of the world to a notable degree. These three convocations, called to be helpful, prescribed for three different sorts of human ills—intemperance in the use of liquors, intemperance in the production of fiction, and for diseases, especially cancer—which war against the human body. The Illinois Federation of Women's Clubs, one of the most influential groups of women in the United States, held its session in the Evanston suburb. After a striking discussion of the efforts of brewers and distillers to prevent all prohibitory and remedial temperance legislation, it overwhelmingly adopted resolutions pledging Illinois women's clubs to fight the entrenched saloon. The action of the women was all the more brave and significant when it is recalled that the United Societies—another name for beer incarnate—are endeavoring to organize the women of the state, nominally to support personal liberty, but as a matter of fact to perpetuate the slave shackles of intemperance upon the home. The daily newspapers, with customary desire to poke fun at things serious, especially when these things have behind them just a touch of assumption of superiority, have been making fun of the American "immortals"—the men organized into the American Institute of Arts and Letters from whose ranks are chosen the members of the "Academy," men who are the embodiment of the most exalted ideals in art, literature and music. The meetings of these two organizations, which hitherto have invariably been held in the East, brought to Chicago a brilliant group of men, writers of international fame, sculptors whose works have been honored by foreign critics as well as in American exhibits, and musicians and dramatists whose audiences attest their power. The most far-reaching action of the annual meeting of the institute was its denunciation of the prurient fiction of our day which is becoming a stench in the nostrils of decent people. The third convention was that of the surgeons of the United States, hundreds, not to say thousands, of whom met not only to strive for the uplift of the entire profession but to form a college of American surgeons similar to that which has been so helpful in Great Britain. The outstanding action of this convention was the adoption of a report on cancer. The wide publication of this report ought to be helpful to the relief of human suffering and to prevent the dull knives of dull and mercenary surgeons from operating for cash instead of for the relief of suffering and pain. The entire country cannot but be uplifted by the meetings of these three organizations, typical of those higher motives which after all are dominant in the great mass of America's millions.

THE CHURCH AND EDUCATION.

THAT the Episcopal church is alert to the importance of religious education as a feature of its work is evidenced by the strong statements recently made by Bishop Lawrence, of Massachusetts:

"Under the condition of this country, with the separation of Church and State, where does this Church stand on the subject of education?" the Bishop asked. "We believe that education includes the whole child, youth, and man; that it involves his physical, intellectual, moral, and spiritual nature. We believe in education in its largest, richest significance. What the boy learns in school is of great importance, but it is only a part of his education; lessons, influences, forces pour into him from every quarter. We believe that the source and spring of character which is the highest result of education is faith in God as revealed in Christ. Religion is at the foundation of education first, last, and always; it gives vitality, depth, and harmony to the whole character."

"The Church of today," Bishop Lawrence declared, "recognizing the conditions of the day and country, must marshal to her service every instrumentality at hand, parents and the home, the press and literature, the playground, an hour of a week or Sunday, various forms of schools, correspondence, public worship, the pastoral work, the parish, the diocese, the Department, everything, and in a large and statesmanlike way, plan for and press through not one system but many systems of religious education, yes, and spiritual culture without apparent system, that will reach and upbuild all sorts and conditions of children in Christian faith and character."

TWO DEAD JAPANESE LEADERS.

TWO interesting figures have just passed from the stage of Japanese public life. Prince Katsura was one of the most remarkable and modern Japanese statesmen. He traveled extensively in Europe in the 80's, and familiarized himself with modern military affairs, especially in Germany. He began his public career as Governor General in Formosa. In 1898 he became minister of war in the cabinet of Premier Ito, and retained that post through several changes of ministry. In June, 1901, he was called by the Emperor to form a cabinet, which remained in power until 1906, a record-breaking tenure of office. During this regime the Anglo-Japanese alliance was formed, and the Russo-Japanese war was fought. After a time, in June, 1908, Katsura was called to form his second cabinet, and during this administration he effected the annexation of Korea which he regarded as his most important contribution to Japan. He retired from office in 1911, but in the opening of the present year was once more summoned forth to a brief and unsuccessful leadership. It is thought by some that public misunderstanding of his motives brought on his death. He was a self-made statesman, progressive though not radical. He shared the low morality of many of the Japanese leaders, but was always favorable to Christian institutions.

The second interesting figure to pass away during the month was Prince Keiki Tokugawa, the last of the Shoguns. This man had passed almost a life-time in practical retirement at Tokio. He represented the old military chieftainship of the age when the Mikado was kept in cloistered seclusion in Kioto, while the Shoguns, or military governors of the land, held court and ruled Japan from their castles, first at Kamakura and later at Tokio. In 1860 the imperial authority was reasserted in an edict from the late Mikado for the abolition of the Shogunate and the resumption by the Emperor of full power. Civil war broke out and continued for several years. But at last Kieki, the last of the Tokugawa line of Shoguns, abdicated, and thus restored the power to the imperial throne. He retired to complete seclusion for many years, but in 1898 he was invited by the Mikado to take up his residence in Tokio and the title of Prince was conferred upon him. With his death the last link that binds Japan to the old feudal age, which extended down to such recent times, is broken.

A REMARKABLE WILL.

LAST April there died in Cairo a young man named William Whiting Borden, an American who was on his way to take up misssionary work in China. Although possessed of great wealth, and only twenty-six years old, Mr. Borden had decided to devote himself to missionary work in connection with the China Inland Mission, founded by Hudson Taylor many years ago. Recently when Mr. Borden's will was read it was found that he had given almost his entire fortune to Christian and especially missionary work. He left $250,000 to the China Inland Mission, suggesting that $100,000 should be applied to the maintenance of incapacitated missionaries. He gave $50,000 each to Princeton Theological Seminary, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Presbyterian Church, the Board of Foreign Missions of the Southern Presbyterian Church, the Board of Foreign Missions of the United Free Presbyterian Church, and the Chicago Hebrew Mission. The Nile Mission Press, the American Bible Society, the Chicago Tract Society, and the African Inland Mission each received $25, 000. Generous sums were also left to the institutions founded by Mr. Moody. The will provides that the residuary estate shall be divided between the China Inland Mission and the three Presbyterian boards. In this manner almost a million dollars was bequeathed by this devoted young Christian man to missionary work. He was studying Arabic with Dr. Zwemer at Cairo when he was seized with the illness that brought him to his death.

CHURCH UNION IN AUSTRALIA.

A VERY important conference regarding the union of churches has just been held in Melbourne, including the Anglican, Presbyterian, Methodist, Congregational, Baptist, Disciples, and Society of Friends. The chief worker in securing the conference was Mr. Wooten, a business man, who received the impulse to his efforts at the Edinburgh Missionary Conference. Several inquiries were held into such matters as overlapping in overpopulated districts, standardizations of college curricula for students for the ministry, and combined plans for the instruction of such students, and the question of organic union. The reports that issued from these conferences were comprehensive and suggestive. It was believed that organic union between the Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational churches was practicable, and a preliminary organization was effected. Perhaps the most notable features of the conference were the positions taken by those bodies least favorable to the plan of union. The Anglicans took no part in the conference, though some of their clergy were present. A considerable section of the Baptists frankly stated that the demand for immersion as the only valid form of baptism must be given up, and freedom be allowed the individual on this theme. The Disciples appeared to be divided somewhat into two groups, one being favorable to union with the other churches, and some being unwilling even to join with them in the communion service. It is expected that further conferences will be held, which ought to lead to the clarifying of denominational views and statements, and to closer co-operation.

PROF. PETRIE'S DREW LECTURE.

THE annual Drew lecture was recently delivered in the library of Memorial Hall, London, by Prof. Flinders Petrie, the noted archaeologist, on "The Egyptian Beliefs in the Future Life." It was a review of many familiar facts regarding this oldest belief in a future existence, but many new points of value were added. No one has ever solved the question as to why this very early people far surpassed all others, even of much later days, in their elaborate system of belief regarding the future. To them the west was regarded as the home of happy spirits, and to it the souls of the departed, kings and subjects alike, passed in reed boats over the river of death. Prof. Petrie thought that probably the west was regarded as sacred because the tribes who held the Nile valley in early times came from the western region. The great feature of the Egyptian mythology was the resurrection after death. "Though thou departest, thou comest again; though thou sleepest, thou wakest; though thou diest thou livest again." The worship of the sun-god, Ra, overthrew the primitive Osiris cult. Osiris himself was arraigned and judged by Ra in the great hall of the dead. Yet Osiris remained in the background of all Egyptian mythology. The souls of the departed went to Osiris, and therefore it was the general desire of the Egyptian of the early age to be buried at Abydos, the Osirian sanctuary.

DR. HUME AT UNION.

IT IS ANNOUNCED that Dr. R. E. Hume, for many years a missionary of note at Ahmednagar in southern India, has been called to the chair of the History and Philosophy of Religion, and of Missions, at the Union Theological Seminary in New York City. In taking this position Dr. Hume succeeds Prof. E. W. Knox. One of the foremost agencies for the promotion of Christianity in India has been the mission and school founded by the elder Hume in Ahmednagar. It is the most important mission in southern India, and has spread its influence throughout the entire Bombey presidency. It is the contribution of the Congregational church to the evangelization of that important district. Dr. Hume will bring to his professional work in Union a rich experience in the heart of one of the most interesting of the non-Christian lands.

CHRISTIAN UNITY AS A CHURCH PROGRAM.

A VERY interesting program of Sunday topics and speakers has been issued by the Mount Morris Baptist Church, New York City, of which Rev. J. Herman Randall is pastor. On successive Sundays from October to May the different aspects of Christian unity are to be presented, under such general headings as "The Economic Basis," "The Ethical Basis," and "The Religious Basis" of Christian unity, and "The Next Step" toward its realization. Under the last of these themes the attitude and efforts of a number of the denominations are included.

Some of the most noted men in the country are to participate in this important symposium. It is a very impressive sign of the times.

The length of a sermon is best measured by the distance between the text and the sermon.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

THAT beautiful wedding at the White House has greatly fascinated me. Of course any wedding is fascinating and any White House wedding is extraordinarily fascinating. But I think the circumstances attending the giving of his daughter in marriage to young Mr. Sayre have done as much to strengthen President Wilson in the confidence and affection of the people as any single act of state which he has performed since his elevation to the presidency. The wedding and its circumstances have given the nation a glimpse into the habits and tastes and ideals of the President's family as perhaps no other event could give.

Of course one's choice of a life companion nearly always discloses one's own ideals. I say "nearly" always because there are many instances, alas! where one's real self has not determined the choice, but a vagrant impulse has determined it. Even in that case, however, the unfortunate mating stands as a monument of an uncontrolled purpose. But most folks, I am persuaded, marry those whom they truly love.

And whom one loves reflects what one is.

I have been today reading the newspaper accounts of this wedding, and I am deeply impressed with the rare character of the two young people who gave themselves each to the other. How beautiful that the daughter of the ruler of the greatest nation in the world should choose to be wedded to an untitled young man but recently out of college, his life work all before him, which he has begun at the bottom with simplicity and straightforward earnestness to do! It might have been so different. It so often is so different. There was no attempt to put on airs; the attempt was rather to reduce to the minimum the airs which custom seems to stimulate if not to require.

THE whole story sounded to me like the story of many a simple wedding that I have attended in quite modest surroundings. Any one of your readers, Mr. Editor, the humblest of them, would have been at home amid the simplicity of that White House wedding, nor would any of us have needed to take a course of training in the etiquette book before going, had we been so fortunate as to receive an invitation!

I would like to have been there! The thing that would have touched and fascinated me most—more than the bride's gown, more than the gowns of the "fine ladies" present (and I confess I am not by any means wholly indifferent to attractions of that sort), more than the picturesque regalia of the foreign ambassadors—would have been the moral beauty of the event I was privileged to participate in. I think I would have been able to see in the whole setting of this event the reflection of many of the nation's moral ideals. Indeed, it is not necessary that one should have been present in order to see this. The accounts in the newspapers paint for us a picture in which those ideals are plainly enough reflected.

HERE, first of all, is the successful Christian home. Our democracy believes in the home. It is fundamental to our happiness and our moral prosperity. And here stand three daughters beside the nation's ruler and his wife, altogether embodying beautifully the success of the family ideal. These daughters have grown from childhood in an atmosphere of Christian culture. With what inexpressible tenderness must not the hearts of father and mother regard the changed family circle! The home has begun to be broken up. It has served its holy function and now begins to lose itself in other homes of which the House of Sayre is the first.

They say the President and Mrs. Wilson stood with but half-hidden clasped hands during the reading of the service. Only the fathers and mothers among your readers, Mr. Editor, can imagine what emotions were telegraphed from heart to heart as they stood thus. But it is a great thing for a nation to have its destinies guided by a President whose whole family is an object of our admiration and our pride. Happily for us, most of our Presidents have set before us such families.

ONE cannot help discerning in the picture also the reflection of our modern educational ideals. Both the bride and the groom, we are told, are members of Phi Beta Kappa, which is not a mere social fraternity, as some reader may think from its Greek name, but an order in which membership is earned by scholarship of distinction. These two young people are the embodiment of the ideal of earnest work at the task of knowledge. And not only so, but they both beautifully illustrate the modern ideal that education is for human service.

Many were the communities in which Miss Wilson had rendered important social service that sent to her tokens of their affection on her wedding day. Workers of a steel mill in West Virginia raised $2,500 with which to purchase a gift and the mountain women of Kentucky and Tennessee whom the bride had often visited and in whose welfare she had taken personal interest clubbed together in groups and made rugs and homespun cloth and pieced bedquilts enough to last the young couple all the rest of their lives.

The groom came to the floral altar accompanied by Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell. And who is Doctor Grenfell? Why, of course everybody knows that he is the English physician who is giving his life to Christian missionary service among the fisher people of the cold coast of Labrador. And how does Mr. Sayre, the bridegroom, come to have this missionary as his best man? Because he worked with him one year, sharing the hardship and the rewards of ministering to God's neglected ones, and he learned to love him.

I LIKE the feel of that! The President's daughter marrying a young college man who has the missionary vision and spirit. The presence of a man like Doctor Grenfell in the wedding party interprets to me the spiritual idealism of these young people—Grenfell, who wrote, besides his missionary books, a searching and wonderfully revealing answer to the question, "What is Christ to Me?" Unless they were spiritually akin to Grenfell they would not have had him in their party. But to be akin in spirit to Grenfell shows how lightly the trappings of high position are held, and testifies to the moral earnestness and reality which our modern educational system is creating in the hearts of young men who come under it.

We are told that the bride desired to keep the word "obey" in the marriage service. When she promised "to love and to cherish," she also added, "and to be the loving, faithful and obedient wife." I would like that very much, provided the husband promised on his part the same thing. The austerity, the augustness, of the marriage relation, needs to be expressed in the ceremony. And that idea of obedience can ill be spared. Obedience, however, not to the arbitrary whims of the husband but to the highest ideals of wifehood—that is what I understand the added clause to mean as compared to the phrasing of the prayer book ritual. And I should feel like asking the groom to add to his vows also the promise to be "a loving, faithful and obedient husband."

OUR homes are in need today of the re-enthronement of the sense of duty. The whole fabric of the family is flabby and frail. Anything that will plant and quicken the stern sense of responsibility for the faithful carrying through of the vows taken at the marriage altar is to be welcomed. It may help only a little, but in this case every little helps, if in the ceremony itself the idea of mutual obedience to the ideals of marriage is not allowed to be effaced.

So I say as I began, the White House wedding has increased our confidence in our President because it has given us a glimpse of his tastes and ideals as they are revealed in his children, in his beautiful home-life, in his daughter's choice of a companion, and in the simplicity, the democracy, the reality, the religious strength with which the circumstances of the wedding were arranged.

And I thank God for our President, and pray His blessing upon the new House of Sayre.

HUGH MACDONALD.

THE PRIVILEGE OF PRAYER.

BY WILFRED T. GRENFELL.

The privilege of prayer to me is one of my most cherished possessions, because faith and experience alike convince me that God Himself sees and answers, and His answers I never venture to criticise. It is only my part to ask. It is entirely His to give or withhold, as He knows is best. If it were otherwise, I would not dare to pray at all.

REPAIRING A BROKEN LINK.

In order to repair what it regarded as the damage done to Church unity's cause by the recent Episcopal General Convention the convention of the Episcopal diocese of New York, just held, sent greetings to the Federal Council of Churches and appointed a committee of seven to find out how closer touch with the Council might be brought about. The local body was enthusiastic and almost unanimous in its action, Rev. William T. Manning, prominent in Episcopal unity affairs, leading in the debates and openly mentioning the awkward position in which Episcopal unity had been left. The only vote against the proposition, cast in the New York convention, was that of Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, the author. This same clergyman introduced and had passed the so-called open pulpit canon in 1907. That was an extreme low church act. Now he takes the extreme high church position.

The late Episcopal General Convention, sitting in New York, adopted in its House of Deputies a resolution making the Episcopal Church a member of the Federal Council of Churches, to which already belong 16,000,000 to 18,000,000 Protestant Christians, or all of the Protestant bodies in America except the Episcopal. Its House of Bishops defeated the proposition by refusing to agree. Episcopalians are leading in unity plans. This action of the bishops caused great regret on the part of many Episcopalians. To set matters right in some measure at least came the action of the New York convention.

JOLIET'S "GO TO CHURCH" IDEA GROWS.

Half a dozen cities are considering a "Go to Church Sunday" scheme, after the plan carried out at Joliet, Ill., on Nov. 9. First reports had it that in Joliet, a city of 47,000 people, fully 40,000 went to some church that day. It is now known, however, that the number was about 18,000. But on all sides that number is stated to be a big outpouring for the city. The scheme started with a Universalist layman, a business man, and it is reported, for local reasons, that the idea was not taken up with entire unanimity, even among Protestants. Catholics did not join in the planning, but did in getting their own members to the ten Catholic churches of the city. Newspapers of Joliet took hold handsomely, and to them much of the success of the plan is declared to have been due. The expense of the central organization at Joliet, a temporary one, is said not to have exceeded $50.

Plans of some other cities, already under way on the Joliet idea, include co-operation by the moving-picture people. The latter are to give, for three or four days preceding, Bible scenes and stories, of which many have already been prepared by moving-picture people. These newer plans also contemplate full-page advertisements in the newspapers, setting forth names of world famous persons who have believed in and proclaimed the Christian religion, either as preachers or laymen. Forty-five churches, including the Volunteers of America and the Salvation Army, were mentioned in the general "Go to Church" circular of the Joliet campaign, and the slogan of the campaign was "We do it for Joliet."

JEWS AND CHRISTIANS MEET IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Jews and Christians, representing two of the largest congregations of their churches in San Francisco, dined together at the Commercial Club, San Francisco, recently, and listened to some of the most liberal speeches on religious and sociological themes ever delivered in that city. The dinner was given by the Men's League of the First Congregational Church in honor of the men of the Congregation Emanu-El, whose synagogue the hosts have been occupying during the construction of their new church building.

The general topic of the evening was "What Next for the World?" Under this broad heading the speakers and their themes were:

Otto I. Wise, a leading Jewish attorney, "Religious Unity in Practice."

Ralph C. Goodwin, secretary of the Young Men's Christian Association, "The Renaissance of the Home."

Rabbi Martin A. Meyer of Congregation Emanu-El, "The Creation of Enthusiasm for Liberalism."

Rev. Charles F. Aked, pastor of the First Congregational Church, "The Recognition in Thought, Law and Social Life of the Equality of Men and Women."

"We are here as representatives of liberal religious thought," said Rabbi Meyer. "The first problem of religious liberals is not only religious unity in practice, not only the renaissance of the home, but the creation of enthusiasm for liberalism. Reaction is strong upon us, in the churches, in the synagogues and in society. Everywhere we hear the cries: 'A truce to modern brotherhood.' 'A fig for liberalism.' 'Let us pursue our own way, unheeding the needs of our fellows.' 'Let us be done with attempts to create a great church unity.' 'Let us be content with being Jews, and nothing more.'

"We need a propaganda to create enthuiasm for liberal religion. The recrudescence of Anti-Semitism in France, Germany, Austria, even in liberal Italy, liberal England and liberal America, would reproduce in the twentieth century the conditions of the middle ages. Because of the picturesqueness of those ancient conditions, many would be glad to set back the hands of the clock of progress in order to bring them into existence again.

"There are many other evidences of reaction—economic, social and political. I urge you men to become apostles of the liberalism of the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. We have had enough of the forms of religious liberty; let us have something of its realities.

"The pulpit neglects its open, palpable duty in permitting economic problems to be solved by those who are guided not by religious ideals but merely by selfish brute instincts. We need discussion of social problems by those who have a consecrated social point of view. The problems of the men and women of the twentieth century will bring us together, where the problems of the teachings of religion have kept us apart.

"We don't want religious uniformity. I am thankful for religious individuality. What we need is an ideal of unity rather than uniformity; recognition of the rights of the group. Our ideal should be not authority against the individual but authority and the individual.

"Mankind needs to be redeemed from prejudice and oppression, our inheritance from the past. Man's inhumanity to man has made thousands mourn. We believe that man's understanding of man will make millions rejoice."

At the conclusion of his speech Rabbi Meyer expressed the hope that a California State conference of religion, composed of representatives of all denominations and creeds, would grow out of the new spirit of liberalism and co-operation exemplified at this meeting.

LATE BOOTH FAMILY NEWS.

The report that Ballington Booth, head of the Volunteers of America, and Bramwell Booth, of the Salvation Army, have "made up" after an estrangement of twenty years, is the chief item of Salvation Army news.

Another outcome of the Salvation Army Congress and the visit of General Bramwell Booth to this country is the certainty that Commander Eva Booth will not be relieved of the command of the Army in the United States for at least another five years. Reasons why she will not are said to be two. One is the fact that during her terms, which have been two of five years each, more property has been accumulated than during twenty-three years previous, or since the Army was established in America in 1880. When Miss Booth took hold Army property amounted to $2,000,000. It now amounts to $6,440,000. The business of the Army here is now only $3,000,000, a year behind that in England, and would exceed the latter were it not that in England a big banking institution is under control of the Army. It is growing here to such an extent that it is certain, it is said, to lead the world within a few years.

The other reason why Miss Booth is to remain is that in many principal cities ambitious plans have been projected for building under Army management. These plans are in the hands of Miss Booth, and she is to be left here to carry them into effect. It is said that General Booth and the English commissioners have been immensely impressed with the business ability with which the Army here has been managed. Cities in which building plans are projected include Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, Minneapolis, Pittsburgh, Detroit, Boston, Washington and Cincinnati. These buildings are for various purposes, but include homes, hospitals, schools and industrial training plants for men and women.

Of Human Interest

Henry Watterson on "Home."

Home! There may be words as sweet, words as tender, words more resonant and high, but within our language round, is there one word so all-embracing as that simple word, Home? Home, "be it ever so humble there's no place like home"—the Old Kentucky Home; the home of your fathers and of mine; of innocent childhood, of happy boyhood, of budding manhood; when all the world seemed bright and fair; and hearts were full and strong; when life was a fairy tale, and the wind, as it breathed upon the honeysuckle about the door, whispered naught but of love and fame; the glory—strode the sunbeams, and there was no such music as the low of cattle, the whirl of the spinning-wheel, the call of the dinner-horn, and the creaking of the barnyard gate. Home—

For it's "Home, Home, Home," sighs the exile on the beach, and it's "Home, Home, Home," cries the hunter from the hills and the hero from the wars—"Hame to my ain countree," always Home, whether it be tears or trophies we bring; whether we come with laurels crowned, or bent with anguish and sorrow and failure, having no other shelter in the wide, wide world beside, the prodigal along with the victor—often in his dreams, yet always in his hope—turns him Home!

Mrs. Pankhurst Tells Story.

Mrs. Pankhurst at a dinner in New York, said that the militant suffragettes could not love their country as now constituted—they could not love her till, transformed, she gave votes to all.

"We are in the position, omitting the ignominy of it," Mrs. Pankhurst said, "of the beautiful chorus girl of 17 who married Gobsa Golde, the septuagenarian millionaire.

"The day of the wedding, speeding California-ward in Gobsa Golde's magnificent private car, the old man took his bride's hand in his and said:

"'Dear, do you love me for what I am, or for what I was?'

"The beautiful girl answered calmly:

"'I love you, Gobsa, dear, for what you will be.'"

Mrs. General Pickett, Writer.

La Salle Corbell Pickett, widow of the famous confederate general, George Edward Pickett, is a gifted and courageous member of the guild of patient penwomen. Mrs. Pickett began contributing to magazines in 1863, and since then has written unnumbered poems, editorials, short stories and special articles, to say nothing of lecturing on historical and folk-lore subjects. Her life has known many sorrows—her early widowhood was recalled not so very long ago by the death of her soldier son, Major George E. Pickett, "who came home across the sea from the far-off Philippines with eyes forever closed to earth to be opened to the light of eternal day." But, although the saddened mourner says that she now "sits alone in the twilight shadows," she says that "the visions of morning come back to me, radiant with faith and hope and love, even though darkened by the clouds of war," and she is not yet ready to give up the literary battle waged with such gratifying success.

This, the Gettysburg anniversary year, is distinguished by a new and enlarged edition of Mrs. Pickett's most impressive work, "Pickett and His Men," and also by publication of a sad, sweet little story, "The Bugles of Gettysburg," combining history and tender romance. Mrs. Pickett, who lives in Washington, D. C., is still young in soul and heart.

A Hoosier Author Embarrassed.

Booth Tarkington, like most literateurs, writes a wretched hand. Of this he said in New York recently:

"Once, crossing to Naples, I sat in my deck chair with pad and fountain pen, at work on a short story. A young Peorian stopped before me.

"'My!' he said, 'I wish I could write as well as you do.'

"I smiled, and the Peorian resumed his promenade. The next time he passed me he said again:

"'What a hand! If I could only write like that!'

"Again I smiled a flattered smile, and the Peorian made another round of the deck. Then he said a third time:

"'Oh, if I could only write a hand like yours!'

"Nettled a little by this third interruption, I said:

"'Well, what would you do if you could?'

"'Go to China,' said the Peorian, 'and write labels for tea boxes.'"

"Uncle Joe" as Scribe.

Uncle Joe Cannon writes a very illegible hand and when a member of congress received a letter from him one day, he was able to read but a single word. He disliked to bother Mr. Cannon so he went to several friends among the congressmen and finally the letter, except for one word, was made out.

This word seemed very important, as is was underlined, but as neither the congressman nor his friends could make it out he thought he would consult Mr. Cannon himself. He told him of his trouble in reading the letter and explained that with help from several other members of the house he had made out all but the word in question.

Cannon looked at his letter, and then at the congressman, and then again at the letter, his face meanwhile taking on a peculiar expression. Finally he looked at the congressman and with mingled anger and laughter said: "Why can't you see, that word is 'confidential.'"

Our Clever President.

President Wilson, thanks to his training at Princeton, but in greater part to his tact, is said to receive and dismiss visitors more adroitly than any former occupant of the white house.

Sometimes, however, a stupid visitor turns up and then President Wilson's tact is unappreciated and the visitor overstays his time. Apropos of such visitors, the president at a luncheon in Washington told a story.

"There was an old fellow," he said, "who was praising the rising young lawyer of the town.

"'George, for a busy man,' said the old fellow, 'is one of the pleasantest chaps I ever met. Why, I dropped in on him for a social call this morning and I hadn't been chattin' with him more than fifteen minutes before he'd told me three times to come and see him again.'"

The Lineal Descendant.

Senator Tillman was criticising our American aristocracy.

"We have families," he said, "that claim descent from Charlemagne, Richard Coeur de Lion, Shakespeare—in fact all the celebrities of all time.

"These claims to distinction are more or less false. How futile, anyhow, such claims are.

"A little boy said the other day to his father:

"'Dad, what's a lineal descendant?'

"'A lineal descendant,' the father answered, 'is a lazy, worthless loafer whose only claim to importance lies in the fact that he once had an ancestor who devoted his life to hard and honest work.'"

A Roosevelt Story.

Colonel Roosevelt, in a brief interview in Albuquerque, said of a political turndown:

"That was a turndown indeed. Brusque, trenchant, complete, like the cowboy, eh?

"At a concert in Tin Can a lady vocalist was singing. The chorus of her song ran, 'I would I were a bird.'

"But she had no sooner pitched into this chorus than the cowboy sang, in a deep, wall-shaking bass:

"'I would I were a gun.'"

From Near and Far

What was called "the most significant political meeting in the history of Indianapolis was held last week when Progressive party leaders from every section of Indiana and from New York, New Jersey, Minnesota, and Illinois gathered there. Every one of the men and women were pledged to stand by the progressive party. The idea of amalgamation or compromise with the old parties was farthest from the inclination of those assembled, and when Raymond Robins, of Chicago, asked the conference if he might take back to his state the word that Indiana will stand firmly on its ground every one of the assembled guests cheered.

Alfred Russell Wallace, renowned English scientist, recently deceased, is reported to have expressed himself thus, on the occasion of his ninetieth birthday: "I have come to the general conclusion that there has been no advance either intellectually or morally since the days of the earliest Egyptians. Everything is as bad as it possibly can be. There exist in our midst horrors and dreadful diseases never known before. Our whole social environment is rotten, full of vice and everything that is bad."

December 7 of this year will be observed universally as Bible Sunday. It is desired that churches and Sunday-schools everywhere will on this day make the Holy Scriptures the subject of consideration. The press has been called upon to co-operate. The observance of a Bible Sunday has already made substantial progress in various parts of the world. It has been observed for some years sporadically in Great Britain, the United States, Canada, Australasia, South Africa and in the mission churches of North Africa.

At the recent Sayre-Wilson wedding it is reported that no wine was served. The punch used was made of pure fruit.

A Page of Reviews and Literary Notes.

BY ARTHUR GORDON.

THE LIFE OF JESUS, IN THE LIGHT OF THE HIGHER CRITICISM. By Alfred W. Martin, A. M. The author of this volume is a prominent worker in the Ethical Culture movement, and he has made a sincere and interesting effort to write the story of Jesus from the point of view of one who not only accepts all the valid conclusions of the Higher Criticism, but who is also concerned to eliminate from the story of the Master all that relates him to the supernatural. His first chapter deals with the higher criticism as a discipline, and presents in admirable spirit the character of the work attempted by biblical scholars, and the most outstanding of its results. He then takes up the New Testament story, convinced that the only scientific handling of the narrative is that which sees in the life of Christ a purely human experience, though to be sure the most authoritative and sublime experience of the centuries. The virgin birth, the temptation, the miracles, especially the resurrection, are dealt with in this manner. It is conceded that Jesus healed the sick, but the author thinks that this is as far as one should go. The resurrection is of course to be explained as the result of a conviction on the part of the disciples that Jesus had in some manner overcome the power of death. We commend the book to all those who wish to read a thoroughly reverent and scholarly treatment of the life of Christ from this point of view. The unconvincing character of the volume is due to the fact that the method is unable to give proper weight to those features in the life of Jesus which lie outside of a purely naturalistic view, and these are among the most impressive factors in his personality. THE SPELL OF FRANCE. By Caroline Atwater Mason. It was at Avignon, in southern France, that the lady waited for her husband to arrive from America, and begin the fascinating pilgrimage of Provence and the Riviera. Their tastes led them into the antiquities of the towns they visited, and their conversation helps the reader to journey along with them with awareness and pleasure. Few places in southern France have played a more important part in history than Avignon and Lyons. To the former the Holy See was removed in 1300 to bring it more completely under the control of France, and seventy years later, after what Petrarch called the "Babylonian captivity," it was returned to Rome with the triumphal entry of Gregory XI. Two women were directly and dramatically connected with this great adventure of the popes: Jeanne, Countess of Provence, the sinner, and Catherine of Siena, the saint. Avignon is still full of the memories of those romantic times. The interest of Lyons is still older. It was the Roman capital in the days of the early Cæsars, and with the rise of Christianity it became the scene of some of the most heroic martyrdoms. From that city was sent the thrilling letter of "the servants of Christ dwelling in Gaul to the brethren settled in Asia and Phrygia," which relates the heroic stories of Sanctus, Maturus, Attalus, Pothinus, and the maiden Blandina, whose martyrdom was one of the tragic glories of the early faith. That letter, preserved in the history of Eusebius in the fourth century, is quoted in full in the appendix to this volume. Of the artistic, literary and sacred memories of Vaucluse, Arles and St. Remeys, of Petrarch and Mistral, of the Pont du Gard and the monuments of St. Remey, Mrs. Mason writes with contagious enthusiasm. Then away to the Riviera the journey takes itself, and finally back to Languedoc and the fascinations of Carcassonne. In the midst of the journey, like a gem, is set the charming little romance of "La Rose du Wai." Full-page photographs of many of the most charming and picturesque scenes help make the volume a delightful possession. (L. C. Page & Co. Boston.)

CHINA REVOLUTIONIZED. By John Stuart Thomson. The volumes now appearing on China and the Chinese would make a considerable library. But the general reader has litle time to devote to so many volumes, and wishes access to some one book which covers adequately the ground of modern Chinese affairs. It is the opinion of the present reviewer that Mr. Thompson's volume comes nearer meeting this need than any other recent work. He has been fitted for his task by years of residence in the Orient, and by previous literary work which is recognized as authoritative. To this document he therefore brings ample resources and experience. The first chapter traces in a painstaking and accurate manner the story of the recent revolution in China, from the memorable day, October 10, 1911, when the revolution broke out at Wuchang, on the Yangtse River, to the election of Yuan Shi Kai, as provisional president of the Republic. In tracing this story, Mr. Thompson does ample justice to the admirable work of the missionaries, as for example, when he remarks on page 46, "Let us go down to Nanking for a moment to see how the war is progressing. To keep Nanking and Shanghai in touch, the Americans have brought up their beautiful cruisers, 'New Orleans' and 'Albany,' for the American vice-Consul, Gilbert, and his intrepid American missionaries, Dr. Macklin, President Bowen, Mr. Blackstone, Mr. Garrett and others were in the city." Of the fall of the city on December 2, 1911, he remarks on page 64, "The investigation was now complete, and the situation was hopeless for the defenders. Twelve brave Americans had remained on the scene, the great missionaries, Dr. Macklin, Mr. Garrett, Dr. Blackstone, Pres. A. J. Bowen and others, and the vice-consul, Mr. Gilbert, who dramatically watched the bombardment from a high graveyard in the city. They believed in saving blood, much provocation as there was on the side of General Hsu's victorious men. They pleaded with General Hsu for the first humanitarian surrender in Chinese civil war, as an example for all men that Chinese revolutionists, like George Washington's and Oliver Cromwell's men, were men of heart and not feudists fighting for a great cause." Other chapters of the book are devoted to present commercial and industrial conditions, transportational facilities, the numbers and enterprises of foreigners in China, the Chinese army and navy, and many other interesting features of Chinese life. Of the missionaries and their work the author speaks in the highest terms, and refers caustically to those travelers who have professed to find no results of missionary labors in the Orient.

Of the medical work he finds it difficult to speak with just restraint. He says, on page 465, "Were I a billionaire, I am a thousand times sure that I would send a thousand medical missionaries to China for five years, each man to hire a native assistant and carry a full surgical and medical chest, and the Bible and medical text books only. . . No man who ever lived, not even Paul when he wrote the thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians, not even the beloved John when he saw the heavenly city in seraphic dreams, would have experienced such real and great happiness as I." CLASS BOOK OF OLD TESTAMENT HISTORY. By George Hodges. There are many books dealing in admirable spirit with the story of Israel, but there is always room for another, especially when it is written with the scientific precision, the attractiveness of style, and the perception of moral and religious values which characterize this book. The author is Dean of the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, Mass. His work as a religious educator is widely and favorably known. In a series of brief chapters he has outlined the leading features, both civic and religious, in the life of Israel, from patriarchal days to the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the proclamation of the law in the times of Nehemiah and Ezra (Macmillan. $1, net).

THE SECRET OF SUCCESS FOR BOYS AND YOUNG MEN. By B. J. Kendall, M. D. Just the sort of book a boy or young man can read with interest and profit. It discusses frankly the sexual problems which are now for the first time receiving some due measure of attention.

It deals with general health, giving excellent advice regarding daily habits. It points out the dangers of the use of tobacco and liquor in a manner to convince and persuade the reader, and it discusses very helpfully the principles which lead to success in the choice and pursuit of a vocation. Admirable in tone, and valuable in counsel. (B. J. Kendall, M. D. Geneva, Ill. 50 cents.)

HAND-BOOK OF CHRISTIAN INSTRUCTION, By Peter Ainslie. A small catechism in four chapters, dealing helpfully with the life of Christ, the church, the Bible and the Christian life. It is intended for young Christians, and should prove of value in classes. (Seminary House, Baltimore. 10 cents, $1 per dozen.)

REV. CAMDEN M. COBURN is a Methodist minister who has held important pulpits of that denomination in Ann Arbor, Denver and Chicago. He has, however, a side line, as every minister ought to have. With him it is Egyptology. He contributed to the Geographical Magazine a few months ago an interesting article on the jackal necropolis at Abydos, and in the Homiletic Review for November he has a sketch of "The Latest Excavations in Egypt."

Disciples Table Talk

Dr. Dye at Eldred Memorial.

The churches of St. Joseph County, Indiana, united on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 16, in a great service in honor of their lamented missionary, Ray Eldred. Geo. W. Hemry, pastor of First Church, South Bend, presided. Cecil Franklin, of Indiana Avenue, E. K. Van Winkle, of Mishawaka, and Rev. Mr. Mullins of the Lakeville church assisted in the service. The main address was given by Royal J. Dye. Dr. Dye proved to be in this, as in other efforts, a "master workman." At the conclusion of the service the large audience stood, unanimously pledging continued and increased support to the Congo work. Doctor Dye also addressed the Ministerial Association of South Bend and Mishawaka on Monday morning. Never, reports Mr. Hemry, has a group of ministers, met in interdenominational fellowship been more thoroughly gripped by a message than were these men by the address of Doctor Dye. The services held at Mishawaka and at the Indiana Avenue Church were very largely attended. Unbounded enthusiasm for the work was everywhere apparent. A number of new volunteers for special religious work were decided by these services, Mr. Hemry believes.

A "Covenant for Christian Men."

Reuben Butchart, of Toronto, is the author of a new Covenant for Christian Men. E. E. Elliott, of the Brotherhood, sends a copy for publication, and suggests that any desiring the covenant in card form may secure same from the National Brotherhood office, R. A. Long Building, Kansas City, Mo. The covenant follows:

MEN AT WORK MOVEMENT.

"Reaffirming my personal belief in Jesus Christ as a Saviour needed by and sufficient for all men, I desire to engage in His service more definitely for the following ends:

"1. On account of our lack of growth of membership it seems evident that the church does not grip the community—or ourselves—as it should.

"2. I desire to try the experiment of perfecting my own Christian life, making it worthy of the name; and realizing afresh that the glow of inspiration for others may only be kindled by faithfulness in me.

"3. Whereas too frequently the reproach of churches is that to a few workers, mostly women, is left the burden of duty, I desire to co-operate in an attempt to find a task suited to me, and for every man in the church.

"To these ends I solemnly promise to study afresh the word of God, to pray daily for light, and by meeting with my brethren at stated times help in the "man's job" of solving Christianity's problem in our particular church. I approve of the simplest organization which will thereby enable us to promote these religious and social ends for self, for others, and for Christ."

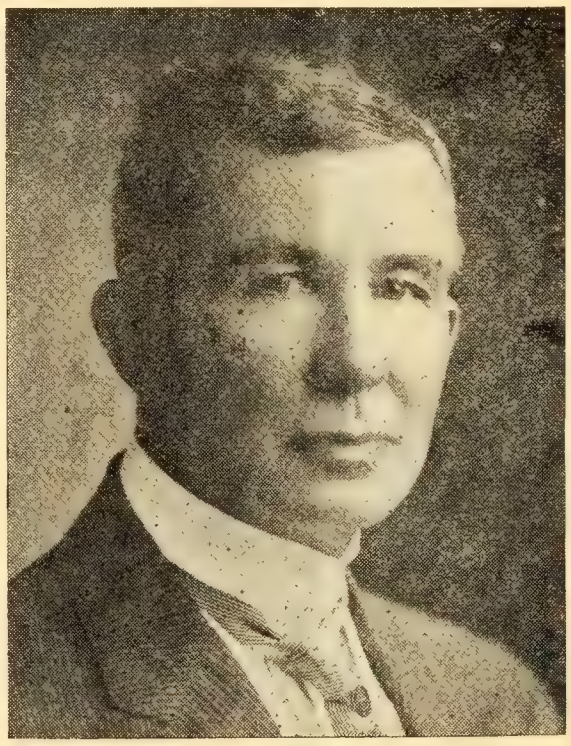
Rock Island Pastor Fights Local Evils.

M. E. Chatley has taken up arms in a war on local evils. In a sermon recently preached at Memorial Church, Rock Island, Ill., he held city officials responsible and demanded that they clean up or resign. But he placed blame also on the shoulders of the citizens of Rock Island, for the election of inefficient officials. A recent horrible crime gave point to the sermon. Mr. Chatley referred to the twenty brothels and ninety-five saloons as a disgrace to the city.

"I expect criticism for what I am saying tonight," Mr. Chatley said in closing. "I will be told that I ought to keep quiet about such things, and just 'preach the gospel.' Well, that is what I am doing—preaching the gospel of moral decency and public safety, showing you your duty as a good citizen. I don't believe that either the pulpit or the pew should settle down into an easy-going self-complacency and talk only of the sins men were guilty of 4,000 years ago. The church of God is not an army organized for dress parade, but a force organized for fighting, radiant with light and thundering with power against God's enemies here in society. The time for indifference is past. The time for action has come. It will never come if you remain indifferent. There are many who thrill with patriotic fervor at the thought of going to war and risking their lives for their country, but who forget to vote on election day. Plenty of men will die for their country, but the man who will live for his city and state every day is the man good government needs."

Japanese Sunday-school Boys Celebrate.

With an elaborate seven-course banquet, a program of speeches and music and a general good time, members of the Salt Lake City Japanese Sunday School Boys' Association celebrated the sixth anniversary of its foundation last week at Central Church. S. Narita, the first member of the association, acted as toastmaster. In a characteristic Japanese speech, delivered in fairly good



J. Fred Jones, Resigning Secretary of Illinois State Missionary Society.

English, Mr. Narita told of the advantages which have come to the Japanese youths of Salt Lake from their membership in the Sunday-school. He paid tribute to the American teachers who have labored to interest the Japanese young men in the work and to uplift them. That Christianity and the conversion of the Japanese is the only solution to the difficulty now existing between the United States and Japan, was expressed by W. Sakahiaara, professor of Sensu University of Tokyo. Professor Sakahiaara is making a short visit to Salt Lake on his way east and was one of the guests of honor. His remarks were deeply religious. This association of Japanese Sunday-school students is said to be the only organization of its kind in the inter-mountain region. From a small class of three, six years ago, the class has grown to a membership of more than 100. These are divided into three classes which meet each Sunday at the Central church. The organization is non-sectarian.

South Favors General Convention.

R. Graham Frank, of Liberty, Mo., Corresponding Secretary of the General Convention, has just returned from a tour of the Southern conventions, which he made in company with President Hill M. Bell and E. E. Elliott, also convention officers. A conference with the Atlanta people and with L. O. Bricker, chairman of the Atlanta committee on arrangements, convinced Mr. Frank that hearty co-operation may be expected in the convention city toward a successful meeting next year. Mr. Frank attended the North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida conventions, with the purpose of setting before the southern Disciples the real origin and nature of the General Convention. Mr. Frank writes, concerning the sentiment of the Southerners regarding the convention, as follows: "There has been so much dust in the air and so many unwise and unchristian things have been said and written that it is a wonder to me that our people have not become worse confused than they have concerning the purpose of the General Convention. In each of these state conventions, I spoke of the origin and nature of the General Convention, and my addresses were received in a most cordial way. In North Carolina I found that our State convention is and for years has been a strictly delegate convention. Many of the leaders of our work who were in attendance at the convention told me that there was only one man in the state who was opposed to the delegate convention and that he was not in attendance. In South Carolina, I found that the men who are leading in our work there are heartily in favor of the General Convention. The same is true in Georgia and Florida. In speaking of the delegate feature of the General Convention I said in my address: 'It seems to me that the emphasis in this matter has been sometimes misplaced. It is not so much a matter as to who shall vote or where the delegates shall sit in the convention. The matter of first and vital importance is that of educating our local churches to take sufficient interest in our conventions to select representatives to attend them.' It was a very great delight to me to find that so many of the leaders of our people in the Southeast look favorably upon this new order of things. The men and women who talked with me did so with the utmost freedom. There were frequent expressions of grief and sometimes of righteous indignation concerning some of the things that had been written about the men and women who had led in the organization of the General Convention."

Pastor Suggests Publicity Campaign.

C. R. Oakley, pastor at Mansfield, O., believes that the time has come for a publicity campaign on the part of the Disciples. He suggests paid advertisements in daily papers and magazines as media of publicity. He writes: "We have had church-going campaigns, Sunday-school campaigns, simultaneous evangelistic campaigns and House-to-house canvasses. These have all been profitable and resulted in stirring up much interest, and in winning many souls to the cause of Christ. Why not try a Simultaneous Publicity Campaign? We have the grandest plea in the world. Why not advertise it? Although we have been in existence for more than a hundred years, and have enjoyed unprecedented growth, now numbering about a million and a half in the United States, yet there are millions of people in this country that know little or nothing about our plea, or what we stand for as a people. Among these millions there are many that are tired of creeds, sectarianism, and ecclesiasticism that would be glad to unite themselves with bodies of Christians upon the simple profession of their faith in Christ. How can they do this unless they know of the existence of such a people? The pulpit is wielding a mighty influence, and yet it reaches comparatively few. The vast multitudes do not go to the churches. The religious press has a limited circulation, extending little beyond the membership. If we are to reach the millions with our plea, we must add to these agencies the use of some instrumentality that will carry this message to the very door of every inhabitant of our land."

Pacific Northwest Parliament of Disciples.

The second Pacific Northwest Parliament of the Disciples of Christ will meet at Portland, Ore., Dec. 29-31, 1913. Every preacher in Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho and Western Canada, is urged to attend. The transportation expenses of the attendants will be pooled among all the attending members. This reduces the expense to a mere nominal sum and makes it possible for those farthest away to enjoy the Parliament. A program worthy of a national platform has been prepared. Its range will cover the social, economic, and religious problems related to the various activities of the church. Program will be published later. Dr. W. B. Hinson, who delighted the delegates to the National convention in 1911 by his address of welcome, will treat the subject of unity between Baptists and Disciples in an address on "Our Common Fundamentals." Dr. Hinson is the pastor of the First Baptist Church (White Temple), of Portland, and has not only a national but international reputation. W. F. Reagor, Floyd R. Ross and E. S. Muckley, of Portland, constitute the committee in charge.

Russia Emergency Committee.

Geo. W. Kramer, treasurer of the Russian Emergency Committee, submits the following: The seventeenth consecutive statement or report of the Russian Emergency Committee covering all cash receipts and expenses to date (November 26, 1913), follows: Cash receipts previously reported, $4,381.68; W. H. Klotz, Macungie, Pa., $2; Mrs. E. B. Grannis, New York, $2; collections, Standard Publishing Co., $89.29; Mrs. L. I. Sweeney, $1,000; total, $5,474.97. Expenses previously reported, $4,100.73; expenses Toronto, express, etc., $8.61; expenses secretary, $3.13; draft Russia, $250; exchange, $1.50; expenses Davenport, $1.70. Total expenses, $4,365.67. Balance cash on hand, $1,109.30. Very favorable reports are received from the work. College opened with double the number of students enrolled last term, only limited to present number by the accommodations possible and state of finances.

Orpheum Theater for Men's Bible Class.

Messrs. Brentlinger and English, owners and managers of the Orpheum Theater at Terre Haute, Ind., have placed their building at the disposal of the Men's Class of George Darsie's congregation, Sunday mornings, furnishing orchestral numbers and special music from week to week. The management made but one request of the men of the class; to fill the theater with the men of the church and of the city at each morning service. The pastor and the officers of the class are determined to live up to the terms of the agreement, and hold that the offer of the Orpheum is exceptional. In addition to the orchestra, the management will put on a moving picture each week if possible to secure suitable films.

Secretary J. Fred Jones Resigns.

At the meeting of the Illinois State Board of Missions, just held at Bloomington, J. Fred Jones, secretary of the State Board, handed in his resignation, to take effect Jan. 1, 1914. At this time Mr. Jones will have completed eighteen years of able service for the Illinois Disciples. J. Fred Jones is known and loved throughout the state not only for the service he has given the state, but also for his strong and interesting personality. He will be missed in the conventions throughout Illinois.

Dean Lhamon Delivers Lectures.

Dean W. J. Lhamon, of the Bible Department at Drury College, Drury, Mo., is giving a series of lectures before the Training School for Sunday-school Teachers, at Springfield, Mo. The lectures are given under the auspices of the Church Federation of Springfield. Dr. Lockhart is considering various phases of the historic background of the life of Christ. The lectures are being delivered one each week, from Oct. 13 to Dec. 15.

California Pastor Popular Evangelist.

For three consecutive years the church at Santa Ana, California, has tried to secure Bruce Brown for a meeting. This year at its earnest request the Board of Officers of Fullerton consented to allow him to be away for a month. C. C. Chapman will fill the pulpit during his absence. The Santa Ana Church, Paul Wright, pastor, is one of the best and most aggressive on the Coast. The meeting began November 6.

The "Church Efficiency" Congress

Held at Davenport, November 17-23.

With but one or two exceptions, there seemed to be a good spirit throughout the sessions of the Church Efficiency Congress, held in Davenport, Ia., Nov. 17-23. The meeting was conceived and projected by the Standard Publishing Company. Its officers were mainly employes of that company and those who were not actually so employed were closely attached by personal interests or sympathy with the company. No newspapers save the "Standard" had been invited to send representatives, although applications for exhibit space in the church basement by the St. Louis and Chicago houses was cordially granted by the Davenport pastor, J. T. Houser. The Christian Board of Publication sent an exhibit of books but no editorial representative. The Disciples Publication Society sent the editor of The Christian Century, but no exhibit. The editor was treated with the greatest kindness and brotherliness. Those present were almost altogether from the "Standard" constituency. The faces were quite unfamiliar to one who is accustomed to attend our national conventions. Few readers of either the "Evangelist" or "Century" were present. The program was made up in the "Standard" office. It included names with which the readers of that paper are especially familiar—Briney, Welshimer, Brandt, Sweeney, Cobb, Father Crowley, Violett, Small, Scoville, M. M. Davis, J. H. O. Smith, Kershner, etc., etc. "Standard" mottoes covered the walls of the church auditorium. The most conspicuous one was this:

Ours is a Loyal School
We use all "Standard" Supplies.

The commercial motive of the convocation was not concealed, but it seemed to affront no one.

GOVERNOR CLARKE'S ADDRESS.

Governor George W. Clarke, of Iowa, set the congress considerably by the ears in his address of welcome on the opening night. He struck a note of progress, a note that might even in progressive circles be called radical, and there was not a little dismay among the leaders. Next evening, however, J. H. O. Smith evened things up by a sermon on the Disciples' position which was as sound as anything Benjamin Franklin ever said. We should not have used the term "Disciples," in this connection, as Mr. Smith strongly objects to it, preferring the term "Christian Church." In this important (?) matter he seemed to have the approval of his hearers. There were probably 400 present from outside Davenport. Not that many were registered, we were told, but no doubt many did not register. The church which has been newly remodeled and which had been dedicated on the previous Sunday by Dr. I. N. McCash will seat perhaps 800 people, using all the lecture rooms and gallery space available. It was filled at the evening sessions, with always some standing who could not be accommodated with seats.

Z. T. Sweeney made the same speech on the Russian work which he delivered at Toronto, and his phonograph played the same Russian hymns. The people were captivated with his plea just as they were at Toronto. Mr. Sweeney seems to have been rejuvenated by his new sense of an important mission on behalf of our brethren in Russia. He speaks with unquestioned sincerity and power. He appeared on the program many times as did most of the better known persons present. For a sermon theme Mr. Sweeney chose the text, "He that would be greatest let him be your minister," and delivered what was evidently a well-seasoned Chautauqua lecture, emphasizing in good language and fine spirit the great ethical ideals which grip the modern mind. He made no effort at playing to a conservative "gallery" but declared boldly that he was in favor of a "delegate convention," a statement that was not cheered until he later explained that such a convention must have absolutely no "authority" over anybody!

John L. Brandt, of St. Louis, in an hour's lecture traced the history of the Church from the birth of Christ through the apostolic age, the middle ages, the Reformation period and down to the present time. He was recounting the victories of Christianity. Following him A. P. Cobb, of Decatur, Ill., pleaded for a congress like this in which none save Disciples' voices could be heard. He declared that there was danger of the lines of our distinctiveness being obliterated or confused through too free association with other Christians and seemed to reflect upon our national conventions for making a place for so many addresses by others than "our own folks." Mr. Cobb shocked some of his hearers by confessing at the beginning of his address that had the option been in his power he would have chosen to be born a "cultivated Christian woman in preference to the best man that ever lived."

J. B. BRINEY IN SPLENDID SERMON.

J. B. Briney made a beautiful and wholesome address—a sermon it was—on the Second Coming of our Lord. He expounded the Thessalonian passage about being "caught up to meet the Lord in the air." The theology of the sermon, as an exposition of Paul's expectation at the time the first letter to the Thessalonians was written, would bear the closest scholarly examination. Mr. Briney threw out a hint at one time to the effect that the early church, including Paul, expected the immediate return of the Lord, but that with his delay in coming they seemed later to abandon that view. He made no use, however, of this clue in interpreting the Scripture, but built up his picture of the end of the world out of the materials furnished in this early Thessalonian description. The sermon was a beautiful revelation of the soul, the spiritual life, of this aged controversialist. Most of us who know him as a debater and polemicist were gratified beyond expression that he chose to make a revelation of his own faith and hope and feeling rather than to argue some mooted question of theology or church polity. Tears were in the eyes of all of us as he bared his soul, and the assembly broke up with a sense of the nearness of God and the reality of the heavenly home.

During the forenoons and afternoons the sessions were held in segregated classes—ten or a dozen of them proceeding simultaneously—for the study of various themes. Some of these were related but remotely to the "Efficiency" idea. For example S. W. Traum conducted classes in the study of Mormonism, and the aged D. M. Canright in the study of Seventh-day Adventism. These subjects seemed to be among the most popular of all those offered, drawing large groups each time. Church finance, evangelism, Sunday-school work, the duties of elders and deacons, the rural church pastoral problems and such themes were treated in other class rooms. This idea of carrying on special studies in classes is certainly a good one and capable of advantageous use in our state and district conventions. The only criticism we heard on this aspect of the Congress was on the fact that the instructors seemed to have come, in many cases, with little or no preparation, trusting to the inspiration of the moment or the interrogation of the class members to provide grist for the mill, much as the unprepared Sunday-school teacher does. There were exceptions, however.

GOOD FELLOWSHIP THROUGHOUT CONGRESS.

There was good fellowship throughout the Congress. It was good to be there. The thinking of the Congress was such as readers of the "Standard" are familiar with, but the spirit of the gathering was much above the temper of the newspaper that projected it. If the "Standard" would itself adopt the temper of reserve and brotherliness which for the most part characterized the talk at Davenport there would be hope that our differences could be talked about and perhaps solved without the haunting fear of a rupture in our body. Teach Christ

TO YOUR ADULT AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSES. The Uniform Lessons for 1914 are based upon the life of Christ. This means that the emphasis in the year's work will be placed upon that matchless study. The best book on that theme published for young people's and adult classes is Dr. Loa E. Scott's

"LIFE OF JESUS"

Why You Should Use This Text:

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There is not a skeptical question in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus." A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study.

A GREAT AND POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC BOOK

The New Praise Hymnal

EDITED BY GILBERT J. ELLIS AND J. H. FILLMORE

There is no equipment of the church more vitally related to its spiritual development and growth than the kind of hymnal it uses. In other words, a church makes no better investment than the purchase of a good hymnal. It is a serious mistake to buy an ordinary gospel song book for use on the Lord's Day and the Wednesday evening prayer services. Such books cheapen the worship.

The New Praise Hymnal comes as near being the ideal church hymnal for the present day as could well be conceived. It is a handsome book, dignified in appearance and make-up. It embraces in its contents as nearly everything demanded to-day as could be gotten into a book of 600 pages.

The New Praise Hymnal is practical in every way; everything in it is available for use in the average congregation. It contains also what is used by the most advanced churches.

The setting of the hymns and music is engaging to the eye and pleasant to read and sing.

It is a book that grows in favor as it is used. New beauties are discovered from time to time as its pages are tested by use. The hymns and tunes of the church universal are found in The New Praise Hymnal, also the best available Gospel Songs that the modern church has found to be necessary to its various activities.

The New Praise Hymnal is widely used in our churches. We believe it to be the favorite book of the church.

GOD'S GLORIOUS GIFT.

By A. Z. Conrad.

The heart center of the Christian's religion is the incarnation. The entire redemptive revelation rests upon the fact that God assumed humanity. Without Christmas there can be no Easter. If the Bethlehem shepherds did not hear the angel choir we have no guarantee that we shall any of us sing the new song. If God did not come among men in Christ the basis of our hope of an eternal fellowship with God is gone. St. John was the apostle of mystic contemplation and spiritual insight. He witnessed a growing faith and determined to discover whether or not it had an adequate foundation. Destructive criticism has opened its batteries on the citadel of the fourth Gospel, but with the clearing of the air we find there is no breach in the walls. The effort to dislodge St. John from the fortress has failed. All the critical surgery of our day is unable to separate John the apostle from the gospel that bears his name. The diligence and devotion of many scholars to determine the authenticity and credibility of the gospel of John is beyond all praise. A very extensive reading of both destructive and constructive criticism has resulted in a calm conviction that the apostle John was the author of the fourth Gospel and that more than any New Testament writer he had the opportunity, the ability and the inspiration to present to the world a trustworthy record regarding the most sacred facts in the life of Jesus Christ. The prologue to this Gospel has been the arena of the greatest critical combat the world has known. No passage in literature contains so much that is vital and fundamental to humanity as the first eighteen verses of the first chapter of St. John. It furnishes a philosophical and theological basis explanatory of all the facts which follow in the sacred narrative. It presents a sufficient reason for all of the teaching and doing of Jesus Christ. Matthew emphasized the fact of the Messiahship of Jesus. Mark stressed the imperialism of Christ as the Son of God. Luke underscored the reality of the humanity of Jesus Christ while St. John goes behind and before all expression or manifestation, and sees Jesus Christ as the Eternal Personality who in all the essential aspects of his being always was and always will be. The triumphant peroration of the poem deals with the self-unveiling of deity when the pre-existent "Word" took upon himself the habiliments of a true humanity that God might henceforth be known and loved by man.

BEFORE THE BEGINNING.

"In the beginning was the Word." Standing on the outer rim of the eternal Now the inspired apostle sees one who uncreated already existed and who did not begin to be at that initial period of time. The one beheld is he who in the solemn moment of the upper room, and in the sublime exaltation of holy prayer spoke of the glory he himself had "before the world was," and "before the foundation of the world." (John 17.) The apostle had accepted the stupendous fact of the pre-existence of Christ and proceeds to set it forth as a fundamental philosophical and theological truth. Language could not more unequivocally declare the concept of eternal existence than in this initial sentence, "In the beginning was the Word." As the entire prologue has been the subject of unending controversy, so the very storm center has been the "Word" "Logos." Both Plato and Philo were familiar with the term and with the Alexandrian school it was a word to conjure with. In the philosophical usage of the day the term had a double meaning of "reason" or dwelling in the God-head and also of the expression of that reason in language, or "speech."

There was not only no hint of an incarnation in the metaphysical speculation of Philo, but his whole scheme antagonized the very idea of the incarnation of the Logos. John never derived his idea of the Logos from the schools of thought of his day. Nowhere in the New Testament writings is the word Logos used to convey the idea of "reason," but invariably with the thought or expression of reason, hence as Word, or Speech. The act of God's self-revelation is repeatedly portrayed in terms like, "The word of the Lord," and, "The angel of Jehovah." Word in Old Testament writing is employed to designate God's revelation. When employed by John, "Word" was a person, before all creation. The material universe was created, made, but not so with the Logos. He was before the beginning, with no time limitation.

THE WORD OF GOD.

"And the word was with God." This is a statement of relationship, a relationship which essentially subsisted in the very constitution of deity. The idea of fellowship is firmly indicated and therefore the personality of the Logos. We are not therefore to limit the fact of the Logos to the matter of revelation or manifestation. The revelation is one which eternally subsisted irrespective of and independent of God's self unveiling.

TRUE DEITY OF THE LOGOS.

"And the word was God." Language could not be more specific than it is here. What is declared is that there is eternal communion and at the same time eternal distinction. The Son of God is not the Father, neither is the Father the Son. What is asserted is that the Logos, or Word, was God distinct from man, or from any created thing or being. In kind and substance he is the same as God.

THE AGENT OF CREATION.

"All things were made by him," that is, all created things came into being through his instrumentality and activity. The notion of Plato that matter was eternal finds no acceptance in the statement of St. John. He has no sympathy with the dualism which was rife at the time of his writing. It is through the volitional energy and the holy act of the Logos that the world has come to be.

LIFE AND LIGHT.

"In him was life and the Life was the Light of men." The Logos is represented as having within himself, potentially whatsoever has come to be through his action and will. The chasm between something and nothing is no greater than that between mere dead matter and living organism. The very comprehensive statement and declaration is this, that life in all its features, phases and forces, in all the vegetable world and the animal kingdom, physical life, intellectual life and moral life, all had its source in the Logos, who was himself Light in all of its fulness and beauty.

DARKNESS AND LIGHT.

"The light shineth in darkness and the darkness apprehended it not." Light and darkness are mutually exclusive. The Light from the Logos had been shining in the darkness long before the period of the incarnation. But in the person of the "Word," Jesus Christ, all the ancient light had come to be focused and He who was himself the Light was pouring out his effulgent brightness into the world about him, and yet sin-blinded minds, seared consciences and dead hearts were unresponsive to the Light's appeal. The reference here is not to a historic fact alone, but to a continuous process. The only possible displacement of darkness is through the incoming of the light.

THE MAN FROM GOD.

"There was a man sent from God whose name was John." In contrast with the Logos this forerunner of Christ is designated as merely human. John the Baptist is introduced as a witness, who, representing as he did all that was best in the prophet and priest of the Old Testament history, was yet personally in great contrast with the one whom he had been sent from God to proclaim. He came for the purpose that he might bear witness to the Messiah. "This man came as a witness that he might bear witness of the light." He had been sent from God that he might awaken and arouse the world from its torpor, indifference and carelessness and to direct it to the light which was to light men to God. He found even the religious world in a moral stupor and warned them against dependence upon merely formal religious observance. He portrayed definitely the conditions whereby the light might be apprehended, by moral earnestness, unselfish obedience, consecrated service. He distinctly disclaimed that he himself was the light.

THE TRUE LIGHT.

V. 9. "That was the true light which lighteth every man which cometh into the world." It is no mere reflection, it is not transitory, but this light is the source of all illumination. It is capable of clarifying vision, energising the volitions and safely guiding every man that comes into the world. "He was in the world and the world knew him not." "He came unto his own and his own received him not." This, notwithstanding the fact that the world was made by him and that his own should have first recognized him. Not so much censure as amazement is expressed that he who was himself the author and Creative Being should have been ignored by his creatures. The tragic fact did not relate alone to the prenativity era, but it is a melancholy truth applicable today. The great unattached multitude do not KNOW HIM. All that infinite love could do has been done to make God known to men, but the natural heart is at enmity against God.

THE INCARNATION.

"And the word was made flesh and dwelt among us." We have here the climax of sublimity in revelation. There is no single sentence in any language more pregnant with meaning than this. It outranks and outclasses any words which have fallen from the lips of man or from the pen of an inspired writer. Unnumbered volumes have sought to disclose the real significance of this simple statement. We have brought to view the nature and character, the responsibility of humanity to respond to the divine affection manifested in the humiliating act of incarnation. How forcibly has been set forth the fact of the pre-existence of the Christ, of his creative energy, of his life and light giving nature, of his affectional attitude whereby the children of men have been brought into saving relations and into close fellowship with the Eternal, and now the "Why" of it all appears in a single sentence, "The Word became flesh and dwelt among us." Undoubtedly this statement is entirely unique. The literature of the whole world finds no parallel. This has been made an objection to receiving it as having historic validity. As a matter of fact it is precisely what we would expect of an event so transcendently great. It was the only satisfactory explanation of what the apostle had himself witnessed in the life of Jesus Christ. The expression is intended to represent that the Word took upon himself humanity, a human body and a reasonable soul were his.

GOD'S GLORIOUS GIFT.

God's glorious gift to man of Jesus Christ is the only way he could fully reveal his own nature to man. It was by taking upon himself human nature, enduring temptation, suffering persecution, meeting the trials incident to life, "that we may know we have an high priest who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities" and therefore understands us. Though God had appeared in theophanies, in wonderful providences, manifestations of divine power, his real nature was not understood and the world did not dream of defining him as "Love," until he came and lived among men and went to the last limit of possibilities in sacrifice to declare the extent of his divine affection for those who were loveless and who were enemies to his eternal purpose. The Word made flesh is nigh our interceding Saviour who has wrought for the children of men a wonderful redemption and who sympathetically companionates those who trust him all the way home.

*Note.—International Sunday-school Lesson for Dec. 21, 1913. Scripture.—John 1: 1-18.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

FRUIT-BEARING.

Dec. 10. John 15:1-17: Gal. 5:16-18, 22-26.

The Christian conscience is socialized. We do not enroll a man among the saints because he has had an experience which he calls conversion or has submitted to the forms and ceremonies of initiation into a religious society; we determine the value of the emotional experience and the forms of religion by the social significance of the man who has been converted and baptized.

WALKING IN THE SPIRIT.

The Cynic denied all social obligations. His boast is thus represented by Epictetus: "Look at me, who am without a city, without a house, without possessions, without a slave; I sleep on the ground; I have no wife, no children, no praetorium, but only the earth and heavens, and one poor cloak. And what do I want? Am I not without sorrow? Am I not without fear? Am I not free?" When we cannot have our own way, we are all apt to become cynics. We should like to be free from all obligations and be able to scold the world without incurring any risks. But such a life would be worthless and mean. Of the cynics, Epictetus says, "No: but their characteristic is the little wallet, and great jaws; the devouring of all that you give them, or storing it up, or the abusing unseasonably all whom they meet." The Cynic turns out to be utterly selfish. He has not the courage to live in the world and play the part of a man. Much that has passed for Christianity should be called cynicism.

THE JOY OF LIVING.

Morality has been defined by one of our writers on ethics as life organized and confident, "the struggle for existence being replaced with the prospect of a progressive and limitless attainment." The moral person is happy. Life is full of meaning for him. Life for the disciple of Jesus is organized and confident. He rejoices in hope and also in his present possessions. Very different, however, is this joy from that of the man who has no sense of sin and who refuses to see the misery there is in the world. Nor does he have the satisfaction of the Pharisee who thanks God he is not like other men. The disciple knows he has sinned and come short of the glory of God. The misery of the world is forced upon his attention every day and he takes account of it when he frames his philosophy of life. He is like other men, and he knows it, and he is glad to be a man. The good that he hopes for himself he also hopes for others. Unlike the pilgrim of Bunyan, he travels with his brethren to the city of God. He is therefore already in the city, for he has the daily companionship of those who constitute it a city of God.

FRUITS OF THE SPIRIT.

There are other fruits of the spirit besides joy which the disciple exhibits to the world. Love is the characteristic virtue of the Christian. He who loves has the right attitude toward others and he abhors whatever destroys life. The peace of the spirit is the peace of intelligent confidence. The battle is still on within the soul of the Christian and in the world without, but there is a firm alliance with the powers of righteousness which gives the soul the peace that passeth understanding. God, the teacher of man, is long-suffering with his pupils. They learn slowly the lessons of life. They do many foolish things and suffer the consequences before they attain unto wisdom. The spirit of God endows man with the qualities of heart that enable him to endure the folly of those whom he is trying to lead into the paths of wisdom. The impatience and hardness of the minister and the Sunday-school teacher bespeak the presence of motives other than those inspired by the divine spirit. The disciple is meek, that is, he is aggressive without being indifferent to the rights of others. What he wins he wins for all. The weak and defenseless, the outcast and the hopeless, receive benefits from all his victories. He teaches them to see clearly, to act from their own choices, and to choose the good.

"The Best, Wherever Found!"

That is the slogan of modern Sunday schools. Superintendents and pastors no longer use a certain kind of supplies because they "have always used it." They are on the alert for the best, wherever found. Note what some of our Sunday school leaders say of

The Bethany System

"Nothing Could Pry Us Loose"

We began using the Bethany Graded Lessons at their first issuance and have increased the supply from year to year as the literature for all grades was published. There is nothing in the series that is not now used by our school. Nothing could pry our superintendents and teachers loose from these lessons. They meet the needs of pupils of all years and make the teacher's work a joy. We have no word with which to express our satisfaction with the series.

H. H. HARMON,
First Church, Lincoln, Neb.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teachers' text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN,
Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va.

"Thoroughly Edited"

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upon the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday-school pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned.

L. J. MARSHALL,
Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

"We Would Not Turn Back"

We are using the Bethany Graded Lessons. We would not turn back. The service our Sunday-school specialists are giving us as represented in this course is making a new day in religious education.

FINIS IDLEMAN,
Pastor Central Church, Des Moines, Ia.

"Unanimously the Bethany Series"

After a campaign led by Miss Eva Lemert of Kansas City, Mo., resulting in the thorough grading and departmentizing of the school, we had to decide the matter of graded helps. A committee of three was appointed, consisting of the pastor, superintendent and one member of the Executive Committee. This committee made an individual examination of lesson helps and decided unanimously in favor of the Bethany series, arriving at their decisions independently and solely upon the merits of the literature. So far as I know these lessons are giving entire satisfaction.

EDGAR DeWITT JONES,
Pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

"Nothing to Compare With Them"

We have been using the Bethany Graded Lessons from the time you began to publish them and we are very highly pleased with them. We have often had occasion to compare them with the publications of other houses and thus far can say we have found nothing that compares with them. I am teaching a young men's class in the course, "The World a Field for Christian Service," and am glad to say that it seems to me the best adapted for young men of high school age of all courses I have ever seen. My class is becoming very enthusiastic over it.

P. J. RICE,
Pastor First Church, El Paso, Tex.

"Have Created Enthusiasm"

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

T. E. WINTER,
Pastor First Church, Fulton, Mo.

"Delighted"

Our Sunday-school, which has lately begun the use of the Bethany Graded Lessons, seems to be delighted with them. I have heard no word of unfavorable criticism and very many words of appreciation. Our teachers like the form and material of these lessons.

GRAHAM FRANK,
Pastor Liberty, Mo.

"Best on the Market"

We consider the Bethany Graded Lessons for the Beginners and Primary department the best on the market of our own brotherhood and second to none of other communions. Congratulations!

J. J. TISDALL,
Pastor Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O.

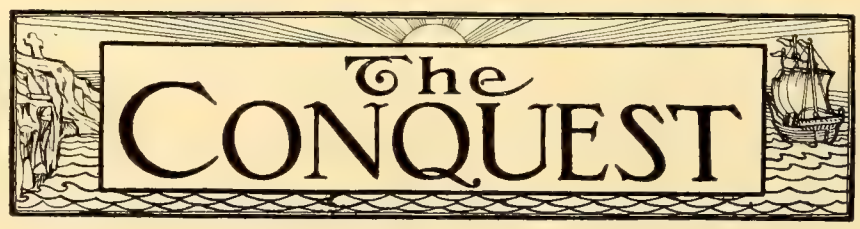
What They Say About Our New Weekly



Rev. Claude E. Hill, National C. E. Secretary—"This paper ought to have a wide circulation among the young people of our churches. I like, especially, your treatment of the Endeavor Topic. I certainly wish the paper abundant success."

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor-Emeritus Christian Evangelist—"I have examined The Conquest with care and with pleasure. If you can maintain the high ideal which is so well realized in your first issue, you will be making a valuable contribution to our Sunday school literature and to the religious training of the young."

Rev. J. H. Goldner, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland—"I like The Conquest immensely. The treatment of the Sunday school lesson, C. E. and midweek prayer-meeting topics is fresh and satisfying. In addition there is an abundance of readable and informing matter of a high order. The paper merits a hearty reception."

Rev. H. D. C. Maclachlan, Seventh Street, Richmond, Va.—"I am very much pleased with The Conquest. It is a good augury for the success of the Sunday school and the Disciples Publication Society that you are putting out such a publication."

W. O. Rogers, of the Sunday School Times Staff—"I have examined the copy of your new paper, The Conquest, with great interest. It looks interesting, which is the first requisite. Then it is interesting, which is the second. It has a fine tone. I predict for it a real success."

Dr. Loa E. Scott, Author of "The Life of Jesus"—"The Conquest is indeed a credit to the Disciples Publication Society. There is need among us for just such a paper, one that takes a broad outlook upon the world and upon the problems of the church and Sunday school."

Rev. Cloyd Goodnight, Uniontown, Pa.—"I like the virility and admire the study pages of The Conquest. Am sure you have a fine combination of page and column features, such as will make the paper not only attractive but valuable. It has the modern touch."

Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds, Author—"I am sure you are putting out just the kind of a paper our young people need."

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

The Present Power

"And the power of the Lord was present to heal them."

Let us therefore hope that some people were healed.

It is a fair inference that there was healing. But it is not a certainty.

We may reasonably believe that there were several healings; that this group of manifestations of the divine power prevents the mention of separate cures; that this occasion in which a number of men were healed in quick succession is contrasted with those other recorded instances in which there were single cures.

But this is only an inference. It is not a certainty. The power of the Lord may be present and available for healing, and no one be healed.

There are vast reservoirs of unused power. The tides ebb and flow with power enough to turn all the wheels on earth, and multiply their number a thousandfold, but it is unused. The waves beating against the shores of the world's long coastline would if utilized save all the coal and carry all the burdens of humanity, but it is not used. The rays of the sun were used by the ancient Greeks to burn a Persian fleet, but practically nothing has been done since in that direction. The solar energy which last summer was expended upon Kansas, burned up the corn crop, and none of it was saved to help us with next winter's coal bills. These vast sources of power are present, but unemployed. They do not heal. They do not help. We have not yet found the way to utilize them.

We stand at the breech of a thirteen-inch gun, and are shown the delicate machinery by which it is elevated and lowered, and turned to the right and left. It suggests wonderful power. But thus far it only consumes power. Very well, here on the ground is a thirteen-inch shell; and here is an electric hoist whereby it may be placed within the gun; let us place it there. We do so, but the gun is just that much more inert; there are now 1,500 pounds more or less to move in addition to the several tons that formerly were there. There is no power in the shell. But here is powder, in large brown prisms, weighed and measured, and ready for the loading; let us place it behind the shell. We do so, and close the breech, but still there is no power. Not till there is a spark; not till out of the sky there comes a tiny lightning spark, does the ignited powder communicate its captive energy to the monster mechanism, and cause the long tube to thrill with life and energy. Then and not till then does the shell take its long curve, upward, then downward, a mile to every inch of caliber, and bury itself in the target a dozen miles away.

How much of our work is futile because we have not the spark of divine power? How much of our ecclesiastical machinery produces no product because we have no unction from on high?

What made the power of the Lord available for healing that day? First of all, Jesus was there. But Jesus was sometimes present and no one was healed. "He could not do many mighty works there" in his own town "because of their unbelief."

The disciples were there as witnesses. They knew that an investigating committee had come down from Jerusalem, hostile and ready to make trouble, and they did not intend that Jesus should be left in need of help. Peter knew that his mother-in-law had been healed, and he was grateful. Peter knew that his own net had been filled, and he was grateful. Peter knew that he had been called to a close companionship with Jesus, and he meant to make it mean something. He looked over at the scowling scribes, the incredulous Pharisees, and he was ready to stand by his Master.

We need a return of the Amen corner in the church. We need a body of men who are ready to back up the minister and support his message. The presence of the disciples there that day, testifying some of them that they had been healed and others that Jesus had come to them and helped them was one reason why there was healing.

But after it was all over, there were probably some crabbed old scribes who limped back to Jerusalem, saying, "If I had had any faith that He could help my rheumatism, I would have let Him try."

They deserved to limp.

But that is no reason why we should imitate their folly and sin.

The power of the Lord is now present for our help.

The only question is whether we are to use or waste it.

This is a season when we have good right to expect an outpouring of the Spirit of God upon our churches and their members. From every side come up reports of anticipation. The tumult and the shouting over past controversies die. Brethren are in unity, and in brotherly love. The world seems to be awakening from its search after vanities, and to be hungering for spiritual realities.

Now is the accepted time.

The power of the Lord is present to heal.

Shall any one be healed?

Why They Left the Disciples

A SYMPOSIUM.

Editor's Note:—The suggestion made by Hugh Macdonald that The Christian Century secure statements from a number of the ministers who have recently left Disciples' pulpits to accept pulpits in other communions was acted upon by the editor who wrote to eight of these brethren requesting them to state in brief compass "Why they left the Disciples." They were assured in the editor's communication that the purpose of the request was solely in the interest of a better understanding of their motives and the breaking down, if possible, of the sectarian feeling with which such a step as theirs is usually judged. Four of the eight have responded to the request with communications of a character and spirit which we take pride in being permitted to set before our readers. The writers of these replies have all occupied prominent positions among Disciples and are, without exception, greatly beloved by a large circle of their brethren in the ministry and by the congregations to which they have ministered. Their leave-taking is not an event that should be treated with either silence or harsh criticism. They are gracious enough to frankly bare their hearts to us; we will be not less gracious in according them an honest and unprejudiced hearing. Our judgment of their opinions and the wisdom of the course they have chosen may not agree with theirs, but their words to us are the words of earnest men who love our common Master and who desire above all else to make their lives count to the utmost for his Kingdom. All four of the ministers whose replies were received are now in the Congregational ministry, and two of those who did not reply are also in the same denomination. It is not to the present purpose to dwell upon this interesting fact, though it, no doubt, possesses significance. Before presenting their letters the editor desires on behalf of our readers to heartily thank these four pastors for the kindliness and promptness of their response to a request which by men of other than serious purpose might have been treated otherwise.

BY CARLOS C. ROWLISON.

IT WILL BE a pleasure for me to comply with your request to tell you why I accepted a pulpit among the Congregationalists. I do not say, "Why I left the "Disciples" because, as I have stated to my people here, it is my hope that we have reached an age when such a move as mine is not to be considered as leaving one denomination for another, but is rather a way of adding a new fellowship to an old one. This may, of course, be a mere fiction of mine, and certainly has nothing in it for those members of either communion who are still sectarian in spirit. Indeed, I am very well aware that I am quite definitely repudiated by a considerable number of Disciples.

"RESTORING PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY."

But then I have been repudiated by them for a long time, so that I am experiencing nothing new. That, on the other hand, I may retain the fine fellowship which I have long enjoyed with an increasingly large group of ministers and church workers among the Disciples, is one of my most cherished hopes.

To some of these last the acceptance of this pulpit has, I know, given pain; and the hardest thing about my action was to be forced to inflict this pain. Therefore I hail with pleasure this unsought opportunity to state publicly why I have done that which I have done.

In the first place, let me say that I have sought, during the whole of my ministry, to make my pulpit an interpreter of "the spirit of life in Christ Jesus." I have always believed, as I do most firmly believe now, that to make this spirit vital in men's lives is to restore primitive Christianity, and is the only way to bring about the genuine unity of Christ's people. Hence I have believed, and still believe, that I was genuinely loyal to the essential plea of the Disciples.

But I do not believe, and for a long time have not believed, in the interpretations which have been put upon that plea by a large majority of the Disciples. Yet if there is anything at all of worth to the contention of the Disciples, it is that the truth is to prevail, and not majorities. To my mind, there is no truth at all in the historic position of the Disciples, that a certain dogmatic scheme of things is primitive Christianity. The highest representation of God in my Bible is not that of a schemer. His methods are not those of politics. He is a Father, and is Love. So that Christianity is not the propagation of a scheme of redemption, but is simply a way of life. Essential Christianity is not a dogma, but it is a vital, spiritual principle at work in the world for "the revealing of the sons of God."

If this is so, as it seems to me it is unquestionably so, then we may feel assured that wherever the sons of God are being revealed, there the vital Christian principle is at work. This principle works in a thousand ways, and undoubtedly men are led by the spirit of God to a high manifestation of Himself in their lives through most devious channels. By such interpretations, one is led into holy fellowships with men in most varying associations.

City of God, how broad and far outspread thy walls sublime!
The true thy chartered freemen are of every age and clime.

And on the other hand, in the practical efforts of the ministry, one is led to use any means which will produce these spiritual results in the lives of those to whom he ministers. Hence it was easy for me to make use of the accepted practices of the Disciples, just as it is now easy for me to adopt the accepted practices of the Congregationalists.

Secondly, I remained in the ministry of the Disciples so long as I had even the semblance of the liberty which I claimed as my right under the form of their plea. In fact, I never lost my liberty, but did lose my standing as a minister among the Disciples. For more than six years, I have been all too conscious of that fact. Yet I do not blame them; for the large majority do not accept my interpretation of the plea, and because this is so they naturally do not care to invite me to their pulpits, where the ideas of the majority inevitably rule.

DISILLUSIONMENT.

When this discovery was forced into my consciousness, I will admit that I became somewhat desperate. The love for the Disciples, which I had cherished from my earliest youth, did not easily yield to the disillusionment. I invented all sorts of artificial props for my faith that the Disciples were seeking, in an open-minded way, to solve the great spiritual problems of the day, by a genuine return to the spirit and life and ministry of Jesus Christ. I knew that a considerable number of the finest souls in the world were seeking to do this; but I also knew that, along with me, they were hanging on for dear life to the cause made precious to them by childhood training. Along with me, they were maligned and repudiated. And though some of them have achieved a degree of success, which I yet trust may be as leaven for the creation of the new day of the Disciples, still it was evident that I was not achieving any particular success in these later years.

Naturally I contemplated leaving the ministry altogether, and did seek openings for usefulness in fields elsewhere which appealed to my tastes. For some reason, in which it seems to me now as though there were some great element of divine ordering, no door opened to me out of the ministry.

The last step came about in this way. Upon the invitation of the President of the State Normal School at this place, I have visited and addressed the students and faculty each summer for the last four years. In this way I became acquainted with the man who had been pastor of the First Congregational Church of La Crosse for the past twenty-five years. A mutual friend, now living on the Pacific coast, asked me to permit him to suggest me to the retiring pastor as a possible successor. This pastor immediately wrote me a long and most fraternal letter, asking if I would be interested. This led to further correspondence and visits to La Crosse, until with the fullest understanding all around of our essential points of view, the call was unanimously given and heartily accepted.

Let me assure you, my dear brother, that I have never been more conscious of carrying out the divine will than I have been in this movement. And let me assure you further of my confidence that the essential mission of the Disciples may be fulfilled by me in the pastorate of the First Congregational Church of La-Crosse, just as I believe it has been fulfilled in my pastorates, and in other positions occupied by me, among the Disciples. And finally, permit me to express the hope that this act of mine may have some genuine influence in destroying sectarianism, and in bringing the Congregationalists and the Disciples into somewhat closer unity. Believe me always sincerely yours,

CARLOS C. ROWLISON.

First Congregational Church.
La Crosse, Wis.

BY HARRY F. BURNS.

The invitation of the Editor of The Christian Century to make to its readers a brief statement of why I made the change from the pulpit of the Disciples to that of the Congregational Church, I find myself accepting heartily. And I do this the more cheerfully, because I am assured that the Editor's purpose is not to bring "an erring one to judgment" but to set before his readers the facts in a situation which has caused no little concern to some of us, and which I believe to be of considerable moment in the work of the Disciples of Christ. It is evident that the answer to the question which the Editor has set must be found through a frank statement, and an honest facing of the facts; and these facts are largely matters of individual experience; therefore the personal character of the following paragraphs.

EARLY EXPERIENCES.

That several men have gone from the fellowship of the Disciples to the pulpits of other churches is the first fact to be faced. But let me offer no word of explanation until I have stated the facts of my own experience. I was cradled in the faith of the Disciples; my parents being active members of the Christian Church and myself attending its Sunday-school and church services. My college days were spent in a Baptist school, from which I graduated, but during this time I was a member of and regular attendant upon the services of the local church of the Disciples, and many was the time that I urged the need of Christian union upon the attention of the young Baptist theologs. Then came a year in "The Bible School" of Drake University (where I went for special ministerial training), and a brief pastorate during which I began to read theological books representing a point of view decidedly at variance with the fixed system of thought to which I was accustomed. This led to my determination to enter the Divinity School of the University of Chicago, where I found a spirit of free, earnest scholarship, of earnest inquiry, which was to me like the light of a new day. After graduation I went to the pastorate of a church of some importance in a city of one hundred thousand population; and with enthusiasm, for I believed the church to be free and open minded. I even dreamed of soon being able to admit the "unimmersed Christians" into the church, as one of the ways of promoting Christian union, which seemed to me the fundamental plea of the Disciples, and an end greatly to be desired.

But three years' experience taught me that for the majority of people not only in that church but in the state, there was no road to Christian union except upon the basis of a fixed, dogmatic statement of faith. And I further found that to preach the gospel without putting it in terms of that definite statement was to fail of response from many good people in the church. Now I had come to believe that this fixed and well-known statement of things was not adequate and implied an artificial definition of salvation. These were the bitterest hours of my life, for I had come to see that the Disciples' plea for union was not to be taken at its face value in many instances for it rested upon a narrow, dogmatic basis, upon which its realization was impossible; and I had come to believe that in most churches of the Disciples one would find most people unprepared to appreciate any statement of religious truth which did not contain the fixed phrases to which their ears were accustomed.

FURTHER STUDY.

Then came two more years of University study during which I supplied constantly various Congregational pulpits in city and country, and talked much with ministers in Congregational churches, for it had seemed to me that I should find in this fellowship an opportunity to work for the things which are worthful and real in our modern world without the interferences erected by an artificial doctrine of salvation. In the new atmosphere it took some time to find myself, but my preaching met with a response, and I enjoyed the freedom, the reality, of the church life.

WHAT THE CHANGE MEANT.

But the change was not to be made without hesitation. It is no pleasant task to sever one's relations with his brethren in the church in which he has been reared, to meet the misjudgments of his motives which are sure to follow in a group where denominational loyalty has been emphasized as with the Disciples. Besides, one's fellowship and acquaintance is a professional and life asset, not to be quickly set aside. But there were questions of conscience to be decided. Might it not be one's duty to remain and help lead the denomination to a more adequate conception of its mission? This was the crucial question, which some of my friends, under slightly different circumstances, have decided affirmatively. Frankly, I saw no strategic position to which I might go, where with intellectual and moral sincerity in my work, I might effectively promote this desired end.

At the same time I felt deeply that in settling the real, the crucial problems of our age, discussions of theological heresy had little place. Before the great opposing forces of materialism, greed, lust, injustice, so apparent in our life today; challenged as we are by an industrial order, a political activity, the spirit of scientific inquiry, all of which have been compelled to find their guiding principles outside the teaching of the churches, with the resulting indifference to the church and religion; one must feel that the discussion of questions of "baptism" or any other theological heresy, is an anachronism. Implied in these dogmatic controversies is an artificial definition of salvation, which is impotent in the modern world. In face of these considerations it seemed to me right to seek a pulpit where I might be free to address myself to the real problems of the age. That the Disciples would come to such a position I did not doubt (many of them had already arrived); but because the churches have been so largely built up by a dogmatic evangelism, the churches will change more slowly, and as a result of the work of the public schools, with their scientific spirit making impossible the dogmatic presuppositions of that revivalism.

PRESENT CONDITIONS OF WORK.

I am now enjoying perfect freedom in the pulpit, a deep desire on the part of the church to help meet the serious moral and religious problems incident to a period of transition, a response to any pulpit message which has in it the ring of reality, and not only a conviction as to the need of unity but an earnest desire to co-operate with others in every possible way. Into the fellowship of my present church have come persons from every evangelical church, and they feel at home, for the only test of fellowship is Christian character and purpose. This is to practice Christian union.

To such a position I rejoice to see the Disciples rapidly moving, as I rejoice in the splendid work some of my friends are doing toward this end. I pray that men may find it increasingly easy to pass from the pulpit of one denomination to another, for when that day comes we shall find the common basis upon which union is possible; and this interchange of pulpits now increasing will hasten the day of the united church, and the answer of the prayer, "that they all may be one."

HARRY FOSTER BURNS.

First Congregational Church, Oshkosh, Wis.

BY CECIL J. ARMSTRONG.

The change from the Disciples to the Congregationalists in my case was not the result of a sudden impulse; nor was it for pecuniary gain. I think I may justly claim that my record among the Disciples will prove that it was not to escape hard work. My present pastorate is the busiest I have ever had. Financially I have been as well off among the Disciples. The cause is far deeper—it is a soul conviction. It is painful to leave the church of one's fathers.

A multitude of tender ties, growing out of labor, suffering and association, bind one to the past with a grip almost impossible to break. After my own experience I am not surprised that many who feel as I felt, remain where they are, hoping that the necessity of a change of affiliation will pass. But there is one problem that will not down—namely, the best place in which to invest one's life. It was that, not personal considerations, that determined my action. Now I am happy that the struggle is past. Not for a moment do I regret the change—though I miss past associations. I cannot but rejoice that, so far as I can judge, I have not lost a friend of former years.

You ask, Mr. Editor, why I made the change. This demands a frank answer. In giving my reasons I do not mean either to cast any reflection upon the Disciples nor to assume a "superior-than-thou" attitude toward that cause or its advocates. I trust my friends of the past, and all your readers, will remember that as they read this article.

Briefly, but frankly, then, my personal reasons were:

1. I became convinced that the Disciples were stranded on a dead issue. This age is not interested in the restoration of the apostolic church. It needs and must have a twentieth century church. It understands that a church patterned after the synagogue could appeal to the first century. It seizes on the principle rather than the form. Of course there are apostolic truths that are eternal. They are effective today, however, not because they were apostolic, but because they can touch this age. I cannot see evidence that the restoration of the apostolic church is either possible or desirable today.

AN INCONSISTENT PLEA.

2. I became convinced that the Disciples were unconsciously inconsistent or illogical in their plea for Christian unity. I could find no alternative between either denying the discipleship of unimmersed Christians or welcoming them into the fullest fellowship. Not only that, but I can see no reason for that unless also baptism is made a matter of individual conscience. Apostolic precedent, or even command, cannot settle this question. The lexicon cannot change a doctrine into a moral value. Unless immersion can be proven to be more essential to moral character than any other form of baptism, no amount of proof-texts can get this age interested in, or impressed with, it as a divine ordinance. Becoming convinced that union, with insistence upon immersion as a condition of church membership (to say nothing of "salvation") was impossible, and being also convinced that full liberty of conscience in this matter was a condition of unity, what could I do other than that I did—seek a denominational affiliation where such an attitude may be found?

3. I also became convinced that, even if the Disciple program were possible, a wrong method was being pursued to accomplish it. Union will never be produced by argument. The less we talk about it the better. Councils have their value—they would have more value if confined to "acquaintance" and social concerns rather than discussions of doctrines—perhaps, but it has been overestimated. The preaching of so-called "first principles" is a positive hindrance.

HOW UNION WILL COME.

Union can only come through the social passion of Jesus in the heart of the church. In that passion our denominationalism will lose its life only to find the higher life of the higher unity. When the denominations put into humanizing our industrialism and Christianizing our socialism, the time, money and effort that are now expended on sectarian propaganda, the unity of the church will be achieved as by a miracle. A narrow intellectualism, a cold ethicalism, a passionless "decencyism" or a dogmatic propaganda can neither unite the church nor save the world. A hazy social vision will be equally vain. But a social passion that suffers with the masses, yearns to redeem the criminal and dies for the outcast, will do both.

I do not claim that my present denomination has reached this ideal. I do believe, however, that it is more nearly this denomination's ideal than it is that of the Disciples. Certainly, in my judgment, Congregationalism is in a better position to bring about the unity of God's people and to lead in social effort than are the Disciples. In fact, I firmly believe that Congregationalism is in the position that logically the Disciples should have occupied. Their effectiveness was largely destroyed when they turned from the path Congregationalism is now treading.

This is a statement, not an argument or a criticism. Because I wanted to invest my life where it would count most in helping to solve the social problems of our day, in bringing about the unity of the church, and in saving the world, I became a Congregationalist. And this is true of others who have made a change of denominational affiliation. In becoming a Congregationalist I am no less a disciple of the Lord.

Pilgrim Congregational Church.
Superior, Wis.

BY H. C. GARVIN.

Why did I leave the Disciples? Because of radical difference of views. They were intolerant, but I find no fault with them for that. Loyalty to a religion and intolerance towards everything opposed to it are but two sides of the same thing. I only wish the Disciples were not so loyal to their religion, which I have found to be false in every particular.

Men do not err so much in their reasoning as in their assumptions before they begin to reason. Campbell adopted the common, popular views of God, Bible, sin, forgiveness, salvation, etc. He thought of God as having instituted different religions at different times. The truth is, God had a purpose in Christ Jesus concerning man before the foundation of the world, and in creation God gave man the work that is necessary to the realization of that purpose. Everything that God has done for man was towards the accomplishment of this purpose. God never changed, never was taken by surprise, never was reduced to the necessity of employing a makeshift, such as religions at the best are. He never gave or instituted a religion. All religions are false and hurtful. Campbell thought the Bible was given to tell us what to do to be saved. The Bible does not tell us WHAT to do, but HOW to do the work given in creation.

If there were space to consider sin, forgiveness and salvation we should find that the popular conceptions are all false and injurious. We will mention only faith. Campbell held that that man has faith who accepts the statement that Jesus was conceived by the Holy Spirit and born of the Virgin Mary as a historic fact. Jesus teaches that that man has faith who has such admiration for the life and character of Jesus, that Jesus becomes his ideal to which he is continually striving to attain. Where there is no desire to imitate, to be like Jesus, there is no faith. Here again the difference is very great.

DISCIPLES NOT PECULIAR PEOPLE.

It must also be observed that each part of Campbell's fundamental doctrine was held by some religious neighbor. All this being so, it is strange that the Disciples have considered themselves a very distinct and peculiar people. Having the common conceptions and beliefs of the sectarians, why should they not be sectarian too?

The New Testament teaches that Jesus commanded his disciples to dip the bodies of believers in water in the name of the Father, of the Son and of the Holy Spirit for the remission of all past sins. As proof of this doctrine are cited Mark 16:16, Matt. 28:19. As corroborative are mentioned Matt. 3:13-1, John 3:5, Acts 2:39, 8:37, 9:18, 10:48, 22:16, Rom. 6:4, Col. 2:12, Tit. 3:5, 1 Pet. 3:21.

An examination of these passages shows that Matt. 3:13-15, 28:19, Mark 16:16, John 3:5, Acts 8:37 are interpolations. Very probably the whole of the 8th chapter is spurious. The text of Col. 2:12 is corrupt. Acts 2:38, 9:18, 22:16, Tit. 3:5, 1 Pet. 3:21 are mistranslated. We are told of a monk, who, when reading the Psalms, crossed himself every time he met the word "maria" (seas) thinking it was Maria (Mary). The translations of Acts 9:18, 22:16, 1 Pet. 3:21 exhibit a like sagacity. No initiative use of water is here meant. Acts 10:48 refers to the Jewish proselyte washing, and is not fairly translated. In Rom. 6:4 the leaving out of the article before "baptismatos" is a serious mistake, but the chief error lies in the interpretation. To use this in confirmation of the practice of immersion is certainly very bad exegesis. You will say, these are bare statements. Very true. But, if you will give me space, I can substantiate every one of them.

THE QUESTION OF BAPTISM.

Campbell passed by all the teaching of Jesus set forth in the sermon on the mount, in the parables, in his controversies and in his life, and seized upon a few spurious texts and a few mistranslations and built on these a doctrinal structure. Do you ask why I am not still his follower?

If it seems strange to any that there are spurious passages in the Bible favoring baptism, please remember that the bishops got all their power through the sacraments, baptism and the supper. Had it not been for these sacraments or something equivalent, we should not have had a pope. If the pope today had the opportunity to insert here and there in the Bible some sentences in favor of his power without our knowledge, do you think he would hesitate to do it? The bishops had the opportunity once and they used it. This fact makes earnest Biblical criticism necessary.

An Open Letter

To a Young Disciple Minister Contemplating the Acceptance of a Call to the Pulpit of a Denominational Communion.

BY CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

My Dear Brother:

I WISH to write you as one between whom and myself there is no radical difference of conviction. You have been educated in modern schools. You are a reader and a student of modern books. You have come under the influence of the scientific method of finding out what is truth. The practical ideals of service and social co-operation which grip modern minds grip you also, and afford you the terms with which you define your own personal ideal and program. The conception of religion and life—the Christ-like life in its fullness and depth of insight and experience—is the conception to which your minister-heart has consecrated itself.

These, too, are my experiences and ideals. For both of us many of the old dogmas are dead. Those only survive which we can translate into the terms of the world-view of today. Calvin's "Institutes" we do not read, except for historical knowledge as to the way brave minds thought through their problems more than three centuries ago. Alexander Campbell's debates and his "Christian System" we do not read except for the same reason that we read Calvin and St. Augustine and Emanuel Kant. These men have all contributed to the making of our world-view, but they did not have our world-view any more than we—you and I—have the world-view of those who will be living fifty or one hundred years from now.

THE MODERN SPIRIT.

You and I feel an intellectual kinship for each other just because we have been educated under the influence of the modern spirit. Under the influence of this modern spirit (which, incidentally, I believe to be a fresh revelation of the divine spirit) new problems have arisen which have displaced many of the old problems, and you and I have no interest longer in the old problems. One of the effects of being educated under the influence of the modern spirit is the loss of interest in the inter-sectarian disputes about religion. Somehow we feel that men and women of the modern spirit whether they are in our sect or another sect are more closely akin to us than men and women of our own sect who keep on threshing out the old-straw problems which the rest of the world is busily engaged in forgetting.

Hence, with this loss of interest in denominational controversies there is a marked softening down of our sectarian animosity. What Mr. Rowlison says in his letter on another page of The Christian Century is your conviction, and mine too, that the life and purpose of God are manifesting themselves in all the evangelical denominations. We believe, in short, that our neighboring churches of various names are churches of Christ and that to be the pastor of one of them is to be a true shepherd of Christ's flock.

ONE TEST OF FRIENDSHIP.

In a word, we find ourselves, you and I, much less finical about nice distinctions of doctrine or of formal correctness in ecclesiastical practice than are those with whom the old issues and animosities are still alive. We feel that the great thing—the only thing worth bothering about in the matter of fellowship, is Christian character and personal loyalty to the Lord Jesus Christ in devoting our lives to the bringing in of his kingdom. We look therefore upon the transfer of a minister from one communion to another as a much less radical step than it once was regarded. And you are favorably entertaining the possibility of making this transfer from the Disciples to another communion, in the honest belief that your efforts will count for more there than among us Disciples.

DO NOT DO IT!

I pray you, do not do it. And I have gone to the pains in the preceding paragraphs to define your point of view and to confess my own substantial agreement with it in order that the reasons I give for your remaining with the Disciples may not seem to come from one whose mind is sectarianly constituted, and thus alien to your own, but from one who holds the most sympathetic intellectual and moral agreement with you. It is my purpose as I know it is your desire that I speak very plainly what is in my heart to say.

I know you quite well. I have watched your young ministry with deep interest and concern. You came out of the university (it was not the same university that I attended, but all universities are the same today in that if a man really gets INTO them at all he comes away with the modern spirit) newly possessed of these views that I have just been describing. You felt the sharp contrast between your views and the way in which the "fathers" taught. I fear that you have let your soul become somewhat cynical. You have approached your people from above. You have "talked down" to them. You lost interest in the general brotherhood.

I have not seen your face often at our conventions—I do not remember seeing you even once at a national convention, and when I have seen you at our smaller gatherings I have observed that you held yourself aloof, in a fashion. You were to be seen most of the time with a congenial friend or a clique of like-minded spirits, and I always had the feeling that you were not getting into the spirit of our conventions very far. You seemed to be an outsider, critical, except when one of your own kind of men spoke, and holding yourself detached, for the most part, from the things that were going on.

A MISTAKEN CONCEPTION.

Many times I have wished that you did not assume this air of sophistication, of disillusionment. I have wished that you would enter heartily into the larger human communion which such gatherings afford. I felt that you were, all the time, building up a distorted, unjust and false conception of our people, due altogether to the fact that you were looking at us with a mind in which we had not been given a fair chance to register our true character and spirit. It is only secondarily for our sake that I deplore this attitude on your part. It is primarily for your own sake, for your happiness and your fruitfulness in the ministry, that I deplore it.

Not many weeks ago a young man of about thirty-five years came to me to talk about entering the ministry of the Disciples. He was and is yet the pastor of a Congregational church. He was full of complaints on account of the narrowness of his denomination. It was not through any clairvoyance of mine but because I had known him personally for some years that I diagnosed his case as due to much the same primary cause as that to which I am now tracing your discontent. He was cynical about his own people. He had had trouble with two or three heresy hunters in his congregation. He was somewhat suspected in the denomination. He believed the Disciples were a more open-minded people, and that he could find the liberty with us that he yearned for.

Now I am convinced that he would have found liberty with us Disciples, but I am likewise convinced that unless he left his cynical spirit behind him and threw himself into the practical enterprises of our people with a will he would soon get into trouble through the exercise of his liberty. That spirit will get one into trouble anywhere. And the opposite spirit, the spirit of co-operation and hearty fellowship, will make one at home anywhere.

MUST AVOID EXAGGERATION.

I wish to avoid exaggeration. I do not mean to say that you have developed a chronic case of ecclesiastical cynicism. But I do say that your attitude helps more than anything else to account for many of the irritations you suffer in your present pastorate. You are irritated mainly (not altogether) because your attitude irritates others.

What we see is determined by the open mind with which we apperceive—that is a fact of psychology well-known to you, and no man can fairly see the Disciples or the Congregationalists or the Christian Endeavor Society or any social group if he allows local or personal experiences to bias his vision.

This open letter to you is appearing in The Christian Century simultaneously with four letters written by four men who have left the Disciples for the pulpits of denominational communions. I ask you to read these letters carefully and tell me candidly if the writers' conception of the Disciples is in any single case a fair one. I hesitate to do this because the first inference you will make and other readers will make from my request is that I am intending to explain the disaffection of these brethren by the fact that they allowed themselves to fall into such an unsympathetic and cynical attitude as I have discerned in you. But I disavow any such purpose. There are many other possible causes of such a mis-reading of the facts about our brotherhood besides the one I find in you, and I am far from attributing this particular cause to the others. There must be no doubt in your mind or in their mind or in any reader's mind on this point. I am not diagnosing their cases. I am diagnosing yours. But the symptoms are much the same in all your cases—if I may judge from the long letter you sent me, which I have read afresh in the light of these published communications.

INADEQUATE CONCEPTIONS.

As I read these published letters I am amazed at the inadequate conception of the Disciples that is implicit in them. These good men—personal friends of mine, every one, and equally fair-minded, I do not doubt—seem to see a wholly different picture of our people than I see. I cannot help thinking that their view of the Disciples is colored greatly by their own personal experiences and local observations. Perhaps they would themselves concede the truth of this. It is inevitable, as I suggested a few paragraphs back, that their observations would be colored by their "apperception mass," to use a technical term with which you are quite familiar. And in the forming of this "apperception mass" personal and local experiences have played perhaps the largest part.

Here is Rev. Mr. Garvin. He left the Disciples nearly twenty years ago. Of the four whose published letters are before you he probably endured the most suffering of all. The "Garvin case" was a very bitter controversy. He was a teacher in Butler College and took an unacceptable position, as I vaguely recall it, on the relation of faith and repentance and on the New Testament teaching concerning baptism. There is no doubt in my mind that he suffered grave injustice. He may have been somewhat indiscreet, somewhat brash, in his statement of views, but the intense temper which his teaching excited was wholly disproportionate to the seriousness of his "heresy," even if taken at its worst. The iron still rankles in his soul. He bears no love at all for the Disciples. His letter bristles with defiance and vindictiveness. Perhaps you and I would feel as he, apparently, feels if we had had his experience.

DECISION NOT DELIBERATE.

The other three writers, Rev. Messrs. Burns, Rowlison and Armstrong, have but recently left us. They, too, have had personal experiences of mal-adjustment in their pastoral relations. They write with an evident attempt, which is by no means wanting in Mr. Garvin's letter also, to avoid unjust and ungracious characterizations of the body from which they have withdrawn. But the point I am getting to is this: I want to dispel the illusion from your mind that these men sat down in the cool and weighed the merits of the Disciples and the Congregationalists against each other. They did nothing of the kind—no more than did a Baptist minister who recently united with us Disciples and with whom I talked the other day. I asked him why he had come to us. The one definite reason he could give was that he liked our way of having the communion every Sunday! Pressing him for further and more substantial reasons I got this: that the Disciples needed the spiritual interpretation of the gospel he felt he was able to give us! Still skeptical, but without betraying it, I kept on my inquiry until I learned that his personal experiences in his local Baptist church or churches had led him to believe that he could do better work elsewhere. There was no great passion for Christian unity in his soul. No clear vision of the great task we Disciples feel called upon to work at. There was, it seemed to me, no really adequate reason why he should have joined with us rather than with any other body.

So likewise your present willingness to consider a call to a denominational pulpit is due to your personal and local situation. You won't concede that, for it is much more heroic to give a theological issue as the reason. And when you set out to find a theological issue you put yourself in a position where you do not see the Disciples as they really are, and your interpretation of them, like the interpretations suggested in these four letters before us, does not take into account the most essential facts.

There are two essential facts, all of them very clear to my vision, which are entirely missing from the picture of the Disciples seen by these four writers, and from your picture also. I have not space to do more than suggest them and leave to your trained imagination the task of filling out the picture.

ONE FACT DISREGARDED.

The first is the fact that the Disciples have changed. It is inevitable that we should change. We are children of our age, just as Alexander Campbell was a child of his age. We do not believe as Alexander Campbell believed. By "we" I do not mean just you and I, but the Disciples generally. We honor Campbell; we are indebted to him; but we do not follow him. He does not master us, we master him. Mr. Campbell is not read among the Disciples today. The time was when every minister sat at his feet and even every lay convert to the "Reformation" was familiar with his writings.

Candidates for our ministry graduate from our "Bible Colleges" who have never read a line of Alexander Campbell. I am told that the majority of the graduate students from "our" seminaries who enter the Divinity House of the University of Chicago (our single graduate institution) are totally unfamiliar with the writings of the younger Campbell, and that many do not know the Declaration and Address from the Declaration of Independence!

Mr. Garvin says he left the Disciples because he could not be a follower of Campbell in the latter's teaching on baptism.

Mr. Armstrong says he left because the Disciples, he believes, are "stranded on a dead issue," the restoration of the form of the apostolic church.

Mr. Rowlison says he left because to his mind "there is no truth at all in the historic position of the Disciples that a certain dogmatic scheme of things is primitive Christianity."

And Mr. Burns says he left because he could not preach the gospel in a Disciple pulpit unless he cast it into the artificial mould of a fixed and well known and accepted formula—I presume he alludes to "faith, repentance and baptism"—to make it palatable to the minds of his congregation.

DISCIPLES HAVE CHANGED.

I cannot let you read these characterizations of the Disciples without calling your attention to their inadequacy. They omit the essential fact, the fact that the Disciples have changed. One rarely hears a Disciple minister preach Campbell's position on baptism. The prevailing tone of voice is one of apology for the extreme position taken by him on this subject. There are others, many others, and you and I are among them, who say straight out that Alexander Campbell was in error, in radical and fundamental error, in his teaching on baptism. The ministers and teachers who are today leading our people are much more nearly in accord with your views on baptism than with Campbell's views.

As to the artificial scheme of salvation, the restoration of an assumed authoritative "ancient order" of things, and the undeviating use of a fixed formula, I know of no social body a million and a quarter strong and a good round century old that is hurrying so fast to leave certain things behind it as the Disciples are hurrying to leave behind them the legalism implied in those ideas which these writers regard as the essential stock of our people. Our preaching is becoming more and more vital, inward and social, as much so, I sincerely believe, as Congregational or Presbyterian preaching.

I sat in the great congregation of Dr. Charles S. Medbury in Des Moines, Ia., two weeks ago. I must not let my pen begin to describe the deep impression his sermon made upon my soul. It was a sermon that Alexander Campbell could not have dreamed of, not because Campbell was not a master-preacher, but because it was pregnant with the ethics of today—the personal idealism, the new social imperative and a wonderful sense of spiritual reality. Doctor Medbury is a Disciple, but not a follower of Campbell, yet he is usually classed as "conservative" by partizan-minded "liberals" who love to make those distinctions. He has mastered Campbell. Carried by the holy spirit of this age, he has transcended him.

Of the eleven major colleges of our brotherhood the presidents of nine of them are men who have been trained in modern universities and have substantially the same point of view that you and I hold. Nine-tenths of the faculty members of these colleges are the same kind of university-trained men and women who carry into their work the spirit and method of modern scholarship.

Our churches demand that their colleges shall produce modern-minded men to fill our pulpits. There are few congregations especially in the more progressive communities, that nowadays can be satisfied with a legalistic gospel. They demand a vital, a spiritual and a social message. The great body of the Disciples today are as unlike Mr. Campbell as the Congregational church of today is unlike Cotton Mather or Jonathan Edwards.

THE SECOND FACT.

The second fact disregarded by these good men who have left us is that the extreme agitation, the anguish and the temporary miscarriage of the purposes of our people in the past two decades has been due to no essential doctrine which they held but to the wicked machinations of a very powerful private institution.

If I am to deal squarely with you, if I am to avoid doing injustice, on one hand, to these brethren who have left us and, on the other, to the Disciples themselves, I must let that full-packed paragraph stand just as I have written it. There has been agitation in all the religious world over the clash of the old with the new world-view. But there has not come under my observation, outside of the Roman Church, a single free religious communion in which the agitation has been so extreme, so distressful, so bitter, so sinister, as among the Disciples of Christ. The explanation of this unmatched condition is not found in the Disciples' doctrines nor mental temper, for the Disciples have always regarded themselves as progressive and open-minded, and did themselves in their earlier period suffer the charge of rationalism, of unitarianism and of breaking down the authority of the Bible.

Allowing for a certain amount of natural tension in the clash between the old and the new, involving inevitable suffering on the part of some pioneers; allowing also for the errors of judgment and

From New York to Beirut

Beginning a New Series of Oriental Sketches.

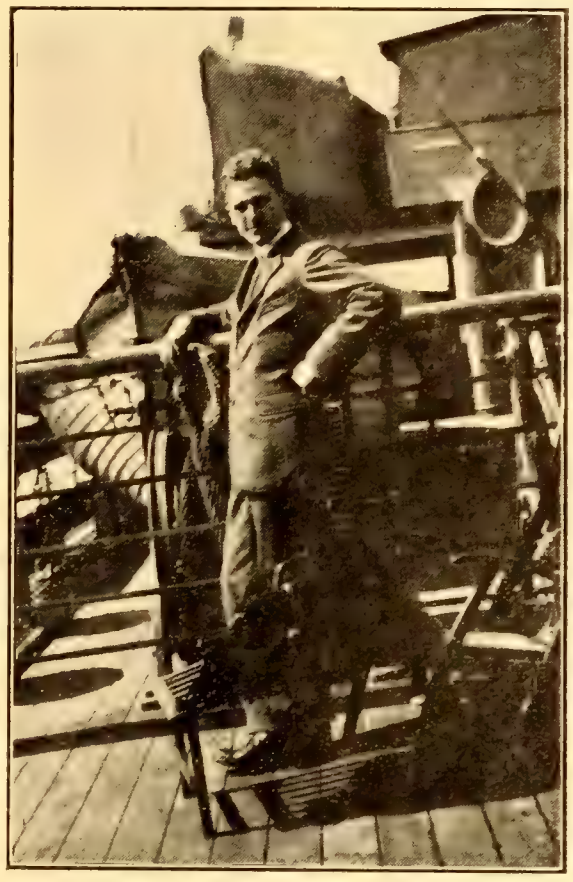
BY HERBERT L. WILLETT, JR.

THE necessity for speed is all too often a distinct misfortune in our American life, and I have felt this fact many times since leaving New York; as we have seen San Miguel, the main island of the Azores group, slip past, allowing us only a glimpse of fertile, terraced fields, green woods capping tall hills, and clusters of white stucco-houses which have a quaintly welcoming look; as Gibraltar has loomed up before us like the grim giant it is, forbidding to the unfriendly, but sure to interest the traveller, and then has been quickly lost in the sea mist; and as we have barely touched the land at Naples before rushing to another ship. But when vessels leave Mediterranean ports but once a week, one cannot afford to risk connections, and so we have sighed as we steamed past appealing bits of scenery, and have hoped for better luck next trip—the traveller's daily comfort.

FELLOW VOYAGERS.

This has been, on the whole, a delightful voyage, despite the assertions of a few still, white-faced figures getting full value of their deck chairs and wondering why people insist upon asking how they feel. Three meals and three lunches a day, aided by sundry baskets of fruit and boxes of candy have succeeded in keeping up most of our drooping spirits, and jolly companions have done the rest. There are nearly thirty persons on the Barbarossa bound for some field of missionary work, and we enjoy to the full association with such families as those of President Bliss of Syrian Protestant College, whither several of us are bound, Dr. Reed of the United Presbyterian School at Assiut, Egypt, and his helpers, Professors Owen and Galloway. Every morning we have prayers led in turn by the different men of the party, and the few moments of worship have been most helpful to all of us, especially, perhaps, to the younger men going out for the first time to an unknown work.

We have had the pleasure, also, of meeting a Jesuit priest and five of his students going to their training school at Innesbruck, Austria, to spend several years of their preparation for professional positions. The entire course can be completed in fifteen years, if a man is industrious, and demands in addition to the rule of "Latin or silence" in all school work, deep study of science, philosophy, and church history. The men were a very attractive group of young college graduates and we found it difficult to understand how they could study in any line for so long a time without finding a host of facts to shake their belief in Catholic infallibility.



On the Barbarossa.

SHIP-BORED.

Although very inventive in looking for amusements, we were constantly pursued by hard luck: all tennis balls went overboard; the shuffleboard sticks were broken; someone stole the quoits; the beanbags broke and the beans were scattered. In the end we were reduced to playing tiddle de winks, and it was truly a fascinating sight to watch gray haired matrons and corpulent gentlemen gather round the small wooden pot on a rug spread out on the main deck and while away the time shooting small colored disks here and there in an atmosphere charged with excitement.

At this season of the year people from Lower Egypt are returning from Europe and the Prinz Heinrich, from Naples to Alexandria, was crowded to the sinking point with Englishmen and their pipes, Frenchmen and their cigarettes, and duck-clad orientals wearing the tarboosh or fez. This headgear is never removed, so far as I have been able to observe, and certainly the dining-room, the church service, the presence of ladies and the trials of seasickness have no power over this strange but convenient sort of hat. The cosmopolitan crowd was a jolly one, however, and some of us who slept on deck to escape the heat of inside cabins found that no sooner did the English contingent cease harmonizing in American ragtime than the Egyptian passengers were astir for their morning stroll and smoke.

COALING THE SHIP.

One thing that every passenger to port looks forward to with interest is the coaling of the ship. No sooner were we anchored in the harbor than four large barges were dragged alongside and swarms of figures black as coal dust could make them raised planks from the piles of coal to our engine room port holes and formed in line carrying up baskets of the dust or large chunks of the fuel, always on their heads, then running down another plank to where new loads awaited them, singing constantly a doleful but rhythmic refrain. Every cabin port hole on board had to be securely closed to keep out the clouds of coal dust which were thrown up as high as the deck, and when we tried to get pictures we found umbrellas and eye protectors very necessary.

When the coal was all loaded small row boats came to carry the workmen to another task. They swarmed on board and perched themselves on the sides of the little craft, shoulder to shoulder, huddled close together like so many birds of ill omen on a death bark. We could not help feeling a shudder of repulsion as we watched these men who had lost all human semblance behind a mask of black, floating slowly and silently over the water in their little boats. Many other times I have seen coal loaded by hand, but never before have I felt as though black ghosts were doing the work.

We landed at Port Said just long enough to recognize the business methods of a restaurant devoted to transients. Mindful of the inexpensive ices

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTIONS.

THE Body of Christ is a democratic body. Recent developments in the manner of holding the Disciples conventions are in the direction of greater democracy. Our conventions have not been democratic. They have been secretarial conventions. The programs and most of the business originated with the secretaries of our various missionary societies. There has been very little business transacted. No sense of responsibility rested upon the attendants at these national gatherings. The people went to hear and to enjoy what the secretaries, for the most part, had provided for them.

Our secretaries have done their part well. They are among the ablest and most trustworthy men in the communion. But no great body like the Disciples of Christ can afford to trust its organized interests to an oligarchy composed even of our most devout and ablest men. The wisdom resident in the whole body is greater than the wisdom resident in a few picked leaders.

We need democratic conventions. In order to be democratic the members of the convention must be representative, and they must be responsible.

They must be responsible. Coming up to a national gathering merely as individuals, prompted by a mixture of motives —the pleasure of the trip, the enjoyment of the speeches, the amicable desire to be of help to the cause—no convention constituted merely of those individuals that happen to be present will take its responsibility seriously. It will not act seriously. It will be satisfied to have questions settled without debate. It will be a crowd, not a convention.

If our conventions are to be responsible they must be representative. The membership of a convention should stand for something besides its own individual opinion. It should represent the judgment and will of the churches. The individuals taking part in a convention should stand for and speak for the churches. This does not mean that on every issue the delegate's judgment will agree with his constituency's judgment, but it means that he will try faithfully to consider the will of those whom he represents. If his conscience disagrees with the will of his constituency he can resign. If his course is disapproved by those who elected him they will elect another in his place next time. But every argument for a democratic procedure in the affairs of every other democratic institution holds with full force in the conduct of the affairs of the democratic Body of Christ.

EPISCOPALIANS AND DISCIPLES.

WE can only plead that our brethren of other names will be patient with us. The spirit of true Christian accord is spreading in this Church. We are not so arrogant as we appear—but we are excessively conservative.

With the spirit of this closing paragraph of an editorial in The Churchman every sincere seeker after Christian unity in every denomination will sympathize. The Churchman is trying to interpret the backwardness of its communion in taking some of those steps toward a united Church which most Christians of other names regard as obviously the right steps to take. It feels the need of making an explanation to the rest of the Christian world for the strange position in which the Episcopal Church places itself when it pleads for Christian unity and declines to practice it. The editorial discloses the editor's breadth of mind. He feels the temper of his own people, but he is also conscious of the temper of other Christians. He knows what is expected of a communion that talks ardently of unity. And he pleads that the Church at large will have patience with his church and charge their strange inhibitions to "excessive conservatism" not to arrogance.

Some of us among the Disciples have had often enough the same sense of chagrin which lies at the basis of this Episcopalian editor's plea for his people. Dr. Peter Ainslie, for example, going into the meetings of the Federated Council where the thirty constituent communions had all paid their share to the expense of the Council, except one colored denomination and the Disciples of Christ, must have had the same feeling. No doubt he made some apology, like that of the editor of The Churchman, in which he sought to find a euphemistic word or phrase to use in place of "indifference," or "inertia," or "sectarian self-sufficiency," or "arrogance."

Perhaps he found such a word. "Excessive conservatism" would hardly suit our people, would it? We stand so consciously for progressive ideas. What would the word be?

Tell us, honestly, Doctor Ainslie, what you do say in explanation!

How do you defend us from the charge of sectarian indifference?

A SURGEON'S DIAGNOSIS.

HUGH MACDONALD thinks the passage of a number of ministers from Disciples' pulpits to the pulpits of denominational communions calls rather for a re-examination of the temper and practices of the Disciples than for harsh condemnation of the ministers that have left us.

He thinks they have suffered much in leaving our fellowship, and that they went because they were made to believe their usefulness was at an end in the communion in which they had spent their lives. As their problem developed it seemed to them that they were reduced to the practical necessity of doing secular (or semi-secular) work if they remained with the Disciples, and that if they were to continue in the ministry in any effective and adequate relation they must invest their lives in the service of a communion affording them tolerance and room to work out their ideals in freedom and peace.

While not wholly ignoring the personal equation in most of these cases of withdrawal—the over irritability of the preacher, his imperfect insight into the Disciples' program, and what might be called sheer bad luck in his not being able to find a congregation suitable to his temperament and message—Mr. Macdonald's diagnosis of the situation is certainly sound and beneficial. He cannot tolerate the suggestion that men who believe in the divine leadership of Jesus, and who desire with holy passion to preach Him as the Saviour of a lost world, should be able to say that they find more freedom in their ministry in any other communion than is afforded them among the Disciples of Christ.

Of course, if this suggestion has any basis in fact it is, as every Disciple of Christ who takes the plea for Christian union in dead earnest knows, a serious commentary on the temper of this Christian union movement. If our fellowship is not broad enough to include and to inspire such men as have recently left us we are in a sorry position as pleaders for Christian union.

Our esteemed contributor wonders if we are more than or other than an ecclesiastical denomination ourselves. He has raised an old question, a question which most of our people probably have imagined had been discussed for the last time. In our opinion it is the livest issue before our body today.

If we are to succumb to the denominational order about us and be ourselves a denomination like the others—but unlike them in being scripturally right while they are wrong!—it is time for us to say so, frankly, to ourselves and to the Christian world.

But if we are intending to hold firmly to our undenominational purpose, and to preach and practice Christian unity, it is time for us to remove from our minds some ideas and from our organization some customs that are radically inconsistent with such an intention.

Certainly our only hope of retaining the allegiance of many other educated young men who are likewise contemplating the step across the denominational border line is to make indisputably good our claim to have abandoned the whole denominational order of things and to stand solely upon the essentials of the Church of Christ.

If we make good that claim, no man can leave us for the beggarly elements of denominationalism without moral disobedience to the heavenly vision.

A CONSTRUCTIVE WEEKLY

THE UPWARD CALL.

WE NEED to be on guard when we talk about the changes made for us in the Revised Version. There is some danger that we shall get the impression that these changes are more in number and greater in imporance than is the case. King James' version of the Bible, which we call the Authorized Version, is a good translation. We could have gotten on very well if we had no better. Its inaccuracies are not of the sort that affect seriously any vital question of faith or conduct Nevertheless, we have rightly determined never to be satisfied with any translation of the Bible less than the very best. For this reason there never can be a final translation of the English Bible. It is a book written in a foreign language and the original manuscripts are lost and we have to learn it through an almost bewildering number of later manuscripts, some better and some worse. For centuries to come there are likely to be occasional discoveries of manuscripts or versions which give us new shadings of Biblical meaning, and it will always be our duty to keep our translation abreast of our greatest and latest knowledge.

There is an unimportant but still very interesting shading of thought in Paul's word about "pressing toward the goal for the prize." The Authorized Version says, "The prize of the high calling." That is not an inaccurate translation, but the Revision gives this interesting shade, which more nearly represents the thought of the original, namely, that it translates it, "the upward calling."

It is not to be pretended that this change represents any radical modification of our thought, but the change is interesting none the less. It is not as though the high calling were something stationary and inflexible. The significance of the change lies in the fact that the upward call is relative and progressive. It is indeed a "high calling," but that does not tell the whole story. It might be too high for us. It might be, and in a sense it must be, so high that we shall say of it in awe, "It is too wonderful for me. It is high; I cannot attain it."

There is a sense in which that must be true of everything relating to God. "His ways are not our ways, nor His thoughts our thoughts." This might be said for our discouragement, and therefore a calling that is high, as God is high, might be in the nature of the case a calling impossible for our attainment and discouraging in the fact that it was expected of us.

That is not the kind of high calling we have in the text. It is higher than we are; it is an upward call. It is a call to something above our present level. It is a call that finds us where we are and becomes the goal of our present attainment. It is not a faint shout from an impossible distance; it is a voice from just above.

But it is also a call that continues to be high. It is a call that is perpetually upward. Neither we nor God stand where a level once attained by us becomes a spiritual finality. God is still higher and we ourselves may reach higher. This is something well worth thinking.

There was a good old hymn:

> "Jesus, my All, to heaven is gone,
> He, whom I fixed my hopes upon;
> His track I see, and I will pursue,
> The narrow way till Him I view."

That is one aspect of the truth, but it is not the whole truth. Jesus has gone to heaven, but He is not hopelessly out of our sight. His Word still is with us, "Lo! I am with you alway." He is just above and beckoning us upward.

The old pictures of the Ascension were beautiful and inspiring, but there was an immeasurable distance between the Lord far yonder among the clouds and the wondering, lonely disciples on the ground below. Fritz Von Uhde, in his fine rendering of the same subject, gives a somewhat different impression. Jesus is ascending, but not hopelessly far above the disciples They still can almost reach Him, still they feel the warmth of His fellowship, the inspiration of His beckoning invitation. Something like this is the message which the Apostle Paul brings to us in that remarkable passage. We are pressing onward for the prize of the high calling.

THE FACT OF DIVINE AUTHORITY.

GOD the Almighty Father is the author of our being and has the right to expect our obedience as his children. This sounds like a cold affirmation of a truth in theology; but it is warm with the life of glad obedience when its full meaning is practically recognized by living men. Our modern religious life stands in sore need of the recovery of a sense of responsibility to the great God who has the right to command the allegiance of his children. Religion is strong and conquering when it expresses itself under the sanction of responsibility to God. Our Christian thought today is not mastered as it ought to be by the truth that the living God is the Creator and Lord. We are responsible beings. Duty still rests on the fact that God made the universe and created man in his likeness in order that order and strength might mark human life. We live under the reign of law. God is sovereign over the universe that owes its being to him. The sanction of a happy life lies in this fact. Instead of fearing this truth it ought to be most welcome to every Christian. It gives the sense of peace and it furnishes the grounds of confidence and joy. God is our King and our Father.

BEAUTIFUL THINGS IN A CITY BLOCK.

IN A DREARY street in the dullest part of a dingy city not long ago a mother and her little boy went out to do an errand. It was a gray day as they started and the mother said to the boy: "How many beautiful things do you think we can find in the first block?" And the boy said: "Let's count!" So they watched sharp for beautiful things in their walk through an ugly city block. That night the boy told of what had been done, and he said: "We counted eleven." It is a real test of vision to see eleven beautiful things in walking the length of a city block; yet there are as many as that to be seen; we are sure from the confident tones of the boy who saw them, every one.

THE CROSS A SYMBOL OF SERVICE.

WE have so long associated the cross with the idea of sacrifice that we overlook its value as a symbol of service. This it is, however, and thus it may be used if only it is clear that the basis of service is sacrifice. Jesus gave his life for the world, and this was the greatest possible service that he could have rendered mankind. Sacrifice may be regarded as an end in itself. When it is so considered it fails to claim for itself a source of power that belongs to it by native right. All true self-dedication is for an end, which is the betterment of the world. Sacrifice is justified by the fact that through it something is done for the life of others. Jesus made the cross the symbol of the serving life.

A FEDERATED CHURCH WEEKLY.

THE Christian Commonwealth is the name of a large eight-page weekly published by the Federated Church of Toledo. Only a few numbers have been issued and it is reported that it is receiving subscriptions at the rate of one thousand a week. It is distinctly Christian in its make-up, and without a note of sectarianism in it. It carries a splendid class of advertisements, but leaves out the abominable patent medicine displays, the shame of so many otherwise religious papers.

MY PILOT KNOWS.

AS moves my fragile bark across the storm-swept sea,
Great waves beat o'er her side,
As North-wind blows;
Deep in the darkness hid, lie threat'ning rocks and shoals;
But all of these—and more,
My Pilot knows.

Sometimes, when dark the night, and every light gone out,
I wonder to what port
My frail bark goes;
Still, though the night be long, and restless all my hours,
My distant goal, I'm sure,
My Pilot knows.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

I ATTENDED a funeral today. The minister spoke appreciatively of the character of the departed, of his devotion in the home, in the church and in the community, to the highest ideals. But he said no comforting word at all about the great beyond into which I have always believed our dear ones are taken and kept for reunion with us and for immortal life. He did say some vague but beautiful words and quoted some poetry about an invisible immortality in the hearts of those whose lives were helped by the kindly services of the departed one's life. I was touched with this tribute. But I came away with a sense that there was lacking a note which an interpreter of religion ought surely to be expected to strike, a note of comfort and of hope, a note of immortality.

It was not as if the dead man were of dubious character morally. I could well enough understand a certain inhibition resting upon the minister's soul in speaking at the funeral of a wicked man. Indeed, I have often felt the keenest sympathy for my minister when he had to face such a situation. His heart was always under a strong stimulus to ignore the moral considerations which his sturdy ministry voiced, and to bring the comfort of immortality to the distressed mourners before him.

Yet he could not yield to this stimulus. He could not bid them "sorrow not as others who had no hope." So he spoke always in an impersonal way about the mystery of death, and he sought around until he found some good trait—and he always found one or two—which he could hold up for praise and appreciation. It was this interpretation of the good trait that saved the funeral service from a desolateness and coldness sadder than the death itself.

ONE time I suggested to my minister that he could find ground for bringing God more openly into such a service if he tried. We do not know all the facts about such a life, I said. This sad result in whose presence we now stand probably had its origin in a more or less accidental twist of fate in childhood or in youth—or even before this man was born. Who can say that your good man's goodness is less accidental than this bad man's badness? Why not then, I persisted, give the sorrowing relatives the comfort of knowing that in God's universe—on this side death and on the other side—the Father yearns to restore the prodigal and will receive him if he so much as reaches out his hands in return?

I am not a theologian at all. But I sometimes bring problems like this to my minister in order to see what light he can throw upon them. It is not fashionable, I know, to have problems like these today. The day of the discussion over universalism is apparently past. I sometimes wonder what any one wants to be a Universalist preacher for, in a day when most evangelicals either allow the doctrine of the "larger hope" or else refuse to think into the problem at all.

Yet the time was when the chief heresy was that of universalism. There were Swing and Thomas in Chicago, Cave in St. Louis, Alexander Proctor in Independence, and who was that Disciple preacher in Jacksonville, Ill., (his name slips me now) who almost split the church at that place with this heresy? I have a book in my library that I purchased fully twenty-five years ago, made up of articles on immortality. Most of the score of contributions to this volume treat of the question of partial versus universal salvation. It was a live issue then.

SO WHEN I asked my minister why he did not at least put the gate of hope ajar in the case of even the sinful man whose funeral service he was conducting I suppose I was voicing some sentiment that still echoed in my soul from the days when universalism was a vital topic of discussion.

"It would weaken my sermon next Sunday if I should do so," was my minister's reply. "I could not urge men to come to Christ now, with the same earnestness that has been my habit if I knew that they felt that there was a chance after death for the unrepentant."

Perhaps it is just as well. It is a good policy where moral questions are involved not to mix with them much speculation. And what chances there may be or may not be after death is purely a matter of speculation, of reasoning, albeit reasoning based upon the character of God as too good to withhold his grace from any soul anywhere who prays to receive it.

I am glad I live today, when the question of one's relationship to Christ is not complicated with speculative considerations of this sort. One's duty to become a Christian is not nowadays stated in terms of the consequences that are bound to come in case one does not become a Christian. Being a Christian nowadays justifies itself.

YET on the positive side there is, it seems to me, surely a place for contemplation of the great mystery of death and the glorious hope of the gospel. The preacher at the funeral today (he was not my minister) left my soul wanting something more than he gave me, and I am certain that the surviving dear ones of the departed must have ached for a more sure word of prophecy.

And why should they not have received it? Why should they not, in this day when the great word of holy scripture is being re-enforced by unexpected corroboration from science?

I grow impatient, not to say indignant, when I hear a minister speak hesitantly or tentatively, or keep silent altogether, about heaven, when men like Sir Oliver Lodge and Henri Bergson speak with such courage and faith about the overcoming of death. I do not take much stock in the so-called "scientific demonstrations" of a future life. I am inclined to believe that there never will be a scientific demonstration. If there could be such a demonstration it would, it seems to me, debase the moral order of the world, and remove from us men the conditions under which we have a chance to make ourselves, through Christ, fit for immortality.

And as for all these "spiritualistic" phenomena, I cannot believe for a moment that the Universe is of such a character as to reveal secrets of that sort to coarse and vulgar and often immoral mediums which it denies to the wisest and most refined and morally strong souls in the world. My attitude is unscientific, you say; I ought to be open-minded and investigating, and not close my mind against objective facts with a theory of the Universe! Well, call it unscientific if you will. But to me it is the highest kind of science not to drag the moral order down in order to afford a tentative hypothesis to account for a set of facts which many another hypothesis can take care of equally as well.

BUT I believe in immortality, since Christ brought it to light in himself and in his gospel. And I believe in it a little more securely now that our scientists and philosophers are tunneling clear through the material universe and are showing us that matter is not the last thing, but that it and we are embraced in a vast spiritual order whose meaning gives reality to matter and meaning to our lives. Most of the scientists today are our friends, the friends of those who long

> "to believe again
> In the things men felt and saw
> And wondered at and worshipped
> Before they worshipped law."

Why then should the preacher stand with silent lips? Let him read the Word of God, and read the World of God in the light of the things science tells us as to the stuff the world is made of, and then let him go to his pulpit on Sunday morning with a message so sure, so illuminating, so tender that all his aged hearers, yearning for a message from the land whose shores their feet are all but touching, will feel the breath of heaven upon their faces and rejoice that they are so soon to be with the Lord!

Lifts heavenward its head; so do we unto God,
In aspiration fond, lift heart and mind,
Captive to earth and circumstance unkind.

Death of Dr. Herrick Johnson.

The Presbyterians and the religious world generally are in sorrow for the death of Dr. Herrick Johnson, President-Emeritus of the College Board of the Presbyterian Church. Doctor Johnson passed away Nov. 20, at his home in Philadelphia. He was eighty-one years old. The first president of the board, Doctor Johnson served continuously from the organization in 1883 to 1904, when the Assembly appointed him President-Emeritus. His interest in all the affairs of the board is indicated by the letter which he sent to be read at the recent meeting held Nov. 11, and in which, after excusing himself from attending on account of failing health, he says: "I want to assure you all, however, of my unlessened interest in everything pertaining to the board and its work." Doctor Johnson will be missed especially in the educational councils of the church.

Lloyd George Speaks for Ministers.

In a recent address Chancellor Lloyd George, who is said by some to be a Baptist, by others a Disciple, stated some truths concerning the ministry. The address was delivered at a meeting of London Baptists called for the purpose of raising $25,000, London's apportionment for the Ministerial Sustentation Fund of $1,200,000, which the Baptists of England are making an effort to secure.

Chancellor Lloyd George presided at the London meeting and made a stirring speech. Referring to the depletion of the country towns, he raised a laugh by saying that as yet the birds had not attended Baptist chapels, but he foresaw a time when the town and city artisan would find refreshment in the country after his day's work. "No profession," he went on to say, "called for as high qualities as that of the ministers of little churches—patience, tact, knowledge and intelligence—and yet some congregations expect to get all these virtues for twenty-six shillings a week."

Oppose Roman Catholic Thanksgiving.

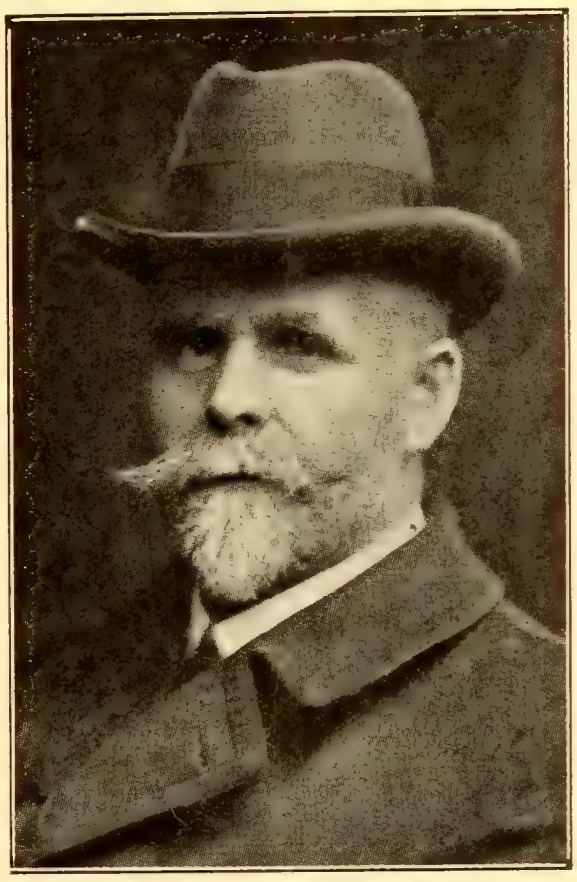
Resolutions have been passed by the Episcopal ministers in Washington, D. C., looking to the defeat of the attempt of the Roman Catholics to build up by precedent and custom a national celebration of Thanksgiving Day, to be under the control of the Roman Catholics. This church has for several years held a celebration service on the national day of thanks, and makes a practice of asking high officials of the capital city to attend. President Roosevelt was present at one service during his administration and President Wilson was to have attended this year. The leaders of all the non-Catholic churches in Washington are making protest.

The Episcopalian resolutions read as follows:

"We desire to give voice to the widespread feeling of indignation among the millions of Protestants in America against the efforts of the Roman press and the Roman hierarchy to exploit the attendance of our Chief Magistrate and some of his Cabinet (which we are convinced has only been intended as an act of courtesy and good will) for the purpose of glorifying the Roman Catholic Church and giving this service an official character which it does not and cannot possess."

Missions in Federal Council.

The Commission on Foreign Missions of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, of which Robert E. Speer is the Chairman, met recently and adopted a program to be carried out in co-operation with the Annual Conference of Mission Boards and its Committee of Reference and Counsel. The Commission placed itself at the disposal of the Mission Boards to forward its movements among the churches and to disseminate special information concerning the work of federation, co-operation and unity which is developing on the foreign field. The Commission will meet with the Foreign Missions Boards Conference at Garden City in January.



Dan Crawford.

Dan Crawford in Chicago.

"Africa—the Nearest Place to the Bottomless Pit," was the subject on which Dan Crawford, African missionary, talked at Chicago last Sunday. He drew a picture of the barbarous customs of the bloody tribes he had met and conquered through the power of the gospel.

"I told Mrs. Pankhurst, the militant suffragist, that the women of Africa had formed a suffragist cult years before she had," he said. "She was astonished, but I told her that the women of Africa had been so scurvily treated by the men of Africa that they were obliged to combine."

Mr. Crawford told of a comely young woman who had suffered the cropping of her ears because she had refused to marry an old man who wanted her, and of a queen who had volunteered to go into the grave with her husband, the king, who had died.

"The lion drags down the zebra, the leopard drags down the antelope, and the big man drags down the little man and the little woman in Africa," he said, "but the missionary's mud hut becomes a 'house of refuge' to many. We missionaries were called 'softies.' Nevertheless, we had to live by our rifles and were the best shots in the country. The bloodiest tribes came to us, and we brought them to peace with each other."

"You have much to say about the 'big stick' in America. I am thankful that you have a president now that has put away the big stick. Another thing I have to be thankful for is that when I was in Africa I was shut away from those cemeteries of dead folks called libraries. I was shut up with my Bible, the book with a million eyes."

Mr. Crawford called his wife a "white angel," living on the edge of the world, and made a plea for help for her in building a hospital. "You have an expression here that 'dirt is cheap.' Dirt is costly. One of the greatest achievements I was able to accomplish in Africa was the building of six miles of clean dwelling houses for the natives. They soon caught the spirit and built 130 miles for themselves.

"An African said to me, after I had explained the wonders of civilization—the aeroplane, the submarine, the elevators: 'To be better off is not to be better.' This is the lesson I leave with you, O Chicago."

SOME RELIGIOUS SIGN POSTS.

Leslie's Weekly has given impetus to a movement for a nation-wide "Church day" that seems to be getting results.

At the National Convention of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church held recently in Washington, ringing resolutions were passed condemning the legislation in Florida whereby whites were prohibited from giving intellectual instruction to colored people.

The governor of Texas embodied the twenty-third psalm in his Thanksgiving proclamation.

THE SECRET OF UNITY.

BY JOSEPH FORT NEWTON.

Here is the secret of Christian unity and the seat of authority in faith. Not what the dogmatists argue, but what the humblest soul learns by following the Master and obeying his impulse to know and do the will of God—this is the truth that makes men free. It has the authority, not of an argument, but of a Personality, a unity not of forms but of fellowship, in which the resources of a Higher Mind are disclosed, and the deep things of God are revealed. Let the Church seek by prayer, by principle, by practice, to know the mind of Christ, and be guided by it, and its discords will be healed and its deeper unity unveiled. 'Tis a consummation devoutly to be wished, yea, sought for with prayer and tears, and may the great God hasten its coming!

This lesson is for all—that we may seek to embody, each to the utmost of his capacity, and all to the fullness of an abundant life, the wonder and beauty and love that are in Christ. By as much as we put on Christ as the spirit and form and color of our lives, by so much do we reveal him to the world, and hasten the advent of the day when the Mind of Christ shall rule the race, healing its ills, hallowing its fellowships, and lifting it from the animal to the angel shape.

Of Human Interest

How Edison Works.

"Are your discoveries often brilliant intuitions?" asked a reporter of Thomas A. Edison. "Do they come to you while you are lying awake nights?"

"I never did anything worth doing by accident," was the reply, "nor did any of my inventions come indirectly through accident, except the phonograph. No, when I have fully decided that a result is worth getting I go ahead on it and make trial after trial until it comes. Anything I have begun is always on my mind, and I am not easy while away from it until it is finished."

When Economy is Easy.

Apropos of the 50 cent increase in the price of coal, Miss Evangeline Booth, of the Salvation Army, said at the New York headquarters:

"And this increase, of course, will bear hardest on the poor. The poor, buying their coal by the bucket or by the quarter-ton, will pay this increase a dozen times over. And the rich, buying their coal by the car-load, will dodge by means of discounts the increase altogether.

"There was a lot of truth in the remark of the poor, harassed, East Side housewife whose husband complained:

"'I wish you would be more economical, Mary. Look at the boss' wife, how economical she is!'

"'Yes,' Mary replied, 'it's easy enough for the boss' wife to be economical. She's got plenty to be economical with.'"

Adulteration Science.

Dr. Harvey Washington Wiley said the other day of a butter adulterator:

"The man's excuses are as specious and transparent as the Oshkosh grocer's.

"A woman said to an Oshkosh grocer:

"'I'm going to stop dealing with you. You mix bad butter with your good.'

"But the grocer, looking very much hurt, replied:

"'Oh, ma'am, how can you misjudge me so? It's true I sometimes mix a little good butter with my bad to make it better, but I'd never dream of mixing bad butter with my good butter to make it worse.'"

Won Suit for Mutilated Venus.

The late Congressman David B. Henderson of Dubuque some years ago addressed the Dubuque people at a May day festival.

The ex-Speaker, apropos of ignorance, said:

"The worst case of ignorance I can tell you of occurred in 1869 in a remote section of our country.

"There was a man who suddenly became rich and built an enormous house. He decided to adorn the house with some statuary and so he wrote to Italy for a copy of the Venus de Milo.

"The copy in due time arrived. It was executed in Carrara marble very beautifully.

"But no sooner did he receive it than the millionaire sued the railroad for $2,000 for mutilation, and what's more, he won the suit."

Why Not?

Bob Davis has a literal friend who is a Tammany district leader on the East Side; and the Tammany man went to Buffalo once to attend a Democratic State Convention.

After the convention adjourned a citizen of Buffalo took the Tammany man out to see the Falls.

"Isn't Niagara wonderful?" chortled the native. "Isn't it wonderful that all those millions of gallons of water should go over that cliff every second?"

"Well," said the Tammany man, "whut's to hinder 'em?"

Riis on Grand Opera.

Jacob A. Riis, called by Mr. Roosevelt a few years ago "our most useful citizen," after attending the opening night of grand opera in Chicago, had this to say in an address before the Woman's Club of Evanston:

"I saw the opening of the diamond show in the Auditorium last night, and it was not the least bit handsome. The sight of one person wearing $500,000 worth of diamonds is one of the big inequalities of which we have no right to be proud. The name of 'republic' will not save us from the fate which befell other nations. We have to remember that we are the republic, and that we are a republic only in proportion as we form a democracy."

FROM NEW YORK TO BEIRUT.

and cooling drinks one finds in Italy, we ordered somewhat lavishly, for the day was very warm, but failed to demand a price list. When the bill came in we were horrified to see that a very small section of decidedly inferior strawberry ice costs 18 cents and that lemonade is 25 cents. In discussing the matter later we came to the conclusion that as one seldom stops at Port Said for more than a few hours between boats, the cafes feel it their duty to make the experience a memorable one in a thoroughly emphatic manner. It is certain that the three of us who settled that bill will never forget.

As we were unfortunate in entering and leaving the famous bay of Naples on a rather dark day, so we failed to see more than the dimmest outlines of the coast of Palestine as we sailed past from Port Said to Beirut. It was a distinct disappointment not to be permitted to watch others landing at Jaffa, and then to cruise very near the shore and trace on our maps the mountains and the Maritime Plain of the Holy Land. But ours was a through boat and the day was gray, so that it was only as we came near to the harbor of Beirut that we could discern details of landscape. Then the splendid view of our college, crowning the ridge at the west end of Beirut, and almost on the very banks of the sea, burst upon us, and we realized for the first time the extreme beauty of this location, of which I shall speak again. President Bliss and his family have been away for some months and many of the faculty and staff of the Syrian Protestant College came out to welcome them back, so that we had a right royal reception on the deck of the ship as soon as quarantine regulations were observed.

Eighteen nights is a long time to be cramped up on narrow bunks, and we are all very happy to be again on land where the lure of the Orient has already fallen upon us.

AN OPEN LETTER.

the more or less brash indiscretions on the part of some of these pioneers; the fact remains yet fully to be recognized that a sinister force has been at work exaggerating this tension and sustaining it, falsifying the teaching of those caught in the toils of the conflict and spreading among the churches a spirit of suspicion and superstitious hate toward those who could not pronounce the old shibboleths. The reason that the Disciples have been more greatly agitated than others by this Christendom-wide change, and the reason why devout and profoundly earnest men have had to leave us — men like the three Disciple pastors now filling Congregational pulpits in Wisconsin, and many others— the main reason why you, my young brother minister, are willing to at least entertain your present call, and the reason why it can be asserted that 60 per cent of our young ministers who go to Union, and Harvard, and Yale seminaries, sift through into other pulpits than our own, is not to be found in our doctrine, but in the coarse and unscrupulous leadership which a commercial publication house has given to the forces of reaction.

NEITHER MEN NOT DOCTRINES TO BLAME.

I cannot harshly judge my brethren who have left us. Nor can I charge their leaving us to our principles and doctrines. We do not need to look so deep for the explanation. It lies on the surface. They have been branded and hounded, as have been hundreds of their ministerial brothers, by ruthless opposition until they, either more unfortunate than their brothers or less patient, have given up and gone where they can have peace.

I feel that you should be able to make this analysis of the situation in which you too find yourself, before you make a decision to leave the Disciples. In the light of such an analysis does not the task before such minded Disciples as yourself challenge you? If our historic ideals were in error, you might leave us without a moral tremor. If our program of practicing Christian unity were an impossible dream you might leave us to work at some task worth while. But our ideals were never so valid as today, and our program grows more practicable with each new rising sun.

Our task is to rescue these ideals of our people from a captivity in which unscrupulous hands have debased and exploited them. I believe the leaders of our churches are seeing this today, never so clearly. I believe our great brotherhood is shaking itself free of the power which has been exploiting it. I believe the churches are determined to go straight forward and do what needs to be done without let or hindrance from any self-constituted authority. I believe the power of the menacing institution has been broken, and that it is either making a last fight for its life or else that it will take its embittered constituency into a separate body where it can enjoy the prestige which it once enjoyed with the main body of our people.

I counsel you to remain with the Disciples. Your ideals are the Disciples' ideals. These ideals find historic anchorage in the Declaration and Address and received their initial dynamic from the passionate soul of Thomas Campbell. The investment of your life in their advocacy and practice will, in my judgment, bring a richer reward in the end than any other investment you can make.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

A FORECAST OF THE NATIONAL SUFFRAGE CONVENTION.

At this writing (Dec. 1) the opening session of the forty-fifth convention of the National American Woman Suffrage Association is in progress at Washington. Every such annual gathering emphasizes the sweeping progress which the passing years have shown. In 1869, Susan B. Anthony made the first appeal to congress for votes for women, and continued to address committees of every Congress from that time until 1906. When she began, her work was entirely one of faith—no woman in all the land had the right of suffrage; now, 3,600,000 women have become qualified to vote for presidential electors, and women are voting in ten states, that elect one-fifth of the United States Senate and one-seventh of the House of Representatives.

THE TRIUMPHS OF A YEAR.

From November, 1912, to November, 1913, there were victories for equal suffrage in four states, Oregon, Kansas and Arizona, by Constitutional Amendment and the Illinois Legislature granted to the women of their state all the voting privileges it could bestow; Illinois women can now cast their ballots for presidential electors, and for all city and town officers, except police magistrates. In addition to these triumphs, the legislature of the Territory of Alaska, by unanimous vote, gave the women of that far-off land the same political rights as men.

In the states of Montana, Nevada and the two Dakotas, the Woman Suffrage Amendment has passed the legislatures by the required majorities, and is to be submitted to the people in the general elections of 1914—while in four more states, the amendment has passed one legislature, and must pass another before being decided by popular vote.

NOTES OF PROMISE IN THE AIR.

While the convention has just begun its sessions, already the air is full of notes of promise. A Men's League for Woman Suffrage, whose avowed object is to work for votes for women, has just been organized in the National Capital, with Dr. Harvey W. Wiley as its president.

At a preliminary meeting of college women, Miss Jane Addams declared that the recently acquired franchise in Illinois had already given the women of that state great influence in needed reforms. The new women voters in Chicago had risen in their might to protest against the retirement of Mrs. Ella Flagg Young, the famous school superintendent of their city; by their means, the political opposition to her was withdrawn, and conditions were readjusted in harmony with her ideas of right—thus, they helped to secure the continuation in office of one of the ablest educators of our land.

Tonight, the suffrage victory in Illinois will be celebrated, and many prominent women will take part. The first speaker will be Mrs. Grace Wilbur Trout, president of the Illinois Suffrage Association; she will be followed by Mrs. Sherman K. Booth, chairman of the Legislative Committee, Mrs. Catharine W. McCullough, Mrs. Medill McCormick, Mrs. Ella S. Stewart and Mrs. Antoinette Funk.

The last number on the evening program will be the address of the president of the National Association, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, who will present suggestions for the campaign of the new year, already looming up as a critical one.

Other speakers of note are Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt, president of the International Suffrage Alliance, Jane Addams, Mrs. Helen Ring Robinson, state senator from Colorado, and a number of distinguished gentlemen.

THE MAIN OBJECTIVE OF THE CONVENTION.

An amendment to the Federal Constitution, extending the ballot to women throughout the nation, is the great goal for which a week of meetings, speeches and hearings before Congressional Committees will work. In an audience before the House Rules Committee, they will ask for the appointment of a Woman Suffrage Committee similar to that recently appointed in the Senate.

But while there is much enthusiasm for a Federal Amendment for Woman Suffrage, yet there is marked opposition to it. This comes largely from the Southern delegates, who stand for Woman Suffrage through state enactment, rather than through an amendment to the Constitution of the United States. They claim that the presence of several millions of Negro women in the South makes a problem that can be best handled by the legislatures of the several states. This is the old doctrine of state rights, which we have been so often assured was settled once for all by the Civil War, but which has a knack, like the fabled bird of olden times, of rising every now and then with fresh vigor from its ashes.

Expansion and growth, with their widening horizons, are bound to give a greater sweep of vision, and to develop differing points of view. This division in the ranks should not disturb us; it is no sign of disintegration, but is an inevitable symptom of finding and facing new problems, and is thus one of the penalties of success. I. W. NO CRIME IN MOTHERHOOD.

Justice Seabury Decides Famous Teacher Case in Favor of Mrs. Peixotto.

Motherhood is not a crime for a teacher in New York, and cannot be penalized by the New York City Board of Education. This is the gist of a decision which Justice Seabury handed down last week in granting the petition of Mrs. Bridget C. Peixotto for a writ of mandamus directing the Board of Education to reinstate her as a teacher in Public School 14, in The Bronx.

Justice Seabury discussed at length in his decision every argument advanced by the Board of Education in defence of its action in dismissing Mrs. Peixotto. He said it was settled that the board is without authority to remove a woman principal or teacher because of her marriage, and, that being so, it seemed self-evident that the board cannot dismiss a principal or teacher because she has given birth to a child.

"If she cannot be removed because of her marriage," said Justice Seabury, "she cannot be removed because of an act which is a natural incident of her marriage."

The court further declared: "The policy of our law favors marriage and the birth of children, and I know of no provision of our statute law or any principle of the common law which justifies the inference that public policy, which concededly sanctions the employment of married women teachers, treats as grounds of expulsion the act of a married woman in giving birth to a child."

The justice said that the theory that illness resulting in absence, if caused by maternity, becomes neglect of duty, "is repugnant to law and good morals."

"There is nothing in the language of the charter," said Justice Seabury, "which would justify the assumption that by the use of the words 'neglect of duty' the legislature intended to include the case of a married teacher whose absence was caused in order to give birth to a child. To impute such an intention to the legislature would be a gratuitous and arbitrary attempt on the part of the court to legislate and to read into the law a provision which there is no reason to believe the legislature would have inserted."

The court also dismissed the contention of the Board of Education that the Supreme Court was without jurisdiction and that the matter should be submitted to the State Commissioner of Education.

Mrs. Peixotto's attorney is reported as saying:

"The outcome of the case proves that employees in our schools have the same right as any other public employees to appeal to the courts for justice. The decision takes all school decisions that seem to be unfair entirely out of the circle of school authorities. The decision is a sweeping one, and is not confined to the simple question of whether a school teacher has a right to become a mother, but it embraces all disputes that might arise between the teachers and the Board of Education."

CHRIST WITH US.

By Edwin Markham.

"Inasmuch as ye did it unto the least of these ye did it unto Me."

I cried aloud, "There is no Christ
In all this world unparadised!
No Christ to go to in my need—
No Christ to comfort me and feed!
He passed in glory out of sight,
The angels drew him into light:
Now in the lonesome earth and air
I cannot find him anywhere.
Would God that Heaven were not so far
And I were where the White Ones are!"

Then from the grey stones of a street
Where goes an ocean drift of feet,
I heard a child's cry tremble up,
And turned to share my scanty cup.
When lo, the Christ I thought was dead
Was in the little one I fed!
At this I drew my aching eyes
From the far-watching of the skies;
And now whichever way I turn
I see my Lord's white halo burn!

Wherever now a sorrow stands,
'Tis mine to heal His nail-torn hands;
In every lonely lane and street,
'Tis mine to wash His wounded feet—
'Tis mine to roll away the Stone
And warm His heart against my own.
Here, here, on Earth I find it all—
The young archangels white and tall,
The Golden City and the doors,
And all the shining of the floors!

Christ is patient with the world, and would have us patient too; plowing, sowing, working, praying, believing that a harvest will come at last, and that we shall see issues by and by which we never saw or even expected here.—Alfred Rowland.

Disciples Table Talk

J. G. Cannon at Thanksgiving Service.

A feature of the union Thanksgiving service held at Danville, Ill., was an address by Hon. Joseph G. Cannon, of that city. J. F. Bickell, pastor at First Church, writes of this service with enthusiasm, calling it absolutely unique, so far as his observation goes. The service was held under the auspices of the Danville Ministerial Association. Fully three thousand people were in attendance. Civic leagues met and attended in a body. Lodges followed suit. The soldier boys from the Armory marched in a body to the Coliseum where the meeting was held. Men's clubs and classes from the various churches met at a common rendezvous and marched in a body to the meeting. The G. A. R. came in a body. In fact, it was "a meeting of the people of Danville," as Mr. Bickell states. Among the special features of the service were music by the Ben Hur Band; a ten minute speech by Rabbi Latz, of the Reformed Jewish Church, on "God in Our National History;" an address by Father McCarthy, of the Roman Catholic Church, on "God in Our National Resources;" one by Preston Wood, of the M. E. Church, on "God in Our National Destiny." A thought expressed by Mr. Cannon especially impressed his hearers, "No two men ever worshipped the same God." Mr. Bickell believes that much has been done for the cause of Christian unity by this strikingly successful service.

E. L. Powell Lauds New Mayor.

In a recent sermon, Dr. E. L. Powell, of First Church, Louisville, after treating the times of Ahab and Jezebel, whom he called the first political bosses of history, paid a tribute to the newly elected mayor of his city.

"I shall close this sermon, appropriate to the general theme, by affirming that the fight of Carmel is that which is on now in our city and in other municipalities and great cities of our nation," said Mr. Powell, in closing. "We have elected here a new mayor. He has been chosen, it seems to me, under rather peculiar and unique circumstances. Back of his election is the moral demand. It is significant that so much during this campaign was said of the moral issue.

"Will our mayor make good? I believe in him, but before God, and in the name of the messenger of God, Elijah, whose words were as lightning and tempest, I hold this high official of a great municipality to the fulfillment to the letter of his sworn obligations. It is the moral issue. He will make good economically. He will give an efficient administration. He is going to bring satisfaction to many of us, as I verily believe, by giving to us a more than average civic administration, and I believe that he will not forget that he has promised to enforce the laws insofar as in him lies, and all of the laws, and that he has sworn and given his solemn promise to see that vice shall be probed and that investigation shall be made as to vice conditions with a view to giving us a cleaner city and a less malodorous city."

Philadelphia, First, Prospers.

Irving S. Chenoweth, pastor at First, Philadelphia, reports that some of his dreams for this church seem about to be realized. Gifts are being brought in to be applied on the old church mortgage, larger audiences than for a long time are reported, young people are coming in and taking hold of the work. The congregation is very loyal and hopeful. A special series of addresses is being carried through the winter, the city being thoroughly canvassed by way of preparation. The following are the subjects of addresses planned:

Dec. 7. "The Church and Citizenship," Franklin Spencer Edmonds, member Committee of One Hundred. Dec. 14. "The Church and the New Education," Prof. Scott Nearing, University of Pennsylvania. Dec. 21. A Christmas Service, conducted by the minister. Dec. 28. "The Church and Charity," Riley M. Little, Secretary Phila. Society for Organizing Charity. Jan. 4. "The Church and Labor," Charles Stelzle, Consulting Sociologist of New York City. Jan. 11. "The Church and Social Purity," J. W. Cochran, Secretary Presbyterian Board of Education, member Philadelphia Vice Commission. Jan. 18. "The Church and Socialism," Charles W. Ervin, Socialist writer and lecturer. Jan. 25. "The Church and Public Health," Alexander Wilson, Assistant Director Department of Health and Charities. Feb. 1. "The Church and the Immigrant." Prof. James P. Lichtenberger, University of Pennsylvania. Feb. 8. "The Church and the Woman's Movement." Miss Home Mission Church Planting Pays.

R. M. Hopkins sends in an interesting report of a Canadian school, of home missionary planting. This school observed Immigrant day, using the plans of the Home Missionary Society. Good results may be obtained by any school using this plan. It is expected that December and January will be more fruitful in results than was November. It is not too late for any school to work out the suggested plan. This may be secured from R. M. Hopkins, Carew Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

Here is the letter, in part:

"Lethbridge, Alta., Nov. 24, 1913.

"Dear Brother Hopkins:

"In accordance with the plan of the Home Missionary Society, we yesterday observed Immigrant day with the program 'America's Welcome to New Americans,' and the day was the greatest in our history. Our attendance was one hundred eleven, an increase of about 20 per cent over any previous record, and our offering will aggregate about $25, I think, by adding what birthday money we have in reserve to our collection of yesterday. If the twenty-four Canadian schools which contributed last year come up to the standard we have set, Canada will have done her part well, it seems to me.

"I attribute our success largely to the following out of plans suggested by the Home Missionary Society, the scrap book idea which we carried out in three classes, etc. The educational work accomplished through this program to our brotherhood will be worth much to the immigrant cause, I feel sure, as we will be the more enabled to see the opportunities before us.

"Dora E. Fitch, Supt."

Evangelist Praises Deceased Pastor.

Sad indeed were the circumstances of the death of W. S. Gamboe, who passed away at Olney, Ill., during the evangelistic services being held there by F. B. Thomas Mr. Thomas writes thus of Mr. Gamboe: "W. S. Gamboe was born fifty-four years ago in the country near Winchester, Ky. He came of Kentucky blood. He was a man of wonderful physique and great heart. He was a man of lovable and winsome character. Everybody in Olney loved him. He was a graduate of both the collegiate and Bible courses at Lexington, Ky., and was thoroughly trained and efficient in the work of the ministry. He labored in various pastorates and was conspicuously successful. Among the more important pulpits which he graced were those at Ashland, Ky., the Third Christian church at Louisville, Ky., Watseka, Ill., Herrin, Ill., and Olney, Ill. In this latter place he did a really wonderful work. No other ministry in this city was as profitable as his. The revival just closed with ninety-five additions was largely due to the splendid preparatory work he had done."

San Diego's Sunday-school Parade.

"The greatest parade San Diego has ever known," was the verdict of thousands of San Diegans who lined the street of that California city, recently, while 3,000 Sunday-school students, from three of the largest churches in the city, in ages ranging from 3 to 90 years, assembled and marched up Broadway to a vacant lot in the heart of the city. A large crowd assembled while services were read and prize banners were awarded. The parade was a grand climax to the Sunday-school attendance contest between the First Christian school, W. E. Crabtree, pastor, the First Presbyterian, and the First Methodist schools. In eight weeks the number of students has been doubled. After short addresses by the pastors of the three churches, Mayor O'Neall awarded the prize banners to the Central Christian church for the largest average attendance during the period of eight weeks' competition, as well as for having the largest number of students in the parade. Both banners were awarded to Central Christian on the smallest margins. W. E. Crabtree said in his address, "This is a union of churches of this city. We are here assembled together, three different denominations. What we have accomplished here together could not have been accomplished alone by any one of the churches. And this illustrates the fact that we can always accomplish more by working together than by working alone. We have all won a great victory."

In Memory of R. Ray Eldred.

Celeste Ball May, a writer of Blackwell, Okla., was inspired by the recently published story of Mr. Eldred's tragic death on the Congo, to write some good verse. We quote two of her stanzas:

"Let no man deem the price too high,"
Though friends and home-land he forsake;
Of fame, and name, and earthly tie,
And self, a glad abandon make.

His every motive and each prayer
Was that the kingdom of our Lord
Might come to all men everywhere
By giving them the Living Word.

Benevolent Association Adds to Work.

The Child Saving Institute, at Omaha, has been taken over by the National Benevolent Association. The present board of eight will be increased to twelve, and women will be made members with voting power. Heretofore women have been only associate members, with only advisory authority in the management. The Child Saving Institute is one of Omaha's oldest charitable institutions The new building is one of the finest institutional structures in the state. The institution has been supported by private donations from Omaha people and has never lacked for funds. Negotiation for the transfer was begun several months ago. There were rumors for a while months ago that the University of Nebraska wanted to secure the institution to operate it in connection with the medical college as a child hospital.

One of the great Christian Endeavor societies is in the First Church at Decatur, Ill. With a church membership of 800 they have a society membership of 111 all of whom are workers in the Sunday-school and church. The church ushers are Endeavorers as is the majority of the chorus of fifty voices. They, as a society, are giving a dollar a Sunday to the current expenses of the church and $300 towards a new church building. The average attendance at the prayer-meeting is an even 100.

Christian University, Canton, Mo., reports an attendance a little more than 50 per cent larger than for the first term of last year. H. B. Robison, Dean of the Bible Department, sees in this fact signs of a new day for the university. Earle M. Todd, the newly chosen pastor at Canton, is taking a strong hold on the work. Four weeks of service have resulted in twenty-four accessions to the membership. Mr. Todd is praised as a true man of God and spiritual leader.

The following gains are reported by the Foreign Society for last year. Nine missionaries; 151 contributing churches; $33,454 in total receipts; 70 contributing Sunday-schools; $16,264 in personal gifts; $18,186 in Annuity gifts; $4,379 in bequests; $1,592 in miscellaneous gifts; 32 living-link churches; 536 baptisms; 7,492 patients treated; $2,437 in medical fees; 291 in mission schools; 749 in membership of churches; twenty school buildings.

Miss Mary F. Lediard, Tokyo, Japan, reports fine religious interest. In one evangelistic service she reports two one-hour sermons. Twelve were baptized in the church known as the "Hongo Church." Miss Lediard says that five more are to be baptized. Plans are being made for the erection of a new building for Economics for the Girls' College in Tokyo, and also for the new building for the Bible College, or Drake College.

Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Quiggen, of Birkenhead, Eng., who were delegates to the International Convention of Disciples at Toronto, have accepted work among the Mexicans at San Antonio, Tex. The new institute building of which they have charge, was dedicated Nov. 23. They are both exceptionally well equipped for this work.

The C. W. B. M. of University Place Church, Des Moines, Ia., held a week's meetings preparatory to the observance of their special day, Dec. 7. Mrs. A. T. Ross, of Eureka, Ill., addressed the meeting at one of its sessions, and Charles S. Medbury delivered the annual address at its concluding service.

Dr. A. L. Shelton and family, and Dr. and Mrs. Hardy are now on their way from central China to the Tibetan border. Under date of October 23, Dr. Shelton writes: "We are at last on our way up-river, all in good health and with a fair prospect of being able to reach Ta Chienlu some time in January."

The report of First Church, Bloomington, Ill., should have read 459 as the average attendance in Sunday-school for the year. It is only the cramped conditions that keep the attendance at this figure. This church is making remarkable strides under the leadership of Edgar DeWitt Jones.

In a recent communication to the Foreign Society, Frank Garrett, now at Des Moines, says: "I have just had a conference with Ng Poon Chew, editor of the leading Chinese daily in San Francisco, and he told me the effort to have Confucianism made the state religion in China had failed."

The forty-eighth annual convention of the Missouri Sunday-school Association was held at St. Joseph, Mo., November 18-24. W. S. Athearn, Mrs. W. H. Dietz, W. C. Pearce, W. W. Charters and A. J. Accola were among the speakers.

The Third District of Missouri, with headquarters at Springfield, J. H. Jones, superintendent, reports meetings and conventions held in twenty-six out of thirty-one counties. Distinct growth is shown in every department of the work.

H. P. Shaw and wife have reached Shanghai. They had a pleasant voyage across the Pacific. He is down to hard work studying the language. He reports that James Ware is better and is even gaining flesh.

G. P. Hedges, of the Congo Mission, reports 39 baptisms. There were 178 baptisms at Tumba, where lies the body of R. Ray Eldred. The offerings of the native Christians for the quarter will reach about $70.

The members and friends of the Central Church, Rockford, Ill., entertained in honor of the twenty-fifth wedding anniversary of their pastor, W. B. Clemmer and wife. Many substantial gifts were in evidence.

The fourth annual meeting of the Brotherhood at Uhrichsville, O., was held Dec. 1, attended by 200 men. This Brotherhood started the Reading Room Association which is the public library of the town.

J. C. Odgen and family expect to sail from San Francisco, January 22, for Tibet. It will be remembered that these missionaries were obliged to leave Tibet at the time of the revolution in China.

The total receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of November were $22,232, a gain of $14,279. There was also a gain in the number of contributing churches and Sunday-schools.

The growth of the Sunday-school of the church at Paris, Ill., is noteworthy under the leadership of George W. Brown, county superintendent of schools. H. H. Peters is the pastor.

Howard O. Rocks has been engaged as pastor of the church at Milford, Ill., for another year with an increase of salary. He will devote some of his time to the Anti-saloon League work.

The New Library Building of Phillips University, Enid, Okla., was dedicated November 25, with addresses by A. E. Cory of Cincinnati, Ohio, and M. M. Davis of Dallas, Texas.

W. R. Hunt reports 31 baptisms at Chuchow, China. The service was an impressive one. There were 400 in attendance at the Sunday-school on a recent Sunday.

First Church, Winchester, Ky., reports the average attendance of the Sunday-school 500, and $600 raised for the state missionary work for this year.

Teach Christ

TO YOUR ADULT AND YOUNG PEOPLE'S CLASSES. The Uniform Lessons for 1914 are based upon the life of Christ. This means that the emphasis in the year's work will be placed upon that matchless study. The best book on that theme published for young people's and adult classes is Dr. Loa E. Scott's

"LIFE OF JESUS"

Why You Should Use This Text:

1. It is not a study of men's opinions of the events of Christ's life, but is a direct study of the Scriptures themselves. You cannot use this text without your Bible in your hands.

2. It is positive. There is not a skeptical question in this book. It speaks with authority.

3. It is simple and practical. The poorest teacher should find it a pleasure to instruct a class with this book as a basis.

Your class, whether high school students or grandfathers, will enjoy Dr. Scott's "Life of Jesus." A new era in your work will begin if you take up this charming study.

The Mid-Week Service

By Silas Jones.

SHARING CHRIST WITH OTHERS.

Dec. 17. Rom. 15:14-29; 2 Cor. 8:3-5; 1 Cor. 9:12-23.

No disciple of Jesus is anti-missionary. There are many who oppose certain forms of missionary work and differences of opinion as to methods of carrying the gospel message to all the world are to be found in all the churches. The best of the Lord's disciples have but an imperfect apprehension of their duty to other men. We therefore need to be patient one with another. But if we find a man who imagines that he can keep the goods of the soul for himself alone and declines to share his faith with others, we may justly deny that he is a disciple of Jesus.

PIONEER DUTY.

Paul delighted to enter new fields and present his message to those who had never heard it before. He had no mind to be a camp follower. He was always at the front. For him opposition meant opportunity. He chose the difficult tasks. The disciple is by virtue of his discipleship a pioneer. He does not always go to new peoples but he is at all times holding up an ideal that makes men unwilling to accept their present attainments as sufficient and satisfactory. He has a vision which compels him to be a progressive in morals, politics, and religion. He wars upon uncleanness of every sort, physical and moral. The present generation should be reminded that the church was a pioneer in education. Luther and Melanchton and Calvin were educators. These religious leaders taught the state its duty toward its children. The church of the present must be true to its traditions and teach not only what is commonly accepted as true and right but what ought to be regarded as true and right. There is much for us to learn before we can call ourselves completely Christian.

GIVING OURSELVES.

The Corinthians, said Paul, began their work of ministering to the saints by giving themselves to the Lord. The great weakness in many of our so-called reform movements is that there is more of self-seeking than there is of desire for social benefit. The preacher raises a disturbance in order that he may gain notoriety. The politician sees in the advocacy of measures for the common good a way into office. When the missionary becomes a hero we commend him for the purpose of sharing in his popularity. Sincerity was the mark of the ministry of the Corinthians.

"Not what we give, but what we share,
For the gift without the giver is bare."

There is no substitute for the gift of self. If we give ourselves to the Lord, we shall be able to give others a knowledge of him. A feeling that Christianity is a good thing for a nation to profess will not give force to our words in its favor.

THE COMPULSION OF TRUTH.

It is worth while to observe that Paul saw in his message the ground of his mission. He did not go to the Gentiles because an external authority told him to go. His gospel was such that a man who accepted it felt impelled to share it with all whom he could reach. We waste time and energy in discussions about our duty to the non-Christian peoples when we seek any other authority than the truth itself for our missionary enterprises. If a scientist should discover a cure for cancer, he would not need to be told that his discovery ought to be given to the medical profession and thus made available to relieve suffering and prevent death. What an absurd person, then, must he be who thinks he knows the truth about God and yet waits to discover explicit commands before he feels any sense of obligation to enlighten mankind! To know the truth that gives freedom is to have the desire that all the world know it. The command to go into all the world is a statement of the tendency of truth to make missionaries of its possessors.

CONSUMMATION AND CULMINATION IN CONQUEST.

By A. Z. Conrad.

Every reverse doubles the probabilities of further defeat. One Bull Run defers indefinitely the success of a great cause. The stampeded hosts of Israel encouraged the warriors of Ai and proportionately depressed the would-be conquerers of Canaan. In the first flush of the Jericho victory the intoxication of success blinded them to the strength of the enemy and their contempt was costly enough. The Babylonish garment and the wedge of gold and the three hundred shekels of silver in the tent of Achan were but a symptom. Disease could only be purged out with fire and it was done. When the people were once more right with God they heard the cheering assurance, "Fear not, neither be thou dismayed. Take all the people with thee. Arise, and go up to Ai. See, I have given into thy hand the king of Ai, and the people of his city and his lands." Josh. 8:1.

The year 1913 is closing. While we hark back through its experiences we find many a duplication of Israel's old time defeat at the hand of the men of Ai and, sad to say, for much the same reason. It would be difficult to find a better description of our deflection and failure than we find in the words of Achan, "I saw, I coveted, I took, I hid." In view of certain broken resolutions, it is preeminently fitting for us to inquire, as did Joshua, the possibility of turning defeat into victory. The momentum of evil is tremendous. On the down grade speed is rapidly increased. It is not difficult to hold the toboggan at the top of the slide, but it takes both force and fearlessness to stop it when once under way. Right now is a good time to call a halt upon any tendency or movement contrary to the will of God. It is worth while to take an inventory to see where we stand as to spiritual relations and assets. Before the new year opens, we must be right with God and with ourselves, or we will make sorry work of the coming year. No more helpful intellectual or spiritual exercise can be recommended than a consideration of the great campaign of conquest under Captain Joshua. The world has known many campaigns of occupation but not one in all human history was fraught with such great consequences as the conquest of Canaan.

A STUPENDOUS TASK.

Defeat is humiliating. Presumption gave place to caution. In the first attack of Ai only a handful of men were deemed necessary. Every fighting man is called to the battle front in the second attack. The enemy had at least commanded respect. Much is gained when we learn to properly estimate the strength of temptation. God gives no encouragement either to indolence or self-indulgence, and his intervention can only be expected when we have exhausted the resources at our command. Both strategy and strength are employed in the new attempt to capture Ai. By a feint and an ambuscade the city is taken. There is a definite relation between venality and vulnerability. Evil usually secures its own defeat through over confidence. Organized vice is forever leaving exposed behind it citadels which it thinks have been thoroughly won. The men of Ai followed the retreating army of Israel supposing the retreat was genuine. They turned to discover their city in flames. They were thrown into a panic and their entire army utterly annihilated. Joshua 8: 11-29.

GIVING GLORY TO GOD.

After Jericho where God did all the work, the army was boastful of its own successes. After Ai where the army did all the work under divine direction the General calls the troops to the altar to give thanks to God for the victory. 8:30-35. This was a good omen. It promised well for further engagements. "Not by might nor by power, but by my spirit saith the Lord." Our defeats would be fewer and our successes larger if our expressions of gratitude were more constant and our recognition of the divine arm more complete. Too often prosperity chokes out prayer. The altar at Ebal where Joshua inscribed the law in accordance with the command of Moses, rebuked all self-assertiveness and lifted the faith of the army of Israel from the implements of war to the source of power. The erected altar and the uplifted prayer constitute the real ground for the hope of lasting conquest.

THE GIBEONITE ARTIFICE.

Joshua 9: 26. The Gibeonites were an observant people. They had their ear to the ground and heard the tramp of the coming army. Reputation is a wonderful thing. It outruns the swiftest racer. It carries the voice of the orator a thousand leagues beyond his visible audience. It precedes the army in the march. It paves the way for victory or defeat. The Gibeonites had heard of Og and Sihon and the Jordan and Jericho and Ai, but they had heard something more, they had been told of that striking pronouncement and promise which guaranteed to the Israelites the successful conquest of Canaan. By a clever artifice they proposed to insure themselves against the consequences of the promise of Jehovah. They accepted the proverb that, "A living dog is better than a dead lion." They were quite unable to understand the sentiment expressed so recently by the wife of that noble Indiana editor who, when told that her husband's opposition to the saloon was likely to cause him his life, replied, "I had rather be the widow of a dead hero than the wife of a living coward." Ambassadors from the Gibeonites went to Joshua clad in old clothes, with moldy bread and every evidence of having come on a long journey and asked for a league of peace. Accepting their statement the league was made, but when the ruse was discovered they were doomed to perpetual servitude. It is a striking commentary on Joshua's estimate of a vow that though he had been deceived he stood by the agreement made with the Gibeonites. Joshua 9: 26. "Who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord, who shall stand in his holy place? He that sweareth to his own hurt and changeth not."

THE CONFEDERACY OF KINGS.

Joshua 9. Five great kings of southern Palestine now determined to punish the Gibeonites for their capitulation and covenant with Israel. Their armies have gathered for their work of destruction. They had not reckoned with the intrepid commander of the Hosts of the Lord. They had no idea that simply because of a promise the Gibeonites would find in Israel an ally rushing to their defence. They never dreamed that the undisciplined troops of the invading crowd could stand for a moment before their own veterans in war. The celerity of Joshua completely disconcerted them. By a forced night march he rushed his army to the defence of the besieged people. Like the eagle shooting from the upper sky upon its prey he descended upon the five kings, put them to confusion and their entire armies to rout. The army of Israel was not left unaided. God's reserves in battle were called forth. Joshua 10:11. A violent storm of great hail stones smote more of the enemy than did the sword of Joshua. In the entire Old Testament narrative of the deeds of valorous heroes the declarations of faith and the audacious claims upon Jehovah for co-operation, none compares in significance and splendor with the portrayal of the great hero and commander of the Battle of the Five Kings, as he stood looking out upon the Vale of Ajalon and cried, "Sun, in Gibeon be still, and moon, in the Vale of Ajalon. And the sun was still and the moon stood until a nation was avenged of its enemies. Is not this written in the book of the upright? And the sun stood in the midst of heaven and did not haste to dawn as a perfect day. And there was not a day like that before or after it for Jehovah to hearken to the voice of a man, for Jehovah fought for Israel." We have given here the literal translation. The book of Jasher, from which this is quoted was doubtless a book of national songs. It is simply stated that Joshua made his demand that the sun and the moon must not set until he had accomplished his work. He had daylight until his work was finished. The statement has all the liberty of poetic expression and adornment. It is like the statement that "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera." The great lesson is one of Divine co-operation. We are not required for a single moment to suppose that the sun literally stopped in his course and that the whole solar system was interrupted and halted. There would be nothing impossible about this, but there was nothing in the occasion to warrant it.

SUCCESSFUL SIEGES.

Many a success is lost because not followed up. Joshua immediately laid successful siege to Makkedah and Libnah and Lachish and Eglon and Hebron and Debir. The strongholds one after another fell into the hands of Joshua. The subjugation was complete now of the South Country all the way from Gibeon to Gaza. The reason of the success is clearly stated, "Because the Lord God of Israel fought for Israel." It is the only basis of hope for nations and for causes and for individuals. The self impartation of God is the real ground of all human prosperity.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Joshua 11. The success of Joshua surprised and startled all the nations of Northern Canaan. By Jabin, the King of Hazor, the chief commander and leader, the league of nations was effected. Lake Merom was the place of rendezvous. The time had come when if ever the invasion of Israel must be stopped. Kings long in antagonism with each other united together for the common cause of defense in the expectation of exterminating the new-comers from the land. They must be driven back across the Jordan and into the desert and destroyed. They were unable to account for the success of the arms of Joshua. How with an inexperienced army he was able to win such victories baffled all attempt at explanation. Whatever the reason, the advance must be resisted and his power overcome. It was a great army that assembled at Lake Merom. In Numbers it is described as the sand of the sea upon the shore. Numbers count for nothing against the purposes of God. In addition to the infantry we read, "They had also horses and chariots very many." The army was well equipped. It far exceeded Israel in numbers. For the first time the army of Joshua was to stand face to face with a vast host prepared with all the munitions of war. As Ewald says, "Unequalled in arms and tactics they could oppose to the Canaanites only courage and confidence." Just at the opportune moment came a new sign of assurance. V. 6. "And the Lord said unto Joshua, 'Tomorrow about this time will I deliver up all, slain before Israel.'" In the Hebrew the word "I" is emphatic. One word seems to express the pre-eminent characteristic of Joshua. It is the word "suddenly." The narrative reads, "So Joshua came and all the people of war with him against them suddenly, and they fell upon them." Then follows the statement of the great victory. The league of nations had counted as nothing against Joshua's league with God. We are not to suppose the success was all gained in a single battle. It was a long war. V. 18. The campaign continued until the entire northern Palestine had been subjugated. In a general way, it could be said that the Land of Palestine was in the possession of the people of Promise. Returning from the north, insurrections were successively overcome, cities were retaken, the anakim were subjugated, the giants that had terrified Israel were destroyed. Then came the long desired peace. Joshua 14:14. The hero of a hundred battles had accomplished his task. In spite of all his successes the Lord said, "There remaineth yet very much land to be possessed."

CHICAGO

They Were Surprised!

Some of the schools that have recently adopted the Bethany System of Sunday School Literature stated that they were surprised upon examining this fine line of texts. They had no idea the Bethany System was so nearly perfect. Other schools are receiving such a revelation daily. Note what the leaders say of

The Bethany System

"Nothing Could Pry Us Loose"

We began using the Bethany Graded Lessons at their first issuance and have increased the supply from year to year as the literature for all grades was published. There is nothing in the series that is not now used by our school. Nothing could pry our superintendents and teachers loose from these lessons. They meet the needs of pupils of all years and make the teacher's work a joy. We have no word with which to express our satisfaction with the series.

H. H. HARMON,
First Church, Lincoln, Neb.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teachers' text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN,
Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va.

"Thoroughly Edited"

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upon the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday-school pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned.

L. J. MARSHALL,
Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

"We Would Not Turn Back"

We are using the Bethany Graded Lessons. We would not turn back. The service our Sunday-school specialists are giving us as represented in this course is making a new day in religious education.

FINIS IDLEMAN,
Pastor Central Church, Des Moines, Ia.

"Unanimously the Bethany Series"

After a campaign led by Miss Eva Lemert of Kansas City, Mo., resulting in the thorough grading and departmentizing of the school, we had to decide the matter of graded helps. A committee of three was appointed, consisting of the pastor, superintendent and one member of the Executive Committee. This committee made an individual examination of lesson helps and decided unanimously in favor of the Bethany series, arriving at their decisions independently and solely upon the merits of the literature. So far as I know these lessons are giving entire satisfaction.

EDGAR DeWITT JONES,
Pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

"Nothing to Compare With Them"

We have been using the Bethany Graded Lessons from the time you began to publish them and we are very highly pleased with them. We have often had occasion to compare them with the publications of other houses and thus far can say we have found nothing that compares with them. I am teaching a young men's class in the course, "The World a Field for Christian Service," and am glad to say that it seems to me the best adapted for young men of high school age of all courses I have ever seen. My class is becoming very enthusiastic over it.

P. J. RICE,
Pastor First Church, El Paso, Tex.

"Have Created Enthusiasm"

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

T. E. WINTER,
Pastor First Church, Fulton, Mo.

"Delighted"

Our Sunday-school, which has lately begun the use of the Bethany Graded Lessons, seems to be delighted with them. I have heard no word of unfavorable criticism and very many words of appreciation. Our teachers like the form and material of these lessons.

GRAHAM FRANK,
Pastor Liberty, Mo.

"Best on the Market"

We consider the Bethany Graded Lessons for the Beginners and Primary department the best on the market of our own brotherhood and second to none of other communions. Congratulations!

J. J. TISDALL,
Pastor Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O.

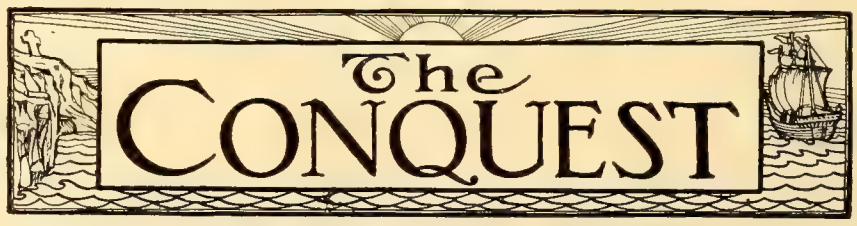
What They Say About Our New Weekly



Rev. Claude E. Hill, National C. E. Secretary—"This paper ought to have a wide circulation among the young people of our churches. I like, especially, your treatment of the Endeavor Topic. I certainly wish the paper abundant success."

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor-Emeritus Christian Evangelist—"I have examined The Conquest with care and with pleasure. If you can maintain the high ideal which is so well realized in your first issue, you will be making a valuable contribution to our Sunday school literature and to the religious training of the young."

Rev. J. H. Goldner, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland—"I like The Conquest immensely. The treatment of the Sunday school lesson, C. E. and midweek prayer-meeting topics is fresh and satisfying. In addition there is an abundance of readable and informing matter of a high order. The paper merits a hearty reception."

Rev. H. D. C. Maclachlan, Seventh Street, Richmond, Va.—"I am very much pleased with The Conquest. It is a good augury for the success of the Sunday school and the Disciples Publication Society that you are putting out such a publication."

W. O. Rogers, of the Sunday School Times Staff—"I have examined the copy of your new paper, The Conquest, with great interest. It looks interesting, which is the first requisite. Then it is interesting, which is the second. It has a fine tone. I predict for it a real success."

Dr. Loa E. Scott, Author of "The Life of Jesus"—"The Conquest is indeed a credit to the Disciples Publication Society. There is need among us for just such a paper, one that takes a broad outlook upon the world and upon the problems of the church and Sunday school."

Rev. Cloyd Goodnight, Uniontown, Pa.—"I like the virility and admire the study pages of The Conquest. Am sure you have a fine combination of page and column features, such as will make the paper not only attractive but valuable. It has the modern touch."

Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds, Author—"I am sure you are putting out just the kind of a paper our young people need."

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Ten Big Reasons Why

BETHANY GRADED LESSONS are being adopted by so many of the best schools among Disciples.

1. There is more to them—at least a third more—than is contained in any other series.
2. They are rich, vital and full of suggestion to teacher and pupil.
3. They are free from the sectarian spirit.
4. They are soundly and fervently evangelical.
5. They are truly artistic in all their illustrations.
6. They are printed on better paper with better binding and in better taste than any other series.
7. Every lesson writer is an expert of interdenominational reputation.
8. They are a monument to the modern spirit of unity—several leading denominations have co-operated to produce them and are now using them.
9. The Disciples possess full editorial rights, through the editor, Charles Clayton Morrison.
10. Every Disciple school that uses them participates in and promotes a great Christian union enterprise.

Life's Unconquerable Aspirations

There are forces in human life which tend constantly to pull it down. There are passions, deep and powerful, which, like an awful undertow, suck men beneath the surface and choke out their lives in black and bitter depths. So mighty are these passions, so instinctive and elemental, it is no wonder men have shaped their perceptions of them in doctrines of total depravity, and the universal ruin of human nature. It is not surprising that they have tortured the penitential outbursts of the psalms into metaphysical axioms, and based their formulated systems of theology on this fearful negation of the primitive and hopeless badness of humanity, and have held that, apart from the regenerating and sustaining grace of God, life would be hopeless. There is a fallacy in the assumption that life is, or can be, a thing apart from the grace of God; that God has abandoned, or can abandon, what He has made, to a condition of despair, with no divine effort for its restoration. But even so, there is a sufficiently somber side to the picture to make us pause now and then when we remember how wicked, how mean, how weak, men and women are.

Happily these are not the only forces in human life. There are others, not less significant. Among them is that wonderful quality of spiritual discontent which prompts men to seek for something better than they have known or experienced. There is a tendency in human life to flow downward into the gulf of bestial sensuality; there is another tendency due to an equally significant law of spiritual hydrostatics, which forces the level of responsive life upward toward that of its divine fountain.

In Henley's startling little poem there is yet a ring of fine nobility: "I thank whatever gods may be for my unconquerable soul." One can find a good deal of sympathy with such an expression of gratitude. An unconquerable soul is a thing to be thankful for. But a soul unconquerable by God himself, and yet vulnerable to passion and despair, as was that of the poet, is occasion for gratitude of a very qualified and subdued sort if any. And he who possesses such a soul need not have overmuch pride in his mere spiritual obstinacy; he ought rather to be asking whether in his satisfaction over his unconquerability he has not already surrendered to evil. But there is an unconquerable element in the soul of man, if we will have it so; it is that upward aspiring tendency which is none other than the Spirit of God within the human heart upreaching after better things. The body of man is composed of the same elements which shine in the stars; the soul of man is of the same stuff which was in the beginning with God. Science tells us of a reversion to type; there is such a thing as aspiration to type. God is the norm of the universe. Godward grows normal life as the free plant grows sunward. This is the real unconquered element of life. Evil can be conquered, and evil will be eternally eradicated from the universe of God. The one unconquerable element in human life is the element of goodness.

Our regret of the past is half hypocrisy and the other half mostly self-deception. You would do better if you had the past to live over again? Try with all your might never to regret anything. Did you do your best, and did it turn out badly? Thank God for your good intention, and save the regret. You know better now than you did before your failure? Thank God for the knowledge, and save the regret. You have done badly, and you cannot help regretting it: no, you cannot. But just here is your danger: you are in danger of making a virtue of your regret, and failing to do better. Try not to regret, even when you know that you have done wrong. Do better, and let the regret alone. Regret is a hypocrite; his twin brother Aspiration is often slain by him before the very altar of sacrifice. Do not regret; aspire. Do not pretend that you would do better if you had the past back again. Do better in the present.

But, some one will ask, Can we have aspiration without regret? Perhaps not. Yet we can certainly vary the proportion. The ratio is not constant; it is often inverse. Alas for the man who is so full of regret that he makes no effort at improvement. Let us admit that we have not done our best; do better. This perpetual slandering of the past is like libel upon our friends. And this pretense of a better use of the past is mostly sham.

And yet no one of us can pretend to be satisfied with the past. And no one of us who is honest and sincere can desire not to do better in the future. One thing is perfectly certain, we shall not do better without effort. And we shall not do better without the help of God. Let us be thankful that the past has been so good. And then, not as though it had been good enough, or we had been worthy of its goodness, let us press forward. Yesterday is past. A new day has dawned. Let us wake and greet it.

Christ's Call and the World's Need

A Call to the Disciples in Behalf of a New Crusade.

BY CHARLES T. PAUL.

THE call to Christian service never sounded with such clarion clearness, such urgent insistence, such varied and universal challenge as today. The more our modern life—individual, social, national and international—has become complex and many-sided, the wider and more diversified has grown the range of the world's appeal to the church. And as the appeal of the world has widened, so has the Church's conscious obligation to respond. For it is of the very genius of true Christianity, as manifested by its most saintly and illumined souls, that with every emergent human need there is a fresh recognition of the Christian's duty, a warmer throb of the Christian's heart, a further stimulus to Christian action, and a waiting discovery of the gospel's power.

PROBLEMS THE CHURCH MUST MEET.

The Church today is confronted by an almost appalling accumulation of problems and demands. What is hopeful is that Christian men are keenly aware of them. In most cases it was Christian men who first grasped and adequately stated them. As Lincoln, Garrison and Wilberforce, themselves free, first voiced effectively the inarticulate cry of the slave, so it is the Church's own prophets who have most clearly discerned and most eloquently uttered those calls of the world which the world itself could only confusedly express and which the Church as a whole had forgotten how to hear. And what is still more significant is this: that although aware of her weaknesses and failures, confessing the justness of the world's rebuke that she has not kept pace with the needs of the age, that she has not adequately expressed the life she professes; alert through her leaders to the difficulty and magnitude of the tasks before her—the Church has never lost the consciousness that she does possess a dynamic, the only dynamic, which if rightly applied can meet modern humanity healingly at every point of its vital need.

It is a paradox that as our knowledge increases of the vast depths and reaches of the world yet beyond the sweep of Christian contact, there should be coming to the Church as there undoubtedly is, a strengthening conviction of the rich resourcefulness, the multiplying adequacy, the all-compassing sufficiency of the Christian religion. There never was a time when so many Christians of all communions were so confirmed as now in the faith that Jesus Christ has a redemptive response to the highest demands of our evolving life, that he has power to meet all the deepest needs of man. Despite the questions of method and organization which perplex us, (and which, alas, threaten to estrange us), was there ever a time when we Disciples of Christ, whether conservatives or liberals, were more united in one burning conviction, namely, our faith in the sufficiency and supremacy of our Christ, in the immediate and solving applicability of his life and teaching to every phase and problem of the welfare and salvation of our race? In this faith can we not as one unbroken brotherhood gather closer about the cross, and from the hill where our Master was lifted up, look out on the nations and join in Saint Bernard's hymn:

"No voice can sing, no heart can frame
Nor can the memory find,
A sweeter sound than Jesus' name
The Saviour of Mankind!"

Rejoicing in him as the world's redeemer does not our faith take on a new enthusiasm by the fact that in it we are at one with the enlarging consciousness of all Christendom? For despite all the forces which have tended to provincialize, denominationalize, circumscribe and obscure the missionary Christianity of Christ, the number of his followers of whatever name is greater today than in any preceding time who conceive the Church's task to be nothing less than the uplift of the whole world in all the aspects of life.

But the uplift of the world according to the program of Christ is a highly differentiated task. We used to hear much about the simple preaching of the gospel, as if the work of the Church were a very simple task. We now understand how manifold an undertaking the preaching of the gospel really is. No one can listen to the voices of our day and not marvel at the multiplicity of the forms of service to which Christian men and women are called. The church organizations are clamant for agents and leaders for all branches of their growing activities in all parts of the globe. To the young people of this generation, especially to the 100,000 students in the colleges, seminaries and universities of Canada and the United States, and to the additional thousands in the educational institutions of Europe and other parts of the Christian world, these calls are coming with unprecedented frequency and number.

Let me mention only a few of the kinds of Christian work for which leadership is sought. There are (1), the various forms of social service—child welfare, charitable relief, rescue work, prison work, slum evangelism, settlement work, the advocacy of temperance and purity, and other moral reforms; (2), in the larger field of "Home Missions," there is demand for regular ministers, evangelists, and pastoral helpers, for university pastors and professors, for religious journalists and specialists in religious education, for Bible scholars and teachers, for executives of home mission boards, for Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. secretaries and assistants, for experts in work with boys, for specialists in rural work, for leaders in frontier missions and in the various lines of activity among the Negroes of the South, the Indian aborigines of the reserves and plains, the Orientals of the Pacific Coast, and the foreign-immigrant populations in Canadian and American cities; (3), moving out into the still larger field of world-missions, the note of urgency grows as the foreign boards and the non-Christian nations call through open doors for the thousands of missionaries of all types—evangelistic, educational, medical, literary and industrial—yet required to develop the native Christian communities and lead them in the task of evangelizing the unreached world.

Two things may be said regarding these modern calls. First, they are immediately related to and arise out of discovered human needs. From this they derive their primary meaning and appeal. There is a pull in them even though we link them up to no divine command. Here are needs to be met which no one else can or will meet if Christians do not respond. Here is work which ought to be done and which cries for doers. These calls are expressions and tests of that new enthusiasm for humanity, of that social sense of brotherhood and altruistic obligation which is the salient moral and spiritual watchword of our day, and which is doing much to rescue our profession of Christianity from theoretical unreality and sentimental sham. Theoretically we all recognize a general call to service. We know well enough that Christ summons no one to merely passive or nominal discipleship. "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" But do we really hear and rightly interpret the voices which tell us what he wants us to do? Have we too lightly regarded the appeals of our missionary societies and other church organizations? Have we grasped the fact that the calls of the boards have simply translated the general call to Christian service into specific concrete terms, and related it to the tasks and necessities of our own time? The call of the boards is the call of men and women and nations who need our help today, and whom it is within our power and opportunity to serve.

Prof. Charles T. Paul, at his desk.

"THE CALL OF CHRIST."

Second, the present calls to service in so far as, and just because they do spring out of the needs of men are direct echoes of the call of Christ. We talk as if the commands of Christ created the obligation to service. No, they merely revealed it. His own service was not of command but of compassion. Did not the commands themselves grow out of the unmet needs of men as he saw them, and did he not relate his call to discipleship to those needs? "Follow me . . . go work in my vineyard." Why? Because the harvest is great and needs gatherers. "Feed my sheep." Why? Because he tells us to? Yes. Because we love him? Yes. But away down deep is another reason—because the sheep are hungry.

CHRIST'S CALL IMPLIES SERVICE.

It is significant that the universal commission was issued at the close of Christ's career, and not at the beginning. What had happened meanwhile? He had wept over the love-rejecting Jerusalem, had felt the spiritual hardness of the Galilean towns, had been moved with compassion for the unshepherded multitudes, had looked himself and had bidden his disciples lift up their eyes upon the unharvested fields, had caught the vision of lands and peoples on which the light of the world had not dawned. The people, the fields, the nations, their needs—and then the imperial commands to "preach the gospel to every creature," to witness for him "to the uttermost part of the earth," to heal the sick, to open the eyes of the blind, and to proclaim to all men their birthright in the kingdom of God. I do not forget the transcendent plan of God behind it all; but a loving, redemptive purpose on the part of God, a saving mission on the part of Christ are utterly unintelligible apart from conscious human need. Christianity has a social basis. Any call to service which does not answer the needs of men is not the voice of Christ.

But I wish more particularly to speak of the special united call which has come to the Disciples of Christ through our missionary societies, home and foreign, and which is to be sounded throughout the Brotherhood to the churches, the colleges, and universities in connection with the approaching "Men and Millions Movement." After a careful survey of our fields, after consideration of the pleadings of our home leaders and foreign missionaries for reinforcements, after hearing the challenge to enlargement which, because of the wonderful movements and changes transpiring in all the world, has come to all Christendom, six of our societies have issued an appeal for one thousand workers, who within the next five years shall dedicate their lives to, and prepare themselves for, missionary service at home and abroad.

A CALL TO THE DISCIPLES.

Since this call of the boards is related to definite human needs, I believe it to be a distinct call of Christ to the people known as Disciples of Christ, in the second decade of the twentieth century.

We do well to consider some of the meanings of this call.

1. In the first place it is a call to reality. At once the question arises as to whether the Disciples have sufficient spiritual resource and momentum to answer it. Have we ourselves such abounding and overflowing experience of Christ that we can send out a rich new stream of the water of life into the dry and thirsty places of the earth? Our movement has stood for vital as against formal Christianity. Do we possess it? Have we fallen under the blight of traditional acquiescence, or is our religion a felt and compelling conviction? Is our own life in Christ so real and deep that we can answer his call with a new apostolate a thousand strong? Is it only our "plea" that we have to give to the world or is it Christ, our Christ, the Christ whom we know as the supreme reality and controlling passion of our souls, the Christ clothing himself in a thousand of our young men and maidens, Christ flaming forth in a new parousia of blessing and service in the drab and needy ways of this modern world? We have said much about restoring apostolic Christianity. Can we practice it? That was more than a plea or a position or a contention or a cry. That was an expanding life. That was the Christianity which, smiling at a thousand martyrdoms, went everywhere preaching the Word, and lit those fires of evangelism which "burned to the water's edge all round the Mediterranean and remade the Roman world." What shall now be the fruition of our "discipleship" in this modern day of the Lord, in this day of our judgment when we are asked to give account of our stewardship in men? What answer to the world? What answer to the Church? What answer to God?

MUST ANSWER HUMANITY'S CALL.

During the century of their existence the Disciples have been subjected to some severe and crucial trials of their loyalty, and we are said by some now to be "at the parting of the ways;" but I declare unto you that this call for a thousand workers in view of the present need of the world is the greatest test of the reality and vitality of their whole conception and plea and experience of Christianity, that the Disciples have ever been called upon to undergo. Real Christianity? Let that be real which answers humanity's call not in words but in men and deeds.

2. In the second place this call for a thousand workers is a call to sacrificial devotion. It is the death call of self. It is a summons to a struggle for the life of others. Real Christianity knows that in this struggle is the refinement of joy. Real Christianity cannot do otherwise than devote and communicate itself. "No man was ever yet convinced of any momentous truth" says Southey, "without feeling in himself the desire as well as the power of propagating it." Reality and sacrificial devotion for the sake of mediating reality are as inseparable as light and heat.

I recall that at the Student Volunteer Convention held in this hall in 1902, Prebendary Fox, of the Church Missionary Society, in one of his addresses quoted and fairly burned these lines into our hearts:

"Oh, for a passionate passion for souls!
Oh, for a pity that yearns!
Oh, for the love that loves unto death!
Oh, for the fire that burns!

"Oh, for the power that prevails,
That pours out itself for the lost,
Victorious power in the Conqueror's name,
The Lord of Pentecost."

Real Christianity has always that passion and that power.

"Christianity," as Principal Fairbairn used to say, is "the passion of a divine life." It is the expression of a divine love, that must express itself in service to men.

When some time before his death the late General Booth was asked for a brief message which summed up the secret of his own herculean labor and fiery apostolate, a message which should be flashed around the world as a rallying cry for his followers, the old patriarchal warrior sent vibrating over the cables which knit the continents and seas, the single Anglo-Saxon word "Others." In that word was the heart of Christ! That was the passion of Paul as expressed in Myers' noble poem:

"Then with a rush the intolerable craving
Shivers throughout me like a trumpet call,
O to save these, to perish for their saving,
Die for their life, be offered for them all!"

Not long ago I grasped the hand and looked into the face of Dr. Grenfell, a British hero-saint of whom all Christians should be proud. What was it that sent Grenfell to the bleak coasts of Labrador? What has kept him through the years, cutting the ice drifts with his gospel ships, ministering in the teeth of the polar blasts to the fishermen from Newfoundland to Hudson Bay, climbing over the rocks and snows of the mainland, planting his supply depots and bringing the evangel of the helping hand to low-browed, blubber-eating Esquimaux? It was the resolution he made when a young man in the London street, after he had heard Moody, and when his incipient medical career beckoned him to success and ease and fame in the metropolis. "I must give up my Christianity or make it real by giving it to others." And Grenfell went down to his ship justified. He went to that frozen coast because his Christianity was real.

HOLY PATRIOTISM NEEDED.

I lived in Canada when the bugles sounded for the Boer war. Canada didn't wait to be asked for her quota of soldiers. She volunteered them. And when the call re-echoed through the Canadian regiments the best young men of the country fairly strove with each other to enlist. They marched off in buoyant companies to martial music and waving banners because they couldn't stay at home. As I think of the hundreds of my young countrymen who sleep tonight in their far away graves on the lone South African veldt, I ask myself whether the patriotisms of earth cannot be matched by a patriotism for the kingdom of God that shall drive our young men and women with holy enthusiasm and deathless devotion into the battles of the King.

3. In the third place, this is a call to special preparation. The men and women who answer this call must be equipped with sound learning and disciplined powers. They must have broad, sane vision, and thorough acquaintance with the problems with which they shall have to deal and the environments in which they shall labor. The conditions of religious leadership were never so exacting as they are today. The home churches are demanding more of the ministers, the foreign mission fields, more of the missionaries than ever before. The religious leader for which the world is crying must be not only consecrated but capable; not only faithful but fruitful; not only devoted but dynamic. It no longer suffices that he be merely a witnesser, he must also be a creator; not simply a transmitter, he must likewise be a transmuter; not simply a passive instrument but a positive initiator, not a willing disciple only, but a wise and winsome teacher, a spiritual master-builder, a man of God—a man of men, knowing what is in men. And he must be in the full-tide of the intellectual currents of our age.

The thousand workers must be imbued with the teachings of the Holy Scriptures according to the soundest means and methods of study and interpretation. To know Christ they must search and assimilate these writings which testify of him. They must freshen and fill and sustain their souls by deep and constant draughts at the fountain of divine truth. They must attune their souls to hear the voice of God speaking in his word. They must go out to the world themselves to speak with the authority of a divine message and of a spiritual experience based on that word. But they must know the world to which they are to speak, its history, its philosophy, its social conditions, its religious yearning, its spirit—yea, and its sins. Otherwise how can they tell out the message of the Bible in the language of today?

THE LEADERSHIP NEEDED.

The man of one book will no longer do. He who knows the Bible only does not know the Bible for this age. I plead for deliverance from the delusion that mere knowledge of the Bible text equips a man for Christian leadership. Some of the most conspicuous failures as religious workers have been mighty in the repetition of Scripture—and in nothing else. It is no longer Christian leadership to get a few people into a corner and linger over the A B C of Christianity so long that first principles become last principles with nothing between the first and the last! You will understand me. We Disciples must sweep past the leadership of the alphabet and the corner, into the leadership of God's great world movements in which we are so manifestly called to do our part.

The equipment of these workers must be equally thorough, though different, for those who go to the foreign fields and those who work in the home lands. Does a young man decide to give himself to the country ministry in America? Let him know that the rural communities present some of the profoundest problems in sociology as well as in religion, and that the present workers are not expert enough to keep 10,000 country churches from dying. Does a young woman wish to do social service in a city? No university education is too complete for her. Culture, technique, grace, laboratory experience—she will need it all. Give her time to get ready, for "it takes the highest to lift the lowest." All the home mission boards call not simply for workers, but for experts.

A NOTE FROM THE EDINBURGH CONFERENCE.

As regards the foreign fields, I need but remind you that the Edinburgh Conference devoted an entire Commission to the question of the better preparation of missionaries, and that the Boards of Missionary Preparation in England and America insist that henceforth no candidate shall be sent to the field without a year's post-graduate work in missionary science and history, phonetics, comparative religion and other disciplines not usually provided in a university or college course. For the challenge of the non-Christian world is that which Count Okuma recently uttered for Japan: "Send us the best men, and the best equipped, which your Christian civilization can produce."

A CALL OF DEMONSTRATED POWER.

4. In the fourth place, this call for a thousand workers is the call of demonstrated power. It is buttressed by nearly twenty centuries' witness of what Christ can do in the world when his life and teachings get themselves incarnated in men. This witness is luminous in history notwithstanding the mistakes, lapses and divisions of the church and all the corruptions of true Christianity. Richter speaks of Christ with his bleeding hands lifting empires off their hinges and turning history from its channels. That is only a rhetorical way of saying that Christ through his followers has been at work through the nations and through the centuries and that he has given us our Christian civilization. The chief glory of the challenge which seeks the new legion of a thousand, is that they are called to be instruments of the mightiest power for righteousness the world has ever known—the power which is to redeem the earth and cover it with the kingdom of God. They are to be heralds and mediators of a moral and spiritual life which has demonstrated its right and power to become the religion of all mankind. They are called to service when victory is written large over the Christian cause. Never were the manifestations of the redeeming power of Christ so abundant as they are now. "What shall be the sign of his coming?" The signs are luminous all over the world-horizon.

"Lo the clouds begin to shine
About the coming of the Lord."

5. Finally, this is a call to the whole Brotherhood of the Disciples—a call to unity, a call to prayer, a call to consecration and action. We must not leave it to the societies alone to find this new legion. Let every young minister answer this call for himself. Let parents consecrate their children. Let college presidents and professors lay the obligation upon their students. This is an exodus that means gold. Let those who cannot go make paths with their wealth for those who can go. Let us not forget in this closing moment, that this is Christ's call to us all sounding out from the need of the world.

The Disciples have been a long time getting "back to Christ" in their faith. Now he calls us forward with him in his enterprises. We have lingered long at the gateway. Let us hasten on to the goal!

I preach a new crusade. It is the appeal of the societies! It is the voice of the nations! It is the call of Christ! It is the will of God!

A Visit to Chu Chow

A Glimpse of an Inland China City.

BY HERBERT L. WILLETT.

ONE of the most interesting of our experiences in China was a side visit from Nanking to Chu Chow, a city forty miles north, on the Pukow and Tientsin railroad. Dr. E. I. Osgood, the head of the medical work in that city, came down to Nanking and took us with him on his return home.

We left in the mid forenoon, and drove down the three miles from the Drum Tower to the river. There we took a steam ferry over the Yangtse to Pukow. This is a rapidly growing city, the terminal of the new railroad line to the north which is now complete, and affords, with the exception of the transfer across the river, a through line from Shanghai to Pekin. This is a much shorter route than the steamer from Shanghai to Hankow, and the Hankow and Pekin railroad to the capital.

Just before our ferry boat started we met a missionary from an inland station fifteen miles off the line from Chu Chow. He was waiting for his two little boys, who were attending school in Shanghai, and were coming home for a few days' visit. The boat on which they were coming was just in sight down the river, and he hoped it would dock in time to permit him to join us at the train.

On arrival at the Pukow railway station a short distance up the river bank from the ferry landing, Doctor Osgood went in to get the tickets, and we waited beside the train. It was quite long, made up of goods or freight cars and of third class passenger coaches. The doctor had told us to get into any second class coach we could find. But as there were only thirds, we waited for his return. He told us, with some embarrassment, that there was no second provided for that train, and that we must make the best of the situation.

TRAVELING UNDER DIFFICULTIES.

This we proceeded to do at once. But as every coach was full to the doors, with men, women, children and all manner of belongings occupying every available inch of space, it was no easy matter. The people, however, were very polite and friendly. They evidently knew the doctor along that line, and willingly "moved over," compressed themselves, stood up, and in various other ways made room for us. Fortunately several members of our party remained in Nanking. But the four of us who went had plenty of experience for the entire group.

Just as the station bell rang, the conductor's whistle sounded, and the train pulled slowly out of the station, our friend the missionary who had waited for his two boys, came hurrying from the ferry, and rushed up the incline to the station platform. It was too late, however. He dared not take the risk of trying to get aboard and as the long train could not stop for him, there was nothing to do but to wait six or eight hours for the next train.

The train went quite slowly, so we had plenty of opportunity to study our neighbors. They were a cheerful, chatty lot. The doctor sat beside a most friendly, farmer-looking man of fifty, who wore garments not too clean, but such as would compare well with most in the car. He had a brother or some other relative in the next seat, and after conferring with him, evidently regarding the proper duties toward strangers, he proceeded to unwrap some most unappetizing looking food, and passed it over to us. The doctor and I took small help-ings of what looked least objectionable, but the ladies frankly declined, much to the old man's regret. I think the doctor actually ate his portions, but I satisfied my conscience (and appetite) with as careful an imitation of eating as I could give.

Meantime the rest of our fellow-travelers gathered around as closely as possible to observe and comment. We had been fearful that the open windows and doors might make us uncomfortably cold. But in the small space we had, and ringed around by so many curious and all too friendly people, we were very glad to get such whiffs of fresh air as could reach us. The range of odors in that crowd was very wide. You got everything from carbolic acid to garlic. The combination of numbers and smells was impressive, they must have been at least fifty, strong!

But after a time the curiosity wore off, the circle thinned out, and we were not at all uncomfortable. A man in the corner of the car took out his elaborate pipe, and proceeded to smoke in the Chinese fashion, which uses only a pinch of tobacco at a time, and consumes it at a puff. In the intervals of his own inhalations he passed it around to some five or six of his neighbors, who took their share in the smoking and the conversation.

Medical Mission Compound in Chu Chow, China. The building to the left is the Tisdale Hospital, and the one to the right is the residence of Dr. Osgood.

THE CHINESE REGARD FOR PRINTING.

The doctor did not fail to use his chance to talk with the men around him. He gradually led up to the main theme, and after talking for a time with several, handed about some tracts. The Chinese have great regard for anything written or printed. There is to them something sacred about a paper that has a message on it. This they get from their old Confucian training. Most of the men put the tracts carefully away in their clothing or packs. One or two read them in silence. Our friend of the lunch bag treated the matter lightly, declining at first to take the pamphlet. When it was pressed on him, he wanted to reciprocate by giving us some more of his lunch. I hoped the doctor wouldn't press the matter of exchange, for I had found it hard to give an imitation on so limited a stage.

As the afternoon wore on we passed many travelers going north or south on the great highway, parallel with the railroad, that joins the Yangtse valley with Pekin, and was in earlier days the most important caravan route in the land. They were mostly on foot, though some rode horses or mules, and many drove loaded pack-animals. We were now up in the half-mountainous district that runs back from the Yangtse, and many beautiful bits of scenery were interspersed with bare plains and rough mountainside.

About four in the afternoon we reached the station at Chu Chow. In the crowd gathered along the track we soon found Mr. W. R. Hunt, Doctor Osgood's colleague in the mission work, and several of the children, and members of the native church. After the greetings were over, part of our little company went with the doctor, and the rest of us followed Mr. Hunt.

We went down from the station platform, and presently entered the city gate. Like all Chinese cities, Chu Chow has a wall. And in this case it is of real service, for the mountains about are infested with wild beasts and robbers, and the gates are carefully closed at night. The missionaries can tell exciting stories of encounters on the highroad, when detained after nightfall by storms or stress of work.

In this city of thirty or more thousand people the two families of Hunt and Osgood are the only non-Chinese households. They were here long before the railroad, and it used to require two days to make the journey from Nanking. They live in two compounds, or wall-inclosed courts. In the one where the Hunts live are the home, the chapel, a boys' school, and other needed buildings. In the other, across a small stream, are the Osgood home, the hospital, the gift of J. T. Tisdale of Covington, Ky., the dispensary, the girls' school, and a kindergarten. A boys' school is near by.

We walked through the narrow, dirty streets of the city, past an old river gate, and finally came to the mission compound. Here in the home of Mr. and Mrs. Hunt we were made royally welcome. These missionary households, where women are honored and children are given access to all that knowledge, culture, courtesy, health and religion can confer, are the convincing witnesses for the noble character of our Christian faith.

That evening at Mr. Hunt's request, a group of some dozen Chinese preachers and evangelists made us a visit. They had many questions to ask about America and the churches there. The conflict between shyness and curiosity was apparent, but the latter generally conquered. One of the men interested us particularly. He was very quiet; a short, stocky, strongly-built man, who hardly spoke at all, but listened with the closest attention to all that was said.

Later on Mr. Hunt told us that their first acquaintance with this man, back in the mountain village where he lives, was the result of an assault which he made upon the missionary, when he was trying to introduce the Gospel to the people. But after many efforts, not without danger, the man was won to friendliness and then to Christianity. Now he is the leading elder in that village church, and has just given land to the mission for a school. For the missionaries have not only the care of their home station, but as well make periodic visits to some twelve or more out-stations, where the work is regularly carried on by local native teachers and pastors.

A CHINESE "DOCTOR."

In the morning we went out past one of the old pagodas, erected to secure the favorable influences of wind and rain for the city, and came presently to the bridge crossing the little stream. On one edge of the bridge was a native doctor with his stock of remedies. Doctor Osgood called our attention to the assortment. There were dried toads, snakes, and lizzards, bones of many sorts, insects in bottles, and powders in variety, all intended to be used in decoctions for the ignorant, to heal their diseases. One might think it impossible that humanity should be so duped by quacks and imposters. But an American is given pause in his indignation by the reflection that in our own cities at home men are dispensing almost as impossible compounds as medicine, and, if the advertising pages of our newspapers, secular and religious alike, are to be believed, they are thriving on the credulity of twentieth century Americans. The Chinese doctor is probably following the customs of his fraternity for centuries, and knows no better. The American quack is not such a fool. He is just a common knave.

The Chinese doctor and apothecary on the bridge greeted Doctor Osgood with ready courtesy. He seemed to have no ill-will toward the good physician who was every day making his business less possible. At the entrance to the hospital compound we met our missionary friend with his children. He had come up from Pukow on the night train, and was starting for his station, fifteen miles away, with a pony and a coolie chair hired for the trip.

SOME FRUITS OF MISSION WORK.

We were welcomed in the Osgood home, where the other members of our party were staying. Then we went over to the hospital, where the crowd of waiting patients, the work of the dispensary, of the operating room, and of the chapel where all are told the story of the Christ, were objects of deep interest. It is hard to think of a sort of self-indulgence more satisfying than the bestowal of money on so gracious and rewarding a ministry as this. One feels that the contributors to mission work, whether medical, educational, industrial or evangelistic, ought to be among the happiest of people. It is given to them as to few to see in the most convincing manner the fruits of their labors.

Another of our excursions in Chu Chow was along the top of the city wall. From this vantage ground it is possible to see not only the city, with its pagodas, gates, streets and open spaces, and multitude of houses and shops little and big. But it is also possible to see something of the influence which the missionaries are having upon the city, apart from the work within the chapel, schools and hospital. They have given many public lectures on sanitation, garbage disposition, public decency, industrial competence, and good government, and these addresses are listened to by attentive crowds. To be sure, the progress is slow where the hold of the dead hand of the past is so firm. But custom and ideas slowly change. And as we walked along the wall we were shown many signs of the cleaning up process, both in physical and moral estate.

From the wall we also saw another interesting phase of China's improvement under missionary direction. For centuries the public lands have been unimproved, except as they were rented by the rich for private gain. Doctor Macklin of Nanking and some of his friends among the progressive Chinese have conceived the idea of allowing the poor people of the cities to cultivate this unused land. In Chu Chow Doctor Osgood has taken up the same idea, and a considerable portion of the land immediately outside the walls is now being used for that good purpose.

It is such men as these missionaries who are "Breaking Down Chinese Walls," to use the expressive title of Doctor Osgood's most interesting book. They know what it is to enter a totally non-Christian city, and build up from the very foundations a community of carefully trained industrious and efficient workmen, who at the same time are becoming Christian men and women. They have the confidence and the good will of their fellow citizens. When the Revolution came on them three years ago, they organized a Red Cross Society and were the means of caring for many of the soldiers both in body and soul.

In Mr. Hunt's book, "Heathenism Under the Searchlight," he quotes an advertisement in a prominent native paper, in which a girl of sixteen, whose parents had recently died, offers herself for sale in order to raise funds to provide for their burial. The depths of heathenism are not easily sounded. Something of its vileness may be seen by the most casual observer. But the missionary alone knows the abysses, and has at the same time the sympathy to abide in the darkness till he can bring in the "Light that lighteth every man."

When we left Chu Chow Mr. Hunt came with us to Nanking, and we had a chance to talk over with him many phases of Chinese life and mission work which the journey helped to illustrate.

The Tangle of Life

A Bit of Philosophy for Every-day Living.

BY CLELAND B. McAFEE.

THERE is a famous verse in Ecclesiastes which says, "The king himself is served by the field." It means that the very ends of the social order depend on each other. The king riding by in state may feel very superior to the farmer who stops in awe to see him go by, but the farmer could really get on far better without the king than the king could without the farmer. The king might strike work and go out of the country, and the farmer would be sure to suffer for it after a while; but if the farmer and all his kind should strike work, the king would know it before the week was out. "The king himself is served by the field." Of course, it bears testimony to the current faith that the real producer must work in the ground, and that all real and new wealth comes out of the earth in some form. I remember the scorn with which a mining man met the suggestion that he leave that sort of thing and settle down to something that would really be productive. "Productive!" he exclaimed; "the only two men who are really productive are the farmer and the miner; all the rest are manipulators!" There is some ground for that judgment, and this verse helps out the contention.

But the chief thing which this verse suggests to some of us is the great and interesting tangle of life. Kings and farmers seem far apart, but they are actually intertwined. You can touch no part of the social order without jarring it far and wide. Sometimes we speak of the necessity for disciplining railroad owners and managers by drastic legislation, and we set out to do so. Then we discover that the discipline cuts off the incomes of hundreds whom we had not in mind at all. The papers told us the other day of the dividend payment of a certain great railroad system, when checks were sent to 85,310 shareholders. Nearly half of them were women, who had no more to do with the running of that railroad apparently than with the shining of the moon. Yet whatever affected it was sure to affect them. The influences which make corrective legislation difficult are not necessarily sinister; some of them issue from the tangle of life. Innocent interests are involved, and an apparently simple process becomes at once much complicated. You want to get at the farmer, and he looks like an easy mark, but you would best go slowly, for the king is involved. Life is all intertwined, all tangled, and you can not treat one strand of it as though it were alone.

LIVES ARE INTERTWINED.

Now, there are two inferences which follow from that fact. One is, that one can never know how far a deed will go. There is no knowing just what strand of the web of life is being touched or pulled when one's hand reaches out. Ministers have much occasion to realize that. They find that chance sentences have stuck in some man's memory, and come floating back from the most unexpected places. A stranger is in the church one Sunday; he is never there again, but the next Sunday is out in some village, where he repeats the word he heard to a minister in that church, and he passes it on to other people, and the story grows until only God knows where the end of it is to be. Or else for that one day the minister was a bit careless in his message, and a life which needed him at his best must go away disappointed; then other lives which would have been helped have to go without it in turn, and so it goes on down a long line of failure.

But in the nature of the case that is as true for other people as for ministers. When we meet people in strange places who know our intimate friends in some far-away place, we say: "How small the world is, after all!" But that is not the explanation. How intertwined life is; how tangled the webs of life are!— that is the important fact. And what a silly thing it is to chafe over narrow opportunities when one can never tell that they are really narrow at all! We thought we were only hard-working farmers, but the king is on his throne because we are

Conducted by Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

THE WORK OF THE WOMEN.

The one time in the year when the work of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions is brought before the churches is the set Sunday of December, or a day that may be chosen as a substitute for it. This is our opportunity for presenting the aims and achievements of the only National Woman's Society among the Disciples of Christ, and of taking a public offering for its support. But while it is primarily a woman's organization, yet we should not hesitate at this annual hearing to ask for sympathy and co-operation from our brethren, because we think our work in the past justifies this.

NEARLY TWO SCORE YEARS OF SERVICE.

We enter this fall on our fortieth year of missionary service, both a t home and abroad. From a single station and a handful of workers in 1874, we now have 518 missionaries, evangelists, teachers and native helpers, in thirty-five states in our own land, and in Canada—and we do foreign work in India, Africa, Jamaica, Porto Rico, Mexico and Argentina. These are supported by 2,650 auxiliaries with a membership of about 75,000 women, by a large number of children's societies, and by gifts from friends of the Board. Our receipts for the missionary year just closed were $358,944.97. Our work, therefore, is both home and foreign—our labors are only limited by our opportunities; this gives it a cosmopolitan flavor that should commend it to all tastes.

THE WORK AS VARIED AS THE FIELDS.

Our educational work has always been especially emphasized, and with it we reach all sorts and conditions of people. We have Chairs for teaching the English Bible in centers of culture and influence like our great state universities; we have six schools for the Negro, in Mississippi, Alabama, Texas, Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee, over five hundred being in attendance at these institutions during the past year; we have four splendid schools for the bright mountain boys and girls of Kentucky, West Virginia and Tennessee, with an enrolment of about 1,600 students for the last term; and we have schools for the Chinese and Japanese on the Pacific coast. We have flourishing schools in all of the six foreign fields in which we labor. During the past year we have conducted sixty-seven schools, with 5,969 pupils in attendance.

We do philanthropic work for orphaned and destitute children in India and Porto Rico, and have about four hundred girls and boys in these institutions. We do medical work in three hospitals and seven dispensaries in India, and treated fully one hundred thousand patients during the missionary year.

We do evangelistic work in all our fields and stations—our labors at home and abroad have been crowned with 3,432 conversions during the year.

MUCH OF THE WORK WITHOUT A PARALLEL IN THE CHURCH.

Another reason for asking for support for the Christian Woman's Board of Missions from the church at large is that much of its work has no parallel in our other missionary and benevolent agencies. The only missions in Jamaica, in Porto Rico, in Mexico and in South America conducted by our church are under the auspices of the woman's board. At home, our Bible Chairs in state universities, our oriental missions on the Pacific coast, our mountain schools, our educational and evangelistic work for the Negro are unique in our church, and are supported entirely by our board. We are sure that there are many outside our membership who would be glad to share in these important undertakings.

GROWTH A PENALTY OF SUCCESS.

But great as are these enterprises of our Board, we are ever planning to enlarge them—for growth is one of the penalties of success. We began our work among the 35,000 Mexicans in San Antonio, Texas, recently, when we dedicated our new twelve thousand dollar building there. We shall erect buildings for the Chinese in San Francisco, and for the Japanese in Los Angeles—each to cost $30,000. A hospital for our Siberian Mission, houses, schools, chapels, and a tuberculosis hospital for India, are some of the things to which we are pledged for the coming year.

We have purchased property in Luchowfu, China, and shall open our Girls' School there, as soon as we can find two women properly equipped to take charge of it.

We must have a growth in offering to support this growth in work and workers. Our Board asks that we raise $400,000 for this missionary year. Shall we not take a long step toward the accomplishment of this splendid task in our offerings during the month of December or later?

The Kansas women who campaigned for equal suffrage are now carrying on an educational campaign among the women of the state. The Equal Suffrage Association has therefore changed its name to "Good Citizenship League." This League will send out a pamphlet on economic subjects in which women are or should be interested. Political science leagues will be formed in every county to take up the study of political and economic problems. The work of the League is to be nonpartisan. Among the subjects to be discussed are: state charitable institutions, marriage laws, child labor, peace movement, public utilities, widows' pensions, taxation, educational institutions, vocational training in schools, sex hygiene training in school, food and health department work.

"The one supreme thing that distinguishes the thought of today from the thought of twenty years ago is our care and consideration for making mankind," said Secretary Redfield of the department of commerce, addressing the thirty-second annual meeting of the Associated Charities of the District of Columbia, which was held at Washington early in the month. "It is manifested in various ways," said the Secretary—"in strikes, sometimes in riots, in great uplift movements, in political upheavals. It is the great increasing spirit of the times. Because that is true your work here is on a growing tide and with this tremendous thought behind it."

Pray for patience towards men and patience towards God. Pray for bright eyes to find out the light even in the darkness; pray ever to lean wholly upon God and stay yourself upon Him.—C. H. Spurgeon.

CHRISTMAS FLOWERS.

LEGEND relates that when Joseph of Arimathea departed from Palestine after the tragedy of Calvary, bearing the sacred cup, the Holy Grail, in which the blood of Jesus had been caught, he journeyed far over land and sea, till at last he set foot on English soil. Wandering through the land, he came a few days before the Christmastime to the summit of Weary-all Hill at Glastonbury. There he tarried, and as he accepted the simple hospitality of the good people of the place, he thrust his staff into the earth, in token that for the time his pilgrimage was ended.

To the astonishment of all, on Christmas morning, the staff, like Aaron's rod of old, burst into white flowers. And there, affirmed the legend, ever at Christmas time bloomed the snow-white blossoms of the Glastonbury thorn. Long years afterward, until the fierce passions of men in the civil wars caused its destruction, the bush continued to send forth its yearly offering of snowy white.

The truth of the tradition goes deeper than the fact. The Christian pilgrims of all the years have sent down their palm-staves to make the first trees of the Garden of God. Where ever they have planted their stakes there have risen in fair design the walls of the City of the King, and there have grown the clusters of the Rose of Sharon and the Lily of the Valley.

The flowers of Christmas Day are not alone the blossoms trained by gardeners. Much more truly are they the white souls that lift themselves out of the dust and mold of the earth, and with the rare beauty of stainless lives gladden the world of sorrow and sin. Such flowers may grow in any soil. For they are from the seed of the Kingdom. Blossoms are they on the Tree of Life, the pilgrim staff of the Great Pilgrim who passed once this way, and left behind him an abiding Christmas time.

"WE WILL NOT FORGET."

IT IS SAFE TO SAY that nothing will come to pass in this Christmas season that will more truly reflect the spirit of the Master than that which centers in the office of the Board of Ministerial Relief at 120 E. Market St., Indianapolis, Ind. We are informed that exactly one hundred pension payments are being made this month to aged and disabled ministers and missionaries and widows and orphans of those who have died in the service. This requires nearly $2,000, which is being supplied by churches, Sunday-schools and individuals. There is a specific place for a Christmas gift of every size from the dime of the little child to the $10,000 of the millionaire. One hundred dollars will make a church or a person a "Living link" for a year, one dollar for a day, five dollars for a week, and ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five or thirty for a month, as pensions are paid at all these rates. The Board speaks truly for the brotherhood when it prints on its envelopes, "We will not forget the Missionary's orphan, the minister's widow, the veteran preacher!"

THE SCHOOLS AND THE SPOILS.

THE LONG STRUGGLE in this city to deliver the public schools from the spoils system has just reached another critical stage. When Mrs. Ella Flagg Young was placed at the head of the schools three years ago, it was the result of a long campaign, extending back through former administrations, to secure members of the school board who would be above the level of political henchmen of some boss, merely acting as tools in a scheme of graft. But the victory was only partial. There were irritating and obnoxious survivals on the board. Perhaps it was the sentiment of the partly defeated spoils system that a woman could be easily managed. But Mrs. Young speedily disillusioned the gangsters. She made them understand that she was really the head of the schools of Chicago. Then they began their campaign of irritation and obstruction. This reached so serious a point that in August last Mrs. Young resigned her position. This suddenly awakened all the elements in the city concerned in the best life of the schools, and so great was the demand for Mrs. Young's retention that even Mayor Harrison, who is first of all a politician, bowed before the storm, and promised such support from his administration that Mrs. Young was induced to continue. Among the mayor's promises was included the assurance that the new members to be appointed by him on the school board should be favorable to Mrs. Young's policies. What then is the astonishment and wrath of the progressive citizenship of Chicago, when, by a secret ballot, Mrs. Young is now discharged, and a successor elected! The leaders on the board in the movement for better things charge treachery on the part of the mayor. He asserts that his appointees have been untrue to their promises, but that he has no power to control their action. At the present writing the spoilsmen have the wheel, and it remains to be seen whether public sentiment can bring enough pressure to bear on the administration, both of the city and the schools, to right the wrong that has been done the cause of honest and efficient educational organization. The latest report of the resignation of the anti-Young members of the Board carries hope.

SEX HYGIENE AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.

THE NEWS that Governor Dunne of Illinois has expressed himself as strongly averse to the teaching of sex hygiene in the public school brings no surprise to those who know the strong opposition of the Roman Catholic Church to all such instruction. In all instances in which it has been possible to exert Catholic influence on the subject, that influence has been hostile. The attitude of that church is that children should not be taught on subjects of that sort, lest they become sex-conscious and evil minded, or that if they are to be taught at all, it should be by their parents. This attitude involves two fundamental errors. The first is that one may decide whether or not his children shall be made aware of sex matters. In reality that is no longer a matter for parental decision. Those who have any competent knowledge of the subject are well aware that the average child gets a pretty full volume of information on that subject at an astonishingly early age. The question for the parent to decide is, whether that information shall come from trustworthy, clean-minded and sensitive sources, or from those not so clean or competent. That is really the only choice to be made. The second error is the assumption that the average parents are sufficiently informed and tactful to convey the desired knowledge to their children, even if they were minded to do so. Most of them shrink from the task, while acknowledging its necessity. For these reasons and many others the community is increasingly awake to the dangers of ignorance and the obligation to provide instruction. It is unfortunate that the Roman Catholic Church takes an attitude which is not only basically erroneous, but prejudicial to the best interests of society and the home. Gov. Dunne has only followed instructions as a conforming Romanist. But he is headed in the wrong direction.

WISE COUNSEL.

A FRIEND in China has sent us a copy of the North China News of Shanghai, containing the report of an address delivered by Mr. Amos Parker Wilder, U. S. Consul General in that city. The occasion was a large gathering of Chinese students and leaders. Mr. Wu Ting Fang, formerly minister to the United States, and one of the foremost of the liberal leaders in China, was in the chair. Many of the young men present had attended American and European Universities. Mr. Wilder's address was significant because of its frankness, boldness and constructive character. In the strongest manner he counselled moderation, patience, and the support of the administration of President Yuan Shi-Kai. He insisted that China was not yet ready for full political liberty, and in fact would not be able to recognize it if it were within reach. That the need of the hour was a strong man, to carry over affairs till other leaders could be raised up, and that of all the men in sight, the President, whatever his limitations, was the best man.

The speech was the more notable from the fact that Shanghai is the headquarters of the radical wing of the revolution. It is the home of Doctor Sun and ex-Minister Wu, the treasurer of the revolutionary party. The report that the speech was received with favor is encouraging. China's greatest needs are calm leadership, and time to work out a form of government that shall be representative without being weak.

The counsel of such men as Mr. Wilder of Shanghai, Doctor Macklin of Nanking, Bishop Bashford of Pekin, and Bishop Roots of Hankow is China's most valuable asset just now.

THE SOCIETIES AND THE CONVENTION.

ONE hears a good deal of talk to the effect that our missionary societies are unwilling to co-operate with the General Convention of Churches of Christ, that they hold themselves as co-ordinate with this Convention and not subordinate to it, and that one of the issues to be found out at Atlanta will be that of defining the relation of the newly-created Convention to these missionary societies.

Report has it that there has already arisen a clash between the Convention officials and the society officials in the matter of the preliminary arrangements for the Atlanta gathering.

All such talk and such reports will be promptly discredited by our discerning brotherhood. There is no clash and there can be no clash between a Convention representing the churches and a missionary society constituted, practically, of a small group of individuals.

The question of precedence of authority as between the Convention and the societies will be settled as quickly—if it is ever raised—and as gracefully, as it was settled at Toronto when Secretary F. M. Rains, reflecting presumably the attitude of the secretarial force of the Foreign Missionary Society, opposed the Budget plan in a vehement speech. After the Convention had voted contrary to his judgment, Mr. Rains made a good-tempered speech voicing his determination and that of the Foreign Society to co-operate with the Convention in establishing the new fiscal plans.

The Missionary Societies defend upon the churches for their support. The churches intend to use the General Convention as their instrument to co-ordinate, to unify and to control the activities of the societies.

The General Convention is not an autocratic body arrogating authority unto itself. It is a democratic body created by the churches to do what the churches want done, and responsible to the churches. Whatever action the Convention takes relating to the work of the societies the societies will promptly accept because the Convention speaks not for itself but for the churches whose delegates constitute it.

THE LAYMAN'S CALL TO PREACH.

THE world is to be saved by the preaching of the Gospel, but it never can be saved by professional preaching alone. The Lord has need of consecrated, earnest men, trained in the schools and fitted by nature and education for the public proclamation of the truth, but these men alone never can save the world. If the world is really to be saved it must be done in very large measure by the men whose call to preach is a call like that of the man whom Jesus healed, a call to go to their own homes and their own friends and to tell these friends what great things the Lord hath done for them.

The New Testament knows very little difference between clergy and laity. That distinction has grown out of the exigencies that have accompanied the progress of the church as an organization. From the beginning the Apostles gave themselves to the word of God and to prayer, leaving the secular concerns of the church to be ministered by other men, and from the beginning also there was a recognition of diversified gifts so that one man shall be called to serve God in one manner and another, but it never was the will of Christ that any group of Christian men should think their whole duty done when they have hired a professional minister to do their preaching and their praying while they themselves sit back in the pews to be entertained and to think of the sermon as primarily provided for their enjoyment.

D. L. Moody never asked for ordination. He did not have the training or equipment which made him feel that it was right for him to be an ordained minister. He did his monumental work as a consecrated layman, called to a special task, and God wonderfully blessed him in that work. It is not only a needless thing, but it can be a very harmful thing for us to ordain each man who has a manifest gift for service. We ought to keep in the laity some of our most conspicuously successful Christian workers in order that men may have constantly before their thought the truth that God calls them and often calls them to preach as truly as he calls the men who are ordained to the Christian ministry.

This is a time when more choice young men ought to be entering the ministry. There is a loud call for consecrated, well-trained men in the pulpit, but loud as is this call, important as is this field of work, there is one even louder and that is for men who have no call to the ministry to recognize that this is just as truly a call to preach the Gospel, to tell their friends and their neighbors how great things the Lord hath done for them.

Some of the greatest achievements in our whole enterprise of Christianity have been wrought in just this way and some of the largest triumphs of the cross of Christ in the world are still to be accomplished by those who hear this call of God and begin their work among their friends.

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL.

DOCTOR BLAKE is the efficient secretary of the National committee of the Methodist Church, which has the task of promoting Sunday-school work. He said that "if the Sunday-schools of the Methodist Church didn't furnish recruits for church membership that splendid church would go out of existence in thirty years." One-third of the one hundred and sixty-two conferences of the Methodist Church in the United States reported in 1908 fewer Sunday-schools and fewer Sunday-school members than in 1898. Then, his committee got to work. In the last six years the Sunday-schools of the Methodist Church gave to the church one million, one hundred and fifty thousand members. Doctor Blake believes that the Christian church of America is on the eve of a great revival; not a revival of the mass type, but a revival that means winning the boys and girls of our homes and our Sunday-schools to Christ.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF THE FAITHFUL.

A GROUP OF MEN of widely different religious faith were meeting in Chicago not long ago and the chairman presented the common cause in which they were interested and for which each was making a contribution of money and time. "This is the fellowship of the faithful," he said. He knew that he could scatter them by the challenge of formal creeds; he united them in the bond of a great cause. Thus they became the fellowship of the faithful and stood side by side to do for God and humanity the work to which their common Christianity inspired them. The fact is, that when men become so much interested in doing for their fellow-men what they know Christ would have them do they will cease to be cognizant of any dividing barrier of doctrine or polity. This is undoubtedly "the way to unity."

LOVE YOKED TO DUTY.

THIS is the way in which a good friend put the problem of realizing one's ideals to a student. "Yoke your love to duties," he said. This is the test of love and it is also the inspiration of duty. Love may become only a quiet and profitless emotion unless it is given a big thing to do. Duties may become the weary round of disagreeable tasks if they are not relieved by the impulse of a great love. So the two must be brought together, the ideal and the task. Then life sings and is at peace.

CHICAGO FEDERATION COUNCIL BUSY.

The Chicago Federation Council, through its committee on Social Betterment, has taken under consideration the problem presented by a large number of unemployed men now in the city, and the prospect of a very considerable increase in this number as winter advances. At a meeting of the Committee on Social Betterment, held Dec. 4, reports were received from the Municipal Lodging House, and the homeless men departments of United Charities and other agencies interested in the present situation. Action was taken by the Committee in the name of the Church Federation Council to call upon the Mayor's Commission of Unemployed, to do all in its power to stop the in-flow of unemployed men into the city from the surrounding country:

1. Making public an authoritive statement of the present conditions and circulating such a statement as far as possible throughout the surrounding states.

2. By calling upon the police of the city to make a more careful and adequate patrol of the section of the city to which homeless men naturally gravitate, in order to protect these men from various evil conditions which often illegally take from them the savings which they bring with them to the city.

3. By a very considerable increase in the capacity of the Municipal Lodging House, to be gained by opening annexes in other buildings to be operated under the management of the Municipal Lodging House.

4. To stimulate as far as possible the employment of idle men both by private employers and by creating as quickly and largely as possible opportunity for their employment by the municipality for public work which needs to be done.

A sub-committee of five was appointed, consisting of Leslie W. Sprague, chairman; W. B. Millard, Raymond Robins, T. C. MacMillan and Ernest A. Bell, to conceive ways in which the churches of the city may co-operate with other agencies in meeting the problem presented by the presence of the great number of unemployed men in the city.

BRYAN ADDRESSES CHURCH FEDERATION.

Secretary of State William J. Bryan, in speaking, on Dec. 10, before the clerical conference of the New York Federation of Churches on the subject of "Fundamentals" declared it to be his belief that "it is possible for a man really to earn $30,000 a year for a lifetime of thirty-three and one-third working years, or a million dollars a lifetime."

Secretary Bryan made this declaration in discussing man's relation to the society about him, which, he said, was one of the three things fundamental in human life. Other fundamentals he mentioned were one's relation to the government under which he lives and to his God. The meeting was attended by ministers only, representing fifty religious denominations. "Man does not work alone," Mr. Bryan continued. "He works in conjunction with others, and therefore an intelligent man should realize his relations to society."

How much can a man honestly collect from society? Only a sum that barely measures the services he renders to society. And an honest man will not desire to collect more than he honestly earns."

Comparing the wealth of the richest American, which he estimated at $500,000,000, Secretary Bryan declared his belief that Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln rendered services to the world that were worth immeasurably more than that. What the world needs, he added, is not the men who amass money to give it away when they die, but men who will give themselves to society.

BAPTIST STANDARD CELEBRATES ANNIVERSARY.

The Baptist Standard, published in Chicago, has just celebrated its sixtieth birthday. The present editors are Drs. J. S. Dickerson and Clifton D. Gray. Dr. Dickerson entered the Standard office in 1875 and has served as managing editor of The Standard since 1895.

In an editorial on "Denominational Journalism—Then and Now," the editors thus describe the religious journal of sixty years ago:

"The blanket-sheet page of the fifties was unwieldy. There were no illustrations, save now and then a quaint wood cut in an advertisement. The large majority of the contributors concealed their identity, writing under quaint noms de plume. Nowadays correspondents, as a rule, use their own names and write nothing they are not prepared to defend. The general tone of the contributed matter was argumentative, although seldom, at least in The Standard, bitter. Personalities were not altogether unknown and motives more frequently impugned. There was much more doctrinal teaching in the denominational weekly, as in the pulpit, than in our day. Our peculiar denominational beliefs were set forth, sometimes, one would almost say, with a desire to wound an adversary rather than convince him. But our fathers of journalism, after all, were not so belligerent in heart as their manner of writing appears to us, in these days of interdenominational comity and Federal Councils. The proof-reading of the fifties was not so carefully done as now. We can imagine the chagrin of the lovable 'Saint Justin,' one day, as he discovered, too late, that his kindly reference to the Morning Star was printed as the 'Morning Stab.'"

RELIGIOUS NEWS NOTES.

The Young Men's and Young Women's Christian Associations of New York City, jubilant over having established a world's record in fund-raising by obtaining more than $4,000,000 within fifteen days, celebrated a happy Thanksgiving Day. The gift of the odd dollar of the overscribed amount came at the last moment from the janitor of a downtown building, who sent it with the following simple and earnest, if ungrammatical note: "I see by the papers this morning that you have not got your $4,000,000, and so there is nothing else for me to do than help you. This morning a lady gave me $1.00 for a turkey; then I thought that I have to be without turkey and send that $1.00 for your fund. I am a janitor that loves the lost. God bless you." Exactly 17,244 separate contributions were made to the fund and five of these contributors gave so generously that their gifts alone totaled $1,175,000.

Catholic priests are putting out a new English translation of the Scriptures made "direct from the original languages of the Bible." This bold appeal to Hebrew and Greek over the head of the Latin Vulgate which the Roman Church has made its infallible standard of faith has the church's approbation. Rev. C. Lattey, professor of sacred Scripture at St. Beun's College, North Wales, and Rev. Joseph Keating, editor of The Month, are the general editors. Both are Jesuits.

The Chicago Church Federation Council has assumed the responsibility, at the request of the Association of Commerce, of investigating independent religious bodies which appeal to the public for aid. No charge of any kind is made for this service. Any religious organization which deserves endorsement can receive it from the Federation. An appeal for aid for religious organizations should be accompanied with a letter of endorsement from the Church Federation Council.

Church members of Hebron, Neb., have erected a $13,000 school building with the revenue obtained from Sunday eggs, beginning last Easter Sunday, when members of the Lutheran Church decided to add another building to their private school. The women of the parish agreed to donate the money from eggs laid on Sunday. Thus the school building was paid for before it was dedicated.

Baker University, the Methodist Episcopal college of Kansas, located at Baldwin, is making a campaign for a half million. The first reports show that each congregation making an effort has paid more than its quota.

A Sunday-school in Japan.

A large Japanese Sunday-school had its first Christmas celebration a year ago, and the event was made all the more joyous by the present of a large box of gifts from the children of an Episcopal Sunday-school in New York. Since Christmas the givers of the things sent to Japan have received, says the Churchman, the following letter composed by four boys in the Japanese Sunday-school. They wrote the letter without any assistance from their American teachers, and it reads in this quaint way:

"We respectfully write to you: As this place is in the northern part of Japan, the cold is so severe that every morning and evening the ink freezes in the inkstones and although we wear three wadded kimonos we can scarcely brave the cold. At the last Christmas we in this Province received precious things as presents. We Sunday-school pupils were happy and all of our teachers rejoiced to receive the presents from your honorable country. The total number of our school pupils is more than eighty. How many pupils and teachers has your honorable school? Your school is also receiving the teaching about the same God as our school. Well, we write this letter respectfully by way of august thanks.

"To all the American St. Peter's Sunday-school. From all the boy pupils of St. Peter's Sunday-school in Akita, Japan."

Adult Class Visits Prison.

Frank L. Wood, teacher of an Adult Bible Class in Chicago, thus describes some striking features of a recent visit of twenty-four members of the class to the state penitentiary at Joliet:

We are met at the prison station by Professor J. M. Thompson, supervisor of music in the public schools of Joliet and director of the prison choir. The rest of the reception committee consists of a "trusty." After our number has been counted and identified in the general reception corridor, we are passed through the grated iron doors of the Administration Building to a porch, from there through another grated door to the prison yard and thence to the chapel. We are quickly shown to our seats, for everything is done rapidly and on schedule time. About seventy-five visitors are upon the platform with us. Twenty guards are sitting upon elevated platforms arranged along the walls, watching every movement of the thousand smooth-shaven, gray-garbed figures with the prison pallor on their faces, who gaze on us from their long, rough benches. To many of these men the chapel hour is a time of recreation. To some it is a place of worship.

The Chaplain, Isaiah Villars, is a soldier of the old wars. He rises and gives out a hymn, and the great audience sings heartily. There is a brief prayer, another hymn, and then the teacher of the class is introduced to announce the program.

Stella Uthe is the first. She plays a slam-bang piano solo. She receives an ovation. Her encore is La Madonna. You have heard it—a sweet, soft, plaintive thing. Toward the end it gets lower and sweeter until it seems like the breath of a sleeping child. As she plays, the audience becomes more and more quiet. Just before the last note, the silence is absolutely painful. Ever hear a piano solo make men cry? I have. I did that morning. When she has finished, there is a moment of stillness, and then the storm of appreciation breaks.

Frank F. Winter, master of the violin, is the last. He plays a medley. He picks his strings, he jumps his bow, he plays as he only can play. He is interrupted almost continually. At the close this man so accustomed to applause, gets such a quantity of it as he has never had before. Again he lifts his bow. Quiet comes once more, and "Where Is My Wandering Boy Tonight," trembles from the magic strings and throbs its maternal question into the hearts of the listening convicts. Again there are tears in scores of eyes, where tears are not wont to be, and tears are falling upon the surface of the old Cremona.

A young prisoner soon to be discharged sings "The Holy City," the entire audience, accompanied by the thirty-five pieces in the orchestra, joining in the chorus. Suddenly above the singing of eleven hundred people and the music of nearly two score instruments, there sounds a new note. Frank Winter has lifted his violin and is playing "The Holy City" as he never played it before.

School Pushes Birthday Offerings.

The Alliance, Ohio, Christian Sunday-school has a plan to make the most of its birthday offerings. A regular birthday list of the whole school is kept on the cards of a filing cabinet. The name of each scholar and birthday date is kept on these cards. A birthday secretary looks after the list each week and mails a notice to all persons having a birthday that week, asking each to come with his birthday offering of at least a penny for each year he is old.

FACES YOU SHOULD KNOW.

A. E. Cory, who is after a million dollars for Disciple missions.

One Woman and Faith!

The only professing Christian in her neighborhood, a woman living in rural New York, determined to organize a Sunday-school. A meeting was announced to convene—in the school house. A large number came out, some for curiosity, others for real work. To-day there is a Sunday-school of thirty-five regular members and a Home Department of seven members while there are three names on the Cradle Roll. The school has gained nine of the thirteen points required for a State Front Line Sunday-school and the members are working for the other four points.

Y. M. C. A. Helps Immigrants.

The Young Men's Christian Association is planning to provide an association secretary for trans-Atlantic liners. Their work calls for the use of moving pictures and phonographs, the distribution of picture books about America and railroad guides, and having one man who can speak half a dozen languages give lectures several times daily upon phases of American life. Private assistance will be given where possible, and cards of introduction distributed to Young Men's Christian Associations in towns to which the immigrants are ticketed.

A Superintendent at Nineteen.

John Taggart was a superintendent in the Parish of Bride on the Isle of Man, before he was nineteen years of age. After serving here as superintendent he came to the United States and has been a superintendent almost constantly for forty-four years, much of his work having been pioneer Sunday-school work in the West. He organized a Sunday-school in his store in Nortonville, Kansas, and the school was held here until the railroad depot was built and the sessions of the school were then held in the freight room of the depot.

Mexico's First S. S. Convention.

Mexico is not too busy scrapping to hold a Sunday-school convention. The first one for the Mexicans was held recently in Texas. With 300,000 Mexicans, in this state it can be seen that Texas is a good field for such a convention. Nearly 500 delegates were in attendance. The Methodists, Presbyterians and Baptists now have Sunday-schools and churches composed entirely of Mexicans in Texas.

Musical Policemen in Sunday-school.

The music at a recent banquet of the Superintendents' Association of Allegheny County, Pa., was furnished by a sextet of policemen, all of whom are Sunday-school attendants. If there were several hundred Sunday-school sextets of policemen in the city of Chicago, the problem of vice and crime would be settled at once.

Most Remarkable Sunday-school.

With a population of twenty-five, the village of Axis, Alabama, has a remarkable Sunday-school, with an enrollment of thirty-seven and an average attendance of twenty-nine. Every person in the village goes to Sunday-school, and then some.

The Book World

A Page of Reviews and Literary Notes.

BY ARTHUR GORDON.

THE HAPPY WARRIOR. By A. S. M. Hutchinson. A London evening paper reported that young Lord Burdon had been killed in a skirmish on the Indian frontier. That news was the death blow to his girl wife, Audrey Oxford, whom he had married in secret, but whose boy survived to become the "Happy Warrior." It brought an immense elation of spirit to Mrs. Lethem whose husband, a distant relative of Lord Burdon's, became his successor to the title. The cruel treatment of the young wife by the new Lady Burdon aroused her sister, Maggie Oxford, with the dire resolution to train the boy for his career, and one day confront the usurpers at the Manor with the truth and the rightful heir. The book is the fascinating story of the boy's experiences as a companion of the young Rollo, the supposed inheritor of the estate, as the fighting prize winner of the traveling street fair, and at last as the lover of Dora, who was the prospective bride of Rollo. The story holds the interest without a break, and quite apart from the weak and unconvincing ending, which is perhaps the least real of a half dozen that might have been devised. The book is sure to reward hearers of strong, purposeful writing. (Little, Brown & Co., $1.35, net.)

THE IMMIGRANT. By Frederick J. Haskin. Human immigration has been the order of the time since Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees for Canaan. Westward the course of empire has taken its way, and westward the immigrant has carried his small possessions. Europe has the most crowded population of any portion of the world, and when the open gates of America appeared in the vision of the poor and yet hopeful peoples of Germany, Italy, and the eastern states of Europe, they began to come by thousands. Very wonderful has been the story of the immigrant. Formerly western and northern Europe contributed the largest proportion of the newcomers. These people represented a high type of civilization at home, and they came to bring their convictions and industry into the new land and to accept its ideals of citizenship. More recently, however, the tide of immigration has come from southern and eastern Europe, where the level of civilization is much lower and where the chief hope is not that of permanent citizenship in the United States, but of a return to the homeland with the spoils of the struggle, to enjoy an older age of respect and competence at home. This change in the type of immigration has produced many social problems in the treatment of the arriving immigrant. These Hungarians, Italians, Greeks, and Slovaks are not interested in American citizenship, for they do not propose to remain in this land. They do not bring their women to any great extent, but live in groups of hard-working, half starved laborers, toiling in mines or factories or upon railroad construction, with only the simple thought of accumulating enough money to afford the promised return to the homeland. Mr. Haskin has assembled the facts regarding this mighty tide of immigration, the condition from which it comes, the character of the ocean passage with its abnormal and often unspeakable conditions, physical and moral, and the obligations which rest upon all social minded Americans to meet these fortune seekers in the most helpful spirit. (Revell, $1.25 net).

HISTORICAL ADVENTURES. By Rupert S. Holland. The story of America in the form of a cluster of the most thrilling incidents in the life of the nation is the sort of book all can read with pleasure and profit. In this volume such episodes as the Saving of Oregon by Marcus Whitman, the landing of the Barbary pirates, the destruction of Lovejoy's printing press, the conspiracy of Aaron Burr, and many other dramatic events are told in a manner to make one wish to know more of the men who made the nation. (Geo. W. Jacobs.)

YOUNG ALASKANS IN THE ROCKIES, by Emerson Hough. One who has read any of Mr. Hough's semi-historical novels, dealing with the early story of America, does not need to be told that he knows his facts and writes with a practical hand. In this book is told the story of a little group of boys who went on an expedition in the big Northwest. The story is full of rough trails, forest fastnesses, mountain climbing, bear and caribou hunting, and perilous adventures on the great Columbia. It combines information, and adventure. (Harper's $1.25, net).

HER DAUGHTER JEAN, by Marion Ames Taggart. Miss Taggart's "Six Girls" books are familiar to readers of the literature that appeals most to girls. Jean, the heroine of this book is an attractive, loyal, womanly girl, whose devotion to her mother and family leads her to heroic sacrifices. It is the sort of book that holds interest, and at the same time makes its impress on character. (W. A. Wilde & Co., $1.20, net).

SOME LITTLE COOKS AND WHAT THEY DID, by Elizabeth Hoyt, one of the Happy Hour Series. The stories are short, and both interesting and suggestive of what children can do to make themselves useful. Attractive in pictures and cover.

LITERARY NOTES.

Just as two books by Rabindranath Tagore are announced for publication by the Macmillan's comes word that to Mr. Tagore has been given the Nobel Prize for Literature for 1913. The published work by Tagore includes "Gitanjali," song offerings or religious poems, and "The Gardener," lyrics of love and life. The new titles are "The Crescent Moon," a volume of child poems with illustrations in color by a Hindu artist, and "Sadhana, The Realization of Life," a number of essays, some of which were delivered as lectures before the University of Oxford in England and before Harvard University in this country.

The day may be not far distant when Bostonians will be treated to the sight of the Governor of Massachusetts sallying out from the State House, with his market basket on his arm. At the same time the Mayor of the City of Boston might fall in line and go to market likewise. For Dr. Francis E. Clark, author of "Old Homes of New Americans," (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) thinks that if Boston had a general market, and these two high officials would visit it each day in person, as did Daniel Webster and Henry Clay in their day in Washington, it might become a well established institution and aid materially in reducing the high cost of living.

Mr. Winston Churchill, in his article on "The Modern Quest for a Religion" which appears in the December Century, says that "it will be strange indeed if we do not arrive at the conviction that the world has still in Jesus Christ something to grow into instead of out of, and that when we shall have reached the boundaries He has set it will be time enough to think of a new prophet and of a new religion."

"Opium (laudanum, morphia, etc.) is not the tragedy of the underworld nor of the lap-dog world, but the working world, of doctors, writers, lecturers, scientists, teachers, students, both men and women." This is the allegation made by Miss Jeannette Marks, whose new novel, "Leviathan," just published by George H. Doran Company, is the story of one man's triumph over the drug habit.

THE TANGLE OF LIFE.

on the farm. When we strengthen our life cord, who knows if his life is not stronger for it? Who knows how near his life line may run to ours? Nothing but a narrow village life? There is no such thing. Out from all villages there run lines around the world.

The other inference from this familiar fact is that no one can ever know all of those to whom he owes a life debt. As unrealized lines run out from one's life, so a multitude of such lines run into it. The half-conscious arrogance which marks some lives is always ignorant. Yonder goes that dusty, grimy workman —how rude he seems, how unlike you! Yes, but he is the man on whom you depend. You could not be you if he were not he. Everybody has to do with everybody else. Scholars seem remote from daily life, yet many of the gravest problems of life are solved in hidden laboratories, by men whose names are not known, and who would not be recognized if they appeared in the most public places. What some obscure inventor may be doing just now, we have no idea; but we shall all be reaping the benefit of it before long.

That is part of the point of a popular story of this past summer called "V.V.'s Eyes." The heroine of the book has always known in a general way that her living came from "the factory," but she had no idea where nor what the factory was. She did not think of herself in connection with the girls and women who might be working there. So she grew to be selfish and self-centered. Then there came events which led her to see how utterly dependent she was on those who were toiling in dirt and grime. As she realized it she came to her finer womanhood, both humbled and ennobled. We all stand hopelessly indebted to multitudes of men whom we never saw, nor shall see. The only fair thing to do is to send out our own lives so strongly in service that multitudes of men who will never see us shall be hopelessly indebted to us.

Of Human Interest

A Dan Crawford Story.

One of the harrowing stories told by Dan Crawford, African missionary, tells of an experience he had with a wild woman whom one day in the depths of a supposedly uninhabited forest, he discovered leaping from branch to branch like an ape.

The recital grows distressingly dramatic as Crawford tells how he sought to gain the attention of the lunatic creature, and re-establish, if he could, in her wrecked brain the desire for fellowship with human kind.

But nothing he could do could overcome the tremulous dread with which she retreated farther and farther from even the gentlest step with which the missionary approached her. And when he spoke to her soothingly in the human tongue to which she had been born, not the slightest sign of understanding crossed the poor imbecile's face.

Only the nervous, inarticulate chatter which the pitiful hermit had learned from monkey neighbors in her treetops answered the missionary calls—except that now and again, when her fright subsided a little, the uncanny creature's voice would rise to a weird shriek resounding through the forest with one horrible and dismaying cry—the sole remnant of human speech which had survived in her ruined brain.

And the missionary understood and translated the cry:

"The earth is God's; man's a thief."

Roosevelt's Adventure in Indiana.

When Roosevelt was President and Fairbanks Vice-president they were touring the country once in a special train. Collier's tells a good story of the trip. Somewhere in Indiana the engine broke down, and while they were waiting Roosevelt—who is always thinking of things that nobody else would think of—proposed to Fairbanks that they slip away from the crowd and take a walk down a long dusty country road which lay before them. So they started off.

Roosevelt is quick and nervous and takes rapid steps—in the early days in the cow country they called his kind a single footer; Fairbanks is long and lean and lank, with long dangling arms and long gangling legs—they called his kind a pacer.

Here they went down this long dusty country lane, the tall, gangling man and the shorter, rapid one. And presently they came to a field, and over in the field was a stack of straw or hay—I didn't learn which—and on top of the stack was a farmer with a fork.

Fairbanks went to the fence, put up his long arm, beckoned and cried: "Hey, there!"

The farmer, who had probably been troubled a good deal with tramps, was busy and didn't want to be interrupted, stuck his fork in the stack, turned, and yelled angrily back, "Hey yourself!"

When Fairbanks continued to beckon, the farmer slid down off that stack, stumped angrily across the field, and, as was natural, just as you or I would have done under the circumstances, interrupted on a busy day, kept his eye on the man who had beckoned him and didn't look at the second man at all. He walked right up to the tall man, and when he saw who it was he dropped his hands limply to his side and said: "Fairbanks? Vice-president Fairbanks? The Vice-president of the United States?" and while he was shaking hands with Fairbanks, Fairbanks, jerking his thumb to the side, said slowly, "There's the President of the United States."

The farmer turned slowly with awakening surprise and gasped, "Roosevelt? Theodore Roosevelt?" And Roosevelt nodded. And then the farmer, remembering that he was just as good as anybody else on earth, squared his shoulders, filled his lungs with air, got his feet on the ground, and said, "Well, how on earth did you two men ever get here at this time of day?" Then he quickly invited them down to the house for dinner.

Roosevelt told him that they had already had their dinner. Then Fairbanks asked the farmer—you all may have heard of this about Fairbanks—Fairbanks asked the farmer if he had any buttermilk down at his house. Of course the farmer had buttermilk down at the house. And so the three men went down to the house to get it.

Edison and the New Office Boy.

When Thomas A. Edison, just recovering from an illness, started to enter his laboratory he was intercepted by a boy who had recently become attached to the laboratory office force.

"No strangers allowed in here," said the boy. "It is a rule that no one except employes can enter the building unless he has an appointment with Mr. Edison and you can't see him because he's home sick."

The inventor asked to whom he should go if he wished to make an appointment with Mr. Edison. The new boy summoned W. H. Meadowcroft, Mr. Edison's secretary, who was greatly astonished when he saw the "stranger."

"I've come to take up the work left off by Mr. Edison. I want to know if you are not desirous of employing a man who is willing to work now and then," said the inventor, as he shook hands. He added: "Meadowcroft, that boy you have here is all right. I hope he will continue to see that the rules of this laboratory are faithfully carried out."

John D., Jr. on Economy.

It isn't by petty and ridiculous economies that men succeed," said John D. Rockefeller Jr. at a dinner in his wonderful skyscraper residence in New York.

"Some people seem to think that to get rich one must economize like Blanco.

"Blanco's faithful old dog had turned sickly and savage and so Blanco said to his wife on arriving home from business Saturday evening:

" 'I'll shoot Towser tomorrow morning before church.'

"Blanco paused, then added sternly:

" 'So remember, please, that he won't need any breakfast.' "

When Schley Was Clever.

Commander Schley received among his boyhood Christmas presents a handsome Bible from a rich aunt. After a moment's reflection they say he exclaimed, "I'm up to that dodge," and began examining the volume eagerly, leaf by leaf, until he found a $10-bill pinned to a page. It seems that Schley had read a story of the bad little boy away at school, who took with him a similar gift. When he came home for vacation, his mother examined the Bible, and found the bill she had placed between its leaves.

Mrs. Pankhurst on Modern Dress.

The militant Mrs. Pankhurst, at a dinner in New York, said in her gentle voice, with her gentle smile:

"I like American children. They are so natural. There's no pose about them, no wriggling, giggling bashfulness. They never try to hide behind their mothers' skirts."

Mrs. Pankhurst added with a laugh:

"That's just as well, too, isn't it? There's hardly enough to a 1913 skirt for the smallest tot to hide behind."

From Near and Far

One of the largest anti-liquor demonstrations ever seen in Washington took place Dec. 10, when 3,000 delegates, representing the Anti-Saloon League of America and the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, marched upon the capitol and presented to Congress a resolution calling for nation-wide prohibition by an amendment to the federal Constitution. The resolution was presented in the Senate later by Senator Sheppard of Texas, and in the House by Representative Hobson of Alabama. At the eastern steps of the capitol Mr. Hobson and Mr. Sheppard received a petition from the marchers. Mr. Sheppard made a short speech in behalf of them both.

Mrs. Ella Flagg Young has been forced from the superintendency of the Chicago schools. Mayor Carter Harrison lays the blame on treacherous Board members, but Chairman Reinberg, resigning chairman of the Board, puts the blame on the shoulders of the Mayor. Later reports are that the Mayor has accepted the resignations of the five recalcitrant members of the Board. Mrs. Young has been employed by the Chicago Tribune as Educational Editor.

Des Moines, Ia., is now without an open saloon. Saturday, November 22, the supreme court of the state rendered a decision to the effect that the saloons of the city were without legal standing. The decision was announced late in the afternoon and before seven o'clock in the evening the lights were out and the doors closed of every one of the city's eighty-six saloons.

The New York organization of "Spugs," as members of the "Society for the Prevention of Useless Giving" style themselves, plan to play host on Christmas day to every lonely person in New York City. There is to be a Christmas party in Grand Central palace for the lonely, a Christmas tree, music, singing, and refreshments.

Peoria Pastor Resigns.

W. C. Price resigns from Howett Street Church, Peoria, to accept the pulpit of a church in Lancaster, Eng., in February, 1914. Mr. Price leaves a field where, it is reported, there was absolute satisfaction with his work.

Mr. Price first came to Peoria in 1906, when the church was a mission maintained by the Central Church. He was a student at Eureka College at the time and came from Eureka to Peoria once a week to conduct Sunday services. He graduated in 1909 and when the Howett Street church became an independent organization he was called there as the regular pastor. Under his charge the church has increased from 120 to 208 members. Mr. Price is an Englishman by birth and has never been naturalized as an American citizen.

Mr. Price said in his letter of resignation: "I am convinced that under the present position of the church a new man with more progressive plans, with a new voice and new enthusiasms and inspirations will be better able to help you realize your aims and ambitions for a new church and the brighter future that is before the church."

Bloomington Pastor Quotes Jack London.

A recent sermon preached by Edgar D. Jones, at First, Bloomington, Ill., was based on the late book of Jack London, "John Barleycorn." A strong appeal was made in behalf of prohibition by Mr. Jones.

Mr. Jack London has convictions on the drink evil and boldly states them, the speaker remarked. Abolish the saloon is the cure, the only cure, he affirms, for all the woe and distress that John Barleycorn causes. We have been accustomed, continued Mr. Jones, to hear this counsel from ministers, reformers, temperance workers and church people, but this war cry from Jack London is in every way noteworthy. Nothing from Gough, Murphy, Frances E. Willard, Dow, Beecher, or Bryan, Mr. Jones believes surpasses these words of London:

"And like such a survivor of old red war who cries out, 'Let there be no more war!' so I cry out, 'Let there be no more poison fighting by our youths'! The way to stop war is to stop it. The way to stop drinking is to stop it. The way China stopped the general use of opium was by stopping the cultivation and importation of opium. The philosophers, priests and doctors of China could have preached themselves breathless against opium for a thousand years, and the use of opium so long as opium was ever accessible and obtainable, would have continued unabated. We are so made, that is all. We have with great success made a practice of not leaving arsenic and strychnine, and typhoid and tuberculosis germs, lying around for our children to be destroyed by. Treat John Barleycorn the same way. Stop him. Don't let him lie around licensed and legal, to pounce upon our youth. Not of alcoholics, nor for alcoholics do I write, but for our youths, for those who possess no more than the adventure-stings and the genial predispositions, the social man impulses, which are twisted all awry by our barbarian civilization which feeds them with poison on all the corners. It is the healthy, normal boys, now born or being born, for whom I write."

Notable Thanksgiving Address.

Perry J. Rice, in his Thanksgiving sermon given at the union service in El Paso, Texas, mentioned some things the church is especially to be thankful for. The sentiment we print herewith will, we are sure, strike a sympathetic chord in the hearts of all Christian Century readers:

"The old controversial spirit is giving place to the irenic spirit and the great irenicon is the advance of the kingdom of God. The churches are gradually coming to think of themselves as partners and comrades instead of opponents and rivals. Union meetings are being held, union campaigns are being conducted for missions and social betterment. Union enterprises of every sort are being set on foot until the tide of union sentiment rising higher and higher is becoming irresistible and it will sweep us all in.

"We cannot praise our Father enough for the new day that is coming, for the forward look of the church, for the truer conception we are getting of Him, for the larger vision of duty and privilege that is coming to us, for the better feeling that is pervading the hearts of His people, for the wider and richer fellowship we are having in Christian service, for the saner emphasis that is being placed upon the fundamentals of our faith and for the splendid courage and faith that is manifest in all our plans and programs. Surely God is in the midst of us and He is leading us on to greater and still greater victories."

Geo. H. Combs "Talks Plain" at St. Louis.

"Pardon me, this is a little personal, but it does seem to me that this audience is too well dressed. There is not a shabby person here. I want the poor to mingle with the rich when I preach." This short but strong reprimand, delivered from the pulpit of the Union Avenue Christian Church just before benediction, shocked several of St. Louis' most wealthy churchgoers, we are informed by a daily paper. The man who dared hurt their feelings was a guest of the church, George Hamilton Combs, of Kansas City, who had exchanged pulpits for the day with B. A. Abbott. His audience has been referred to as the "glass of fashion and mold of form."

St. Louis Churches Support Benevolent Work.

During the missionary year 1911-'12 ten of the St. Louis churches contributed $3,282.14 to the Benevolent Association's work. In 1912-'13 these ten and two other St. Louis churches contributed to the same cause $6-918.47, a gain of more than one hundred per cent. The total amount received from St. Louis in 1911-'12 was $4,636.43 and in 1912-'13, $8,388.03—a gain of more than eighty percent. The headquarters of the Benevolent Association are at 2955 N. Euclid Ave., St. Louis.

When the people of Liberty, Mo., learned that the Toronto convention had elected their minister, Graham Frank, Corresponding Secretary, they thought this meant he would have to give up his church. To circumvent this they presented him with a petition several yards long signed by every merchant, doctor, lawyer, college professor, and cattle rustler in town. Needless to say Brother Frank has decided to stay in Liberty.

The Christian Board of Publication has to its credit a good piece of work in the recently published volume containing the splendid addresses on "Fellowship With Christ" delivered at the Toronto convention by President Kershner, Geo. A. Campbell, W. C. Bower, J. H. Goldner and Carey E. Morgan. Two of these addresses—those of Mr. Goldner and Prof. Bower—have been published in recent issues of The Christian Century.

"Civic pride" has been receiving attention from George Hamilton Combs, in his sermons at Union Avenue, St. Louis, where he held a week's meeting recently. He told the newspaper men later that he meant every word he said when he stated that Kansas City was a "Brass Band Town," and the salt of the earth, and that St. Louis could be the same, if she would awake and talk about the city instead of the brewery.

Peoria Central Church expects to break ground for its new building by March 1, 1914. M. L. Pontius, the minister, is a graduate of Yale, and one of the best preachers in Peoria. A recent issue of the "Bulletin" shows a number of additions to the church, among them W. J. Burner and family, returned missionaries from South America.

The Third Church at Indianapolis expects to dedicate its completed structure the second Sunday in January if the teamsters' strike permits. The organ will not be installed at that time, but has been purchased and will be placed at once. Miss Grace Black has been organist at the Third for many years.

Wm. E. Adams, of Seattle, Wash., writes that he has used three week of his vacation to aid in a meeting at Vancouver, Wash., where Floyd Ross is pastor. Mr. Ross has a fine young people's class of a hundred, he reports. The best work of the meeting, according to Mr. Adams, was done in an afternoon prayer class.

Evangelist Herbert Yeuell told the Kansas City ministers recently that he was soon to reenter the evangelistic field with more vigor than ever before, after a season of popular lecturing. Mr. Yeuell has traveled extensively in this country and abroad and lectures upon travel subjects.

Newton Briney, son of his father, and preacher for the Broadway Church, Louisville, Ky., and C. J. Tannar, of Detroit, were in St. Louis last week on business connected with the American Christian Missionary Society, of which organization they are directors.

R. M. Hopkins writes that the second week's offerings for American Missions amounted to $5.353.11. This fell short $1,000 of the receipts for the second week of last year. Mr. Hopkins urges every school to send an offering for this important work.

The Student Volunteer Movement will meet in Kansas City, December 31 to January 5, with 5,000 students and 10,000 others in attendance. The most of the attendants will be entertained in the homes of the people.

At a recent meeting in Chicago, O. F. Jordan announced the plans of the City Missionary Board for two new mission points on the north side. The Sheffield Aveune Church, Will F. Shaw, pastor, has long been thinking of getting further north, and this will make three churches on the North Shore.

The meeting of the National and State Secretaries usually held at St. Louis in March, will probably be held the last of February in order to meet with the committee of 100 of the Men and Millions Movement which is being considered for that date.

At a Thanksgiving dinner held in the First Church, Spokane, Wash., there were five nationalities represented in the toast responses, Servia, Greece, Bulgaria, Russia and China. Other nations were represented but were unable to respond in English.

Dr. W. N. Lemmon, Manilla, P. I., says there were 1,000 treatments in one month. There were 34 sick in the hospital. Dr. C. N. Pickett, Laoag, P. I., reports 1,222 treatments in a month. He also reports 1,510 in Sunday-school classes in the province.

Hyde Park Church, Chicago, reports 35 additions within the last six weeks. The pastor, Edward S. Ames, has just finished a series of sermons on the Religion of Five Modern Philosophers, Locke, Kant, Hegel, Schopenhauer and Comte.

Immediately following the St. Louis meeting in December, some of our National Secretaries started for Texas. At last accounts some of them were trying to ford the Brazos River in the direction of Houston.

The Foreign Society has appointed Mr. and Mrs. Chas. M. Jarrett, of Morgantown, W. Va., missionaries to Japan. He is now the successful minister of the church at Morgantown. They will go out September next.

Frank Garrett, speaking in Macomb, Ill., at the First Church, recently on the Republic of China, said that while America was the melting pot of the nations, China was the melting pot of the denominations.

Eureka College is taking the people into its confidence by publishing its plans and program, including the financial conditions and aim. A recent issue of the Pegasus is quite illuminating along this line.

PHILLIPS UNIVERSITY LIBRARY DEDICATED.

November 25, the day set apart for the dedication of the new Library Building was a red letter day at Phillips University. It was the occasion of the first visit of Mrs. T. W. Phillips, Sr., and T. W. Phillips, Jr., to Enid, Oklahoma, and they came as guests not only of the University, but of the city as well. Business houses were closed and decorated with maroon and white in honor of the event.

The program of the day began with a chapel address to the students by Abram E. Corey, who chose as his theme, Consecration. In opening his address, he paid a beautiful tribute to the memory of Thomas W. Phillips, Sr., whose far sighted generosity made possible the founding of the institution. The substance of Consecration, as defined by Mr. Corey is as follows: "I am willing to be something or nothing, to go anywhere and everywhere, to do anything and everything, for God." It was an intensely earnest, spiritual message, and deeply moved the students. Mr. Phillips was then introduced, and was given a rousing ovation, such as students only can give. He spoke briefly and "brought down the house" with a story. Mrs. Phillips was presented to the audience, and received the chautauqua salute.

At 2:30 in the afternoon, the chapel was crowded, largely with citizens and visitors, to hear the dedicatory address of the veteran M. M. Davis, of Dallas, Texas. He showed in his matchless way how Christ is healing with his touch divine. Science, Literature, Education in general, are being touched by the Christ, by its appropriateness, and many remarked that they had never heard Brother Davis do better.

President Zollars then led the large audience to the new Library Building, and the dedicatory prayer was delivered by President Kershner of Texas Christian University.

The new building is the gift of the Phillips family, and was erected at a cost of $25,000. It has three stories; the first for the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A., the second for the library and reading room, and the third for the halls of the literary societies. It was built of red pressed brick, trimmed with white stone, roofed with red tiling, and its interior is re-inforced concrete. It is finished in mahogany, and is thoroughly fireproof and modern. The dimensions are 70x35 feet. Massive colonnades of red pressed brick and stone connect the Library with the Main Building, and the latter with the Fine Arts Building.

In the evening a reception to the City's guests of honor was given by the Commercial Club. The Club rooms were decorated beautifully with the Phillips colors and the leading citizens were present en masse. Numerous addresses were made by men of prominence, showing their appreciation of President Zollars' heroic efforts to build up the University, and of the splendid benefactions of the Phillips family. It was set forth that Enid, a city of 15,000 people, is without a saloon or dive to corrupt the morals of the students, with ten outlets of railway, in the midst of a fine agricultural section of country, and hence a model city for Christian education. Mr. Phillips responded briefly, stating that the University and the city had more than met his expectations, and that he is pleased with the work that is being done. The Commercial Club announced that as a slight token of the city's appreciation of the University, money had just been raised sufficient to build at once the much needed gymnasium for Phillips, and that the work will begin as soon as the plans have been prepared.

HIRAM COLLEGE NOTES.

Several weeks ago a Disciples Club was formed at Hiram, consisting mainly of college students, and members of the college faculty, although several residents of the town are members. The specific work the club proposed to itself was a study of the great historic documents of the Disciples, the men behind them and the movements they represent. The first topic taken up was Barton W. Stone and the "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery." Several evenings were then given to a careful study of Thomas Campbell and the "Declaration and Address." This is being followed by a series of studies on Alexander Campbell and his "Sermon on the Law" and the various debates he engaged in. The next document to be taken up will be Isaac Errett's tract "Our Position." The Club has enlisted some sixty people and is awakening an enthusiastic interest. Some students of other communions are members of the Club.

November 19 was the eighty-second anniversary of President Garfield's birth. As for the two years past, the day was appropriately observed with music and addresses. Faculty, students and village people were present.

The intersociety oratorical contest resulted in the choice of Robert W. Peden to represent the college in the inter-collegiate contest at Wooster. His oration on "An International Illusion" was a masterful and eloquent protest against war and a plea for international peace.

In a series of ten minute chapel talks Dean Vernon Stauffer is ministering in a rare way to the spiritual life and uplift of the student body.

The Hiram church has loaned its beloved minister, John E. Pounds, for the last three weeks, to Indianapolis Central, where he has been doing fruitful work in the winning of souls for Christ. The Central is a former field of Brother Pounds.

R. W. Hopkins and Myron C. Settle, representatives, respectively, of the General Missionary Convention and the Ohio Christian Missionary Society, spent Sunday and Monday, Dec. 7 and 8 at Hiram, filling the pulpit and conducting Sunday-school conferences. They are rare workmen in the Sunday-school field and their work a rich contribution to "The New Crusade" now in progress in our Sunday-schools.

CHURCH EXTENSION FACTS.

Statement of Comparative Receipts for October and November, 1912 and 1913.

Churches.

For this year	$4,946.78
For last year	5,894.84
A falling off this year	948.06

Individuals.

For this year	$ 1,064.10
For last year	26,050.43
A falling off this year	$24,986.33

A total falling off of $25,934.39 over the same period last year.

The above exhibit shows a falling off for October and November of $948.06 from the churches and $24,986.33 from individuals, making a total of $25,934.39.

This would be considered a discouraging showing were it not for the fact that in October 1912 a special effort was going on to reach the Million Dollar Mark by the time we arrived at the Louisville Convention. Many large gifts were made the first fifteen days of October from individuals who could not be expected to duplicate those gifts this year.

The imperative need of a second million is shown in the fact that on November 30th we had on file applications aggregating $83,450.

No one can deny the urgent need of a second million.

At our November meeting the following churches were granted loans: Phoenix, Ariz., $2,000, out of the Annuity Fund at 6%; Lynn, Mass., $3,500; Vincennes, Ind., 2nd Church, $2,000; Antlers, Okla., $400; Burley, Ida., $1,500; Talent, Ore., $600; Gate, Okla. $400; Santa Cruz, Garfield Park Church, $500; Opolis, Kans., $800; Valdosta, Ga., Evergreen colored church, $750; Woodland, Wash., $600; Salyersville, Ky., $1,000; Warwick, Okla., $250;; Napavine, Wash., $400: Jarvisburg, N. C., $500. The loan at Holli days Cove, W. Va., was increased from $2,500 to $3,500.

At the December meeting the following loans were granted: Red Oak, Ia., $5,000, 6%; Converse, Ind., $2,500;. Collinsville, Okla., 1st Church, $2,000; Brooklyn, N. Y., Borough Park, $7,500; Cadiz, O., $3,000; Teague, Texas, $2,000, 6%; Anselmo, Nebr., $400; Apalachie, Va., $800; McConnellsville, O., $2,500; Capitol Heights, Md., $400; Conrad, Mont., $250 and Marshfield, Ore., $1,250.

Loans closed during the month of October, 1913, are as follows:

Como, Texas, (Frank H. Main	$400.00
Washington, Pa., (Annuity Fund)	3,000.00
Milwaukee, Wis., (General Fund)	7 000.00
Belpre, Kans., (Phillips Fund)	1,500.00
Celeste, Tex., (Sunday-school fund)	750.00
Des Moines, Ia., Grand View Ch. (General Fund)	1,500.00
Total	$14,150.00

Loans closed during the month of November, 1913, are as follows:

Bridgeport, Ill., (General Fund)	4,000.00
Silsbee, Texas, (Pomona Calif. Church Fund)	700.00
Russellville, Ky., (Annuity Fund)	6,000.00
Baker, Ore., (Annuity Fund)	2,000.00
Republic, Wash., (Board of Publication Fund)	500.00
Galax, Va., (Drake Fund)	1,000.00
Beloit, Wis., (Cassell Fund)	750.00
Total	$14.950.00

Making a total of loans closed during October and November of $29,100.00.

Many applications were carried over for future meetings because of lack of funds. Only those loans have been granted that have been waiting for many months and such as were most urgent, where the financial reputation of the churches would have been hurt had our Board not granted the loans. Our mission churches are making great sacrifices to build and it should be noted that the Church Extension money is loaned mainly to those churches that cannot borrow elsewhere, except at very high rates.

Church Extension is distinctly a missionary work. G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec.

THE COMING CHRIST.

Dec. 24. Rev. 22:7-21.

We judge ourselves by what we hope to be. We ought in fairness to judge others by their possibilities. We consider the past that we may have a solid basis for hope. The teacher examines the grades of his pupils that he may know what they can do, what studies they can carry and what guidance they need. The Christian is concerned with the past of the good and of the bad in order that he may know what may be reasonably expected of them. We study the records of Christianity that we may forecast the Christianity of tomorrow. We are more interested in what Christianity is going to be than in what it has been. What may we expect the Christ of the future to bring to men?

INDUSTRIAL PEACE.

The question of industrial peace is a question of clear thinking and justice. What are the rights of labor? What are the rights of capital? Who shall control the resources of the earth and the instruments of production? In our complex civilization it is not always easy to decide what is just. Students of the social sciences and men of affairs must give us enlightenment. Sympathy for the unfortunate is an insufficient equipment for the social reformer. He needs the most exact knowledge. The coming Christ will be the inspiration of the student who devotes his life to the consideration of what is economically just. But when his work is done, there remains the task of persuading men to do the right thing. "What ought to be done?" is a question of science. "Am I willing to do it?" is a question of morals and religion. Is the church ready to persuade men to do their duty? Have her ministers the ethical insight to proclaim the message with compelling force? Are they able to speak for human rights so impartially that in times of industrial strife they will be trusted?

THE PEACE OF NATIONS.

"May I never prefer my country's interests to my country's honor" is a saying of Senator Hoar that has become famous. Selfish men are ever ready to involve nations in war. As Christ triumphs, peace will triumph. Speaking of the peace movement, Dr. Nicolas Murray Butler says, "The great movement in which we are engaged is all part and parcel of a new way of life. It means that we must enter with fulness of appreciation into the activities and interests of peoples other than ourselves: that we must always and everywhere emulate the best they have to teach us and shun the worst; that we must answer in no uncertain tones that we are our brothers' keepers; and that, as with men, so with nations, the path of justice, integrity and of fair dealing is the true path of honor.

THE LIFE EVERLASTING.

We must never try to satisfy ourselves with anything less than the whole good. The prayer of Solon does not contain all that we desire: "Grant unto me wealth from the blessed gods, and to have always fair fame in the eyes of all men. Grant that I may thus be dear to my friends, and bitter to my foes; revered in the sight of the one, awful in the sight of the other." If we add to this the petition of Pindar, there will yet be something lacking: "Being dead I may set upon my children a name that shall be of no ill report." These men were too easy to satisfy. They are good teachers when we are tempted to despise things as they are and to postpone all our happiness to some future state. They tasted the joys of this world and they could testify to the worth of life that now is. But if their sympathies had been wider and their knowledge of humanity been more profound, they would not have been willing to take for the whole of life that which they saw in their world. The sense of personal worth which we have as Christians is satisfied only when we believe in the life everlasting. Complacency we can never know, for there is always something to gain that seems necessary to rational living.

THE SUBLIMITY OF SIMPLICITY AND SINCERITY.*

By A. Z. Conrad.

The Old Testament Scriptures abound in the tragic and the spectacular. They deal much with the exploits of heroes. Its revelations are all on a grand, scenic plain. It is like mountain scenery with lofty peaks, magnificent cataracts, wild torrents, sweeping storms, thundering avalanches. It is the flood and the fire and the fiercest forces of nature to which we are introduced. Mountains quaking and lightning-shivered tell of God's presence. Parting seas and fountains from flint announce the presence of the Omnipotent. With the progressive revelations of Providence some of these features disappear and we learn how God deals with men in their natural relationships. The prophets and the poets come on the scene and become the mouthpiece of the Almighty to instruct men. When we move into the New Testament as we are now doing for interpretation and exposition it is like leaving the mountain fastnesses for the pastoral scenery of the undulating plains and instead of the leaping waterfalls we have the quiet lakes, instead of the mountain torrent, the deep flowing river. It is now the falling of the dew, the beauty of the lily, the glory of the sunshine, the sparkling fountain, the ripening harvest, the sheep-fold, the vine, the persuasions of love, the appeal of self-sacrifice, domestic relationships, such things as these are thrown upon the canvas for our contemplation. Our study for the year 1914 breathes the fragrance of God's Garden. Its sweetness and simplicity allure us. It is like the calm of the eventide when the zephyrs fan our cheeks and messages from the spirit world whisper to us the gentleness and the love of the Infinite Father for his children.

THE SEARCHING QUESTION.

Bible texts must always be interpreted by context. Incidents and events in the natural course of life's activities were seized upon by Christ as opportunity for instruction. He was never deceived by the mere dress of things. Both action and utterance found him invariably probing for motives. His basis of judgment was in the reason why. He asked questions, not for information, but to compel a self-revelation. On the way to Capernaum the disciples had been in an earnest discussion and even a dispute as to which should be the greatest in the kingdom they were expecting Jesus to establish on earth. Jesus had disclosed to them so far as he was able the tragic nature of the events which were soon to transpire. It is pathetic that they had been able to associate with Christ so long and yet retain so much of selfishness and self-interest as they did. Instead of absorption with the sorrow and suffering involved in the decease of their loved leader, they were concerned only with personal preferment. Jesus well knew the nature of their disputation and in the quiet of the Capernaum home which they had now entered propounds the penetrating question, "What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?" Mark 9:33. The inquiry carried its own rebuke. "They held their peace, for by the way they had disputed among themselves who should be the greatest."

PROTEST AGAINST PLACE PRIDE.

The discussion of the disciples had been concerning personal precedence. How many ships of state have gone to wreck upon this rock! How many domestic troubles have grown out of the same contention! The social world is torn and rent asunder even now by the old time inquiry, "Who shall be greatest?" Caste and caste-distinctions, the outgrowth of human selfishness have multiplied the woes of humanity. This is what has prevented a free field and a fair chance. The caste system of India has placed barriers to personal progress practically impassable. No wall of granite could as effectually separate people as this line of selfishness, whose injustice amounts to infamy. But we need not turn to India or to any heathen land. This pride blasts and blights in the most favored countries of the world. We claim to be the most democratic nation on earth but exactly the spirit that manifested itself in the disciples when they asked who should be greatest is seen on every hand in our own country. Equality before the law is a fundamental principle of our government. But there is not equality even before the law. Purse and place play a large part even in our courts of justice and a very much larger part in social life. Jesus said, "If any man shall desire to be first the same shall be last of all and servant of all." He was weary of this discussion of relative superiority. His whole soul must have burned with indignation when he saw the arrogance of wealth and the pride of Phariseeism. Boast of our Christian civilization as we will the fact remains, dollars and dress draw their division line.

NEW BASIS OF PERSONAL VALUES.

Jesus introduced a new basis of personal values. He did not despise the benefits of heredity, the advantages of wealth and social position, but instead of making these a ground of personal preferment he made them a ground of personal responsibility and obligation. Then by a striking symbolism Jesus set aside at once the prevailing custom of estimating men by externalities. He denounced the gold-ring-policy and presented character as the only ground of judgment. The acceptance or rejection of men was to be entirely independent of heredity, environment, social favor, political elevation, wealth, or even religious position. The bitterest denunciations of Christ were directed toward those who were exploiting the people socially, economically and religiously. We are to know neither rich nor poor, high nor low, learned nor unlearned when we consider humanity as furnishing an opportunity for sympathy and service. All the judgments of his day were reversed by Jesus when he declared that eminence is not a result of ambition but of humility. Self-seeking would inevitably defeat itself, he declared. It would be quite possible to gain a place, without any of the real honors that belonged to it. The question of worth was solely a question of service. In the sight of God a life has honor just in the degree in which it has out-pouring love.

THE STRIKING SYMBOLISM.

No language could so have enforced the words of Jesus as the act of calling to himself a child and presenting him to the self-seeking disciples as an example. Mark 9:36. "He took a little child and set him in the midst of them." The status of children then was vastly different from what it is today. They received no such attention as now nor did they have the protection which the law today affords them. The child was regarded as practically negligible and insignificant. He was regarded as little more than an animal during the early years of life. This made the symbol all the more effective. Incidentally the attractiveness of Jesus was worthy of note. Children did not fear him. If he who is the embodiment of all truth could so unbend himself as to make himself attractive and appealing to childhood it should be characteristic of the religion which he both was and taught that it should not repel by its austerity but attract by its simplicity and sympathy. There is a touch of beauty in the narrative in the fact that the child was of a very tender age and that evidently without the slightest protest it nestled in the arms of our Lord. We often mistake coldness for dignity and austerity for nobility.

DIVINE ATTITUDE TOWARD DEPENDENCY.

The act of Jesus firmly fixes the attitude of God toward his dependents. Weakness had always been driven to the wall but Jesus always and everywhere championed the cause of the oppressed and especially of the lowly. Ministry to the least and to the lowliest was a constant characteristic of Christ's activities. His act enjoins upon us to give lavishly where we can expect no return but love. The Christian religion antagonizes at every turn the sentiment that "Might is right." It protests against the law of the "Survival of the fittest" if by that phrase we mean the survival of only the physically strong. In its practical outworking that phrase simply means the perpetuation of brute force. It is this principle introduced into the industrial system of the world which has awakened universal revulsion and revolution.

CHILDHOOD AND THE TREND OF LIFE.

Another event soon followed which gave Christ a further opportunity to declare the relationship of Jesus to childhood. "And they brought unto him little children that he should touch them." It was undoubtedly the act of parental love. It speaks volumes for the hold of Jesus upon the hearts of parents that they pressed their way to him with their children for the beatitude of his touch. There was an indefinable something in the personality of Jesus which made those who were nearest to him and in sympathy with his ideals conscious of a divineness and another-worldness about him, which did not pertain at all to their friends and acquaintance. Parental love is instinctive. Everywhere in animal life devotion for offspring has striking expression. That life has become worse than brutal that will abandon helpless infancy. The two thoughts paramount in parents' hearts are, protection and direction for their children. The love of parents liberally lavished is not always wisely bestowed. The very highest manifestation of parental wisdom and love is shown in bringing children under the sanctifying influence of Jesus Christ. There is no folly more criminal than that which declines to influence a child in spiritual things. Children are precocious in this one matter as in nothing else. A child can appreciate spiritual relations and realities very much earlier than the same child can understand truths which require processes of reasoning. A child is intuitionally religious, but the trend of life has to be established through fellowship with the Unseen. The wealth, the fame and the name which can be conferred upon a child is nothing in comparison with the benefits and blessings of acquaintance with Jesus Christ. The disciples rebuked the ardent parents who presented their children, so utterly mistaken was their conception of both God and religion. In return Jesus rebuked them, and he always rebukes parental indifference to the interests of childhood and he invariably rebukes the church and church officials who discourage the coming of children under the protection and care of the church itself. Parental love should express itself in the dedication of children to God. This is an important matter too much neglected in our day. The whole trend of life may be determined by the time a child is five years of age. The safest place to commit a child is into the arms of Jesus Christ.

JESUS AND CHILDHOOD.

Jesus put the aureole on the brow of childhood. He was and is the children's friend. He who said, "Suffer the little children and forbid them not to come unto me" opposes at every turn whatever is antagonistic to the interests of the children. The movement in our own nation to protect childhood from the avariciousness of parents and to reduce child-labor to the minimum is in perfect accord with the teachings of Jesus and should have the support of all Christian people.

COMMENDABLE CHILDLIKENESS.

Mark 10:5. Childlikeness as a qualification for membership in the kingdom had its first perfect illustration in Jesus Christ himself. He came to the world as a little child. He passed through all the experiences of childhood and all the qualities so preëminently desirable in the child life were manifest in his perfect ministry. "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child he shall in no wise enter therein."

*Note.—International Sunday-school lesson for January 4, 1914. Scripture.—Mark 9:33-37 and 10:13-16.

The Highway to Efficiency

in the Sunday School is

The Bethany System

What some of our Leaders say of it:

"Nothing Could Pry Us Loose"

We began using the Bethany Graded Lessons at their first issuance and have increased the supply from year to year as the literature for all grades was published. There is nothing in the series that is not now used by our school. Nothing could pry our superintendents and teachers loose from these lessons. They meet the needs of pupils of all years and make the teacher's work a joy. We have no word with which to express our satisfaction with the series.

H. H. HARMON,
First Church, Lincoln, Neb.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teachers' text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN,
Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va.

"Thoroughly Edited"

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upon the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday-school pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned.

L. J. MARSHALL,
Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

"We Would Not Turn Back"

We are using the Bethany Graded Lessons. We would not turn back. The service our Sunday-school specialists are giving us as represented in this course is making a new day in religious education.

FINIS IDLEMAN,
Pastor Central Church, Des Moines, Ia.

"Unanimously the Bethany Series"

After a campaign led by Miss Eva Lemert of Kansas City, Mo., resulting in the thorough grading and departmentizing of the school, we had to decide the matter of graded helps. A committee of three was appointed, consisting of the pastor, superintendent and one member of the Executive Committee. This committee made an individual examination of lesson helps and decided unanimously in favor of the Bethany series, arriving at their decisions independently and solely upon the merits of the literature. So far as I know these lessons are giving entire satisfaction.

EDGAR DeWITT JONES,
Pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

"Nothing to Compare With Them"

We have been using the Bethany Graded Lessons from the time you began to publish them and we are very highly pleased with them. We have often had occasion to compare them with the publications of other houses and thus far can say we have found nothing that compares with them. I am teaching a young men's class in the course, "The World a Field for Christian Service," and am glad to say that it seems to me the best adapted for young men of high school age of all courses I have ever seen. My class is becoming very enthusiastic over it.

P. J. RICE,
Pastor First Church, El Paso, Tex.

"Have Created Enthusiasm"

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

T. E. WINTER,
Pastor First Church, Fulton, Mo.

"Delighted"

Our Sunday-school, which has lately begun the use of the Bethany Graded Lessons, seems to be delighted with them. I have heard no word of unfavorable criticism and very many words of appreciation. Our teachers like the form and material of these lessons.

GRAHAM FRANK,
Pastor Liberty, Mo.

"Best on the Market"

We consider the Bethany Graded Lessons for the Beginners and Primary department the best on the market of our own brotherhood and second to none of other communions. Congratulations!

J. J. TISDALL,
Pastor Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O.

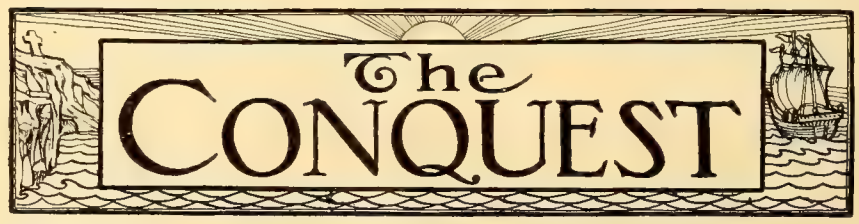
What They Say About Our New Weekly



Rev. Claude E. Hill, National C. E. Secretary—"This paper ought to have a wide circulation among the young people of our churches. I like, especially, your treatment of the Endeavor Topic. I certainly wish the paper abundant success."

Dr. J. H. Garrison, Editor-Emeritus Christian Evangelist—"I have examined The Conquest with care and with pleasure. If you can maintain the high ideal which is so well realized in your first issue, you will be making a valuable contribution to our Sunday school literature and to the religious training of the young."

Rev. J. H. Goldner, Euclid Ave. Church, Cleveland—"I like The Conquest immensely. The treatment of the Sunday school lesson, C. E. and midweek prayer-meeting topics is fresh and satisfying. In addition there is an abundance of readable and informing matter of a high order. The paper merits a hearty reception."

Rev. H. D. C. Maclachlan, Seventh Street, Richmond, Va.—"I am very much pleased with The Conquest. It is a good augury for the success of the Sunday school and the Disciples Publication Society that you are putting out such a publication."

W. O. Rogers, of the Sunday School Times Staff—"I have examined the copy of your new paper, The Conquest, with great interest. It looks interesting, which is the first requisite. Then it is interesting, which is the second. It has a fine tone. I predict for it a real success."

Dr. Loa E. Scott, Author of "The Life of Jesus"—"The Conquest is indeed a credit to the Disciples Publication Society. There is need among us for just such a paper, one that takes a broad outlook upon the world and upon the problems of the church and Sunday school."

Rev. Cloyd Goodnight, Uniontown, Pa.—"I like the virility and admire the study pages of The Conquest. Am sure you have a fine combination of page and column features, such as will make the paper not only attractive but valuable. It has the modern touch."

Mrs. Jessie Brown Pounds, Author—"I am sure you are putting out just the kind of a paper our young people need."

The Disciples Publication Society

The Disciples Publication Society is an organization through which churches of the Disciples of Christ seek to promote undenominational and constructive Christianity.

The relationship it sustains to the Disciples is intimate and organic, though not official. The Society is not a private institution. It has no capital stock. No individuals profit by its earnings. The churches and Sunday-schools own and directly operate it. It is their contribution to the advocacy and practice of the ideals of Christian unity and religious education.

The charter under which the Society exists determines that whatever profits are earned shall be applied to agencies which foster the cause of religious education, although it is clearly conceived that its main task is not to make profits but to produce literature for building up character and for advancing the cause of religion.

* * *

The Disciples Publication Society regards itself as a thoroughly undenominational institution. It is organized and constituted by individuals and churches who interpret the Disciples' religious reformation as ideally an unsectarian and unecclesiastical fraternity, whose common tie and original impulse is fundamentally the desire to practice Christian unity with all Christians.

The Society therefore claims fellowship with all who belong to the living Church of Christ, and desires to co-operate with the Christian people of all communions as well as with the congregations of Disciples, and to serve all.

* * *

In publishing literature for religious education the Society believes a body of such literature prepared by the co-operative effort of many communions reaches a much higher level of catholicity and truth than can be attained by writers limited by the point of view of a single communion.

The Sunday-school literature (The Bethany System) published by this house, has been prepared through the Society's association with the writers, editors and official publishing houses of the Methodist, Presbyterian, Congregational and other communions. In its mechanical and artistic quality, its low selling-price, its pedagogical adequacy, and, still more, in its happy solution of doctrinal differences it is a striking illustration of the possibilities of the new day of unity into which the church is now being ushered.

* * *

The Christian Century, the chief publication of the society, desires nothing so much as to be the worthy organ of the Disciples' movement. It has no ambition at all to be regarded as an organ of the Disciples' denomination. It is a free interpreter of the wider fellowship in religious faith and service which it believes every church of Disciples should embody. It strives to interpret all communions, as well as the Disciples, in such terms and with such sympathetic insight as may reveal to all their essential unity in spite of denominational isolation. Unlike the typical denominational paper, the Christian Century, though published by the Disciples, is not published for the Disciples alone. It is published for the Christian world. It desires definitely to occupy a catholic point of view and it seeks readers in all communions.

Don't Block the Way

Burke said:

"Applaud us when we run,
Console us when we fall,
Cheer us when we recover,
But let us pass on—for God's sake—let us pass on!"

One of the most vexatious obstacles in the path of earnest people who are trying to do good work is the blocking of their progress by good little fussy men who are forever in the way. These blunderers do not mean to do any harm; perhaps they approve the enterprise and really came out to applaud. But instead of joining the procession or cheering its advance, they wander into the only clear road right in front of the band-wagon and everything has to be stopped in order to save their precious lives. The driver cannot let go his reins in order to climb down and remove the dreamer who is wondering if the colors on the chariot harmonize, and so he must wait until the way is cleared so that he can pass on.

Don't Block the Way!

Perhaps the movement is not according to your taste. Opinions differ. So do men. You are different. Perhaps that's what is the matter with you. Do you agree in the main issue? You really came out to see the procession because you believed in it; but now you "raise the question" concerning the wisdom of choosing to go through Main street. So you get in the way; you block the whole splendid business. You mean well and you are perfectly honest; but you are in the way. You must get out of the path of progress.

Don't Block the Way!

You disapprove of the man who drives the first carriage and the head marshal is not the one you would have selected. So there you are, under the nose of his horse, and things are stalled. Personal dislikes and selfishness have blocked the progress of the Kingdom of God at critical points time and again. Movements are more important than persons and principles must not be forgotten because of prejudice. When we ought to pass on let every man forget his dislikes and follow where he can count most.

Don't Block the Way!

The details are not what you would have chosen them to be in every respect. One of the floats seems to you inartistic, because—we only suspect this—it was designed by another artist. So you think you must hold up the whole affair right in front of the grand-stand while you read a critical essay on how to stuff a white owl. Don't do it! We cannot have everything perfect, except our own schemes before anyone tries to work them. Details somehow get themselves adjusted and grow to fit the big plan in time. Whatever is not worth while gets itself discredited finally; but your essay will not accomplish the result.

Not Many Block the Way!

That is the joy of the world's workers. There are only a few who stall the procession. Almost everyone cheers. The multitudes are glad when the movement is steady and the chariots pass on. Do they know how their encouragement counted? Not often, we fancy. But it helped wonderfully when the marchers were fagged. There's nothing quite like an eager outburst of good-will to hearten one when the powers of body and soul are flagging. Were you ever thirsty and fatigued with your powers spent and still a weary mile to go? And just then did somebody cheer? How the strength came back! Somebody cared! On you went through the dust, tired heart pumping bravely. Oh, it is great just to cheer and not block the way.

The place where there is real joy to be had at wholesale rates is along the lines where enthusiastic cheering greets the forward movement. It is a big responsibility to represent the Goddess of Liberty on the main float. Crowns have such a wretched habit of getting on at the wrong angle and draperies are forever becoming snarled up. The drum major looks like the Czar but ask him once what degree the thermometer would register under his beaver hat. He will tell you that being drum major is no joke. No, the place of real joy is on the sidewalk with a bag of peanuts and healthy lungs to cheer the marchers and hearten the band. Of course one gets tired among the multitude. The worst of it all is waiting for the sound of the band when the start was put at nine, you found your position at eight-thirty, and now it is nine-thirty with never a sound of the cornet to comfort your eager ears. Feet grow tired and backs ache during the long wait. Finally, however, "the great procession comes up the street" and you have come to the kingdom for such a time as this. Use your lungs now, friend, for the marching host needs the tonic of your cheer!

Then we Work with fresh Courage!

The procession was for us. We were not in the midst of it; but it was meant for our inspiration. So back we go to the old place and thank God and take courage. There are gray days ahead; but the splendor of the great event will flash across them and we shall be glad that we cheered.

Don't block the way!

Changing Values in Religious Art

BY MRS. KATHERINE GIRLING.

"FRITZ von Uhde, a professor of painting in the Academy of Art, at Munich, is unquestionably the greatest, as he is the most modern of our religious painters," the Artist began.

Jesus Preaching from Boat—Fritz von Uhde.

"He is sixty-two years old and, as yet, little known to the public. When he has become an old master, we may at last know him. The German emperor dislikes him, and sometimes editors of religious papers are afraid of him fearing that they scent socialism, but Von Uhde, because he paints peasants, is no more socialist than Millet was revolutionist. Von Uhde is but doing in Germany today, what Giotto did in Italy in his time, painting religion in terms which the common people can understand. It did not occur to Giotto to paint Christ as a first century Hebrew. 'If Christ came to Italy,' Giotto began. 'If Christ were here now, in Germany,' Von Uhde says."

"Do you mean that he puts the Saviour in modern costume?" asked the Lady in Black.

"No," replied the Artist. "The Christ in Von Uhde's pictures is a heavenly guest. He is painted for reverence and recognition in the seamless robe, but his audience is in modern German peasant dress. This painter is possessed of the idea that it is a mistake to impress upon men that Jesus lived long ago and far away, and that now he is dead. Instead, his whole emphasis rests upon the thought that Christ is a Spirit abroad in the world today, and that working men are in great need of this message. These pictures are dialect pictures, folk pictures, if you understand me. The artist cares little for recognition as an artist if only his message reaches and arrests the peasantry of his country."

"Has he technique?" asked the Connoisseur.

"Inded, yes!" He is master of the technique we call 'lighting.' He can make light so play over an object as to glorify it, even though it be but a haymow. And he understands composition, grouping, balance, relativity. He psychologizes his work to the needs of the public he is seeking to win. For example, in his 'Sermon on the Mount,' Christ sits on a rude bench on the slope of a hill in the full glory of the sunset hour. Only then have peasantry time to listen to a wayside Preacher. They cluster about Him, the women and children kneeling near, and the men less likely to be swayed by emotion, grasping their rakes and scythes, in the background. Christ faces His auditors, showing but the side view to the person who looks at the picture. It is the audience that you see. Not that they are of more importance, but that by their illumined enraptured faces you may judge of the effect His words produce. He is an Influence. If you would see His face you must seek its reflection in theirs. One of the most perfect examples of this treatment of a holy theme may be found in Von Uhde's 'Suffer Little Children.' The scene is laid in a Kinderschule—a primary school, the little ones all escaping from their places, and drawing close to the Strange Guest who sits in the visitor's chair. A teacher has quite evidently rebuked them; they are not to trouble the Stranger, but it is of no use, one little hand is already slipping into His. They are very usual little German peasant children, not fancy picture impossibilities. Perhaps He has uttered the word, 'Come!' At any rate their awkward, friendly little souls are responding.

"Can you imagine a church in which such a bit of modern realism could find place?" asked the Connoisseur.

"I can image the Social Settlement it could find ample room in!" ejaculated the Man from the Settlement.

"Perhaps," said the Artist, "the Settlement is to be the Church of the Future."

"I'd like to put it the other way," said the Lady in Black, "and say that the church will be the future settlement. I would keep religion in the lead."

"I suppose Von Uhde feels that refinement, elegance, formality, have made the church a strange country to the poor. So he tells the story again in terms which anyone can grasp,'' added the Hostess.

The Holy Family—Fritz von Uhde.

''Von Uhde,'' continued the Artist, ''calls his Nativity, 'The Holy Night.' Under that name the German people have sung its praise on Christmas Eve for centuries. The picture is a wonderful study of night effects; of various forms of lighting. The whole atmosphere is tremendously clear in silvery gray harmony. It is a cold, starry night. Crisp, sparkling winter air pervades it, reminding one that the thought is of Germany, not of Palestine. Shepherds have climbed a steep mountain road, and with reverent steps are approaching a barn. A rude, square lantern hanging on a nail on the wall, throws beams of ruddy light down the pathway illumining the faces of the guests. Angels hover among the rafters of the loft singing carols. They are not stereotyped angelic beings, superhuman. They are pictures of departed innocents, visions of children who have died and gone to Heaven. Their little white dresses and wreaths of flowers have a pretty homeliness about them, a sainted familiarity that would comfort any grieving mother who wonders what her little dead child does all day. An august poetry of light plays about the Holy Child who is, the painter assures us, the Baby Jesus. Night winds lift the blonde tresses of the mother and flutter her meager robe. She does not attract you by the usual easy appeal of beauty. Her features are not classic. Her expression lacks the remote refinement of a Madonna of Raphael. She is but a peasant girl whose face if it is lovely, is so only because of the look she gives her Child. All the countenances in the pictures are humble, devout; there glows in them the uplifting of heart, the nameless yearning to understand, which identifies them with true humility. The most cultured of the kings of the Orient can feel no greater promptings of emotion than do these rude folk who herd sheep.

''Von Uhde has made several studies of the Last Supper, or as he calls it, 'The Holy Evening Meal.' In one of them, a group of men, farmers, artisans, fishermen, the very ones He would call as His disciples, if He came to Germany, are seen in twilight dusk in a small, bare chamber. They sit about a table, and are not posed theatrically on one side of it. There is no spectacular grouping, no gesturing hands bid for attention as in Da-Vinci's picture. Possibly Von Uhde has a simpler task than Da Vinci. It may be easier to show diverse individuality among peasant faces than it is after the ground glass of convention has closed over. At any rate Da Vinci's apostles are keen, intellectual aristocrats. They might be a university faculty. Von Uhde's are plain, unlettered working people. Christ sits before the group. The observer does not see His face. The moment chosen is the time of parting, 'And now I go away.' It is the tenderest, most human point of time to choose. His listeners have forgotten everything but Him. St. John leans back of Christ, his head bowed on the chair back, his shoulders are tense, holding back the sob that must not interrupt the Master. The others look at Him with hungry longing in the first unbelieving moment of loss. They accept His final command, 'This do in remembrance of Me!' ''

Come, Lord Jesus, and be Our Guest''—Fritz von Uhde.

''The Man is an evangelist!'' exclaimed the Lady in Black after a pause. ''I hope the common people will 'hear him gladly.' ''

''I think I'll run over to Munich this summer,'' said the Connoisseur.

CARLYLE AND THE BOOK OF JOB.

Carlyle was once asked to take the reading at family prayers during a short visit paid to his friend, the provost of Kirkcaldy. The Bible chanced to open at the first chapter of the book of Job, and Carlyle immediately became absorbed in his subject and read on and on to the end of the last chapter, when, closing the volume, he remarked:

''That is a marvelous life-like drama, only to be appreciated when read right through.''

It is fair to infer that it was appreciated for once. Any one who has taken a long, solitary afternoon and attempted to give the book of Job an opportunity to be appreciated by reading it honestly through at one sitting can realize the consternation of the provost. Such a one will not be likely to wonder with Carlyle why he was not asked again to assist at family prayers in that household.

A Doctrinal Autobiography

Editor's Note: In Mr. Morrison's "Open Letter to a Young Minister" published two weeks ago in The Christian Century it was frankly declared that the Disciples of Christ have undergone a great change in recent years, that they are engaged in a reconstruction of their Biblical views and a readjustment of their relations to the larger Christian world. How great this change is cannot be fully stated in a few propositions, nor in a single article. It is necessary for the atmosphere of the older order of things to be reproduced in order for those of the younger generation to feel the contrast. With the following article we begin a series which will continue several weeks, in which a prominent preacher of middle age tells the story of his upbringing in the Disciples' fellowship and of his growth into a larger freedom and sympathy. The series is entitled "A Doctrinal Autobiography," although it deals with his religious experience as well as with his intellectual beliefs. Happily we have gone so far from the repressive and exclusive type of church life that it is possible for the author to write from a detached point of view, with genial reminiscence rather than in resentful criticism. In addition to the intense human interest of his story, this series should help to break down the habit of going to the "fathers" to find out what the Disciples believe and what kind of people they are. To understand this body of people they must be taken as they are today and not as they were a generation or two generations ago.

I WAS BORN in the faith of the Disciples. I cannot lay claim to the zeal which characterizes those who are won from the errors of one faith to the perfections of another; I cannot say that my conversion was otherwise than commonplace. When I was about seventeen I accepted the gospel invitation at a prayer-meeting service. My life has been such that I could not truthfully say I had been plucked as a brand from the burning. Conversion, to me, was the assuming of new obligations and the entering of a new state. I did the thing that I knew should be done; it ought to have been done sooner. Thus into the faith of the Disciples I was really born as I was born into the world seventeen years before. In that faith I have lived ever since as a preacher of its doctrines. In that faith I expect to die.

My parents were devout believers and ardent Disciples. Had they been interrogated I am sure they would have said that they believed the Bible from Genesis to Revelation. They passed their lives in an atmosphere of prayer. The spiritual ancestry of one was Methodist, of the other Presbyterian. My father had been a life-long Disciple; my mother became a Disciple when in the prime of life. My father's position yielded him a very modest competence, and though we were always in comfortable circumstances, there were no luxuries, and very few extras. At his death the home was broken up, and the inevitable heartbreaks attended that event which can be read any day in that voluminous library of "the short and simple annals of the poor."

PARENTS OF UNFEIGNED FAITH.

One of the tenderest memories I cherish is the unfeigned faith of these parents, my father closing his earthly career a few years before reaching the three-score and ten boundary; while my mother lingered for almost a quarter of a century in that large circle of the solitary the world over to whom the past is always beautiful because seen through the mellow light of memories made sacred by silences that can never be broken, while the present is filled with dreams of the undiscovered country where no ills or woes can ever leave one desolate.

The ostracism to which these saints were subjected because of their peculiar faith, together with their endless discussions of the scheme of redemption, imparted something of austerity to the life of every member of the home. The parents had little in common with the neighbors who belonged to other churches. Their friendships, like those of their children, were to be found within the circle of our struggling congregation. We were surrounded by a Catholic population, mostly Irish immigrants, who were an inferior type of citizens. The Protestant sects, we were taught, were either ignorantly or wilfully disobedient, in the one case deserving our pity, and in the other our scorn. But all Protestants of our town were held together despite the differences among themselves, by the menace of Rome, our common foe. Yet our family seemed persona non grata to the neighborhood, when Catholic and Protestant acrimonies rested on their arms, because of our renewal of the baptismal controversies which had been put to sleep by Baptist and Pedobaptist many years before. I am sure that the neighborhood of my boyhood days was on speaking terms with us but never intimate. The family religion barred us from neighborhood gatherings as a "peculiar people."

CHURCH-GOING HABITS.

My parents never went to any church but their own, and naturally the children were not allowed to go to any other, unless to a neighboring Sunday-school in the mornings which adjourned early enough to permit us to reach our own pew in time for the service. I think the principal motive in the parental minds for allowing us to go there was not for the school's good, but to keep us out of mischief. Had there been any danger of our being won over to a sectarian faith, an end would have been put to our itinerating among the "sects" forever. I am sure that the children had no more desire to be won over than had their parents. Our loyalty to the family faith was as deep as the ostracism to which we were subjected was severe.

The journey to our sanctuary was a long one, but we went three times a day, and father and mother would have gone more often had there been more hours than twenty-four. To the children, however, Sunday was rather a dreary day; its duties were exacting, and any delinquencies were punished. The time between services was spent in Bible reading and singing. Occasionally we took long walks, but were always expected to be in our places for the evening service.

The fact that we, as children, were so closely bound to attend our own church services has been one of the regrets of my life. The popular preachers of our city I never heard, and possibly I would not have cared to hear them, had I been permitted; but the feeling remains that the parental loyalty to our own services shut me out from a great opportunity that would have modified many of my views of life long before they were changed, and saved me from many a mental perplexity. I was almost twenty-five years of age before I heard a preacher of national reputation. I was past twenty before I heard a preacher of any distinction. All through the impressionable years of my life I heard only such men as our limited means as a congregation would enable us to employ.

I knew nothing of the fellowship with other communications until I had been preaching for a year or more. Attendance upon a national Christian Endeavor convention started a series of questionings which began to perplex. I found out then and there that the isolation in which I had been kept by our peculiar views had injured me far more than those communions were penalized by our exclusiveness. For as I grew up I shared the point of view of the family, and was as rigid an observer of the rules of church fidelity as the most rigid. I felt that it would never do for us who had the "truth" to be a partaker of the evil deeds of those who knew they were in error and determined to remain there. And though, as I have already intimated, I might not have mingled with other denominations whom we scornfully denominated the "sects," the teaching that hemmed us in was injurious to young and old alike. We were saturated with one or two groups of ideas, and were blind to all others.

EXTREME CHURCH LOYALTY.

In the college which I attended the same exclusive spirit prevailed and the same loyalty to our church; and the reasons for this exclusiveness in both home and school are not difficult to understand. The college was interested in building up a strong denomination, a "brotherhood," a peculiar people. The family was interested in building up a strong congregation. Both school and home had deep convictions as to the correctness of "our position," both believed that the final word on Christian union had been spoken, both had accepted the dictum: "We are right and can't be wrong," so "what was the use of listening to others?" It was perfectly natural that both these institutions should train those committed to their care as they themselves had been taught, especially when it was a commonplace of faith among the rank and file that our plea would take the world.

As a result of such views my church life was confined to the narrowest limits; our own edifice was a boundary beyond which I could not pass without incurring the displeasure of the faithful, or laying myself open to the charge of "dallying with the sects." The range of my faith was limited by the geography of our people. I knew then the exact number of the elect—that is, they could have been counted had not numbering the people been a deadly experiment to Israel which must not be repeated by those who were attempting to restore the ancient order of things.

In a subsequent paper or two it will appear that I was not nurtured in a cradle of religious liberty. I accepted the dictum that if God chooses to damn the world that mistakes the meaning of a few passages of Scripture, that was no business of mine. "Let God be true and every man a liar," was the final answer to every rebellion against what one instinctively felt was a travesty on justice by the Judge of all the earth.

I was to learn in after years that my early crude views were perversions of reason and Scripture alike, a caricature of the teachings of Thomas Campbell, who being a man of Catholic feeling could never hold such views while he poured into the ear of the Christian world his appeals for the unity of the people of God.

RECOLLECTIONS OF FIRST PASTOR.

The first pastor of whom I have any recollection was a very godly man, but a chronic invalid. His sermons were greatly appreciated by the adult members, while the younger element were supposed to fall into line and like the sermons, too. The era of young people's work at that period had not been ushered in. We remained passive and took counsel from our elders. The wan face and gaunt figure of our preacher I remember well though almost everything about him has escaped me. After preaching twice on Sunday he was in a state of collapse, while the days of the week were occupied with recuperative activities in the hope of postponing his journey to the narrow house of clay as long as possible. The people to this day speak in the warmest terms of his preaching and of his piety. I do not think that he had an obsession for denouncing the sects as did some who came after him.

His successor was a man of devotion, too, who enjoyed the best of health, and possessed a great zeal for the cause. He was a graduate of one of our leading colleges, and for a time broke up the routine of our church services, though not its habits of thinking, by his vigor and that optimism which is the fruit of good health. As I spent some years under his ministry, I learned that no amount of urging could induce him to express more than a pious wish that the unimmersed might be saved. He was not a reader of books, much less a student, and not a touch of the interests of the outside world did he ever impart to his congregation.

STRONG IN "FIRST PRINCIPLES."

Our pastor was strong in the exposition of "First Principles," and often we had an advertised sermon on the plea. We all felt that the enemy had been routed, though the enemy did not share the same feeling, since they were seen in decreasing numbers in our pews, as these sermons grew more frequent. That they did not embrace the pastor's teachings in large numbers was due to their ignorance or perversity, and their allegiance to their idols, so we consoled ourselves. But apart from these doctrinal sermons, the pastor's stock was not extensive, and in the latter days of his ministry he delved again and again as deeply into his barrel as its shallowness would allow. Like many preachers before and since his day he alighted on the device of giving new titles and texts to old sermons, in the hope of deceiving if possible the very elect.

He was preached as dry in a few years as a sun-baked cask.

But his goodness was conspicuous. His ability was above the average. He was genuinely interested in "bringing the young people into the church." He was always busy but in ways that added very little to his mission as a preacher. His days would often be ended in a round of activities with nothing to show for his efforts.

HARD CONDITIONS OF WORK.

When some of the brethren complained that he had accomplished but little for the church, I felt that he had done as much as we had a right to expect, and I am confirmed in that view now with an experience of many years in the ministry. There was a scant prospect for the future of the church. His family was large, his salary small. There could be no inspiration in preaching to the same faithful few week after week. There was no social prestige in the church to attract the influential. The masses could see but few differences between us and the Baptists, and our best efforts to emphasize those differences must have made as many converts for them as for ourselves.

The bonds of union that held pastor and people together were such as are inseparable from a struggling or a dying cause—loyalty and heroism. The emoluments or the joys of the ministry that faithful pastor never knew in that field. The poetry of such ministries may be read in the papers or recited from convention platforms, but they are tragedies in real life.

PRAISE FOR THE TOILING PREACHER.

I am almost moved to tears when I think of the difficulties of that needy congregation. And now when I receive calls to fields just as needy, I move far from the maddening noise of trains lest in an unguarded hour I should board one and be carried whither I would not. Heaven ought to have many crowns for the toiling preacher in the uninviting parish. The chief virtue in our pastor, let me repeat, was his ability to make us stand by our guns when the odds were greatly against us.

It was under the ministry of this good man that I became a Christian. Several others of his converts are also preaching the gospel. I knew only the ministry of one man.

The congregation never enjoyed anything that could be called a modern revival, though several preachers from nearby towns, and occasionally some from a distance, preached for a week or two, at various times. Many passing through the town made my father's house their headquarters, and in this way I came to know quite a number of our ministers by name. They were all self-taught men, thoroughly committed to the plea, and undisturbed, of course, by modern views of the Bible.

We stood in a peculiar relation in regard to our preachers. We had so few in that section that when an itinerant appeared, announcing himself as zealous for the ancient order, he was received with open arms. We never inquired for his credentials, but had abundant reasons more than once for wishing a little later on that we had. We always took our preachers at their word, and not a certificate signed by a heavenly scribe would have added a jot or tittle to their character, if only we could be assured of their fidelity to the truth. A sermon or two soon shattered any fears that might have lingered in our minds, and not infrequently, by the same type of men, our confidence in the dignity of human nature received a stalwart blow. Still, we never learned by experience. The needs of the field were so great and the laborers so few, that we put our heads into the lion's mouth every time we had an opportunity. We never harbored any heretical preachers, but we have taken to our hearts a number of villains, distinguished as preachers.

A PECULIAR CONGREGATION.

There were several peculiarities about our congregation. We never had a church quarrel. The congregation itself was the result of a bitter fight many years before and the evils of factionalism were burned so deeply into the memories of the older members that they were willing to go a long distance in the interest of peace.

We lost a family now and then because of our lack of opportunity for the development of those who were anxious to appear in "society," but comforted ourselves with the text, "They went out from us because they were not of us," and we tried to make ourselves believe that we were better off without them.

We also had a floating membership made up of cranks who had become so objectionable in their own little sects that they were frozen out, or given to understand that their room was better than their company, or who thought that their liberty of speech was being curtailed and came to us for comfort. We had them as birds of passage for a time. Then we had the religious tramp who felt at home with us for a season and then disappeared. Many varieties of creeds tied themselves to our quays for a time but soon cut their cables and were never heard of more. We always lived within sight of the cave of Adullam, and how we kept from breaking into it is more than I can tell. Any man with a theory that explained the mysteries of the Book of Daniel was likely to get a hearing from us. Once in a while these visitors stole a lamb from the fold. The literalistic bent of our theology lent itself readily to any vagary that a religious vagrant had to ventilate.

But these things were incidental to the life of the congregation.

THE "STANDARD'S" INFLUENCE.

The influence of the "Christian Standard," under the strong hand of Isaac Errett was almost supreme in the congregation. I do not understand how we could read it and fail to be impressed with its tolerant teachings as completely as we were. We had no missionary spirit; and I was a student at college before I heard my first missionary sermon. We escaped the organ controversy, largely because my father and his connections were musically inclined. The organ was slipped in without a dissenting voice. Benjamin Franklin was never forgiven for his reference to it as "the calf that we worshiped," when paying the congregation a visit. I have heard it said that its voice was silenced at that time because of the convictions of the visiting speaker. The "anti" brethren found out early that they could gain no footing on our soil, so we were never troubled by their divisive teaching. We had troubles enough of our own without importing any, though at heart we were really in sympathy with the "antis" but fortunately not one of us knew it.

NO UNION MEETINGS.

We never had a union meeting in my time lest we should be accused of compromising with the sects. I was made familiar with those arguments designed to prove that there is no promise of salvation for the unimmersed, the more radical holding that the sects were wilfully ignorant and deserved the doom of the disobedient. Others less harsh in their judgments were willing to leave the sectarians to the "uncovenanted mercies." The apparent injustice of God, and none of us could escape the feeling that there seemed to be an injustice somewhere in our premises, was explained on the ground that "his ways are not as our ways," and in the end it would be discovered that what we thought was injustice was a phantom of the intellect. We were really trying to make ourselves believe that though two and two in this world make four, in another world they would make five, or a triangle here would be a square hereafter, or that the laws of thinking under which we work in this stage of being would be so transformed that what seemed unreason now would be reason then.

HOW SOULS BECAME GRANITE.

I can readily understand how a person of inquiring mind in our congregation would be browbeaten and silenced by the voice of authority, or forced out of the membership altogether. He would be set down as a holder of skeptical views, or as one who was attempting to be wise above what was written.

In opposition to the anti-ism of the seventies, when Loos, Pendleton, Richardson, and Lamar were doing their best to bring our minds to adopt more catholic views than those which the American Christian Review was propagating, not a beam of their light ever penetrated the darkness of the exclusive policy of our congregation. We seemed to shut our minds to all humane influences in theology, and our souls naturally became granite under this dispensation of doctrinal severity. We condemned the piety of the Christian world with as little unconcern as we condemned its error. It never occurred to us that we should save our fellow religionists because of their virtues, though it always occurred to us to damn them because of their errors. We were as much at liberty to exercise charity as judgment, but we chose the thunderbolt to hurl rather than the mantle to hide.

NARROW SECTARIAN PREJUDICE.

We could believe in our neighbor's honesty. We would lend him our hoe or ax or our money. We saw that he was a faithful husband and a loving father. We would gladly sell him goods and give him his own time to pay. But our attitude toward him changed when we saw him wend his way to a church on a different street from our own. We regarded his creed with aversion, we felt that while he was honest elsewhere he was dishonest in religion. We saw him singled out for destruction because he committed a doctrinal error as all his fathers had done before him. If we ever heaved a sigh of compassion for him we were simply inviting our own brethren to question the sincerity of our profession.

All such sentiments in time became my own.

To show how persistent was the exclusive idea regarding other Christians (pardon that phrase, there were no other Christians then!) a company of us were distributing tracts on the street one Sunday evening, and with very meager success. The tract was always accompanied with the invitation to come to a certain place and "hear the truth." It never occurred to us that there was anything objectionable in that phrase, or the slightest connection between it and the number of tracts left in our hands. A few were moved to profanity by our zeal in their behalf. When we assembled to relate our experiences, the failure was construed as a fulfillment of the Scriptures: "They all should believe a lie and be damned."

I have wished many times that I could enjoy the sense of relief after failure that would come to me in those early days by the misapplication of a text to a disappointing situation. I still have the texts, but I have lost the courage to apply them that I had then. No matter how many we handed over to doom we could always save our own prestige in this world and in the world to come. Even our failures were according to the Scriptures.

In the midst of this legalistic Alaska, a few flowers actually bloomed. We were all taught to pray; we were a consecrated and loyal people. We gave freely of our scanty store to help defray current expenses; but we were rarely, if ever, called upon to give to distant benevolent causes. Our bills were paid promptly, a few men of our number making up the deficits year after year. We glorified in our possession of the truth, and were depressed and almost morbid over the disposition of our neighborhood to allow us to keep it.

FEW, BUT CHOICE!

The visiting preachers praised our fidelity, and exhorted us to remain faithful, and never court ruin by a compromise of any kind. If we were few in number we were pointed to the early church with its membershop of one hundred and twenty, and thereafter our restlessness was turned to contentment for a season. With hope that never failed even in the hour of death, the older members toiled, waiting for the turning of the tide; with joy they proclaimed the fact that they were the chosen vessels of the Lord, whose quiet ministry would one day soon be crowned with an abundant harvest.

Two Favorite Christmas Hymns

WITH the approach of the Christmas season the thoughts of many turn to the wealth of beautiful nativity hymns. It is probable that the popular Christmas carol, "O Little Town of Bethlehem," written by Phillips Brooks, is being sung in nearly every church in the land. Bishop Brooks spent the Christmas of 1866 in Bethlehem and in the following hymn, written for his own Sunday-school in 1868, he embodied his meditations during that sacred experience. "Hark, the herald angels sing" is the composition of one of the greatest of our English hymn-writers, Charles Wesley. In its present form it is a curious example of the vicissitudes through which hymns almost invariably pass. Being copied from one book to another by compilers whose theological views are often dissimilar, hymns are more apt to be altered than any other form of literary composition. This famous Christmas hymn has had more than its fair share of such "emendations." As first published it consisted of ten four-line verses. It was then reduced to eight, then to six, and finally to three eight-line stanzas with the well-known refrain of the two opening lines. But it is a curious fact that Wesley was not the author of the famous opening line, "Hark, the herald angels sing!" which originally read, "Hark, how all the welkin rings!" It was Wesley's great contemporary, Whitefield, who altered that line to its present admirable form. There is hardly a hymnal in Britain or America which does not contain this great hymn, and it has been translated into scores of languages and dialects.

Hark! the Herald Angels Sing.

Hark! the herald angels sing,
Glory to the new-born King!
Peace on earth, and mercy mild,
God and sinners reconciled!
Joyful, all ye nations, rise,
Join the triumph of the skies;
With the angelic host proclaim,
Christ is born in Bethlehem.

Christ, by highest Heaven adored;
Christ, the everlasting Lord;
Late in time behold Him come,
Offspring of the Virgin's womb.
Veiled in flesh the Godhead see;
Hail the incarnate Deity,
Pleased as man with man to dwell;
Jesus, our Emmanuel!

Mild, He lays His glory by,
Born that man no more may die,
Born to raise the sons of earth,
Born to give them second birth.
Risen with healing in His wings,
Light and life to all He brings.
Hail, the Sun of Righteousness!
Hail, the Heaven-born Prince of Peace!

O Little Town of Bethlehem.

O little town of Bethlehem,
How still we see thee lie;
Above thy deep and dreamless sleep
The silent stars go by;
Yet in the dark streets shineth
The everlasting light;
The hopes and fears of all the years
Are met in thee tonight.

For Christ is born of Mary;
And gathered all above,
While mortals sleep, the angels keep
Their watch of wond'ring love.
O morning stars, together
Proclaim the holy birth;
And praises sing to God the King,
And peace to men on earth.

O holy child of Bethlehem,
Descend to us, we pray;
Cast out our sin, and enter in,
Be born in us today.
We hear the Christmas angels
The great glad tidings tell;
O, come to us, abide with us,
Our Lord Emmanuel.

Anti-Saloon Forces Storm Washington

The Committee of One Thousand of the Anti-Saloon League of America Presents its Petition to the National Government at Washington.

BY E. J. DAVIS.

Twice within thirty days the Anti-Saloon hosts of the country have gathered in national conclave. Once in Columbus, Ohio, November 10 to 14, and again in Washington D. C., 10 and 11. The one convention was the complement of the other, neither would have been complete in itself. The Columbus convention was the decision, the Washington convention was the beginning of the putting of that decision into action.

The purpose of the Washington convention was to formally petition congress for the passage of an amendment to the national constitution forbidding the manufacture, sale, transportation, exportation or importation of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes.

FORMING THE PARADE.

On Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock, December 10th, the committee of one thousand began forming on Pennsylvania Ave., at 12th street. We quote from the Washington Star, of December 10th, as follows:

"Gathered in Washington from every state and territory of the union, representing the leaders in the anti-liquor movement all over the country, more than 2,000 men and women today begged the federal government to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the United tates by amending the constitution. These men and women presented petitions from the Anti-Saloon League and the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

"Without blare of trumpets or other music than the singing of Onward Christian soldiers and America as they descended on the capitol, the men in the demonstration forming what is called the Committee of one thousand, of the Anti-Saloon League, marched through Pennsylvania avenue, from the Raleigh Hotel where they had assembled, and at the Peace Monument, at the edge of the capitol grounds, were joined by a thousand women representing the Women's Christian Temperance Union.

"A four year old girl, Lillian Flower, of Massachusetts, representing the cradle roll of the W. C. T. U., marched in the vanguard of the women, and an eight year old boy, John Good Jr., the son of a business man of that state, marched at the head of the Anti-Saloon League men.

THE TWIN PROCESSIONS.

Almost silently went the twin processions as they grouped themselves around and on the east steps of the capitol where Senator Morris Sheppard, of Texas, and Representative Richmond Pearson Hobson, of Alabama were waiting to receive them. The Anti-Saloon League men were led by Howard H. Russell, D. D., the founder of the League, and Dr. Purley Baker, general superintendent of the national organization. The women were led by Mrs. Lillian M. N. Stevens, of Portland, Maine, national president of the W. C. T. U.

As soon as the audience had assembled, Bishop Earl Cranston, of the Methodist Episcopel Church, pronounced the invocation, after which the audience joined in a mighty chorus, singing America.

Representative Hobson and Senator Sheppard received from Superintendent Baker, of the Anti-Saloon League, the resolution demanding a constitutional amendment for national prohibition which was later and on the same day, simultaneously introduced in both houses of congress. Senator Sheppard replied in behalf of himself and Representative Hobson.

THE MASS MEETING.

"There is no higher duty that we can conceive," said the Senator, "than to introduce in both houses of congress this resolution calling for nation-wide prohibition by constitutional amendment."

Addresses were then delivered by Earnest H. Cherrington, of Westerville, Ohio, the principal orator for the Anti-Saloon League; by former Governor M. R. Patterson, of Tennessee, byMrs. Stevens, national president of the W. C. T. U., by Mrs. Ella A. Boole, of Brooklyn, New York, state president of the W. C. T. U., by Mrs. Mary Harris Armor, of Georgia, and by Representative Richmond P. Hobson.

A mass meeting was held the same evening in the hall of The Daughters of the American Revolution, which was addressed among others by Congressman Kelly, of Pennsylvania, and Senator Borah, of Idaho. Senator Borah said that while the strike was on in Idaho, he made a thorough investigation of the labor situation and it was his deliberate conclusion that the solution of the liquor question was the solution of the labor problem.

DR. RUSSELL PRESIDES AT BREAKFAST.

On Thursday morning, about 500 gathered for breakfast at Rouschers, at which Dr. Howard H. Russell, founder of the League, presided as toast master. This was one of the enthusiastic meetings of the convention. It was addressed, among others, by Senator Ashhurst, Congressman Hobson, Senator Sheppard and Wesley Sprague, of New Zealand. Senator Sheppard said the national government was as much in the liquor business as though the senators and members of the house of representatives wore white aprons and were tending bar.

Dr. Clarence A. Vincent, president of the New England Congregational Club, said among other things, "The intellectual thought of the nation is leading us toward prohibition. Education and science of modern days are on our side and there is above all in our favor, the tendency of modern political life to take steps for the welfare of all people so that before many years, it will certainly be necessary for men in political life, if they wish to stay there, to destroy whatever is injurious to the people."

Judge McWhorter, of W. Virginia, told us the story of the fight in that state which resulted in the overwhelming routing of the liquor traffic by a vote of more than two to one. He said that the same method would bring the same result in every state, that he believed there was not a state in the union that would not destroy the liquor traffic if the same kind of educational and organization campaign was carried on as was carried on in West Virginia. He told of the terror that came over the politicians at the tremendous sweep of temperance sentiment over the state. He illustrated by the story of a politician who had been more or less successful in politics for twenty years. He came to the Judge and said, "Judge, what shall I do about this temperance question?" The Judge looked at him a moment and then said, "Do something you have never done in your life, be a man." The politician thoughtfully studied the situation and then replied, "By heck, I'll just try that."

SAM SMALL'S ADDRESS.

Rev. Sam Small, of Georgia, said that after the war, and while he was still a boy, he became intimately acquainted with Alexander H. Stevens, vice-president of the Southern Confederacy. One evening at a hotel in Washington he asked, "Mr. Stevens, when did the South first realize that they would have to resort to war?" Mr. Stevens reply was, "As long as slavery was simply discussed on the platform in lectures and speeches they felt safe, but when every prayer-meeting became a recruiting ground and every pulpit a parapet from which was hurled the force of religion against slavery, then they knew they must resort to the cannon."

At this breakfast, I think it was Senator Sheppard who said, "The benignant inactivity of the good is just now more detrimental to the cause than the malignant activity of the bad," and there is food for solid reflection in this statement on the part of our good brethren who think politics is so corrupt that they must stay out of it.

In the afternoon of Thursday, Congressman Hobson made a great address before the house of representatives. The galleries were packed with the visiting delegates. Members of the house gave as close attention as any temperance orator ever received, and frequently applauded the telling points in the speech. Among many fine things, Mr. Hobson dwelt upon this question in public life and as it affected public men. When he declared, "man has never begun to live until he stands for something he would be willing to die for," he received a round of applause from both house and galleries. He was also vigorously applauded when he said, "A man ought not to be in public life unless he would rather be defeated than to sacrifice his sense of right. The Democratic party was never founded to join hands with any interest for the debauchery of the people, and yet," he said, "a great Alabamian is reported in the daily press to have said, 'If the prohibition issue continues to be drawn into politics it will either grind the prohibition cause to dust, or it will destroy the Democratic party.' I take no second place in my loyalty and devotion to the Democratic party, but if to live, it must join hands with an institution which debauches and degrades the people, then in God's name, let it die."

It was hard to realize in its full significance after an age long contest, that King Alcohol was at last on trial for its life before the greatest legislative body in the world. That on the floor where so many questions in the past have been fought out, the people have forced the liqour traffic to the place, let us hope, of its last stand.

THE HEART OF CHRISTMAS.

TO THE QUESTION, "What does Christmas mean to you?" most people would answer, "A little child in a manger-cradle; a fir-tree laden with gifts; the spirit of good will; the gathering of loved ones in a family circle."

All of this is truly appropriate to the season, but it is not the heart of Christmas. It is only the symbolic and superficial side of the festal time.

Christmas is not the story of a babe in a manger. It takes form from that incident, but that is only its first suggestion. To be sure it is a very precious suggestion, for it carries the entire significance of the value of childhood, and the necessity that all the followers of the Christ should become as little children.

But the heart of Christmas is a greater truth than that.

It is the astonishing fact that God once, in time and place, individualized himself in a human life.

It is the solemn and compelling truth that one divine-human life has been lived on this planet of ours.

That the incarnation of God's life in terms of flesh and blood has been achieved.

The significance of that event can never be lost. The world is a different and diviner place since Christ was here.

The fact that God has lived in our human career shows that it is His will thus ever to disclose himself, and that all lives may become manifestations of Him in so far as they will permit.

The Incarnation is no isolated fact of human history. It is an increasing and glorious experience for the race.

The cradle of Jesus is not the shrine of worship, the object of pilgrimage and sacred wonder. It is the center of a new circle of divine forces, the spot from which have radiated the dynamics of a new world-order.

Bethlehem may well be called, "The House of Bread," for from it there went forth One who has become the Feeder of the Nations.

And the inspiriting vision of that Life, as capable of appropriation and achievement by all mankind is the Heart of Christmas.

DENOMINATIONAL PROGRESS.

THERE WAS RECENTLY held in this city a union gathering of several of the Christian bodies. As a part of the program statements were made by some one from each of the seven or eight communions represented. These statements were of exceeding interest. They were not platform utterances, but friendly and semi-confidential announcements of denominational progress. The most prominent note struck during the evening, and repeated constantly in nearly every one of the addresses was that of Christian unity, its desirability, its growing realization, and the signal benefits already realized from its partial attainment. The Methodists reported an increasing emphasis upon the broader phases of church work, and a recognition that too much effort has hitherto been given to the smaller details of church organization. In a precisely opposite form of statement Congregationalism was described as for the first time seeking to co-ordinate its different activities into a working unity by the adoption of a constitution in its recent Council at Kansas City, as the result of the labors of its Commission of Nineteen. Thus from opposite points these two great Christian bodies are approaching each other. The Presbyterians reported a new spirit of activity in such forms of service as the Brotherhood work and the Laymen's Missionary and Evangelistic movements and a distinct tendency toward a more liberal interpretation of credal statements. The representative of the Baptists commented with satisfaction upon the fact that whereas a few years since most Baptist churches in the north practiced close communion, now very few are left of that type and that the same spirit is beginning to manifest itself in reference to baptism. He did not believe that Baptist churches would ever practice infant baptism or affusion, but he was confident that the movement already apparent looking toward the reception of members from other denominations upon the usual credentials of Christian character would increasingly prevail. Further, he emphasized the great advance achieved by the Baptists in the organization of their Convention, by which, without loss of congregational liberty, their co-operative efficiency is greatly increased. Equally interesting statements were made by the representatives of the other Christian bodies present.

IN THE RANKS.

DR. R. W. DALE has a significant paragraph in his great book on the Atonement to the effect that the chief value of the life of Christ grows out of the Master's perception of the fact that he was implicated in the big human struggle for the attainment of life and character. He was in the ranks with his brethren. The great adventure of humanity in its search for a diviner life became his own, because he was made in the likeness of man. He succeeded or failed in his individual purpose as humanity achieved or missed its high calling.

That is a part and a very significant part of the Christmas message. The Son of God is not a solitary and transcendant being above the snow line of human experience and struggle. He is with us in the ranks. He cannot fail us, for that were to lose his own divine objective. To bring humanity up to God by the power of his contagious enthusiasm and spiritual sympathy is the high adventure of the centuries for him. It is the eternal campaign upon which he has started.

THE CHURCHES AND ORGANIZED LABOR.

IT IS ONE of the fortunate facts in connection with the denominational life of several of the great Christian bodies that they possess an interpretative voice and personality in the field of Social Service, and especially in the domain of labor. The Presbyterians have long enjoyed the admirable services of Mr. Charles Stelzle, and have but recently lost the apostle of labor and the organizer of the department of the Church and Labor of his denomination. The same service is being rendered the Methodists by Rev. Harry F. Ward, who has long been an earnest and trusted middleman in the conferences between his church and the laboring people. Prof. Graham Taylor, while not a graduate from the ranks of labor, has manifested so sympathetic a concern for all classes apparently beyond the boundaries of the church that his influence has shaped many of the efforts undertaken by Congregationalism toward a better feeling between the church and the unchurched, whether laborers or unfortunates. The Disciples need a specialist of this class. For a time it seemed probable that Mr. Arthur Holmes of Philadelphia would become our expert in that field. His experience and training seemed to fit him admirably for such an important work. But academic opportunities summoned him to a different vocation. His place has not yet been filled in our ranks. Yet such a place there is, and such a man is one of the needs of the hour.

INSPIRERS OF MEN.

A SIGNIFICANT COMMENT was made the other day upon a minister by a layman of experience and discrimination. He made clear his affection for his pastor and his appreciation alike of his ability as a preacher and as a noble Christian man. At the same time he added: "He does not make it easier for us to pray."

This was both a tribute and a criticism. There are some ministers who so lose themselves in the mechanics of sermon building, of pastoral work and of administration that they cease even to be religious, or to have a religious message. They inspire no one with the reality of God.

Others there are, of nobler kind, who are religious and bear with them the air of the spiritual life, but who fail to impart to even the most eager of their people the great secret of the Inner Way. They seem to be prayerful, but they do not make it easier for others to pray.

Some there are, a glorious few, who consciously and evidently live the life of the Spirit, and inspire their people such as crave the aid to the attainment of the holy life.

Blessed are they who have seen the vision and can make it known. Blessed are the people who wait upon the ministry, who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.

THE LUTHER ANNIVERSARY.

THE LUTHERAN CHURCH throughout the world, comprising many branches and a host of members, is preparing to lead in the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of Martin Luther's life, in 1917. This will be an event of deep interest to all Protestantism. The monk, Martin, who so greatly disturbed the Roman Catholic ecclesiastics in Germany, has become the world's Luther. He was not the first of the reformers. The morning stars of the Reformation shone in the sky before dawn. Wycliffe, Savonarola and Huss anticipated the breaking of the day. But Martin Luther was the one man of his age who had strength of conviction combined with courage and endurance to fight the forces of the Roman hierarchy. His simple German mind was shocked at the levity and looseness of ecclesiastical conduct in Rome. The witty saying of the Pope, "What profit has not this fable of the Christ brought us?" was to him an unthinkable blasphemy. He came back to Germany from his Roman mission prepared to throw himself with unreserved enthusiasm into a campaign for the reform of the church. Four centuries have passed and the entire church, including even the Roman Catholic section, has become the beneficiary of his courageous adventure. The quadrennial will be celebrated throughout the Protestant world.

IMPORTANT MEETING IN NEW YORK.

THE committee on reference and council of the Foreign Missions Conference of the Presbyterian Church, has called for January, 1914, another general conference of missionary leaders like to the conference on China held in January, 1912, and the conference on Latin America which it held in January, 1913. The meetings will be held in the Presbyterian Building, New York City. For 1914 the topic for consideration will be co-operation and promotion of unity in foreign mission work. The first meeting will be held Monday morning, January 12. The sessions will continue until 5 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. Addresses will cover in succession four divisions of the general topic—survey of present conditions, limitations and difficulties, international aspects and unifying influences. The addresses Monday evening on international aspects will be delivered by Professor Warneck, of Germany, and John R. Mott. Mr. Mott will explain the work of the Continuation Committee.

PLANNING FOR CO-OPERATION.

PLANS for greater co-operation in efforts to secure social service legislation and in carrying on social service work by the Protestant denominations represented in the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America were discussed by the executive committee of the council, which held a two-days' meeting at Baltimore, Dec. 3. At a mass meeting the principal speakers were Dean Shailer Mathews of Chicago University, president of the Federal Council, and Bishop W. F. McDowell, of Evanston, Ill.

WANTED—ORATORY!

INTRODUCING an article on John Bright, English statesman, "The Continent" makes an appeal for a return of the oratory of the old days in preaching.

There is a widespread feeling, says this paper, that the power of the modern pulpit is being endangered by the pressure on our ministers to become administrators and factors in all sorts of reform movements. When a minister was installed in a new church and announced that he was not a "reformer" but simply a preacher of the gospel, he was quite taken to task in public and private as being untrue to his great commission from Christ. But most of us will be sympathetic with his obvious meaning. It is a good time to lay renewed stress on the value of great preaching—something that shall correspond in our day to the great oratory of an earlier day.

DEMOCRATIC CONVENTIONS.

CONTINUED CONFUSION.

ITS EARNEST DESIRE to conciliate opposition betrayed the General Convention held in Toronto last October into passing a resolution which puts the Convention in an ambiguous position in the eyes of the brotherhood. A form of organization based upon representation of the churches as churches was adopted with practical unanimity. The explicit intention and only conceivable purpose of such an organization was to bring our general missionary, benevolent and other inter-congregational activities into the direct control of the churches.

But the Convention, prompted by an opponent of the new order, allowed itself to declare that it intended to exercise only "advisory authority" over the missionary and benevolent societies of the brotherhood.

This declaration was not debated save by two or three elderly men whose gray hairs and the fact that they represented the opposing minority won them the indulgence of the chairman. The Convention was in a mood to pass anything, without careful examination, provided it looked in the direction of peace. But this is always a costly mood for a deliberative assembly to fall into. The best way to peace is to talk things out, frankly, in open meeting.

No provision was made at Toronto for a full and adequate debate.

As a consequence of this soft acquiescence in an unconsidered declaration the status of the new Convention is thrown into confusion, and the wretched discussion of the past several years still continues, and promises to continue until the Atlanta Convention makes a clear-cut pronouncement of its function and status.

It is reported that Doctor Garrison who, on behalf of the committee, read the revised resolution (the original draft of which had been offered by Rev. Chalmers McPherson), withstood the other five members of the committee for two long sittings in an endeavor to delete or to revise the words limiting the authority of the Convention over the societies. In the interest of harmony Doctor Garrison is said to have refused to submit a minority report embodying his own views.

Perhaps this course was the best under the circumstances. There would have been no time to debate the matter on its merits. The august body representing the churches of Christ was made ridiculous by having to scurry around to find an odd hour between the sessions of the societies at which it could hold a session of its own to hear this committee's report. The session was held under high pressure for lack of time. It was inevitable that even had Doctor Garrison brought in a minority report the majority report would have been carried by the sheer weight of the five to one vote with which it came recommended from the committee, quite irrespective of the merits of the case.

But there is not the slightest doubt in the minds of those who have followed the development of events that with a fair debate the Convention would have gone five to one for Doctor Garrison's minority resolution.

The reason is this:

The General Convention idea is, and has all along been, the expression of the widespread feeling that our missionary societies ought to be co-ordinated and unified under the control of the churches as churches.

And the only plan by which the churches can control their societies is through a representative Convention.

It is an affront to the churches for their Convention to be put in a position where there is any question as to the unqualified subordination of the societies to it.

AT THE END OF THE DAY

EDITOR THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY:

HOW GLAD the world is these Christmas days! There is on all hands such an evident increase of good cheer, of kindness, of common courtesy. One notes it on the streets of the city, in the cars, as well as in the home and the church. People seem less engrossed in their selfishness. Men accustomed the rest of the year to keep their seats while women stand in the street car seem to take a new point of view of the matter at this season and exhibit a little old-fashioned chivalry. As I was getting off the car this morning a poorly-clad woman with a big bundle was frantically hurrying to catch that particular car. The conductor left the door open and stepped half-way across the street to help her and her bundle on board. I never saw a conductor do that before.

Kindliness is in the air. There is a revival of courtesy and graciousness. The tones of our voices are softer. Our tempers are not so easily aroused. Love is abounding everywhere. How happy would this world be if the love-spirit of Christmas could be sustained throughout the year! Problems would be solved. Burdens would be lifted. Inequalities and injustices would be relieved. The Kingdom which the Christ-child was to bear upon his shoulders would be already fully come.

His Kingdom is coming, more rapidly coming than some of us doubters realize. Many of the economic dogmas on which selfishness has so long rested are being broken down. Business men are recognizing their stewardship. The nations are taking more seriously than ever the ideals of peace. Lawmakers are turning their attention to childhood and womanhood and the great problems of human life instead of regarding in the abstract the problems of industry and social economy as they used to do. Christ is answering the call of this world's need. He is building for us a new world.

MY reflections, however, take me in a different direction. I find myself dwelling upon the fact that Jesus is not alone THE Christ, the answer to all the social longings of Israel and the world, but MY Christ, the answer to all the longings and hopes of my individual soul. He is the great fulfiller of prophecy. He fulfills the prophecies of the Old Testament, but he also fulfills the prophecies of my moral nature. Is there not a prophet in each one of us? Who is there of us but hears idealistic voices in his own soul, stirring through his inner experience, and urging upon him, ever so vaguely perhaps, the suggestion of a spiritual life to which he has not yet attained. It is these inner suggestions which bear witness for God even among the heathen where Christ is not known.

These prophetic voices in us prepare the way for Christ's coming. He could not enter our lives had we not been prepared by these intuitions, these vision glimpses, these vague, uncertain hopes, any more than he could have come to Israel without the heart of the nation having been first prepared by Jeremiah and Micah and Ezekiel and Isaiah.

HERE, first of all, is our longing for a spiritual God. Our hearts are not wholly ignorant of Christ's revelation even before he comes to us. There is in the human soul a thirst for God like that which drives the hart to the water brooks. Blurred images of him flit through our minds. We cannot pass through the searching, turbulent experiences of life without at least the wish for God finding a voice within us. Job knew that his Vindicator lived, though he could not find Him.

Even our reason, that stiff crutch by which lame faith is sometimes helped and sometimes hindered—even reason makes out a certain kind of case for God without the help of a Saviour.

But when Jesus is born in our experience, all these outreachings of our hearts for God are satisfied. The questions of our hearts are answered in him. He is reason's Reason. The uncertain outline of God's being takes on definiteness in his presence. God must be like Jesus, our hearts declare. To see Him is to see the Father.

Thus Jesus becomes the Christ to me—he comes MY Christ when he passes out of a past history into the actual meanings of my life and stands to me for God.

OR, here is this quest of our hearts for happiness. Instinctively we feel that we were made for joy. When the voice of pessimism whispers to us saying that all is vanity, there surges up a prophet's voice within us declaring that the world must be good, that there must be satisfaction, that life is worth while, that the untoward is not basic nor final, but that goodness and justice are basic and final.

Man is incurably hopeful. The disillusionized are the rare exceptions. Human nature is thus prophetic; it faces the future; it expects the better day; it looks for the coming of the Lord. And when he comes, this human nature recognizes him as the answer to its craving for happiness. Every soul to whom he has truly come has found joy in him and his way of living.

He makes us see that our real happiness lies not in our circumstances or our possessions or our star, but in ourselves. He shows us the joy of losing our lives in the loving service of others and finding it again in companionship with God. And as Jesus gave Israel so much more than their vague prophesies called for so he more than fills the prophesies of our inner nature. We call for happiness; and he gives us blessedness—a peace that passeth understanding.

SO also these prophets of the soul speak of immortality.

The hope of immortality is irrepressible. No tenable proof of another world has ever been devised. A "scientific demonstration" is as remote as ever. Yet we hope with quenchless expectation. These foregleams of the life to come find fulfillment and reassurance in Jesus. He is the best answer to our questioning hearts. As he comes, all these prophetic yearnings run out to meet him. He matches them with his own faith, the faith by which he lived the eternal life in our world of time.

And not by his own faith alone, but by his own character also, he completes and fulfills our hopes of the immortal life. Can it be, our souls ask, that we live in a universe which produces such a soul as Jesus, and straightway, in three and thirty years, destroys it? Our inescapable answer is that he still lives. And if he, then also others whom he takes to be with him and to behold his glory.

At this birth-time of our lord may our hearts—humble and poor as Bethlehem's inn though they be—may our hearts be open to receive him, the Christ of Israel. So may he be your Christ and my Christ, too.

HUGH MACDONALD.

TREASURES OF THE CHRISTMAS TIME By Herbert L. Willett

Tradition affirms that the ancient Egyptians were wont to garland their homes with palm branches at the winter solstice, as a token of joy and hope. Christianity has transferred the custom from lands of palm to those of pines and makes it a part of the Christmas celebration. The Jews held the Feast of Lights in the winter, and set candles burning in the Temple and in all their houses as the little Light-Bearers of good will. And Christianity has taken over the glad form and symbolism of the time, and added them to its Christmas festivities. The Scandinavians burned the Yule Log at the December feast of the Triumphant Sun, and Christianity has made Yuletide its own in its observance of Christmas. And thus on every side our Holy Faith has accepted the best customs and hopes of all the nations. But it has reserved the right to lift them to higher levels, and restore them to their first possessors inspired with a new and loftier meaning. The Christian time is more than a home festival, or a feast of lights or a blazing hearth. It is the symbol of discovered and enriched Childhood, of a wider and deeper spirit of Neighborliness and Good Will, of Peace among all the nations of the earth, and of a Divine Life, once lived among men, and now to be lived afresh by all.

Chicago Preachers Compare Notes.

At a recent meeting of the Chicago Church Federation Council, some of the leading preachers of Chicago were asked to discuss, "The Dominant Note in My Preaching." Among those taking part in the discussion were: Dr. H. L. Willett, Disciple; Dr. W. T. McElveen, Congregationalist; Dr. M. P. Boynton, Baptist; Dr. C. B. Mitchell, Methodist. The Congregationalist sums up the point of view of each of these leaders, as follows:

Doctor Willett held that no preacher really has more than one great thing to say throughout all his preaching, believing that his own first duty was to interpret the character of God. In contrast with the unified and concentrated viewpoint of the Disciple leader was that of our own representative. Doctor McElveen is impressed with the many-sided gospel, a ministry to body, mind and soul, an objective expressed in Paul's favorite word, "riches." He therefore confessed his own dominant note to be reconciliation. As Doctor Boynton proceeded for the Baptists the listener passed to another contrast, from the decidedly Pauline Christianity of the suburban pastor to the advanced Christian Christianity of the down-town preacher. The Baptist minister saw his duty to teach Christ as the normal man, the type best fitted to face the conditions of life. And then we swung back with the pendulum again as Doctor Mitchell, the Methodist spokesman and scion of a family whose fathers and grandfathers and uncles and brothers were all Methodist preachers, came out fervently for the good, old-fashioned doctrines of individual redemption. To him the church is the greatest thing in the world, and he is pained to see ministers "getting to be better qualified to be managers of department stores than to be ministers of Christ." He divided the preachers of today into the sheep and the goats, the ones with an office and the ones with a study.

The Congregationalist concludes that while these points of view appear quite different, probably they should all enter into the preaching of today.

Presbyterian Churches Planning Unity.

The Presbyterian church in the United States and the Reformed church in the United States, known as the German Reformed church, are talking plans for unification. The question of union will be brought before the presbyteries this year for an expression of opinion. A Presbyterian journal thus discusses the prospects for unity:

"It must be frankly acknowledged that this union suggestion has not as yet awakened more than a passing ripple of discussion among Presbyterians. There can't, indeed, be much discussion aroused where the proposition in hand is so self-evidently excellent that not even a man of straw can be constructed on the opposite side for advocates of the idea to demolish. There is not even a dreamable reason why Presbyterians should not want to enter into fellowship with 300,000 of the finest people in the country—nearly all of German extraction, but now as thoroughly American as any scion of Jamestown or Plymouth dares be. These Reformed brothers and sisters are all so orthodox that not the most rigid conservatives can fear them, and all so genial that not the most touchy liberal can doubt getting on amiably with them. Moreover, the plan of union as drawn provides for such gradual amalgamation that everybody will have time to get used to new relations before they are compacted into rigid organizational bonds. It is a very wise union scheme in this regard which the committees of conferences have submitted—worthy of all the heartier endorsement because it is stamped in so many places with the wisdom of making haste slowly.

"Besides acquiring so many new comrades in church life, Presbyterians will profit from the union by getting a new coordinate standard for prospective ministers to subscribe to when they join presbytery. It is provided that the conjoined church may use the Reformed creed, expressed in the Heidelberg Catechism, as equivalent in value to the Westminster Confession. In practice it will doubtless prove the more acceptable. * * * So the Reformed friends will be extra welcome because they bring with them that catechism of theirs."

Great Man Makes Great Statement.

Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, who is now in this country and who has won the admiration of the world by his self-sacrificing labors as a missionary in bleak Labrador, is being exploited by The Congregationalist. Beginning a series of human interest papers in this weekly, Doctor Grenfell makes the following simple and commonsense statement of the faith within him:

That all human life, and mine in particular, can have a high purpose and a glorious future is with me an axiom. I have no message for any man who insists that life is purposeless and fruitless, though I would certainly agree that it is fruitless if purposeless and purposeless if fruitless. That we want to win whatever prize our life makes possible is a corollary; and that there is a way to win it is another. I look upon myself simply as a wayfarer quite capable of losing the way, as I have often done in our arctic snowfields and among these impenetrable fogs. I am absolutely convinced that to follow Christ is the best way, and that if that way does not attract every one to it the fault is ours, who claim to be trying to walk it. In other words, to follow Christ is the most profitable and commonsense thing for us to try to do. I am certain that if it were rightly represented, his work and way have met with such success already, and mankind has been so altered by his influence that his way would make an attractive, natural and effective appeal, whereas now many men are indifferent or averse to it.

Dix Memorial Chapel Consecrated.

The chapel of All Saints, erected by the New York Episcopalians as a memorial to Dr. Morgan Dix, late rector of Trinity parish, was consecrated on November 30, by Bishop Greer, assisted by Doctor Manning, the rector, and many of the clergy and lay officers of the parish. The new chapel seats but ninety-four persons, and the congregation was necessarily limited to those who have been long associated with the parish and who were intimate acquaintances of Doctor Dix.

Is the Church Losing Ground?

Assistant Superintendent Philip Yarrow, of the Chicago City Missionary Society, says it is, according to the report of a speech recently made by him in an Evanston church. One of our most substantial exchanges believes that, considering Mr. Yarrow's experience, his opinion should be given weight. This publication holds that the religious reform that will most effectively check this decline of the church's influence, is the reform of actual church federation and unity. This will bring economy, and economy will bring greater prosperity.

What Prevents Christian Unity?

This is the question asked by the United Presbyterian of a recent issue. The question, moreover, is answered. We quote:

Everybody believes in Christian unity, at least until the question comes too close and becomes too personal. No one doubts, as an abstract statement at least, that believers in God and in Jesus Christ His Son, and in the Holy Spirit and the Holy Book and the Holy life, and in the New Commandment which is the Law of Love, ought to form one body in Christ Jesus. No one doubts that this was the unity for which Jesus prayer, or that this manifest Christian unity is the desire of His heart today. Every one admits that it would be desirable and beautiful, and that in the sight of the world it would serve the purpose that Jesus intended and desired that it should serve: "I in them, and Thou in Me, that they may be perfected into one, that the world may know that Thou didst send Me and lovedest them, even as Thou lovedest Me." Every Christian realizes that he ought to pray for Christian union, although there are many who do not pray for it, at least with any real burning desire in their hearts.

The editorial concludes with the following paragraph:

We are persuaded that two of the greatest hindrances to church unity are indifference and suspicion. These ought to be overcome by prayer and by keeping our faces steadfastly turned in the direction of that for which Jesus longs and waits. The plea is often made that ample time should be taken for careful consideration. Well and good—if the time be so spent. But unless we are honestly trying to arrive at Christian unity, are we not really wasting time.

Methodists Mourn Prominent Benefactor.

"A simple-hearted Christian, worshiping God without hypocrisy, and serving his fellows without arrogance." Thus is described by one of the Methodist weeklies, William Deering, known especially for his inventions in reaping machinery. Mr. Deering's gifts to Northwestern University, to general evangelistic work, to the Chicago City Missionary Society, and to the Lake Bluff Orphanage, are all remembered with appreciation by Christians in all brotherhoods.

It may be added as a footnote that it is a regrettable fact that Mr. Deering's will of several millions left nothing to charity.

Of Human Interest

Mark Twain and King Edward, Cronies.

Rev. Joseph Twichell, Congregational pastor at Hartford, Conn., sometimes called "The grand old man of the Congregational Church," was a bosom friend of Mark Twain to the day of his death. He has recently told, for The Continent, some stories of "Mark." Here is one:

"It was at Baden Baden. I forget how long ago. But we were young men in those days. We were taking a walk through the crowded streets, Clemens edging his way along and I following him.

"As we made our way across a small square we were confronted by a soldierly-looking person, erect and dignified, uniformed and gold-braided.

"'Am I addressing Mr. Samuel Clemens, the American author?'

"I replied that my companion was Mr. Clemens, somewhat surprised that anyone so far from home should know my friend as 'Clemens,' rather than as 'Mark Twain.' The officer gave a military salute and said, 'His royal highness the prince of Wales, who is visiting Baden Baden, has seen and recognized Mr. Clemens. He presents his compliments and asks that you do him the favor of speaking with him.'

"Clemens signified his willingness to go at once, and the officer led the way. We were presented, with due regard to ceremony, even there in the street, to the future Edward VII, king of Great Britain.

"The prince was a handsome, courteous man with a most cultured voice. He was most dignified and soldierly in his bearing. He and Clemens were soon conversing freely, walking side by side, while the attendants of the prince and Sam's friend followed. I should judge the prince was a man who never permitted any kind of familiarity; he was born to the purple and he knew how to wear it; he was a princely prince, but more than once his royal highness shook with dignified laughter.

"It was a sight," continued Mr. Twichell, laughing reminiscently, "to see those two men walking together."

Here "Sam's friend" got up to show his callers how the two men walked.

"The prince of Wales," he said, "was dignity personified. He walked as though he owned the earth and didn't care who knew it."

President Cleveland's "Strange Wish."

The first time I was ever in the White House," said the Hon. Franklin Roosevelt, assistant secretary of the navy, "was when I was a small chap of five, and my father took me to call upon President Cleveland during his first administration. Of course, the visit was most informal; my father and the President were old, familiar friends, and I was not duly impressed with the significance of the call until the President put his hand upon my head and said something I have never forgotten:

"'I am making a strange wish for you, little man,' he said—' a wish I suppose that no one else would make—but I wish for you that you may never be the President of the United States!'"

It was a strange wish, yet characteristic of the man, apparently without enthusiasm, the man who never followed an impulse, but studied even his sports of hunting and fishing with scientific accuracy and as seriously as he studied finance and law and the government for the people.

"He was such a hard worker," Mr. Roosevelt continued; "he did everything in longhand and delegated to no one any important part of the labor simply to divide the burden. He worked early and far into the night, and I suppose his idea was to wish for me something easier."

"As, for instance, the assistant secretaryship of the navy?"

Mr. Roosevelt threw back his head and laughed.

"Well, it's tremendously interesting," he said, "and there is much to do, but it's great fun."

And the enthusiastic manner and quick, short way in which he said, "it's gr-eat fun" suggested unmistakably a certain historical character of the same name.

How Doctor Abbott Keeps Young.

Dr. Lyman J. Abbott, editor of the Outlook, is going to write his reminiscences. In a letter to his colleagues concerning this project he discloses what may be, in part, the secret of the youthful spirit which marks this fine old veteran in the campaign for human freedom and human welfare.

"I have never kept a journal or even a diary," he writes, "nor have I kept copies of my letters, nor systematically and regularly the letters written to me. I have always been more interested in what I hoped to do or say tomorrow than in what I did or said yesterday.

It is this detachment from the past, declares a Chicago paper, this living in the moment, with eyes toward the future, that has made Doctor Abbott, through his many years of life, always the vigorous, fresh-thinking contemporary of events and movements. There is magic to avert the paralysis of intellectual and spiritual old age in this attitude; not that the value of the past is to be under-estimated, but that rightly appreciating its enrichment we should carry forward the treasure it has bestowed rather than rest in its contemplation.

John P. Mitchel, Mayor at Thirty-three.

John Purroy Mitchel, a young man and an earnest; a demon for detail, obsessed of figures, saturated of statistics; cold, they say, and suspicious—as he has a right to be, and so has any potential mayor of New York, or mayor either; fired with zeal and patriotism, as pronounced by his friends. This is the Saturday Evening Post's description of New York's new mayor. "Behind a winning smile," says one of his protagonists, "he is the possessor of an unusually analytic mind"—which is an odd place for an analytical mind to lurk, but probably it is all right in his case; and also, we are informed, "he hides the iron hand in the velvet glove," which gives us comfort—for so many New York officials hide the iron head in the velours hat.

His father, John Mitchel, was a fire commissioner in New York; and his uncle, Henry D. Purroy, was a county clerk and a fire commissioner also, and a sturdy citizen. Thus John Purroy Mitchel was raised in a municipal atmosphere, tinctured by politics; and after leaving school he was made special assistant corporation counsel, to conduct an investigation into the office of a borough president when McClellan was mayor.

Presently he was shifted to be commissioner of accounts and from that vantage-point went at his investigations, and pursued them so zealously and so skilfully and so unswervingly that three borough presidents were removed and many changes made in system and procedure. In 1909 he was elected, on a fusion ticket, president of the Board of Aldermen, where he remained until President Wilson made him collector of the port of New York. Then came his fusion nomination for mayor and his election, which, as has been shown, was simultaneous with his discovery of his star of destiny; for if he had been defeated it is unlikely there would have been this addition to the political heavens.

Marshall on "Automatic Citizens."

There are those who obey the law through fear of its penalties—men who deal squarely because their lawyers tell them that they will lose money, and perhaps their liberty, if they do not. These constitute the lowest grade of citizenship. There are those who obey the law because it is the law; they have no respect for it; they regard it as crude, foolish, immaterial legislation, but their respect for constituted authority induces them to keep the letter of the law regardless of their opinion of the spirit of it. These constitute an improved class of citizens. But the citizens of the third and highest grade are the men who make for righteousness. They are the salt of the Republic. These, I am pleased to call automatic citizens. They are men who realize that with the right of individual success in America has come the duty of individual responsibility; that they may 'go the limit' in the way of success, but that they must not injure their fellowmen.

From Near and Far

A "father and son" movement is to be inaugurated in Cleveland. The object is to promote a closer understanding and a spirit of comradeship between fathers and their sons. Robert E. Lewis, secretary of the Cleveland Young Men's Christian Association, has issued a call for a meeting at which plans for the movement will be arranged. He will have the assistance of Mayor Newton D. Baker and other leading citizens. The various aims of the movements are: To help fathers and sons to understand each other; to interest fathers in the outside influences their sons meet so that they can help them to avoid evils; to break down the barriers that often exist between fathers and sons; to make fathers understand that they must go outside the home to best bring their ideas to bear upon their boys' minds.

Winston Churchill's next novel will be a novel of life in Chicago's streets. He hopes that it will be a truly great novel, perhaps the great American novel so long expected. At any rate, he is coming soon to gather the materials and try what he can do with them. Mr. Churchill spent a day in Chicago last week.

Dr. Maria Montessori, Italian educator, whose method of instructing very young children has attracted world-wide attention, has been in Chicago for a week. She is on her tour for study of American public school methods.

Governor Ferris, of Michigan, declares himself for prohibition, but against the state-wide plan.

MODERN WOMANHOOD

Conducted by
Mrs. Ida Withers Harrison

ECHOES FROM THE NATIONAL SUFFRAGE CONVENTION.

One of the most stirring hours at the recent suffrage convention at Washington, was when the great audience listened to the words of three working women—Mary Anderson, of the National Woman's Trade Union, Margaret Hinchey, laundry worker, and Rose Winslow, weaver. They were introduced by the president, Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, and sat on the platform with Jane Addams, the members of the Official Board, and many leading suffragists.

The introduction of these working women as speakers at a National Convention, emphasized the new note that is being struck today for the enfranchisement of woman—and that is, the persuasive plea to right the wrongs of women and children who are suffering from the changes that this period of adjustment to new conditions has brought about.

Now, for the first time in these great annual gatherings, the working women have come forward to speak for themselves. They gave personal testimony of wrongs and hardships from which they have suffered. Here is part of the address of Margaret Hinchey, laundry woman of New York:

"When we went to Albany to ask for votes, one member of the Legislature told us that a woman's place was at home. Another said he had too much respect and admiration for women to see them at the polls. Another went back to ancient Rome and told a story about Cornelia and her jewels—her children. Yet in the laundries women were working seventeen and eighteen hours a day, standing over heavy machines, for $3 and $3.50 a week. When you get home at night you are too worn out to do anything but drop down and sleep, like an animal. This was 'the home' that the laundry women had to enjoy, until we went on a strike and got the State Board of Arbitration to come in there.

"Six dollars a week is the average wage of working women in the United States. How can a woman live an honorable life on such a sum? Is it any wonder that so many of our little sisters are in the gutter? And when we strike for more pay, we are clubbed by the police, and by thugs hired by our employers, and in court our word is not taken, and we are sent to prison. That is the respect and admiration shown to working girls in practice.

"Now I want to give you an explanation of Cornelia, as we find her case today. The agent of the Child Labor Society made an investigation in the tenements, and he found a mother with her small children sitting and standing around her—standing when they were too small to see the top of the table otherwise. They were working by a kerosene lamp, and breathing its odor; and they were all making artificial forget-me-nots; It takes 1,620 pieces of material to make a gross of forget-me-nots; and the profit is only a few cents. When we see such things, we ask, 'Did all the manhood of America die with Abraham Lincoln?' He did not think only about himself, but about the whole people.

"Four years ago we had thirty thousand shirt waist girls who went on strike; and went we went to the mayor to ask permission for them to have a parade, Mayor McClellan said, 'Thirty thousand women are of no account to me.' If they had been thirty thousand men with votes, would he have said that? We have fourteen thousand women over sixty-five years old who must work or starve. What do you do with them when their bones give out and they cannot work any more? The police gather them up, and you may see those women in jail, scrubbing hard, rough concreted floors that make their knees bleed—women who have committed no crime, but being old and poor. Don't take my word for it, but send a committee to Blackwell's Island or the Tombs, and see for yourselves. We have a few Old Ladies' Homes, but with most of them it would take a piece of red tape as long as from here to New York to get in. Give us a square deal, so that we may take care of ourselves—and also help take care of you!"

THE SOUTHERN WOMAN SPEAKS.

A bright feature in the Convention was the large number of young southern women who were present. No speech was more applauded than that of Mrs. Patty Ruffner Jacobs, president of Alabama, who made the response to the addresses of welcome to the Convention. She said in part:

"It is a special pleasure to me to respond, being a southern suffragist, and so a living refutation of the charge that has been made in no less a place than the halls of Congress that 'the womanhood of the South does not want suffrage.' It is an indictment of the Southern woman's intelligence, which I resent. Nor is my position unique, original or lonely—there are thousands of us.

"The women of Virginia, Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Florida, North Carolina, Alabama—in fact, in all the southern states—are stirring, are realizing that the vote is the only honorable, dignified and sure means of securing recognition of their aspirations and of their needs. They are not bound together by social tie, economic interest, political affiliation or creed, yet they understand that coherence and oneness in nature and relations which makes life sweet and sane.

"It is a wonderful thing to have convictions so strong that you must stand up and be counted; you must go out and do battle for them. It is a privilege to be born, to live in such soul-stirring times; to understand that communion of interests, that mutual responsibility which the solidarity of the woman suffrage movement indicates. I recall hearing Miss Mary Johnston speak of the significance of the fact that no word in the English language has exactly the same meaning and use for women as the word 'fraternal' has for men, the inference being there has never been occasion to use it, or it would have been supplied.

"Today we need that word, and here in Washington, where they coin so many useful and necessary things—money, laws and excuses (sometimes)—may we not coin it in fact, as we have in spirit?

"For forty-five years advocates of woman suffrage have been coming to this, the capital city; nine National Suffrage Conventions have been held here, this being the tenth. Each time we have met with a warmer welcome—for so runs the history of the suffrage movement. We have come in ever-increasing numbers, from the small handful of courageous pioneers, until now this great throng is hospitably received. And while we are grateful for the spirit in which Washington entertains us, we know it will not be necessary for us to come back to you another forty-five years, though we are ready and willing to do it if need be."

Young women from other southern states pervaded the Convention, with bright faces and bright minds. People must soon give up calling the South the stronghold of conservatism on the woman question.

DR. MARIA MONTISSORI.

This distinguished educator was in Washington while the Convention was in session, and was the center of much attention. She announced that she was a suffragist almost as soon as she landed in the city and said, "Until women have the ballot, they are practically outlaws."

Three years ago, no one in our land knew of this remarkable woman's existence; and now, we hardly know of her except as the exponent of her new system of training for little children; translations of her books, "The Montissori Method," and "Pedagogical Anthropology," are now being studied by educators everywhere. She aims to develop the activities of the child through the training of the senses—not as an end in itself, but as the foundation of future knowledge. One of her dominant notes is freedom of choice and action so as to develop the personality of the little one.

But Doctor Montissori is not only the friend and educator of little children, she has been a pioneer and champion of women in Italy. More than twenty years ago she paved the way for women doctors in her land, and was the first woman to receive a doctor's degree there. She has played a great part in the foremost movement in Europe, and has always been a defender of the rights of working women. She announced herself at a Woman's Congress in Germany several years ago, "As a representative of all Italian women—above all, of the working women."

The program of her courageous and useful life so far has been:

"First, fair play for women; then fair play for the worker; and, finally, fair play for the child."

For her work now has entered and crystallized on the child, because she has grown into the belief, that in childhood we have the unpolluted source from which the democracy of the future must rise, and the perennial opportunity for the uplift of the race.

MATERNITY.

Within the crib that stands beside my bed
A little form in sweet abandon lies,
And as I bend above, with misty eyes,
I know how Mary's heart was comforted.

O World of Mothers! Blest are we who know
The ecstasy—the deep, God-given thrill—
That Mary felt, when all the earth was still,
In the Judean starlight, long ago.

Disciples Table Talk

Sunday-school Revival Brings Results.

George Darsie, pastor at Central, Terre Haute, believes in growing the church from the Sunday-school. The good results in the recent meeting held in his church—sixty by confession of faith and twenty-three by letter and statement, Mr. Darsie attributes to the revival the Sunday-school has been enjoying since last January. Hundreds of new members have been enrolled in the school. Decision services have been held, with the result that many of these have been won for Christ. Prof. F. B. Hagaman, with a class of twenty-eight Intermediate boys, saw ten of them accept Christ. The invitation was extended in the Men's class at the Orpheum Theater, which is taught by the pastor, and a number of the men responded. A great audience was present on the last night of the meeting, when six young men and women made the good confession and one came into the church from the Baptist Fellowship. There were thirty added at the closing day's services. Two such services as this will be held each year. The next one will be during the week preceding Easter. Mr. Darsie preached during the recent series and was assisted by Jack Lewis, leader of song.

Waverly, Ill., Churches Practice Unity.

E. C. Lucas, minister at Waverly, Ill., reports that during the past two weeks his congregation has dismissed the evening services in order that his people might assist in a special effort being made by the Baptist fellowship at Waverly. In February this compliment will be returned. December 14 was a record breaker for the Waverly Sunday-school. The largest attendance in five years is reported. At a crowded morning preaching service four came forward to unite with the church. This is the result of no special effort, the pastor reports.

Carnegie Gives Church Pipe Organ.

E. N. Duty, pastor at Charleroi, Pa., enthusiastically announces that Andrew Carnegie has made an offer to present the Charleroi congregation with $1,000 as half-purchase price on a new organ if the church will raise another thousand to complete the $2,000. The Charleroi people have already raised half of this required thousand. A series of sane evangelistic services have just been closed in Charleroi with C. M. Smail of the Beaver Falls, Pa. church, preaching. But six nights of good weather were granted, but twenty-three are reported added to the membership. Mr. Duty will hold an exchange meeting for Mr. Smail the first week of February.

Joplin, Mo., Pastor Discusses Resignation.

G. J. Chapman, recently resigned at Joplin, Mo., writes, touching his resignation:

"After more than three years of hard and successful labor, I have resigned the pastorate of First Church, Joplin, said resignation to take effect the second Sunday in January, 1914. The co-operation has been most unanimous and the Christian fellowship most pleasant and delightful. The Lord has not failed in adding His blessing in many ways. The members here say we have accomplished many wonderful things in this difficult field of peculiar needs. All are happy and hopeful of great things. The pastor resigned a short time since, but the officiary of the church unanimously refused to accept his resignation. My future is not determined.

A Unique Work for Children.

Mrs. Maude McClave Brown, wife of Earl B. Brown, pastor of the church at Beaver, Pa., is performing a disinterested service for the children of the community. She invites all children of the town regardless of church connection to a story hour once a week. The best classic stories of literature are told to them with the hope of stimulating their interest in good literature and the habit of using the small public library. The children respond surprisingly well, about sixty coming for the story hour. The council has offered the use of a room in the Municipal Hall for this work.

W. C. Hull at Memorial Church, Chicago.

Rev. William C. Hull, recently of Pasadena, Cal., last week delivered a lecture at the Memorial Church of Christ in this city on "Browning, the Poet of the Soul." It was an intellectual and religious inspiration to those who heard it. Incisive in its analysis of Browning's character and purpose, classic in its literary form, and so laden with the actual words of the poet as both to present and interpret his message, it was such an address as stimulated to the study of the best literature and affords helpful hints regarding a method. But most of all it was the source of unusual pleasure to all who listened. Any church or society that can secure Mr. Hull to give this or others of his lectures may count upon the complete satisfaction of their audience.

Frank W. Allen, Preacher and Writer.

Unique Offer to Montana Church.

One thousand dollars in cash is to be the reward of First Church, Billings, Mont., which is planning to build a new home, for six months' active endeavor in church work. Friends of the church, it is announced, have offered to bestow that amount upon the organization, not for raising a like amount, but for doing real development work, along lines the friends believe all churches should engage in. The names of the friends are being kept secret by D. S. Robinson, pastor of the church, but it is believed they are business men of Billings. To earn the $1,000 the different departments of the church will cease giving bazars, concerts, food sales, etc., for the purpose of raising money, and instead devote themselves to building up the membership, enlarging the Sunday-school and interesting themselves actively in any other line of church work that needs building. Under the provisions of the offer the membership must be doubled in the six months—counting only the members who now reside in Billings—the average attendance of the Sunday-school must have reached 200, and the average attendance at church service must have reached the same number.

Regarding Toronto Attendance.

Advice received from the Railway Lines gives the attendance by rail at the Toronto convention at 3,200, including those using the boat from Lewiston via Niagara Falls. Of this number, 1,268 persons joined special parties moving via Detroit and the Boat Line to Buffalo, arranged by E. E. Elliott, National Secretary of the Brotherhood Movement at Kansas City. The railway people say ours was the largest movement recorded to a religious national gathering during 1913.

A new "Covenant for Christian Men" by Reuben Butchart of Toronto, is being circulated by the National Brotherhood office. It is most timely, and to the point. We should have thousands of laymen in our churches who will subscribe to such a covenant, and set to work to make the local church actually what it now is only in theory. Copies of the covenant may be secured from the Brotherhood office, R. A. Long Building, Kansas City, Mo.

For the past two months a church school has been held in the First church of Norfolk, Va. The classes have been held with an educational-social program to test out the possibilities of such work being carried on permanently in the church lecture room. The test proved the large possibilities of such a program and it is possible that this congregation upon its removal from its down-town site, will make provision for the continuing of the work.

This seems to be the day of the pastor-evangelist C. M. Chilton is loaned by the church at St. Joseph, Mo., for an occasional meeting, Graham Frank and Charles S. Medbury advise they are compelled to refuse several meetings each month, and we anticipate this is true of many of our preachers. George H. Combs has recently been "farmed out" to the Union Avenue Church in St. Louis for a meeting.

Christian Century stock is going up! A request for a copy of the Christian Century, issue of Dec 21, 1911, with an offer of $1 for the one paper, has come to the office. If some good friend will send in the Century of this date, we shall be glad to send him the dollar—unless he would rather donate it to the Thirtieth Anniversary Subscription Campaign Fund!

During the next National Convention in Atlanta, there will be a daily paper published in the interest of the Convention, carrying all the announcements of the day. No announcements are to be made from the platform. The Atlanta Publicity Committee have asked LeRoy M. Anderson, pastor at Macon, Georgia, to take entire charge of the daily paper.

The Convention hall, seating fifteen thousand persons has been engaged for the meetings of the Student Volunteer meeting at Kansas City, December 31 to Jan. 5. John R. Mott, the President, cables from China that he will return to America and will preside at the meeting. Fifteen thousand persons are expected to be in attendance.

Kansas City has an undenominational training school for Sunday-school workers, which meets each Monday night. The enrollment is one of the largest for such schools in the country. Dan. P. Gribben, one of our own laymen, is President of the Kansas City Sunday-school Association and chairman of the training school.

A hint to the Disciples. In the Methodist Episcopal Church (North) the official boards of churches are grouped according to whether or not every member of the board of officers is a subscriber to a church paper. All churches having a church paper in the home of every officer in the church is a "Class A" church.

The West Fourth Avenue Church of Columbus, Ohio, reports 492 additions to the church during the past year, $70.73 raised for all causes, the Sunday-school increased to an average attendance of 506, and the church made a living link, supporting L. HOW THE GENERAL CONVENTION CAME.

In order that all may have a clear knowledge of the steps by which the General Convention of Churches of Christ came to be organized, and its first session to be held in Toronto, Sept. 30th to October 16th, last, I have written the following brief statement of the procedure followed by the brethren during these few years since the Centennial Convention at Pittsburgh.

1. At that Convention, in October, 1909, a Committee of seven was ordered, to be selected by the various missionary boards and the State Secretaries' Association, to consider the questions of the "Reconstruction and Unification of our Missionary and Philanthropic Interests." These Boards selected the following as their representatives on that committee: A. B. Philputt, Mrs. Anna R. Atwater, I. J. Spencer, C. J. Tanner, J. H. Mohorter, W. A. Baldwin and W. F. Richardson. At the Topeka Convention, the following year, three members were added to the committee; namely Judge F. A. Henry, B. A. Abbott and Finis Idleman.

2. During the succeeding two years, that committee carefully and prayerfully worked at the task assigned to it, and at the Louisville Convention, in 1912, presented its Report, together with a Constitution for the proposed General Convention. This Report was adopted by the great mass meeting before which it was laid, and the Constitution likewise, with the exception of one section only, which had been stricken out in advance by the Committee.

3. This mass meeting ordered the appointment of a Committee of Fifteen, whose duty it should be to constitute and appoint holding of the first General Convention at the officers and committees necessary to the Toronto. Of this committee of fifteen, one member was to be selected by each of the participating missionary boards, and the State Secretaries Association, and the eight others by a special committee named by the chairman of the mass meeting, Pres. F. D. Kerschner.

4. Pres. Kerschner named as this committee of five the following brethren: Peter Ainslie, J. B. Briney, Carey E. Morgan, Miner Lee Bates and Chas S. Medbury; and these, in turn, selected as the eight additional members of the Committee of Fifteen the following: W. N. Briney, J. H. MacNeill, E. B. Bagby, W. H. Book, W. C. Morro, P. H. Welsheimer, R. A. Doan and E. A. Gongwer. The representatives of the boards on this committee were as follows: I. N. McCash, S. J. Corey, Mrs Ida W. Harrison, J. H. Mohorter, A. B. Philputt, W. A. Baldwin and W. F. Richardson.

5. This committee followed the instructions of the brethren given them at Louisville, and the convention at Toronto was the result. The Report of the Committee of Fifteen was adopted by that convention without a dissenting vote, and the Constitution adopted at Louisville the year before was ratified by a large majority.

Such is the record, very briefly given, of the process by which the Disciples of Christ in their Centennial Convention at Pittsburg in 1909, brought about the organization of the General Convention of Churches of Christ. Lest anyone might imagine that this new method of organization might mean a change in the spirit of our co-operative work, a resolution was presented by a committee of six brethren, at Toronto, declaring the simple and unauthoritative meaning of the said convention. This committee was made up of the following brethren: J. H. Garrison, A. McLean, F. D. Kershner, Z. T. Sweeney, Peter Ainslie and Chalmers McPherson. Their resolution was adopted.

their way in freedom and love, such as desire to co-operate having that privilege, and those which see fit to stand aloof being still loved and esteemed as sister churches of our Lord Jesus Christ. We shall never, please God, divide over questions of plans or methods. In brotherly love we can differ and still work, each in his own way.

TO INDIANA MINISTERS AND CHURCHES.

You no doubt have heard of our new opportunity. If you have not read this.

Marshall T. Reeves of Columbus has offered to give the state another $5,000 in the year 1914, if the individual members of the state will give a like amount or he will give a dollar for every dollar given up to and including $5,000.

Acting upon the faith and believing that the great Brotherhood of Indiana will respond nobly to this generous offer, the state has been divided into five districts; namely, the Northern, the Western, the Eastern, the Southeastern and the southwestern. Five good men have been called to take up the work of state evangelists, giving all of their time to their onw districts. A. L. Martin of La Fontaine has been called to the work of the Northern District, T. J. Legg will confine his labors to the Western District. Mr. Legg's home will be, as it has been for many years, in the city of Indianapolis, 1402 Pleasant St. G. I. Hoover resigns the pastorate of the great Tipton church to do the work of an evangelist in the Eastern District. Melnotte Miller has been working since October and is in the Southwestern District. For the present his address is Linton, but he will probably make Terre Haute his home, and Fred R. Davies, who lives at Charlestown, has been faithfully at work for the last two months for the Southeastern District. On the first day of January Mr. Hoover and Mr. Martin will join the three already at work and these five men will be working for the Master, we hope, for many months to come.

M. T. Reeves has purchased an auto for each of these five district evangelists. It is his desire to supply all necessary expenses, including tires, gasoline and oil.

May I ask the ministers of the churches to co-operate with these good men to the fullest extent possible? These men, brethren, are worthy of our entire confidence and trust. Let us all work together that Indiana may occupy the place that rightly belongs to her, and be at the very top of the states in good work done in this restoration movement.

The state board has instructed that a state paper, published once per month, be issued from this office. We shall be glad to have your co-operation in this good work also. The future looks bright. Let us work that our expectations may be realized.

C. W. Cauble,
Corresponding Secretary of Indiana.

RESOLUTIONS.

Relative to the Resignation of J .Fred Jones, State Field Secretary.

Whereas: Bro. J. Fred Jones has declined to accept the office of Field Secretary of the Illinois Christian Missionary society, unanimously tendered him for another year, and has accepted a similar position with the State Missionary Society of North Carolina, and,

Whereas: The committee appointed by the state board of the I. C. M. S. has urged that he be released from his engagement with the North Carolina State Missionary Society, and this request has been courteously but firmly declined, and,

Whereas: Brother Jones has served as state evangelist and field secretary of Illinois for eighteen years, which term makes him at this time the dean of all the state secretaries, and,

Whereas: He has at all times proven himself to be a Christian gentleman, faithful and true to the gospel, energetic and efficient in all his work, zealous for the Church, and a friend of the preacher, with a vital knowledge of the field and men. Scores of churches have been planted and rendered self-sustaining the Permanent Fund of the society has been built up, the missionary spirit has been developed and the churches quickened in many lines of Christian service. He has kept pace with the growing demands of the age and has ever held before the churches their enlarging opportunities in the changing order of society. In a word, the present prosperity of our churches and the missionary outlook have been largely made posible through the tireless energy and consecration of our beloved secretary.

His relation with the board have been most cordial throughout. He has enjoyed our love and confidence, and has ever been helpful with his wise counsel and timely advice. He has co-operated fully with the board in the plans of work and has extended this spirit throughout the state so that the agencies of our society have been bound together in the closest ties of the fellowship of service. He retires with the love and best wishes of all. Therefore, be it Resolved, First: That we prayerfully commend Brother Jones to the Brethren of the Southland, and especially to the state board of North Carolina.

Resolved, Second: That we heartily congratulate the North Carolina brethren upon securing such a competent man for their work.

Resolved, Third: That we shall follow with brotherly interest his labors with the brethren of North Carolina and shall earnestly pray that God may richly bless their mutual service in Christ.

Resolved, Fourth: That copies of these resolutions be sent to Brother Jones, to the missionary board of North Carolina, to our religious papers and that they be spread upon the minutes of our own society.

HAMILTON COLLEGE NOTES.

On Thanksgiving Day the college dining-hall presented a truly festal picture. Under the direction of Miss Connelly and Mrs. Parrish, the tables were arranged so as to form a gigantic H, the initial of 'Hamilton," decorated in the college colors. A pretty set piece about two feet square, symbolic of the day, graced the central cross-section. Though many of the students living in Central Kentucky were in their homes for the day, and many others had accepted the hospitality of friends, yet over one hundred sat together for a season of good-fellowship and thanksgiving in the college home.

Dr. Lillian South, State Bacteriologist, and president of the Southern Women's Medical Association, delivered, on Wednesday evening before the students and faculty, an illustrated stereopticon lecture upon Public Sanitation. Other speakers at the chapel service during the past few days have been Mr. S. M. Bedford upon the subject "Bob Taylor" and Judge W. T. Lafferty upon "The Value of Parliamentary Drill." Practical work in this subject is being given each week to the young women of Hamilton College, who show themselves both keenly interested and efficient in the subject.

The board of examiners of Mount Holyoke College for Women, in Massachusetts, have recently advised President Shearin of Hamilton College that henceforth full credit would be given at the eastern institution for all students entering there from Hamilton. During the past few years the local school has had graduates to enter without examination Vassar, Barnard and Wellesley Colleges and the following leading state universities, viz.: those of Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Missouri and Michigan. Mount Holyoke is one of the three largest New England colleges for women, and is the third to definitely extend to Hamilton from this section the rights of entrance without examination.

At the request of the Secretary of the National Conservation Congress of Washington, D. C., Dr. Shearin has appointed the following delegates to the fifth annual convention of this body in the above-named city on November 17, 18, and 19: Mesdames Claude E. Garth, Cecil Cantrill, and J. W. Porter, all of Lexington, and Mrs. H. L. Ragland, of Washington. This organization is probably the foremost of its kind in the country, since it enlists the activity and suport of leading men and women both among the officers of the national goverment, as well as in less public walks of life, and since it has under its supervision the great national problems of conservation of forests, mines, oil-wells, the public health, and related subjects.

OHIO SECRETARY'S LETTER.

Again this year results in our mission churches are developing in a remarkable way. Very recent mail has brought reports of meetings of marked success in a number of the fields. At Marion a two weeks' meeting resulted in 31 additions. Chas. A. Pearce was assisted by J. E. Sturgis as leader of the music. W. G. Oram at West Dayton had the help of Roger H. Fife. There were 37 additions. At Greenfield, S. B. Norviel called Miss Elizabeth Bailey of Dayton to assist him as leader of song and personal worker. There were over fifty additions. Charles H. Bloom of Cadiz was with J. F. Baxter at Cambridge thirteen days. There were 32 additions. L. N D. Wells' "Volunteer" meeting was with the mission church at Barberton, assisting A. M. Bird. Twenty-nine were added to the membership. L. I. Mercer had the assistance of Brethren Boden, Tisdall, Low, Rutledge and Boblitt in a short rally, resulting in 13 additions to the membership of the church at Lancaster. Others have achieved splendid results. Some of them show a large number of additions at regular services.

The state secretary has recently been in the field in three of the missions, Tiffin, Cadiz and Cambridge. At Tiffin he spent a number of days in a general congregational rally with G. Webster Moore. In twenty-one months under the leadership of Mr. Moore the Sunday-school has been trebled and the active membership of the church greatly enlarged. The men's class has come to have an attendance of nearly fifty and the Sunday-school often passes the 200 mark.

Cadiz has recently dedicated its new auditorium, report of which has been made in these columns. The average attendance at the Sunday-school for the past three months has been larger than that of any other school in the county.

J. F. Baxter began his labors in Cambridge and Byesville last March. At Byesville a new tabernacle has been erected and the work has been successfully carried on. The church had ceased to meet for a number of years. At Cambridge Mr. Baxter found 58 members enrolled. The Sunday-school attendance was about 50. Last Sunday the Sunday-school numbered 181 and to the original 58 members 59 have been added. The work in this field is supported from contributions of the Ladies' Aid Societies.

Our evangelists, C. N. Williams and Traverce Harrison are diligent in their ministry. C. N. Williams is holding his second meeting with the church at Ripley. At last report there were 58 additions and the meeting had another week to run. Traverce Harrison is the McDonald Fund evangelist. A cancellation of a date in his field of labor came just at the same time that an urgent appeal came for a meeting at New Straitsville. He was sent to that place under the auspices of the Lathrop Cooley Evangelistic Fund. There were fifteen additions to the membership of the church.

Our Volunteer evangelists have been reaping a good harvest. The little church at Coke Otto, Hamilton, was organized at the close of a Volunteer meeting by W. H. Boden four days before the disastrous flood of last March. The village was terribly devastated but the church rallied and continued its work. E. S. DeMiller of Wilmington has just closed a meeting there which strengthened them greatly There were eighteen additions.

JOINT MISSIONARY APPORTIONMENT POSTONED.

In the report of the executive committee which was adopted at Toronto, there is this recommendation among others, "that after the General Missionary Budget has been adopted by the convention, the executive committee, in conference with the Advisory committee, shall, immediately after the adjournment of the general convention, make a suggestive apportionment of this budget to the various states and shall send these apportionments to the various state boards and ask them to estimate and report back to the executive committee the amount to be raised by each church in their respective states for each of the above mentioned interests." At the meeting of the executive and Advisory committees which was held in St. Louis December 3, the following action was taken concerning this joint missionary apportionment:

ABSTRACT FROM THE MINUTES OF THE MEETING OF THE EXECUTIVE AND ADVISORY COMMITTEE.

"President Hill M. Bell, presiding, stated that the National Secretaries Association had a communication to present and called upon W. R. Warren, President of the association, to state it. President Warren called upon Stephen J. Corey who had been appointed to make the statement. Mr. Corey presented the suggestion that inasmuch as the task of making out the apportionments scientifically for all the churches is too large to be accomplished in less than several months, and inasmuch as this would be too late for use in the current year, and inasmuch as an incompletely prepared apportionment would result in much harm, therefore the societies should send out their apportionments as usual for the current year and that the executive committee be given the rest of the year for the task of completing scientifically the entire apportionment for use in the next year."

"At a meeting a few hours later President Bell announced that the executive committee, after consultation, had agreed to accept the suggestion of the Secretaries Association."

The missionary societies are co-operating in getting this joint apportionment in the best possible condition and it is hoped that it will be ready to be sent to the churches immediately before the Atlanta Convention.

Luke 10:1-24. Memory Verses, 1, 2.

Golden Text.—It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you. Matt. 10:20.

American Standard Bible.
Copyright, 1901, by Thomas Nelson & Sons.
(Used by permission.)

() Now after these things the Lord appointed seventy others, and sent them two and two before his face into every city and place, whither he himself was about to come. (2) And he said unto them, The harvest is plenteous, but the labourers are few: pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest, that he send forth labourers into his harvest. (3) Go your ways: behold, I send you forth as lambs in the midst of wolves. (4) Carry no purse, no wallet, no shoes: and salute no man on the way. (5) And into whatsoever house ye shall enter, first say, Peace be to this house. (6) And if a son of peace be there, your peace shall rest upon him: but if not, it shall turn to you again. (7) And in that same house remain, eating and drinking such things as they give: for the labourer is worthy of his hire. Go not from house to house. (8) And into whatsoever city ye enter, and they receive you, eat such things as are set before you: (9) and heal the sick that are therein, and say unto them, The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you. (10) But into whatsoever city ye shall enter, and they receive you not, go out into the streets thereof and say, (11) Even the dust from your city, that cleaveth to our feet, we do wipe off against you: howbeit know this, that the kingdom of God is come nigh. (12) I say unto you, It shall be more tolerable in that day for Sodom, than for that city. (13) Woe unto thee, Chorazin! woe unto thee, Bethsaida! for if the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, which were done in you, they would have repented long ago, sitting in sackcloth and ashes. (14) Howbeit it shall be more tolerable for Tyre and Sidon in the judgment, than for you. (15) And thou, Capernaum, shalt thou be exalted unto heaven? thou shalt be brought down unto Hades. (16) He that heareth you heareth me; and he that rejecteth you rejecteth me; and he that rejecteth me rejecteth him that sent me.

(17) And the seventy returned with joy, saying, Lord, even the demons are subject unto us in thy name. (18) And he said unto them, I beheld Satan fallen as lightning from heaven. (19) Behold, I have given you authority to tread upon serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy: and nothing shall in any wise hurt you. (20) Howbeit in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you; but rejoice that your names are written in heaven.

(21) In that same hour he rejoiced in the Holy Spirit, and said, I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou didst hide these things from the wise and understanding, and didst reveal them unto babes; yea, Father; for so it was well-pleasing in thy sight. (22) All things have been delivered unto me of my Father: and no one knoweth who the Son is, save the Father; and who the Father is, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him. (23) And turning to the disciples, he said privately, Blessed are the eyes which see the things that ye see: (24) for I say unto you, that many prophets and kings desired to see the things which ye see, and saw them not; and to hear the things which ye hear, and heard them not.

Verse by Verse.

v. 1. Seventy others: That is, besides the Twelve. He was about to come: To continue the work they were to open up.

v. 2. He said unto them: Compare this with the charge given to the Twelve, in Mt. 9:5-15. Pray ye: Notice how Jesus emphasized the importance of prayer as a way to results in soul-winning.

v. 3. As lambs among wolves: Did the fate of the early Christian leaders justify this prophecy of Jesus?

v. 4. Salute no man: Why? Because the Oriental salutation took much time.

v. 5. Peace be to this house: This was an ordinary greeting, and was meaningful.

v. 6. It shall turn to you again: The blessing was to be withdrawn.

v. 7, 8. Here is described a peaceful, simple way of living that would not injure the work being done by the seventy.

v. 10, 11. Even the dust from your city, etc.: It was not, and is not, the way of Christians to force themselves upon men. Tact is always to be observed.

v. 12. Even Sodom: Which was so wicked that not even ten righteous persons could be found there.

v. 13, 14. Tyre and Sidon: Cities in the valley of the Dead Sea, and noted for their wickedness.

v. 15. Thou, Capernaum, shalt be brought down: Why? Because much light was given her, in the presence and work of Jesus, and she did not appreciate that great light. As is one's light, so is one's responsibility.

v. 16. He that heareth you, heareth me: Great is the responsibility, but great also is the honor of the heralds of Jesus.

At the Heart of the Lesson.

The picture is startling. The portrayal is graphic. The world Jesus found is sketched in bold outline in a single sentence. "I send you forth as lambs in the midst of wolves." What an arraignment of social and political conditions of his day. It is a condensed, yet comprehensive commentary upon the utter selfishness of humanity, the godless greed, the untempered ambition, the bitter quarrels and contentions which were abounding on every hand. Looking backward Jesus discovered the wrecks along the shores of time. From the ancient splendors of Babylon to the glory of the Rome of his day there was a continuous succession of national catastrophies. Kingdoms were established only to be overturned, within a few years. Wars of conquest had been almost unremitting. The dripping sword had rarely been sheathed. Untold thousands had fallen upon fields of battle. The collapse of kingdoms had been followed by various political experiments. At every period some leader or teacher had appealed, expostulated, and propounded but with trifling results. The aestheticism of Greece in her period of greatness had failed to develop character strong enough to meet the seductions of luxury and the star that shone over the acropolis was in eclipse. The screaming eagles of Rome had drowned out the music of the world. The tramp of marching armies had terrified until no nation dared decline assent to the mandate from the imperial throne on the Tiber. Virtue had vanished. It was difficult to secure vestal virgins to keep the lamp burning in the Temple of Vesta. The one place of all, where Jesus might have expected exalted ideals, spiritual aspiration and purity of worship was upon Mount Moriah. But while the religion of the Hebrews was immeasurably better than that of their heathen neighbors, even here, temporal and material interests had triumphed and the Phariseeism and the Sadduceeism of the day of Christ was marked more by ferocity than faith, and unholy ambition ruled instead of spiritual aspiration. In such a world Jesus proposed to found a kingdom without spear or sword. To this end he engaged in his ministry and went to his cross. So great a task had never been undertaken before, and it is one of the surest marks of the divinity of Christ, that undaunted, unafraid, unhesitating, he calmly laid the foundation, furnished the plan for the superstructure and prophesied its ultimate completion.

DISCIPLESHIP AMONG DEGENERATES.

"After these things"—that is, the revelations and instructions and prophesies which he had just declared to his disciples—"the Lord appointed seventy others." He had already appointed the twelve and had sent them forth on their commission, giving them power to heal the sick and to work various miracles. He is about to go to Jerusalem for the last time. Every minute is precious. No time must be lost. The towns and villages into which he shall enter must be prepared to receive him, or if their attitude is antagonistic he can waste no time with them. Therefore, he appointed the seventy. "He sent them two and two into every city before his face, whither he himself was about to come." The scope of activity is widening. Disciples are multiplying. Doors of opportunity are opening. By this act of commission he lays the responsibility of kingdom building upon his followers. His commission is a declaration of his confidence in regenerate humanity to win the world. He had met with violent opposition but also with encouraging response. He believed in the savableness of mankind and even now saw the fields white with the harvests and urged his followers to join with him in thrusting in the sickle, which simply meant bringing to decision and commitment many who were waiting for light and who were ready to respond to truth when they really comprehended it. With encouraging assurances he prepared the seventy for their task. He doubtless emphasized the urgency of service, and warned them of the dangers which they would inevitably meet. "Go your way. Behold I send you forth as lambs in the midst of wolves."

ADJUSTMENT AND ADAPTATION.

"Into whatsoever house ye shall enter first say, 'Peace be to this house.'" Here he rerevealed the true attitude of the disciple of Jesus toward humanity everywhere. The coming of Jesus was proclaimed with, "Peace on earth, goodwill to men." The mission of Christianity is to "overcome evil with good." To change anarchy and chaos to orderliness and the spirit of obedience and the higher laws of life. The attitude of the church toward the unattached multitude must be one of sympathetic interest and the desire to bestow peace in the nature of a permanent beatitude must possess the children of God. Rich, beautiful and blessed as are the gifts of God their acceptance is never compelled. "Behold I stand at the door and knock." Jesus waits with willingness to bless, and to contribute his own peace, but it is the gentle knock asking for admission, and not the thunder of the mighty battering ram that would break down the gates of brass and bars of iron. We cannot free an entrance, even for the message of the kingdom. We can approach in kindliness and make our appeal in love but we can go no farther. The seventy were entreated to adapt themselves to circumstances, to avoid fault-finding, to accept hospitality where it was offered without considering too much their own preferences and prejudices, in other words, to make the best of the situation.

THE LIMITS OF RESPONSIBILITY.

Vs. 11 & 12. The city that did not receive them Jesus declared would receive punishment proportionate to the light which was offered. The seventy were to shake the dust off their feet in testimony against that city. Here then we have the limit of Christian responsibility. It is to lovingly, patiently persistently proclaim the Gospel of Christ. The church is not responsible for the conversion of the world. It is responsible for gospelizing the world. "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel." We are not to be overwhelmed or over-burdened except on account of failure to discharge our duty. When this has been done our responsibility ceases and we must leave the rest with God. We are not asked to carry the burden of the world's unbelief. In the degree in which the church may have neglected her duty to proclaim Christ to the unchurched masses she may well repent and in humility plead for pardon, but to make the church accountable for the unbelief of the world is unChristian and absurd. Even the appointed seventy found doors closed against them and met with determined opposition.

FATALITY OF REJECTING THE GOSPEL.

Nothing could be more definitely declared than the inevitableness of judgment resulting from deliberate rejection of the gospel of grace. Here is a truth all too much neglected in our time. With soft words and honeyed phrases we gloss over the consequences of the rejection of Jesus Christ. We need to hark back to the scriptures which declare, that if the watchman failed to give the signal, if the trumpet gave an uncertain sound, the lives destroyed will be required at the watchman's hands. Chorazin and Bethsaida represent both communities and individuals favored with the gospel message but indifferently pursuing the ways of unbelief and given to sinful self-indulgence. The woes pronounced upon Capernaum were marvelously and wonderfully fulfilled and stand as a warning against "sinning against the light." Jesus Christ identifies the gospel with himself. Indeed the gospel is nothing other than the good news of salvation through Jesus Christ the Lord. Acceptance means life, rejection means death and no evasion can change the significance of these terms. The final commission of Jesus Christ included every believing disciple, not the ordained ministry alone, but every believer in Jesus is commissioned to proclaim salvation to a lost world.

The Highway to Efficiency

in the Sunday School is

The Bethany System

What some of our Leaders say of it:

"Nothing Could Pry Us Loose"

We began using the Bethany Graded Lessons at their first issuance and have increased the supply from year to year as the literature for all grades was published. There is nothing in the series that is not now used by our school. Nothing could pry our superintendents and teachers loose from these lessons. They meet the needs of pupils of all years and make the teacher's work a joy. We have no word with which to express our satisfaction with the series.

H. H. HARMON,
First Church, Lincoln, Neb.

"As Nearly Perfect as Can Be"

We have used the Bethany Graded Lessons for three years, and the longer we use them the better we like them. They are the latest and best thing in Sunday-school material, and when all of the text books have been prepared it will offer a Sunday-school course as nearly perfect as can be. They certainly make teaching and learning easy, and cover in a most adequate way the whole ground of education in Christian service. The teachers' text books are especially valuable and constitute in themselves a course in Sunday-school pedagogy.

H. D. C. MACLACHLAN,
Seventh Street Church, Richmond, Va.

"Thoroughly Edited"

I have recently had the pleasure of examining closely a set of the Bethany Graded Lessons, together with a recent copy of "The Conquest." I want to congratulate you upon the high quality of this literature. It is certainly a great satisfaction to feel that we are now able to put into the hands of all our Sunday-school pupils, material so splendidly classified and so thoroughly edited as is the above mentioned.

L. J. MARSHALL,
Pastor Wabash Ave. Church, Kansas City, Mo.

"We Would Not Turn Back"

We are using the Bethany Graded Lessons. We would not turn back. The service our Sunday-school specialists are giving us as represented in this course is making a new day in religious education.

FINIS IDLEMAN,
Pastor Central Church, Des Moines, Ia.

"Unanimously the Bethany Series"

After a campaign led by Miss Eva Lemert of Kansas City, Mo., resulting in the thorough grading and departmentizing of the school, we had to decide the matter of graded helps. A committee of three was appointed, consisting of the pastor, superintendent and one member of the Executive Committee. This committee made an individual examination of lesson helps and decided unanimously in favor of the Bethany series, arriving at their decisions independently and solely upon the merits of the literature. So far as I know these lessons are giving entire satisfaction.

EDGAR DeWITT JONES,
Pastor First Church, Bloomington, Ill.

"Nothing to Compare With Them"

We have been using the Bethany Graded Lessons from the time you began to publish them and we are very highly pleased with them. We have often had occasion to compare them with the publications of other houses and thus far can say we have found nothing that compares with them. I am teaching a young men's class in the course, "The World a Field for Christian Service," and am glad to say that it seems to me the best adapted for young men of high school age of all courses I have ever seen. My class is becoming very enthusiastic over it.

P. J. RICE,
Pastor First Church, El Paso, Tex.

"Have Created Enthusiasm"

Over a year ago our school adopted the Bethany Graded Lessons, upon vote of our teachers, who had examined personally the texts for their respective grades. They are a delight to all. The missionary lessons appeal very strongly to pupils and teachers. The first year Senior lessons have created enthusiasm on the part of both pupils and teachers I most heartily commend the Bethany Graded Lessons to all who may think of grading their schools or have found other lessons unsatisfactory.

T. E. WINTER,
Pastor First Church, Fulton, Mo.

"Delighted"

Our Sunday-school, which has lately begun the use of the Bethany Graded Lessons, seems to be delighted with them. I have heard no word of unfavorable criticism and very many words of appreciation. Our teachers like the form and material of these lessons.

GRAHAM FRANK,
Pastor Liberty, Mo.

"Best on the Market"

We consider the Bethany Graded Lessons for the Beginners and Primary department the best on the market of our own brotherhood and second to none of other communions. Congratulations!

J. J. TISDALL,
Pastor Wilson Avenue Church, Columbus, O.
